

START

Microfilmed By:

NORTHEAST DOCUMENT CONSERVATION CENTER

Andover, MA 01810

OCTOBER 1993

Camera Operator: Kathy Wilder

MICROFILMED
August 1993 - April 1994

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SCRAPBOOK MICROFILMING PROJECT

Funded in part by
THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES

Grant No. PS-20709-93

COPYRIGHT

The copyright law of the United States (Title 17, UNITED STATES CODE) governs the making of photocopies or other reproductions of copyrighted materials.

Under certain conditions specified in the law, libraries and archives are authorized to furnish a photocopy or other reproduction. One of these specified conditions is that the photocopy or reproduction is not to be "used for any purpose other than private study, scholarship or research." If a user makes a request for, or later uses, a photocopy or reproduction for purposes in excess of "fair use," that user may be liable for copyright infringement.

This institution reserves the right to refuse to accept a copying order if, in its judgement, fulfillment of the order would involve violation of copyright law.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MICROFILMING PROJECT

A COOPERATIVE PROJECT BETWEEN THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ARCHIVES AND THE BOSTON PUBLIC LIBRARY
(AUGUST 1993 - APRIL 1994)

This microfilming project includes two collections of scrapbooks housed in two separate repositories. The first set of scrapbooks (80 volumes) resides within the Allen A. Brown Collection in the Music Department of the Boston Public Library (BPL). Their call number is M.125.5. The second set of scrapbooks (132 volumes) resides within the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) Archives' Press Clippings collection. They have the designation Pres 56.

The BPL scrapbooks begin with the founding of the BSO in 1881 and continue, through 79 seasons, to 1960. Articles consist mainly of reviews and feature stories from Boston and New York newspapers. Occasionally, magazine articles and press releases are also included. The scrapbooks cover most aspects of the BSO.

The BSO scrapbooks run from 1889, the Orchestra's 9th season, to 1973. In addition to local reviews and features, the volumes contain articles culled from national and international publications. The scrapbooks document, in detail, all aspects of the BSO: The Symphony Orchestra (including subscription concerts, tours, and trips), the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Festival, the Tanglewood Music Center, and Symphony Hall.

The two sets of scrapbooks have been filmed as two separate entities. Researchers wanting to look at specific seasons or subjects must examine both sets of films to ensure full coverage.

The scrapbooks do not represent the complete holdings of either location on the subject of the BSO.

Requests for positive microfilm copies of individual rolls, or of film sets, should be directed to the respective repositories.

Music Department
Boston Public Library
P. O. Box 286
Boston, MA 02117

Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives
Symphony Hall
Boston, MA 02115

M.125

.5

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SCRAPBOOKS

1881-1882 TO 1959-1960

1181-18 to 1915-16 compiled by Allen A. Brown

1916-17 to 1937-38 compiled by Mary A. Brown

1938-39 to 1959-60 compiled by the Music Department

These scrapbooks contain reviews of concerts, articles concerning the Symphony, its players and conductors, interviews with soloists and composers, occasional letters and notes, an occasional autograph, ticket stubs, pictures of conductors, the Symphony, soloists and composers, and caricatures.

In the scrapbooks compiled by Mr. Brown, it is possible to find articles or reviews pasted on a program which does not have the same date. Mr. Brown used multiple copies of programs for his scrapbook "fillers;" the fillers have no relation to the articles pasted on them. The fillers may be partially to completely covered.

These scrapbooks do not contain the complete programs. For the complete program, the researcher must consult either the hard copies found in either the Boston Symphony Archives or the Boston Public Library's Music Department or the microfilm of programs published by KTO Microform (Millwood, New York) and dating from the 1881-82 season through the 1974-75 season.

Generally, one volume represents one Symphony season; the volume and season should therefore match. Depending upon the compiler and the clippings available, some reviews and articles may be found concerning the Promenade Concerts, Boston Pops, the Berkshire Music Festival and Tanglewood.

The Music Department of the Boston Public Library does maintain other materials concerning the Boston Symphony Orchestra in other scrapbooks and files. Please consult with the Music Librarian for these materials.

VOLUMES 38-40

1918-19 TO 1920-21

THIS REEL CONTAINS MANUSCRIPT MATERIAL.

MANUSCRIPTS MAY NOT

BE REPRODUCED

WITHOUT PERMISSION.

TECHNICAL DATA

IMAGE PLACEMENT: IA IB IIA IIB

REDUCTION RATIO: 1.2X

FILM STOCK:

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

PRECISIONSM RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

4.5 mm

MULTIPLE EXPOSURES DUE TO COLOR VARIATIONS AND OVERLAPPING MATERIAL

VOLUME 38

1918-1919

THIS VOLUME CONTAINS MANUSCRIPT MATERIAL.

MANUSCRIPTS MAY NOT

BE REPRODUCED

WITHOUT PERMISSION.

☆☆ M 125.5. 1918/19

THE PUBLIC LIBRARY OF THE CITY OF BOSTON
THE ALLEN A. BROWN COLLECTION

THE OFFICERS AND TRUSTEES
OF THE
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
INCORPORATED

FREDERICK P. CABOT	-	-	President
GALEN L. STONE	-	-	Vice-President
FREDERICK E. LOWELL	-	-	Treasurer

FREDERICK P. CABOT
ERNEST B. DANE
M. A. DE WOLFE HOWE
JOHN ELLERTON LODGE
FREDERICK E. LOWELL
ARTHUR LYMAN
HENRY B. SAWYER
GALEN L. STONE
BENTLEY W. WARREN

PUBLIC LIBRARY
OF THE
CITY OF BOSTON

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Thirty-eighth Season, 1918-1919

HENRI RABAUD, Conductor

PERSONNEL

VIOLINS.

Fradkin, F. Concert-master.	Roth, O.	Rissland, K.	Bak, A.
Noack, S.	Hoffmann, J.	Theodorowicz, J.	Mahn, F.
Ribarsch, A.	Goldstein, H.	Sauvlet, H.	Tak, E.
Traupe, W.	Gerardi, A.	Grünberg, M.	Di Natale, J.
Thillois, F.	Spoor, S.	Goldstein, S.	Gunderson, R.
Fiedler, B.	Ringwall, R.	Henkle, R.	Diamond, S.
Deane, C.	Kurth, R.	Bryant, M.
Balas, J.	Fiedler, G.	Langley, A.

VIOLAS.

Barrier, C.	Werner, H.	v. Veen, H.	Mager, G.	Van Wynbergen, C.
Wittmann, F.	Berlin, V.	Shirley, P.	Fiedler, A.	Tartas, M.

VIOLONCELLOS.

Malkin, J.	Miquelle, G.	Barth, C.	Belinski, M.	Fabrizio, E.
Schroeder, A.	Nagel, R.	Nast, L.	Mingels, E.	Stockbridge, C.

BASSES.

Villani, A.	Agnesy, K.	Seydel, T.	Ludwig, O.
Gerhardt, G.	Jaeger, A.	Huber, E.	Schurig, R.

FLUTES.

Laurent, G.
Brooke, A.
DeMailly, C.

OBOES.

Longy, G.
Lenom, C.
Stanislaus, H.

CLARINETS.

Sand, A.
Forlani, N.
Vannini, A.

BASSOONS.

Laus, A.
Mueller, E.
Piller, B.

PICCOLO.

Battles, A.

ENGLISH HORNS.

Mueller, F.
Speyer, L.

BASS CLARINET.

Stievenard, E.

CONTRA-BASSOON.

Fuhrmann, M.

HORNS.

Wendler, G.
Lorbeer, H.
Hain, F.
Gebhardt, W.

HORNS.

Jaenicke, B.
Miersch, E.
Hess, M.
Hubner, E.

TRUMPETS.

Heim, G.
Mann, J.
Nappi, G.
Kloepfel, L.

TROMBONES.

Adam, E.
Sordillo, F.
Mausebach, A.
Kenfield, L.

TUBA.

Mattersteig, P.

HARPS.

Holy, A.
Cella, T.

TYMPAN.

Neumann, S.
Gardner, C.

PERCUSSION.

Ludwig, C.
Zahn, F.
Burkhardt, H.

ORGAN.
Snow, A.

LIBRARIAN.
Rogers, L. J.

Henri Rabaud
Boston 1919

1918-1919

SYMPHONY HALL

38th Season

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Pierre Monteux will conduct the Concerts in October Announcement as to the conductorship of the subsequent concerts will soon be made

24 Friday Afternoons at 2.30, beginning October 11
24 Saturday Evenings at 8, beginning October 12

SOLOISTS

HAROLD BAUER	JASCHA HEIFETZ
JOSEPH BONNET	JOSEF HOFMANN
SOPHIE BRASLAU	MISCHA LEVITZKI
FLORENCE EASTON	JOSEPH MALKIN
FREDRIC FRADKIN	ARTHUR RUBINSTEIN
MABEL GARRISON	OLGA SAMAROFF
EMILIO DE GOGORZA	JACQUES THIBAUD

SUBSCRIBE NOW

Seats at all prices may now be obtained.

Applications for tickets for either series of twenty-four concerts should be made at Symphony Hall.

Ticket holders for the season 1918-1919 will have an option on their same seats for following seasons.

Prices: $60, $48, $36, $24, $15, plus 10% war tax.

W. H. BRENNAN, Manager

G. E. JUDD, Assistant Manager

(OVER)

JOSEF HOFMANN
Piano

FLORENCE EASTON
Soprano
Metropolitan Opera Co.

JACQUES THIBAUD
Violin

MISCHA LEVITZKI
Piano

MABEL GARRISON
Soprano
Metropolitan Opera Co.

JASCHA HEIFETZ
Violin

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, in a sense, begins in this its thirty-eighth season a new era in its history. The retirement of Mr. Higginson has placed its government and maintenance in a Board of Trustees. The complexion of the personnel itself has changed greatly by the engagement of Americans and Frenchmen to fill the several vacancies in the ranks. Essentially, however, the Orchestra remains what it has been for a generation, the greatest artistic possession of America.

In making the necessary changes in the personnel, the Trustees have exhibited that painstaking effort which in other years has contributed so much to the success of the Orchestra. The new concertmaster, Mr. Fradkin, is a musician and violinist of most unusual gifts, an American by birth, who won the first prize for violin in the Paris Conservatoire. The presence in this country of the famous French Military Band made possible the engagement of several remarkable artists, all graduates of the Conservatoire, who have won through service their release from further military duty. The vacancies in the string section have for the most part been filled by native Americans. Not only do these changes entail no sacrifice, but the Orchestra is the stronger for them.

Distinguished artists will appear as soloists. Four singers, five pianists, three violinists, a 'cellist and an organist make the list. A majority of these are the most successful representatives of the younger generation and are appearing with the Orchestra for the first time. The others have long been established securely in the esteem of the musical public, and these, for the most part, are returning after an absence of several seasons.

JOSEPH BONNET
Organ

OLGA SAMAROFF
Piano

ARTHUR RUBINSTEIN
Piano

EMILIO DE GOGORZA
Baritone

SOPHIE BRASLAU
Contralto
Metropolitan Opera Co.

HAROLD BAUER
Piano

PIERRE MONTEUX

Châtelet and the Odéon in Paris; Covent Garden and Drury Lane in London, and in the opera houses of Berlin, Vienna and Budapest. During the season of 1913-14 the Monteux Symphony Concerts were a feature of the season in Paris.

Pierre Monteux, conductor of French opera of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York, will direct the October concerts of the Symphony in Boston. Mr. Monteux came to America two years ago as conductor of the Ballet Russe, and last year he was with the Metropolitan Opera Company. Previous to his coming to America he had for a number of years played an important part in the music abroad. He had been conductor of the Concerts Colonne in Paris, and had conducted at the Opéra, the Théâtre des Champs-Élysées, the

I. PROGRAMME. OCTOBER 11-12

Franck Symphony in D minor
Schumann Overture to "Manfred"
Rabaud "La Procession Nocturne," Poème Symphonique, Op. 6
(First time at these concerts)
Debussy "Iberia," Images pour Orchestre, No. 2

II. PROGRAMME. OCTOBER 18-19

Beethoven Symphony, No. 7, in A major Loeffler "Que tu ne t'en ailles," Symphonic Poem Liszt Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, No. 1, in E-flat major Ravel "Daphnis et Cloë," Suite, No. 1
(First time at these concerts)

SOLOIST

JOSEF HOFMANN

III. PROGRAMME. OCTOBER 25-26

Brahms Symphony, No. 2, in D major d'Indy "Istar," Variations Symphoniques, Op. 42
Saint-Saëns Symphony, No. 3, in G minor. (With Organ)

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
PIERRE MONTEUX, CONDUCTOR
W. H. BRENNAN, MANAGER
G. E. JUDD, ASSISTANT MANAGER
SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON

SEPTEMBER 18, 1918

TO THE SUBSCRIBERS:

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA WILL OPEN ITS THIRTY-EIGHTH SEASON OF TWENTY-FOUR FRIDAY AFTERNOON AND TWENTY-FOUR SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS ON OCTOBER 11-12 NEXT.

PIERRE MONTEUX, THE EMINENT FRENCH CONDUCTOR, WILL CONDUCT THE CONCERTS IN OCTOBER, PRIOR TO HIS ENGAGEMENT AT THE METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE, NEW YORK. ANNOUNCEMENT AS TO THE CONDUCTORSHIP OF THE SUBSEQUENT CONCERTS WILL BE MADE SHORTLY BY THE TRUSTEES AND SENT TO ALL SUBSCRIBERS.

THE ORCHESTRA GIVES PROMISE OF GREAT BRILLIANCY. THE NEW MEMBERS ARE ARTISTS OF ESTABLISHED EXCELLENCE, MANY OF THEM FRENCHMEN OF HIGH REPUTATION. THE CONCERT-MASTER WILL BE FREDRIC FRADKIN, THE AMERICAN VIOLINIST. AS USUAL, DISTINGUISHED ARTISTS WILL APPEAR AS SOLOISTS.

WILL YOU KINDLY ADVISE ME BY THE ENCLOSED CARD WHETHER OR NOT YOU WISH TO RETAIN THE SEATS YOU NOW HOLD? PLEASE NOTE THAT THE SUBSCRIPTION SALE CLOSSES SEPTEMBER 26.

YOURS RESPECTFULLY,

W. H. Brennan MANAGER

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1918-19.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

HENRI RABAUD, Conductor.

WORKS PERFORMED AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS
DURING THE SEASON OF 1918-1919.

Works marked with a double asterisk were performed for the first time in Boston.
Works marked with an asterisk were performed for the first time at these concerts.
Works marked with a dagger were performed for the first time anywhere.
Artists marked with an asterisk appeared at these concerts for the first time.
Artists marked with a double asterisk appeared for the first time in Boston.
Artists marked with a dagger are members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

	PAGE
ANON. See Farnaby.
BACH: Suite in D major, No. 3, January 24, 1919	624
Concerto No. 2, F major, for trumpet, flute, oboe, violin, March 14, 1919	970
Polonaise, Rondo and Badinerie from Suite in B minor, No. 2, for flute and strings, April 26, 1919	1252
BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 3, E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55, November 15, 1918	119
Symphony No. 5, C minor, Op. 67, January 17, 1919	567
Symphony No. 6, F major, Op. 68, "Pastoral," April 11, 1919,	1134
Symphony No. 7, A major, Op. 92, November 1, 1918	63
Symphony No. 8, F major, Op. 93, December 13, 1918	287
Overture to "Coriolanus," Op. 62, March 7, 1919	903
Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Op. 72, December 27, 1918	424
Overture to "Egmont," Op. 84, April 26, 1919	1265
Concerto in D major, for violin, Op. 61, January 3, 1919 (JASCHA HEIFETZ *)	529
Concerto No. 5, E-flat major, for pianoforte, Op. 73, March 28, 1919 (HAROLD BAUER)	1028
BERLIOZ: Overture, "King Lear," Op. 4, December 20, 1918	364
Overture, "Roman Carnival," Op. 9, February 14, 1919	766
Royal Hunt and Tempest, from "The Trojans," February 28, 1919 	876
Grand Fête at Capulet's House, from "Romeo and Juliet," Op. 17, March 28, 1919	1041
BIZET: Overture, "Patrie," December 30, 1918	464
BORODIN: Symphony in B minor, No. 2, November 29, 1918	261
BRAHMS: Symphony No. 2, D major, Op. 73, January 31, 1919,	708

Mary A. Brown
Aug. 19, 1919

BRUNEAU: Symphonic Entr'acte from "Messidor," January 31, 1919	679
CAMPENHOUT: "La Brabançonne," December 30, 1918 *	456
CAREY: God Save the King, December 30, 1918	458
CHADWICK: "Land of our Hearts," Patriotic Hymn for chorus and orchestra, December 30, 1918 	460
CHABRIER: Prelude to Act II. of "Gwendoline," February 14, 1919	756
"España," Rhapsody, March 14, 1919	989
CHOPIN: Concerto in E minor, Op. 11, No. 1, for pianoforte, December 20, 1918 (JOSEF HOFMANN)	356
CONVERSE: "The Mystic Trumpeter," Orchestral Fantasy, Op. 19 (after the poem of Walt Whitman), December 13, 1918	301
DEBUSSY: "Iberia": "Images" for orchestra, No. 2, October 25, 1918	38
Three Nocturnes, March 7, 1919 (revised edition )	920
Recitative, "L'Année en vain," and Aria of Lia, "Azaël!" from "L'Enfant Prodigue," November 1, 1918 (FLORENCE EASTON *)	87
DUBOIS: Overture, "Frithjof," April 11, 1919	1159
DUKAS: "La Péri: Poème Dansé," October 25, 1918 	30
"The Sorcerer's Apprentice," Scherzo (after a ballad by Goethe), November 29, 1918	256
FARNABY and Anonymous English Composers: Suite of the XVIth Century, arranged by Henri Rabaud, December 30, 1918 †	485
FAURÉ: Suite from the Stage Music to Haraucourt's "Shylock" (after Shakespeare), February 14, 1919 	762
Prelude to "Pénélope," March 28, 1919 	1015
FOOTE: Four Character Pieces (after the RUBÁIYÁT of Omar Khayyám), April 11, 1919	1154
FRANCK: Symphony in D minor, October 25, 1918; April 18, 1919	7, 1183
Orchestral Suite from the Symphonic Poem "Psyché" ("Psyche's Sleep" *; "Psyche borne away by the Zephyrs" *), February 14, 1919	735
Symphonic Poem, "Les Éolides," November 1, 1918	92
Symphonic Piece from "The Redemption," February 28, 1919	847
Symphonic Variations for pianoforte and orchestra, January 24, 1919 (ALFRED CORTOT *)	646
"Psalm CL." for chorus, orchestra and organ, December 30, 1918 *	487
GABETTI: Marcia Reale Italiana, December 30, 1918 *	459
GILBERT: Symphonic Prologue to Synge's play "Riders to the Sea," February 21, 1919 	804
GLINKA: Kamarinskaya, April 18, 1919	1209

GLUCK: Recitative and Air, "Diane Impitoyable," from "Iphigénie en Aulide," February 21, 1919* (EMILIO DE GOGORZA *)	810
GRIEG: Concerto in A minor for pianoforte, Op. 16, November 22, 1918 (OLGA SAMAROFF)	182
GUILMANT: Symphony No. 1, D minor, for organ and orchestra, Op. 42, December 13, 1918 (JOSEPH BONNET *)	317
HADLEY: Symphonic Fantasia, Op. 46, January 24, 1919	623
HILL: "Stevensoniana": Four Pieces after Poems from R. L. Stevenson's "Child's Garden of Verses," March 28, 1919 *	1036
D'INDY: "Wallenstein," Trilogy (after Schiller), Op. 12, December 20, 1918	343
Symphony for Orchestra and Pianoforte on a French Mountain Song, Op. 25, January 24, 1919 (ALFRED CORTOT *)	652
KELLEY: "A California Idyl," Aria for coloratura soprano and orchestra, Op. 38, January 17, 1919  (MABEL GARRISON)	591
LALO: Rhapsody in A major, January 17, 1919	593
Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys," February 21, 1919	791
LAPARRA: "A Basque Sunday," for orchestra and pianoforte, April 18, 1919 † (RAOUL LAPARRA *)	1194
LISZT: "Mazeppa": Symphonic Poem No. 6 (after Victor Hugo), April 4, 1919	1094
LOEFFLER: Poem: La Bonne Chanson, November 1, 1918	80
MACDOWELL: Suite in A minor, Op. 42, May 2, 1919	1295
MAGNARD: "Hymn to Justice," for orchestra, April 11, 1919 	1127
MALIPIERO: "The Pauses of Silence": Seven Symphonic Expressions, April 4, 1919 	1076
MASSENET: Recitative and Air, "Promesse de mon avenir," from "Le Roi de Lahore," February 21, 1919 * (EMILIO DE GOGORZA *)	816
MÉHUL: Recitative "Que dis-je?" and Air, "O des Amants, le plus fidèle," from "Ariodant," April 26, 1919 * (SOPHIE BRASLAU *)	1244
MENDELSSOHN: Symphony in A major, "Italian," Op. 90, March 7, 1919	928
Concerto in E minor, for violin, Op. 64, February 14, 1919 (FREDRIC FRADKIN*†)	752
MOUSSORGSKY: Three Songs with orchestra: "Death's Serenade" *; "The Banks of the Don" *; "On the River Dnyéper," * April 26, 1919 (SOPHIE BRASLAU *)	1260-65
MOZART: Symphony in C major, "Jupiter," November 29, 1918,	245
Symphony in D major (K. 504), April 4, 1919	1071
Recitative, "E Susanna non vien?" and Aria, "Dove Sono," November 1, 1918 (FLORENCE EASTON *)	76
Recitative, "Mia Sperenza Adorata," and Rondo, "Ah! non sai qual pena sia," January 17, 1919 (MABEL GARRISON)	574

RABAUD: Symphony No. 2, E minor, April 26, 1919 *	1239
"La Procession Nocturne," symphonic poem (after Lenau), December 27, 1918 *	410
See Farnaby.
RACHMANINOFF: Concerto No. 2, C minor, for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 18, January 31, 1919 (SERGEÏ RACH- MANINOFF)	704
RAMEAU: Airs de Ballet from "Hippolyte et Aricie," February 21, 1919 	814
RAVEL: "Daphnis and Chloe," First Suite, November 1, 1918 , Rapsodie Espagnole, January 3, 1919	96 538
RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF: "Sadko": Tone Picture, Op. 5, March 14, 1919	959
Symphony No. 2, "Antar," Op. 15, January 3, 1919	511
"Scheherazade," Symphonic Suite (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night"), Op. 35, February 21, 1919	818
Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34, November 15, 1918	142
ROUGET DE LISLE, La Marseillaise , December 30, 1918 *	459
SAINT-SAËNS: Symphony in A minor, No. 2, Op. 55, March 14, 1919	966
Symphony in C minor, No. 3, Op. 78, November 22, 1918	200
Symphonic Poem No. 1, "Omphale's Spinning-Wheel," Op. 31, February 28, 1919	866
Symphonic Poem No. 2, "Phaëton," Op. 39, January 17, 1919	580
Symphonic Poem No. 4, "The Youth of Hercules," Op. 50, November 15, 1918	132
Concerto in G minor, for pianoforte, No. 2, Op. 22, December 27, 1918 (MISCHA LEVITZKI *)	413
Concerto in B minor, No. 3, for violin, Op. 61, April 4, 1919 (JACQUES THIBAUD *)	1089
"The Lyre and the Harp," Ode for solo voices, chorus, and orchestra (poem by Victor Hugo), Op. 57, May 2, 1919 	1299
SCHMITT: "Outdoor Music" Suite, Op. 44, March 14, 1919 	977
SCHUBERT: Unfinished Symphony in B minor, November 22, 1918	175
SCHUMANN: Symphony No. 2, C major, Op. 61, February 28, 1919	881
Symphony No. 4, D minor, Op. 120, December 27, 1918	399
Overture to Byron's "Manfred," Op. 115, October 25, 1918,	16
SMITH, J. S.: "The Star-Spangled Banner," December 30, 1918,	455
TSCHAIKOWSKY: Variations on a Rococo Theme, for violoncello and orchestra, Op. 33, March 7, 1919 (JOSEPH MALKIN†),	914
VERDI: "Te Deum," for double chorus and orchestra, December 30, 1918 *	483
WEBER: Overture to "Der Freischütz," April 18, 1919	1215
Overture to "Euryanthe," November 29, 1918	231

SUMMARY.

BACH	3	KELLEY	1
BEETHOVEN	10	LALO	2
BERLIOZ	4	LAPARRA	1
BIZET	1	LISZT	1
BORODIN	1	LOEFFLER	1
BRAHMS	1	MACDOWELL	1
BRUNEAU	1	MAGNARD	1
CAMPENHOUT	1	MALIPIERO	1
CAREY	1	MASSENET	1
CHADWICK	1	MÉHUL	1
CHABRIER	2	MENDELSSOHN	2
CHOPIN	1	MOUSSORGSKY	3
CONVERSE	1	MOZART	4
DEBUSSY	3	RABAUD	2
DUBOIS	1	RACHMANINOFF	1
DUKAS	2	RAMEAU	1
FARNABY et al.	1	RAVEL	2
FAURÉ	2	RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF	4
FOOTE	1	ROUGET DE LISLE	1
FRANCK	7*	SAINT-SAËNS	8
GABETTI	1	SCHMITT	1
GILBERT	1	SCHUBERT	1
GLINKA	1	SCHUMANN	3
GLUCK	1	SMITH	1
GRIEG	1	TSCHAIKOWSKY	1
GUILMANT	1	VERDI	1
HADLEY	1	WEBER	2
HILL	1
D'INDY	2
			104

* Franck's symphony was played twice.

ORCHESTRAL COMPOSITIONS PERFORMED FOR THE FIRST TIME.

FARNABY AND OTHERS: Suite of the 16th Century, arranged by Rabaud, December 30, 1918.
LAPARRA: "A Basque Sunday," April 18, 1919	2

Steinway Pianoforte used

WORKS PERFORMED FOR THE FIRST TIME IN BOSTON.

SYMPHONIC POEMS, OVERTURES, ETC.

- BERLIOZ: Royal Hunt and Tempest, from "The Trojans,"
February 28, 1919.
- DEBUSSY: Revised edition of "Three Nocturnes," March 7, 1919.
- DUKAS: "La Péri: Poème Dansé," October 25, 1918.
- FAURÉ: Suite from the Stage Music to Haraucourt's "Shylock," February 14, 1919.
- Prelude to "Pénélope," March 28, 1919.
- GILBERT: Symphonic Prologue to Synge's play "Riders to the Sea," February 21, 1919.
- HADLEY: Symphonic Fantasia, Op. 46, January 24, 1919.
- MAGNARD: Hymn to Justice, April 11, 1919.
- MALIPIERO: "The Pauses of Silence," April 4, 1919.
- RAMEAU: Airs de Ballet from "Hippolyte et Aricie," February 21, 1919.
- RAVEL: "Daphnis and Chloe," First Suite, November 1, 1918.
- SCHMITT: "Out-door Music," Suite, Op. 44, March 14, 1919.. 12

CHORAL WORKS.

- CHADWICK: "Land of our Hearts," for chorus and orchestra, December 30, 1918.
- SAINT-SAËNS: "The Lyre and the Harp," ode for solo voices, chorus and orchestra, May 2, 1919..... 2

ARIA.

- KELLEY: "A California Idyl," for coloratura soprano and orchestra, Op. 38, January 17, 1919 (MABEL GARRI-SON) 1

WORKS PERFORMED FOR THE FIRST TIME AT THESE CONCERTS.

- FRANCK: "Psyche's Sleep," "Psyche borne away by the Zephyrs," February 14, 1919.
- Psalm CL, for chorus, orchestra, and organ, December 30, 1918.
- HILL: "Stevensoniana"; Four Pieces after Poems from R. L.
Stevenson's "A Child's Garden of Verses," March 28, 1919.
- RABAUD: Symphony No. 2, E minor, April 26, 1919.
- "La Procession Nocturne," symphonic poem (after Lenau), December 27, 1918.
- VERDI: "Te Deum," for double chorus and orchestra, December 30, 1918..... 6

ARIAS SUNG FOR THE FIRST TIME AT THESE CONCERTS.

- GLUCK: Recitative and Air, "Diane Impitoyable," from "Iphigénie en Aulide," February 21, 1919 (EMILIO DE GOGORZA *).
- MASSNET: Recitative and Air, "Promesse de mon Avenir," February 21, 1919 (EMILIO DE GOGORZA *).
- MÉHUL: Recitative and Air, "O des Amants, le plus fidèle," April 26, 1919 (SOPHIE BRASLAU *).
- MOUSSORGSKY: Three songs with orchestra: "Death's Serenade"; "The Banks of the Don"; "On the River
Dnyéper," April 26, 1919 (SOPHIE BRASLAU *)..... 6

THE FOLLOWING ARTISTS HAVE APPEARED THIS SEASON.

	PAGE
ALCOCK,* MERLE: May 2, 1919, Saint-Saëns's "Lyre and Harp" 	1293
BAUER, HAROLD: March 28, 1919, Beethoven, Concerto for Pianoforte, E-flat major, No. 5. Sketch.....	1022
BONNET,* JOSEPH: December 13, 1918, Guilmant, Symphony No. 1 D minor, for organ and orchestra. Sketch....	316
BRASLAU,* SOPHIE: April 26, 1919, Méhul, "O des Amants, le plus fidèle,"* from "Ariodant," and Songs by Mous- sorgsky: "Death's Serenade"; "The Banks of the Don" * and "On the River Dnyéper." * Sketch....	1243
CORTOT,* ALFRED: January 24, 1919, Franck, Symphonic Vari- ations for pianoforte and Orchestra; d'Indy's Sym- phony for Orchestra and Pianoforte on a Mountain Song. Sketch.....	644
EASTON,* FLORENCE: November 1, 1918, Mozart, Recitative, "E Susanna non vien?" and Aria, "Dove Sono," from "Le Nozze di Figaro"; Debussy, "L'année en vain" and "Azaël," from "L'Enfant Prodigue." Sketch..	74
FRADKIN,† * FREDRIC: February 14, 1919, Mendelssohn, Violin Concerto. Sketch.....	750
GARRISON, MABEL: January 17, 1919, Mozart, Recitative, "Mia Speranza," and Rondo, "Ah! non sai qual pena sia"; Kelley, "A California Idyl," aria for coloratura so- prano and orchestra. Sketch.....	574
GOGORZA,* EMILIO DE: February 21, 1919, Gluck, "Diane Im- pitoyable," from "Iphigénie en Aulide"; Massenet, "Promesse de mon Avenir," * from "Le Roi de Lahore." Sketch.....	809
HACKETT, ARTHUR: May 2, 1919, Saint-Saëns's "The Lyre and the Harp"  (Mr. Hackett sang the airs in Fauré's "Shylock"  February 14, 1919).....	1293

HEIFETZ,* JASCHA: January 3, 1919, Beethoven's Violin Concerto. Sketch.....	528
HOFMANN, JOSEF: December 20, 1918, Chopin's Concerto in E major for pianoforte. Sketch.....	352
KLINE,* OLIVE: May 2, 1919, Saint-Saëns's "The Lyre and the Harp" 	1293
LAPARRA,* RAOUL: April 18, 1919, "A Basque Sunday" † for orchestra and pianoforte. Sketch.....	1206
LEVITZKI,* MISCHA: December 27, 1918, Saint-Saëns's Concerto No. 2, G minor, for pianoforte. Sketch.....	413
MALKIN,† JOSEPH: March 7, 1919, Tschaikowsky, Variations on a Rococo Theme, for violoncello and orchestra. Sketch	912
RACHMANINOFF, SERGEI: January 31, 1919, Rachmaninoff, Concerto No. 2, C minor, for pianoforte. Sketch.....	693
SAMAROFF, OLGA: November 22, 1918, Grieg, Concerto for pianoforte. Sketch.....	182
THIBAUD,* JACQUES: April 4, 1919, Saint-Saëns, Concerto No. 3, B minor, for violin and orchestra. Sketch.....	1086
WERRENATH,* REINALD: May 2, 1919, Saint-Saëns's "The Lyre and the Harp" 	1293

* *

Sopranos: Mmes. Easton,* Garrison, Kline *	3
Contraltos: Mmes. Alcock,* Braslau *	2
Tenor: Mr. Hackett.....	1
Baritones: Messrs. de Gogorza * and Werrenrath *	2
Pianists: Messrs. Bauer, Cortot,* Hofmann, Laparra,* Levitzki,* Rachmaninoff, and Mme. Samaroff.....	7
Violinists: Messrs. Fradkin,†* Heifetz,* Thibaud *	3
Violoncellist: Mr. Malkin †	1
Organist: Mr. Bonnet *	1
	20

Symphony Hall.

Once More a Frenchman Saves the Day

(Photograph by Mishkin of New York)

Pierre Monteux

Conductor for October at the Symphony Concerts

HEIFETZ,* JASCHA: January 3, 1919, Beethoven's Violin Concerto. Sketch.....	528
HOFMANN, JOSEF: December 20, 1918, Chopin's Concerto in E major for pianoforte. Sketch.....	352
KLINE,* OLIVE: May 2, 1919, Saint-Saëns's "The Lyre and the Harp" 	1293
LAPARRA,* RAOUL: April 18, 1919, "A Basque Sunday" † for orchestra and pianoforte. Sketch.....	1206
LEVITZKI,* MISCHA: December 27, 1918, Saint-Saëns's Concerto No. 2, G minor, for pianoforte. Sketch.....	413
MALKIN,† JOSEPH: March 7, 1919, Tschaikowsky, Variations on a Rococo Theme, for violoncello and orchestra. Sketch	912
RACHMANINOFF, SERGEÏ: January 31, 1919, Rachmaninoff, Concerto No. 2, C minor, for pianoforte. Sketch.....	693
SAMAROFF, OLGA: November 22, 1918, Grieg, Concerto for pianoforte. Sketch.....	182
THIBAUD,* JACQUES: April 4, 1919, Saint-Saëns, Concerto No. 3, B minor, for violin and orchestra. Sketch.....	1086
WERRENATH,* REINALD: May 2, 1919, Saint-Saëns's "The Lyre and the Harp" 	1293

* * *

Sopranos: Mmes. Easton,* Garrison, Kline *	3
Contraltos: Mmes. Alcock,* Braslau *	2
Tenor: Mr. Hackett.....	1
Baritones: Messrs. de Gogorza * and Werrenrath *	2
Pianists: Messrs. Bauer, Cortot,* Hofmann, Laparra,* Levitzki,* Rachmaninoff, and Mme. Samaroff.....	7
Violinists: Messrs. Fradkin,†* Heifetz,* Thibaud *	3
Violoncellist: Mr. Malkin †	1
Organist: Mr. Bonnet *	1

20

Symphony Hall.

Once More a Frenchman Saves the Day

(Photograph by Mishkin of New York)

Pierre Monteux

Conductor for October at the Symphony Concerts

PIERRE BENJAMIN MONTEUX was born at Paris on April 4, 1875. He studied at the Conservatoire of that city, and in 1896, a pupil of Bertholier, he was awarded a first prize for violin playing. The other first prizes for violin that year were awarded to Messrs. Sechiari, Soudant, and Thibaud. He played the viola in Colonne's orchestra; he was a member of the orchestra of the Opéra-Comique, and he busied himself in chamber music. In 1893 with Mlle. Victoria Barrière, pianist, Mlle. Vormèse, and M. Carcanade, he founded the Société de Musique Moderne, playing the viola. Their first concert was on February 25. With Messrs. Geloso, Capet, and Schneklud he took part in the Auditions annuelles des derniers grands Quatuors de Beethoven. In 1900 with Messrs. Soudant, de Bruyre, and Destombes he played chamber music in the Matinées Artistiques Populaires, and he figured prominently at concerts of the Société Nationale and the Société de Musique Française. Among the compositions heard at these various concerts for the first time—in which he participated—were Brahms's Clarinet Quintet, Stojowski's Variations, Leken's "Andromède," pieces by Ropartz, Quittard, Chausson ("Légende de Sainte-Cécile"), Hartog, Luzzato, Glazounoff (Élégie for viola), d'Indy (Suite dans le style ancien), L. Lacombe, Rubinstein, Jaques-Dalcroze. He also took part in concerts given by Messrs. Chevillard, Hayot, and Salmon, and in concerts of the Société des Compositeurs de Musique.

In 1911 he was engaged as conductor of the Ballet Russe, with which he made four tours throughout Europe. He conducted ballet at various theatres in Paris, and gave series of orchestral concerts in that city.

He came to the United States in 1916 as conductor of the Ballet Russe, and conducted at the Boston Opera House, November 6-11, 1916: "Les Papillons," "Spectre de la Rose," "Thamar," "Petrouchka," "Scheherazade," "Prince Igor," "Sadko," "L'Après-Midi d'un Faune," "Cléopâtre."

In 1917 he was appointed a conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House. He made his first appearance there with "Faust," November 19, 1917. He brought out Rabaud's "Marouf" (December 19), "Coq d'Or" (March 6, 1918), and Gilbert's ballet "The Dance in Place Congo."

At the Boston Opera House, coming with the Metropolitan Opera Company, he conducted "Coq d'Or" and "The Dance in Place Congo" (April 26, 1918) and "Samson et Dalila" (April 27, 1918).

AT LAST, WORD OF THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Trans. — Sept. 18, 1918

Mr. Monteux for Temporary Conductor
Through Three Weeks of October—Past and Present of a Semi-Familiar Figure
— A Promising List of "Assisting Artists"—Young Singers, Young Pianists, Mr. Hofmann, Mr. Thibaud, Mr.
Heifetz—The Chicago Orchestra to Continue with Mr. Stock.

FOR three weeks this autumn, as for six last spring, a temporary conductor is to lead the Symphony Orchestra. After a summer of diligent but much hindered negotiation, the trustees of the band are still unable to conclude arrangements with any leader able and willing to carry the concerts through the season at the established and expected standards. Before long, they hope to make such arrangements and announce the outcome. Meanwhile, the orchestra with full ranks awaits the call to rehearsals; the "assisting artists" are engaged and apportioned; the schedule of concerts at home and abroad, from October to May, is drawn, with beginning here, in Boston little more than three weeks hence. In these circumstances, the only practicable course was the summoning of a temporary conductor. One such, fit for the post, was available—Pierre Monteux of the Metropolitan Opera House, of Mr. Diaghilev's Russian Ballet, of occasional symphony concerts in Paris and New York. Accordingly, he will lead in the concerts of Oct. 11 and 12, Oct. 18 and 19, Oct. 25 and 26 in Boston, and in one or two elsewhere. Thereafter, as his contract with the Metropolitan Opera House requires, he will return to work at that theatre.

As conductor, Mr. Monteux has been heard in Boston only in the opera house. His name was first mentioned here when in the spring of 1914, Mr. Henry Russell announced him as one of the conductors of the Boston Opera Company for the season of 1914-15. The war intervened; the Boston Opera Company ceased to be; and Mr. Monteux, actually made his first appearance in Boston in November of 1916 as conductor of the Russian Ballet. With it he led the orchestra in Stravinsky's "Petrouchka," Balakirev's "Thamar," Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade" and "Sadko," Schumann's transcribed "Carnaval," a pastiche from Chopin, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and various intermezzi between the ballets. When the week was done, the reviewer for The Transcript wrote of his work:

At every performance, Mr. Monteux has shown himself an expert conductor with the peculiar requirements of the choreographic dance and the mimed drama—inconstant heed of the stage as well as of the orchestra; exact and fluent mating of music, miming and motion even to minute shadings and suggestion; clearness of rhythm, colorful play of harmonies and timbres; whipping force upon the dancers, readiness to hide any chance slip. These things are the métier of a conductor for a ballet, and few such are readier and surer than he.

Furthermore, Mr. Monteux has appreciable quality as a conductor of the symphonic music, French or Russian, that has beguiled the tedium of many an entr'acte. He heeds texture of tone, seeks euphony, shades color and pace, understands, feels and imparts such widely different music as Debussy's "Clouds" and fragments of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Golden Cockerel." The abilities of a conductor in general that make him a better conductor of ballet, and mimodrama in particular, stood clear in his version of "Petrouchka," far truer to the manifold graphic force, the rhythmic fire, the stark candor of Stravinsky's music than was his predecessor's way with it. At the other extreme, he phrased and colored Debussy's tone-poem of the faun with heightening fancy and finesse. He has bettered the transcribed Chopin and Schumann of this and that ballet, intensified the sensuous richness, the exotic tang of "Scheherazade" and "Thamar." He has a somewhat less expert and less numerous orchestra than journeyed with the Russian Ballet ten months ago. What has been taken away, he pours back—from himself.

Mr. Monteux returned to Boston last April as one of the conductors of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Here he led in performances of Saint-Saëns's opera, "Samson and Delilah," of Rimsky-Korsakov's mimed fantasy, "The Golden Cockerel" and of Mr. Gilbert's ballet, "The Dance in Place Congo." In New York, besides, he had been charged with the restudied and remounted "Faust." Rabaud's newly produced "Marouf," "Carmen" and other operas of the French repertory. With "Samson and Delilah," he seemed no more than a practised conductor of an able orchestra, extracting what he might and what routine bade from Saint-Saëns's dry music. On the other hand, under the stimulus of "The Golden Cockerel," he excelled himself in rhythmic elasticity and verve, manifold glow of harmonic and instrumental color, clear spinning of an intricate tonal web, sensuous suavities, sardonic force, the characterizing and fantastic strokes with which the opera-ballet teems. His "Faust," as New York heard it, was remarkable for felicities of detail, for lyric warmth, for freshening imagination, while

In "Marouf," as in "The Golden Cockerel," he rarely missed the delineative point, the characterizing pith of the music. Obviously Mr. Monteux ripens.

As conductor of symphonic music in the concert-hall, Mr. Monteux is known both to Paris and to New York. In Paris through a winter or two, he led in the Concerts Monteux at the old Casino de Paris on Sunday afternoons. Young men for the most part filled his orchestra; his audience was young as well; band, conductor, hearers were all ardent for French and Russian music of the newest and most intrepid sort. From both he made many a programme. It was he, for example and at these concerts, who first played Stravinsky's "Pétouchka" and "The Rite of Spring" as symphonic pieces—an interesting experiment he might amusingly repeat in Boston; while side by side with Stravinsky on his lists stood Ravel, Roger-Ducasse and other Parisian composers of the new generation. The musically open-minded flocked to the Concerts Monteux; the musically hide-bound came away from them with teeth on edge. In contrast, the summer symphony concerts at which Mr. Monteux conducted in New York in 1917 were models of musical probity. French, German, Russian classics, occasional pieces from American pens, light numbers for their own sake, filled the programmes; performance was faithful and sometimes eloquent; average audiences departed well pleased. As conductor of six Symphony Concerts in Boston, Mr. Monteux will, doubtless, renew the qualities he has disclosed at his best in the theatre. Whether he will choose his pieces as he did in Paris or as he did in New York or, more probably, at the golden mean between, remains to be seen.

The Soloists Also

Simultaneously with this timely word about the conductorship, the management of the Symphony Concerts makes public the list of "assisting artists" for the new season. Beside the first violinist and the first violoncellist of the orchestra, who as usual will play their concertos, each at a pair of concerts, there will be twelve in all; while only one of them, as wisdom and good fortune have at last willed, is of the "old stand-bys" that used to return year after year. No less than seven of the twelve—Miss Easton and Mr. de Gogorza among the singers; Mr. Heifetz and Mr. Thibaud of the violinists; Mr. Levitzki and Mr. Arthur Rubinstein of the pianists; Mr. Bonnet, the organist—come for the first time to the Symphony Orchestra in its own hall; while of the other five, Miss Braslau, the alto, has been heard with it only in a concert for the Pension Fund. She herself, Miss Easton, Miss Garrison, Mr. Heifetz, Mr. Levitzki, Mr. Rubinstein, are all of the youngest generation, in proved worth, of our concert-halls. Mr. Thibaud, Mr. de Gogorza, Mme. Samaroff well represent the middle generation. Only Mr. Bauer remains—deservedly—of the eldest. Mr. Hofmann, illustrious pianist in the prime of his powers, returns, the differences of the past laid aside and forgotten; Mr. Thibaud receives the call he has long deserved; Mr. Bonnet emerges from churches and charity-concerts into fitter surroundings for his qualities as musician and virtuoso; Mr. Heifetz is to be heard, at length, with orchestra; between Miss Braslau, Miss Garrison and Miss Easton, the "jeune troupe" of the Metropolitan Opera House has been searched well. Beyond doubting, new influences, new policies, a fine new day have come upon the Symphony Concerts.

Of these singers, Miss Garrison is the young soprano of light and shimmering voice, of no small skill in ornate song, of sprightly and ingratiating presence, who was first heard at the Symphony Concerts last autumn. Miss Braslau, remembered from the concert for the Pension Fund last spring, is the young alto of the Metropolitan Company who has risen in it by no other means than her richness and warmth of voice, her intelligence, feeling, application. Miss Easton is known to Bostonian ears only by a single appearance at the Opera House last spring in the Italian music-drama, "L'Oracolo." It was sufficient to prove the beauty of her transparent soprano voice, the sincerity and the artistry of her song, the pleasure of her presence. As for Mr. de Gogorza, audience upon audience, here and elsewhere, knows from many a recital the fine ardors of his imparting tones and passion. Seldom, too, do the Symphony Concerts summon a man-singer.

For the violinists, it will no longer be possible to ask why Mr. Thibaud, in the flower of mind, spirit and hand as musician and virtuoso, is not called to the Symphony Concerts or why Boston, alone of the "major cities" of music in America, does not hear Mr. Heifetz with orchestra. Twice and thrice in a season in recent years Mr. Thibaud's abilities and distinctions have spoken for themselves in Boston. They will not sound less when the Symphony Orchestra is background to them. The Heifetz, moreover, of a symphony concert is the Heifetz of many a recital—master of the tone of the violin, the more for the euphony he achieves with other instruments, a flawless medium for his chosen music. As he quickens many curiosities, so in less degree will Mr. Fradkin, when his opportunity comes, apart from his new work as concert-master, to prove his individual skill as violinist.

For the pianists, the long exiled Hofmann, the ripe and familiar Bauer need no bush. Long absences, needless estrangements have not lessened the numbers or the faith of the public that with more and more reason sets Mr. Hofmann high among the pianists of our time. If Mr. Bauer's qualities are now fixed, he seldom fails to find new and interesting means for fresh disclosure of them. Audiences that knew Mme. Samaroff in her younger days as pianist will welcome her anew. Mr. Levitzki is indeed still a youth, but a youth who has already proved himself the instinctive, the practiced, the curiously mature musician. A few years ago, a few audiences in various American cities heard Arthur Rubinstein, pianist, and noted his promise. Subsequent years in Europe, if half of current reports run true, have brought fulfillment.

Forward and Back

The public of the Symphony Orchestra in Boston, in New York, in the cities that it regularly visits, will read these announcements gladly. Perhaps the trustees, new to a difficult task and pressed by many other obligations, under-estimated the time and the effort necessary to secure a conductor in these days of war. With the standards of the concerts what they are, with conductors worthy of them few and well employed, the search and the capture of a new leader have not, these many years, been easy. At the moment, war-time limitations of nationality, war-time obstacles to journeying and communication, have narrowed the field of choice and multiplied the intervals between proposal, answer, and all the steps of negotiation. The trustees deserve whatever time they may need to gain a conductor who will take the post for at least a season, who bids fair to win and hold the interest of the public.

On the other hand, the board is wise not to defer by a day the appointed beginning, the usual succession of the concerts. For months past, it has been common knowledge that it was reorganizing the orchestra, engaging "assisting artists," preparing the schedule for the new year. Yet rumor and gossip would not down that there would be no more Symphony Concerts in Boston; that all the glories and the pleasures of the orchestra were come to end. Now and then malevolence plainly prompted these surmises and prophecies; occasionally mere churlishness encouraged them; usually no more than the zest of the busybody in such knowing prediction spread them. Now, once and for all, they are scattered. The Symphony Orchestra, the Symphony Concerts continue and by every sign a sustaining public with them.

Chicago Continues

As coincidence had it, while the Boston Orchestra was making these announcements, the Chicago Orchestra, a thousand miles away, was also publishing its plans for the new season and similarly silencing careless gossip and ominous rumor. As heretofore, it will undertake the usual series of twenty-eight paired concerts, as catholic as ever of programme, as varied as ever in the "assisting artists." Mr. Stock, moreover, will remain the conductor of the Chicago Orchestra. By January or February, in the ordinary progress of legal process, he will become a full-fledged citizen of the United States. As an "enemy alien," present or past, there is not a valid reproach or even suspicion upon him either for word or deed. Rightly, the trustees are resolved to uphold him and every other member of the orchestra who is equally blameless. In turn, the public of the concerts upholds them. H. T. P.

Post Sept. 22/18
It is worthy of note that with the appointment of Pierre Monteux to conduct the opening symphony concerts of the season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is led by a French conductor for the first time in its history. This is an important innovation in more respects than one. Not only will Mr. Monteux appear as a leader of an American orchestra who is entirely in sympathy, as such an official should be, with America in this war, but he will also bring the French taste and French technique to bear on the interpretation of music which requires these qualifications of a conductor. It may be fairly anticipated that Mr. Monteux's programmes will contain very little German music. French and Russian compositions will therefore, in all probability, predominate. In both fields Mr. Monteux has long since proved that he excels.

Factors in some measure compensatory for this are that Germans, if not Austrians and certain German-Americans neither too discreet nor loyal in their attitude regarding this war, are out of the orchestra; that the personnel of that body has been considerably improved, particularly by the engagement of a number of players from the French Military Band, which performed here last spring, and that an unusually interesting list of soloists has been engaged.

Eleven artists will appear, in addition to those from the orchestra itself. Four of these are singers, two are violinists, four are pianists, and one an organist. Three of the singers are women, drawn from the Metropolitan Opera Company. They are Mabel Garrison and Florence Easton, sopranos, and Sophie Braslau, contralto. Miss Garrison, it will be remembered, made her first appearance here with the orchestra last season. Madame Easton has never sung here in concert. She appeared once last spring in the season of the Metropolitan Opera Company, but she will be best remembered as the very remarkable first soprano of the Savage Grand Opera Company a dozen years ago. For nine years, up to the fall of 1916, Madam Easton was a principal soprano, first of the Royal Opera of Berlin, and afterward of the opera in Hamburg. She returned to this country to be a principal soprano of the Chicago Opera Company and last year she joined the Metropolitan. Sophie Braslau, contralto, has appeared here both in opera and concert. The other singer will be Emilio de Gozozza, who is singing with the Symphony for the first time, although for many years he has been a well-tried favorite here in Boston.

The two violinists from abroad are Jascha Heifetz and Jacques Thibaud. It is scarcely necessary to discuss these artists, so well known are they, unless it be to wonder at the curious fact that Mr. Thibaud is making his first appearance with the orchestra in Boston.

The list of pianists is exceedingly interesting. It comprises the names of Josef Hofmann, Olga Samaroff, Harold Bauer and Arthur Rubinstein. Of these the one stranger is Rubinstein. In the early part of 1906 Mr. Rubinstein gave a recital in the Colonial Theatre, but to the vast majority of music lovers of this city he will be a stranger. He is a native of Lodz, Russian Poland, where he was born 31 years ago. In childhood he was a protegee of Joachim, and his first master was Barth. He did his principal study, however, under d'Albert and spent some months with Leschetitzky. Accounts have it that he is one of the great pianists of the world.

The return of Josef Hofmann will be warmly welcomed, for Hofmann stands today in the very front rank of pianists and bids fair to inherit much of that popularity which was Paderewski's. It is also many years since Madame Samaroff appeared here in Boston. In a certain sense she is a Boston product in that it was here that she had her first success in America, and until her marriage she regarded it almost as a home. Harold Bauer, who last appeared with the orchestra three years ago, is always welcome.

An engagement out of the common is that of Joseph Bonnet, the French organist. His several appearances in Boston have shown that as an artist he has most unusual qualities. The organ in Symphony Hall is an admirable instrument, Mr. Bonnet having said last year that he thought it was one of the most brilliant in this country.

There will be interest in the appearance of Mr. Fradkin, the new concert master of the orchestra. Mr. Noack, the second concert master, will appear in due course as soloist; also Mr. Malkin, the leading cellist.

The orchestra will give its usual series of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts. These will run from Oct. 11-12 to May 2-3. In that period of 39 weeks a total of something over 100 concerts will be given, for in addition to the 48 allotted to Boston there will be the usual series in Cambridge, Providence, Worcester, Hartford, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, while in the late winter the annual Western trip of one week will be made.

Within a few days the trustees expect to be in a position to announce the name of the conductor who will follow Mr. Monteux in November. In the meantime Boston patrons of the orchestra may rest assured of three unusually interesting programmes under Mr. Monteux. This distinguished conductor is greatly interested in the work and has already signified his intention of giving at the opening concert as the principal number Cesar Franck's Symphony in D Minor.

The subscribers to last year's concerts have already received notices regarding the renewal of their subscriptions for the season of 1918-19. Owing to delays made inevitable by war conditions, the time for the subscription sale to the concerts is necessarily brief, but much can be accomplished in three weeks. Last year's subscribers have until next Thursday, Sept. 26, inclusive, in which to renew their subscriptions and retain the seats they had last year. The general sale of subscription tickets to the public will open at Symphony Hall a week from tomorrow morning, Monday, Sept. 30, and continue up to the time of the first concerts. All seats which have not been taken by last year's subscribers will then be placed on sale.

Symphony Proud of War Record

Liberty loan industrial honor pennant and service flags draped over balcony at Symphony Hall.

All Own Bonds and Eleven Are in the Service

The Boston Symphony orchestra is proud of its war record. It won an industrial honor pennant for 100 per cent. subscription in the fourth Liberty loan, and has 11 men in the service of Uncle Sam or the allies.

The attention of patrons who attended the first Symphony concert this afternoon was attracted to two flags draped artistically over the railing of the first balcony. One flag was the honor pennant and the other the service flag.

Every member of the orchestra and every Symphony Hall employe bought Liberty bonds, making the total for the organization $15,150. Joseph Mann, librarian, who took part in the campaign, states he believes no large orchestra made a better record.

The stars in the service flag are for George Grisez, Paul Mimart, Modeste Alloo, Andre Gietzen, Leslie J. Rogers, Charles Pinfield, Joseph Gewirtz, Samuel Rosen, Leon Roby and Mrs. Florence Hayford.

BOSTON HAS A FRENCH CONDUCTOR

Herald (From the Nation.) Oct. 24/18

When Maj. Higginson founded the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881 he decided to spare no expense in making it as good as possible. Most of the violinists were secured in Vienna, while for his players of wood-wind instruments he went to France, which had long been famed for its flutists, clarinetists, oboists and bassoonists. The successive conductors—Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch, Paur, Fiedler and Muck—came from Germany and Austria-Hungary. In view of the fact that these two countries have produced more first-class orchestral compositions than all other lands put together, it cannot, perhaps, be said that German music was unduly favored on the program of this organization. Most of the conductors named were fairly in sympathy with the spirit of French music, too. Nevertheless, one could not but wonder what the result would be if, in place of a Teuton or a Magyar, the Boston orchestra had, in addition to its wood-winds, a chef d'orchestre from Paris.

This curiosity is to be gratified during the present season. Two Frenchmen have been engaged, Pierre Monteux for October and Henri Rabaud for the remaining concerts, not only in Boston, but for those given on tour in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, which last-named city is now again open to this organization. The orchestra has been unionized, and of the new members as many as possible were recruited in France. Judges who have attended rehearsals think the ensemble will soon be as good as ever.

Except in Boston, Pierre Monteux will not be heard at the head of the Boston orchestra. His duties as conductor of the French operas at the Metropolitan Opera House prevent his acceptance of the post in Boston for more than a month. Nor is the conductorship of M. Rabaud to last longer than a year, for it is reported from Boston that Arturo Toscanini is to succeed him next year. He had promised to conduct "Nero," the posthumous opera of the late Arrigo Boito, in Rome, which prevents him from coming to Boston now. In Italy this temperamental wielder of the baton is esteemed equally in concert hall and opera house. On this side of the Atlantic he still has to win his spurs as a purely orchestral conductor.

It by no means follows that because Boston's two new conductors are patriotic Frenchmen they will eschew all German music. M. Monteux has announced that he will have none of Richard Struss or even of Richard Wagner, because of his foolish farce on the subject of the capitulation of Paris in 1871. But the older masters are not to be boycotted. M. Rabaud's intentions are not yet made known at this writing, but it is a safe surmise that he will not punish such innocent masters as Bach, Mozart, and Beethoven for the crimes of the present day. At the same time one cannot but hope that he will give certain overworked Teutonic symphonies and overtures a well-earned rest, substituting for them neglected master-works of France and other countries. There are plenty of these, and it will be a delight to hear those that come from Paris interpreted in the true Gallic fashion. It is one of the paradoxes of music that only a Frenchman can quite reproduce the exact spirit and esprit of French music, whereas the best interpreters of German orchestral and operatic music have usually been Hungarians.

Between Bizet, Gounod, Berlioz, Debussy, Dukas, and Ravel there is a wide divergence of styles which will test the versatility of M. Rabaud. While he is best known as an operatic composer, he is far from being without experience as a conductor. It is almost superfluous to say that he is a product of the Paris Conservatoire, and, like nearly all prominent French composers, a winner of the Prix de Rome. Among his teachers was Massenet, from whom he acquired the knack of scoring an opera fluently. Of his three best-known operas, "La fille de Roland" (1904), "Le premier Glaive" (1908), and "Marouf" (1914), only the last is known in this country. It was produced at the Metropolitan with considerable success. For several years he has served as one of the conductors of the Paris Grand Opera. In appearance as well as in his music he is thoroughly French, and in the present temper of the public is sure of a cordial welcome.

HENRY T. FINCK.

Drawn for The Christian Science Monitor

Pierre Monteux

Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra during October

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONDUCTOR

Monitor—Sept. 24, 1918

Pierre Monteux, the conductor who will open the season for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a native of Paris. He received his musical education at the Paris Conservatory, where he studied solfeggio and harmony with Lavignac, counterpoint and fugue with Charles Lenepveu, and violin with Berthelier. His original ambition was to become a violinist and as such he made his public debut with a string quartet in Paris, 1894; but it was not long before he confined his work to conducting.

His first experience as a conductor of important works was gained with the Concerts Colonne in Paris, a position which he held until 1911. At that time he connected himself with the Ballet Russe, making all in all four tours with that organization through the capitals of Europe. Meanwhile he found further outlet for his ability in a series of concerts at the Paris Casino which he devoted to a great extent to the production of ultra-modern works.

Nor has his experience been limited to the concert and ballet field. The season of 1913-14 he spent at the Paris Opéra, and he has also conducted at the Théâtre des Champs Elysées, the Châtelet and the Odéon, Covent Garden and Drury Lane in London, and in opera houses in Berlin, Vienna, and Budapest.

Mr. Monteux made his first appearance as a conductor in America when Serge Diaghileff brought the Ballet Russe to this country in the fall of 1916 and he continued with that project for its entire second season, during which he was heard in the large cities of the United States. When the Metropolitan Opera Company decided last year to devote greater attention to the production of French operas, Mr. Monteux was engaged and spent the season of 1917-1918 in that capacity. Two new works were intrusted to his direction, the opera "Marouf," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Coq d'Or."

During the summer of 1917, the enterprise of certain public-spirited men in New York City made possible a series of summer concerts at St. Nicholas Rink. The orchestra was placed under the leadership of Mr. Monteux, who conducted a wide variety of orchestral compositions of both serious and lighter nature. His best work at the time was manifested in his conducting of compositions of the modern French and Russian schools.

As has been intimated, Mr. Monteux has always had a preference for the moderns, even for those who have been dubbed ultra-modern. It is worthy of comment to record that among the first performances over which he presided are to be numbered the Stravinsky ballets "Pétrouchka" and "Le Sacré du Printemps," the same composer's opera, "Le Rossignol," Debussy's "Jeux" and "Gigues," Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis et Cloé," and "Valse Nobles et Sentimentales" and "Le Jeu du Furet" of Roger-Ducasse.

Pierre Monteux is a most quiet and unassuming man. He dislikes heartily to talk of his work or of his own career. Criticism—and he has been subjected to much at the hands of certain New York critics—does not affect him. He is content to do his work as he sees it and to allow the public and the critics to draw whatever critical conclusion they may.

His life is most unpretentious. One never sees him about New York in the restaurants or cafés, but on the other hand he is always to be reached at his home on the upper West Side. He married Mlle. Germaine Benedictus in Paris in 1910. His wife is ever to be seen with him both coming and going from the opera house, and the two seem thoroughly happy and content to live the quietest of lives in order that Mr. Monteux may have full opportunity to devote his time and energy to his work. They have been spending the summer near Stamford, Conn.

The trustees of the orchestra announce that 11 soloists will assist at the concerts of the season, which begins on Oct. 11. They are Mabel Garrison, soprano, Florence Easton, soprano, Sophie Braslau, contralto, Emilio de Gogorza, baritone, Jascha Heifetz, violinist, Jacques Thibaud, violinist, Josef Hofmann, pianist, Harold Bauer, pianist, Arthur Rubinstein, pianist, Olga Samaroff, pianist, Mischa Levitzki, pianist, Joseph Bonnet, organist. Besides these, the new concert master, Fredric Fradkin, will be heard, as will Sylvain Noack, the second concert master, and Josef Malkin, the first 'cellist.

Former Boston Conductors

Six Men Have Led the Orchestra Thus Far

The appointment of a new conductor of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra brings to mind many pleasant reminiscences of former conductors, their methods and the results they accomplished, beginning with Georg Henschel in 1881, the orchestra's first season. Mr. Henschel was, first of all, a singer of distinction, but he had had also more or less experience as a conductor, and as he was not only foreign, but withal better than anyone available at this time, the results the first season were eminently satisfactory, especially as to programs, which offered most of the then novelties in orchestral music.

Mr. Henschel remained in Boston three seasons, and was succeeded by Wilhelm Gericke, from Vienna, one who proved in many ways the best conductor the orchestra ever had. Mr. Gericke was a great drill master; he knew the value of "team work" and with the addition of Mr. Kneisel and other young musicians whom he brought over, he made the orchestra well-nigh perfect as to ensemble and tonal beauty and strength.

When Mr. Gericke returned to Vienna at the end of the season of 1888, he left for his successor, Arthur Nikisch, a perfectly drilled orchestral machine, which if memory serves, lapsed a little in efficiency, during Mr. Nikisch's four years' stay, although even then he showed that genius for conducting and that peculiarly temperamental style of interpretation, which he has in more recent years developed to an extraordinary degree.

Rightly or wrongly, there was friction between the conductor and the management, so that Emil Paur became conductor of the orchestra at the beginning of the season of 1893-94. Mr. Paur gave some excellent programs, and was the first to play in Boston such works as Tchaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Schéhérazade" suite, both of which have since become established favorites. Mr. Paur was conservative compared with many, but he maintained the established high standard of efficiency and when in 1898 Mr. Gericke again returned, for a stay of several seasons, he found things in an eminently satisfactory condition.

Mr. Gericke's second term was marked by the same perfection of ensemble and finish, and his programs, generally interesting, furnished most of the worthy novelties as they came into vogue. During this second term the new Symphony Hall was built and occupied for the regular concerts. When he returned to Vienna in 1906, after a two-period incumbency of 13 years, it was felt that as a drill master he had few if any equals, and his interpretations as a whole were broad-minded and sincere, even if at times inclined to be academic and dry.

Then followed Dr. Karl Muck, who brought a new individuality as to interpretation, and his first engagement of two seasons will be well remembered, as will also his work as conductor in his second term, which terminated last season under regrettable conditions. Between the two terms of Dr. Muck, one must not forget Max Fiedler, one whom it was a pleasure to know, and his term was productive of much that was excellent, and enjoyable, although it must be confessed that the ensemble of the orchestra suffered to some extent.

No conductor of American antecedents has as yet ruled the destinies of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, though rumor had it, after Mr. Nikisch left in 1893, that Theodore Thomas, then in Chicago, was considered for a successor, and it has been affirmed that he could have had the position if he had wished to leave Chicago, a step that for various reasons he was

Monteux, Conductor

Herald—Sept. 19, 1918

It is a pleasure to learn that Mr. Pierre Monteux will be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the month of October. Trained in the most thorough and famous of music schools, the Paris Conservatory, an excellent musician, he has had wide experience and has won an international reputation as a conductor of opera, ballet and symphonic concerts. His leadership of opera and ballet has already been warmly praised in this city.

His engagement will put an end to the ungrounded, preposterous theory that only a German or an Austrian can successfully conduct Symphony concerts. It is eminently fitting that a Frenchman should begin the season with an orchestra that is now largely composed of French virtuosos. His present engagement at the Metropolitan Opera House will prevent his remaining here through the season, but he will have a brilliant successor.

There should be, there undoubtedly will be, lively and widespread interest in the approaching Symphony season. The board of trustees has been diligent in securing accomplished musicians to fill the places made vacant by popular demand and patriotic feeling. The trustees fully intend to maintain the standard that has made this orchestra famous throughout the world. The list of assisting soloists already engaged is of itself a strong attraction. For many years the orchestra has been the pride and the glory of this city. It should be the zealous care of Boston that this glory shall not fade.

Monteux Plans Sparkling Programmes for Symphony During Coming Season

BY OLIN DOWNES

The Boston Symphony season will open next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 25 and 26, respectively. Ordinarily this concert would be the third of the series, and William H. Brennan, the manager, announces that for this concert the tickets for the third concert, Oct. 25-26, shall be used. Concerts 1 and 2 will be given later.

The programme that Mr. Monteux will play is somewhat different from the one planned originally for the beginning of the season. It comprises Cesar Franck's Symphony in D-minor, Schumann's Overture to "Manfred," the music of the ballet-pantomime, "La Peri," by Paul Dukas, and the "Iberia" by Debussy.

The first, second and fourth numbers are familiar and long-time favorites of Symphony audiences. Cesar Franck's Symphony, received sceptically when first produced here by Mr. Gericke, has become one of the most popular works in the repertoire of the orchestra.

Schumann's "Manfred" overture is the week's contribution of the older classics, while the fascinating color scheme of Debussy's Spanish pictures has been given frequently in recent years. The Dukas work is new to Boston, if, indeed, it is not new to America. "La Peri" is a ballet-pantomime, employing two mimes, and was written for production at the opera in Paris by the Ballet Russe in 1911. It is dedicated to the Russian dancer Mlle. Trouhanowa, and Dukas intended to have it danced by her in collaboration with Nijinsky. Trouhanowa was not a member of M. Diagheleff's company. The work was put into rehearsal at the Opera under Mr. Monteux; the scenery was built, but it was not produced there because Diagheleff refused to allow Nijinsky to dance with Trouhanowa. As a result, a production of the ballet-pantomime was made at the Chatelet by Trouhanowa and another Russian dancer, and Dukas conducted. It is based on the Oriental story of Iskender, who goes to the ends of the world to find the flower of immortality. He finds it in the hands of a peri at the court of Ormuzd. In the course of the pantomime he finds that the flower is not for him and that his end is near. The entire score of the pantomime as written for the theatre is played by Mr. Monteux.

One thing is certain, aside from the satisfaction which those who are part of the rehearsals of the Symphony Orchestra seem to feel with the methods of Mr. Monteux: he is a maker of programmes a hundred times more interesting than the moribund affairs that his predecessor used to resurrect from time to time from the Symphony chests of scores. Furthermore, though a lover of the classics—being even, for a great exception with a modern French musician, a proponent of Johannes Brahms—Mr. Monteux will give us for his regrettably brief season in Boston programmes which reflect the musical spirit of today.

It has been a habit, and especially a habit of the past German musical regime in this city and country, to decry this modern spirit and these remarkable tonal discoveries by which Frenchmen and not Germans have been opening new paths and disclosing new wonders of color and sonority and beauty to the world. Now, we hold no particular brief for modern French music as opposed to all other music of today. We are not by dispositions nationalists or chauvinists in our musical enthusiasms. We fully recognize the fact that since the beginning of the world much more poor music than good music has been composed, and that this is as true of the modern French school as of many others.

But of this modern French school another thing is true. While others—more particularly Germany in her music—were looking backward and feebly repeating the formulas which past masters struck out for themselves and made great for their time and enduring because of the creative spirit behind them, France, refusing to rest on stale tradition, has been the alert, eager, precise and creative pioneer of a new period in civilization. We do not know today how great Messrs. Debussy and D'Indy and a number of their colleagues will appear in a century hence—although all evidence at hand establishes their claim to enduring greatness more and more strongly as each year passes, but we do know, beyond a doubt or peradventure, that they are the men who speak a musical language of today, a language indicative of more culture, more spirit, less flesh, less sodden convention, than the music, probably, of any other school. The French Messiah of music may not have arrived as yet. It may require the world cataclysm to produce him. But the musical soil is already rich and fertile for his coming and from this soil are springing beautiful flowers of a myriad colors, and a perfume that is the perfume of nothing less than the immortal and transcendent spirit of France.

It is time that this music received at once a more generous and a more sympathetic presentation than it has had at the Symphony concerts in the past. Suppose, for a change, that over-attention were given to music by modern Frenchmen and progressive composers of other countries—including America—whenever a progressive composer from this country can really be found—and the German classics ignored for a period, not because of the war, but simply because we in America wished to cultivate a different point of view and look at the art of music from a newer standpoint than we have been looking at it in late years? It would not hurt us.

Nor will it hurt us to listen at the Symphony concert to a conductor of a school other than German. By all accounts the Boston Symphony, under Mr. Monteux's assiduous rehearsing, is developing again much of the purity of tone and of pitch, the clearness and warmth of color which were its characteristics in the greatest days of its past. The French have an inalienable instinct for that which is clear and beautiful. Today they join the great invention, originality, curiosity in discovery in their art, a profound seriousness, and, incidentally, a mastery of the much-discussed matter of "form" which places a majority of German composers in the light of laborious plodders by their side. It is time this were realized. Even a cursory examination of modern French scores would demonstrate the fairness and accuracy of such a statement. As technicians these men are well nigh incomparable today. As creative artists they are in the vanguard of musical progress, and they have in their eyes a vision of a new beauty that is at once new and very old—that beauty which is the heritage of a long and noble culture, reborn again in the new and youthful spirit of today.

SYMPHONY DIRECTOR NOT YET ENGAGED

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, issued yesterday the following statement concerning the conductorship of the Symphony orchestra for this season:

"It has already been announced that Pierre Monteux will direct the opening concerts of the year. At the time of this announcement it was expected that the name of the permanent conductor could soon be made public. Owing to the entirely abnormal condition of affairs throughout the world, such an announcement is still impossible. On more than one occasion it has taken from four to six weeks to receive answers from cable messages to Europe, but it may, and should, be said that negotiations are in active progress looking toward the continuance of the orchestra in the coming and following seasons upon precisely the high level which it has maintained throughout its history. Just as soon as dates and names can be given with definiteness more will be said." Herald Sept. 20, 1918.

Monteux Restoring Scores That Muck Tampered With

Post

Oct. 13/18
BY OLIN DOWNES

One thing is certain. The days that are passing with never a symphony concert are not passing to the detriment of the quality of the orchestra. Every day it is rehearsing under Mr. Monteux. He is not an easy man to please. When he commenced rehearsals he was not wholly satisfied with his success in getting exactly what he wanted from an orchestra which had long been trained by a conductor of quite another school and different ideals of orchestral tone than those of Mr. Monteux. It took—perhaps it is still taking—even the sanctified orchestra of Boston Symphony some time to adjust itself to the new delicacies and the fine balances of Mr. Monteux's art—this, at least, is the talk in inside musical circles. But Mr. Monteux is gradually gaining the results he covets, profiting by the delays of the season to impress the more satisfactorily his conceptions on his men.

Probably in another 11 days the accuracy of this gossip will be put to test for its accuracy in public performance. In the meantime this seems to hold true: That no conductor since the time of Wilhelm Gericke, the man who gave the Boston Orchestra its reputation, has rehearsed so meticulously, so scrupulously and with so fine an ear for tonal results. In the absence of that press agency by which conductors of greater pretensions, if not more talent, than Mr. Monteux often see to it that their doings and characteristics are loudly trumpeted through the land this may be said: That very few orchestra leaders have such an ear.

The acuteness of the ear of Mr. Toscanini, formerly at the Metropolitan Opera House, and possibly conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season, has been traditional; yet Mr. Monteux, conducting "Carmen," after Mr. Toscanini had conducted this work at the Metropolitan, discovered errors in the orchestral parts which had escaped the famous Italian maestro. He has discovered errors in Boston Symphony parts as well, and we are happy to say—if report is true—that he has restored to their original forms many orchestral works with which Dr. Muck felt free to tamper. Mr. Monteux believes in allowing the composer, and the composer only, to be responsible for his own greatnesses and shortcomings. In his opinion the duty of the conductor is solely that of the reverent and enthusiastic interpreter.

We are happy to hear that he works without a pencil. A man's methods of work may be what they like, provided he gets his results. Dr. Muck got results in ways of his own, though they were sometimes at variance with the intention of the composer. But one of his methods was blue pencilling his scores in practically every measure, and with a geometrical exactitude and elaborateness of which only a German could be suspected. Nothing was left to chance, inspiration, or memory. We know this personally to have been the case. Mr. Monteux does not need or like to mark up a score.

Has the reader ever been annoyed by loaning a book to a friend and having it returned with dashes, question marks, pseudo-profound reflections on the page margins, and all the other indications of the pencil fiend? Why do people do this? If a paragraph impresses them are they going to forget it? If they intend to lecture have they not their subject matter in their mind? Are they school children? If we were a newly appointed conductor at Symphony Hall we should certainly be annoyed to find the library so besmeared. Mr. Monteux's successor will find less "editing" than Dr. Muck's.

Mr. Monteux's sojourn here shows him to be a man of the simple and domestic tastes which characterized other symphony conductors than Dr. Muck. That gentleman lived with some pretension, and on a scale which, if not elaborate, was more or less in conformity with the ideas of those who think carefully about appearances and appurtenances due him who occupies an exalted official position.

He lived first in a pretentious hotel and later in an admirably appointed house on Hemenway street. Mr. Monteux lived also in a hotel—a modest one—for a week or thereabouts after his arrival in Boston for his fall duties, and then went straight out to a pleasant street in a suburb, and ensconced himself in a comfortable apartment and went to "housekeeping." At the rehearsals he has been simple and amiable, has not felt it necessary to intimidate his players to make them obey him, but has made his authority quietly and instantly felt. The gentlemen of the Symphony Orchestra were somewhat surprised, but surprised to their profit, to find him informing them that he was not satisfied with the tone-quality of the first simple, unison passage for strings, which opens the Cesar Franck symphony. He has eyes and ears on all sides of his head. He is not the man for an orchestra to "play horse" with.

The newly announced list of works to be performed by the Chicago Opera Company this season is of local interest since, in all probability, this company will revisit Boston, and, let us hope, repeat brilliant triumphs of last season. The "revivals" are, on the whole, more interesting than the "novelties." A "revival" may indeed be a "novelty" to a younger generation, as are many of Mr. Campanini's offerings, but it is unlikely that many of his "novelties" will have, in future years, "revivals." Certainly one expects little of "Le Vieil Aigle," by Raoul Gunsborg, or from Mascagni's "Le Maschere." Erlanger's "Aphrodite," with Mary Garden in the title role, will draw audiences of those athirst for musical novelties, and those who crave novelties not necessarily of the purely musical order. The same might be said of Massenet's "Cleopatra" with the same singer in the title role. A little better may be hoped of Xavier Leroux's "Le Chemineau" and "Le cadeau de Noel," a one-act opera based on an incident of the present war. But Verdi's "Don Carlos," little known in America, is worth all the other works put together. Other revivals will include Massenet's grim melodrama, "La Navarraise"; Rossini's "William Tell"; Offenbach's "Tales of Hoffmann"; Verdi's "Falstaff" and "Otello"; Meyerbeer's "L'Africaine"; Bellini's "Norma"; Donizetti's "Linda di Chamounix" and Ricci's comedy in the early Italian opera buffa style, "Crispino e la comare."

Conductor Pierre Monteux.

BY OLIN DOWNES

I tried last week to get Pierre Monteux, who will conduct the opening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season of 1918-19, to speak at some length of his work and the musical policies he intends to pursue while leading the Boston orchestra this fall.

But Mr. Monteux would rather work than talk, and when he talks would rather discuss other things than his work.

He spent the summer as the tenant and guest of John McCormack, the tenor, on Mr. McCormack's place, at Norton, Conn., a small house well in the trees, near the sound, along the shores of which he motored in the intervals of his work.

Working with Mr. McCormack, Mr.

MONTEUX FINDS U. S. MUSICIANS FAST READERS

Post

Oct. 6/18

Rapid Sight Players,
He Tells Olin
Downes

Monteux had found him not only a rarely accomplished singer, but an admirable musician—which is not necessarily the same thing—and a very broadminded and thoughtful artist, with a sure taste for the best and most interesting music, new or old.

Mr. Monteux did not share the opinion of the celebrated pianist, who remarked that a tenor was "not a voice, but a disease"! Mr. McCormack was a delightful companion, as well as fellow musician.

When Mr. Monteux talks he looks straight at you, as clearly, frankly, fearlessly as a child, and you know him immediately. At least you know the thing which it is most important to know about anyone. You know his absolute sincerity. You are certain of much human kindness and the loftiest attitude toward his art. You recognize a typical French clarity of vision, which is mental, as well as physical, and you know that if Diogenes had met Monteux he would put out his lantern, realizing for a certainty that he had discovered an honest man.

Also a very unassuming man. Yet the little that he told about his career, or that the little I was able to piece together, has for me an essentially dramatic quality. "Dramatic" because of the manner in which the events of the man's life seem to have dovetailed in with his own most deep-seated desires.

From the time he was 12, when he entered the Paris Conservatoire, he thought and dreamed of one thing—to conduct an orchestra. And not even the war, which interfered so terribly with artistic developments, especially in France, has kept him from advancing very rapidly on a chosen path.

In practically a decade Monteux has progressed from the position of an assistant conductor of the celebrated Colonne concerts in Paris to an appointment which is one of the most important that can be conferred on a musician—and this in addition to his position as a leading conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York.

His Musical Record

He played the violin at the Conservatoire. Among other things he also studied the viola.

In 1893—he is now 43—he became in the same year the violist of the celebrated Geloso String Quartet and first violist of the Colonne Orchestra. For years he and Mr. Longy, present first oboist of the Boston Symphony, were members of this body.

A new generation of musicians was then springing up in France—young men possessed of a holy enthusiasm and curiosity to know intimately the music of all great masters, to understand symphonic and instrumental music, as well as operatic works, which had been in previous years the principal occupation of French musicians.

In course of orchestra rehearsals Colonne became personally interested in Monteux and assisted him to get experience with the baton. It was Colonne, with the enthusiastic assistance of Monteux, who was an early enthusiast for Brahms, who performed that composer's Fourth Symphony for the first time in Paris.

The Russian ballet came to Paris—the organization which was eventually the means of bringing Mr. Monteux to America. Diaghileff wanted someone to prepare the orchestra for performances of "Scheherazade" and also Stravinsky's "Petrouchka." Monteux prepared them, with the understanding that the appointed conductor of the ballet should take the baton when time came for the performances.

"Then," said Mr. Monteux, "a thing occurred which pleased me very much. Stravinsky came to my rehearsals. We talked over the music—which is very wonderful, and very hard for an orchestra. Stravinsky went to Mr. Diaghileff. 'I wish this man to conduct "Petrouchko." ' Therefore, I conducted the premiere and the following performances of this work, which I shall direct this winter, when it is produced at the Metropolitan. Later, the Russian ballet asked me to America and—I am here!

"To go back a little: In 1913 I resolved to conduct concerts of my own. Let me tell you that one of the happiest episodes of my life occurred when a number of my colleagues and supporters met, agreeing to put their influence back of the new orchestral 'societe' I wished to form, and we advertised for young musicians to come and be examined if they wished positions in the new orchestra. The best of the young players of the day came, eagerly, enthusiastically, with the result that I had a really wonderful orchestra to begin with.

Not Placed by Critics

"This orchestra played, under myself and other conductors, for the Boston Opera season of 1914 in Paris. It also gave 10 concerts in Paris of modern music—the most modern music you can imagine.

I asked Mr. Monteux whether he could compare American orchestral musicians with those of France. "As a rule," he replied, "American orchestral players, such as those of the Boston Symphony, are quicker readers at first sight than French players, and they have a commensurate technical facility. This is due, I think, to two important things: First of all, you have here an orchestra of which the musicians are practically bound to give all the time necessary to very exacting rehearsals of music of every imaginable kind. These men are at the service of the conductor at any hour and for as many hours as he wants them. They play music of all countries, of all periods, and all schools. All this develops the quality of reading difficult music at sight in an exceptional degree. Also, for the reason that salaries here are considerably larger than they are, as a rule, in Europe, the musicians can afford to devote their time to constant rehearsal under one conductor, which is very seldom the case on the other side.

MONTEUX TO LEAD SYMPHONY A MONTH

Metropolitan Conductor Engaged for Concerts in October

Pierre Monteux, who twice in the past three years has appeared in Boston, has been engaged by the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra especially to conduct the three pairs of concerts to be given in October, that is on Oct. 11-12, 18-19, and 25-26, as well as two concerts in Cambridge and Northampton on Oct. 17 and 23 respectively. His engagement as first French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company in New York precludes a longer stay in Boston. The trustees expect soon to be able to announce the name of the conductor for the remainder of the season.

Subscribers to last season's concerts have until Sept. 26 the privilege of renewing their subscriptions. The season sale to the general public opens at Symphony Hall Monday morning, Sept. 30.

M. Monteux, who is 43 years of age, received his musical education at the Paris Conservatoire and had his first experience as a conductor of important works with the Concerts Colonne, in Paris. Beginning in 1911 he made four European tours as conductor of the Ballet Russe, and it was with this organization that he made his American debut in the fall of 1916. When the Metropolitan Opera Company decided a year ago to devote greater attention to French operas, he was engaged as French conductor, two new works, the opera "Marouf" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera-ballet, "Le Coq d'Or," being entrusted to his direction. In Boston he will be recalled for his direction of the orchestra with the Ballet Russe in the season of 1916-17, and of the performances last year by the Metropolitan Opera Company of "Le Coq d'Or" and of "Samson and Delilah."

WHEN CONCERTS BEGIN

Frank. — Sept. 21, 1918

More Plans for the Symphony Orchestra —Mme. Galli-Curci's First Programme—Mr. Lazaro To Be Heard

FOR the present there is little to add to the announcements about the new season made by the management of the Symphony Concerts on Wednesday last. It was then made known that Mr. Monteux of the Metropolitan Opera House would lead the orchestra in three pairs of concerts in Boston in October; that, before long, a more permanent conductor would be engaged; and that the "assisting artists" for the autumn, winter and spring, comprised Mes. Garrison, Easton and Braslau and Mr. de Gogorza for singers; Messrs. Helfetz and Thibaud for violinists; and Messrs. Hofmann, Bauer, Levitzki and Arthur Rubinstein and Mme. Samaroff for pianists. It further appeared that subscribers to the concerts of last season, either on Friday afternoons or Saturday evenings, may renew subscriptions through Sept. 26—Thursday of next week; and that on Monday, Sept. 30, tickets for the new season would be on sale at the box-office.

A new communiqué from Symphony Hall now reports the reorganization of the orchestra—that is to say the dismissal of all German and Austrian subjects not on their way to naturalization as citizens of the United States and the substitution for them and for a few drafted men of French or American citizens. Sundry players, however, have still to be added to the string choir, so that as yet it is impossible to print a roster of the reconstituted orchestra. As report goes, Frenchmen have filled most of the vacancies among the wind instruments and Americans most of those among the strings. Thus freed from the current restrictions upon the movements of German or Austrian subjects, the orchestra will return to the full schedule of concerts in cities other than Boston. It will make the five monthly journeys to Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Brooklyn and New York and resume or continue the usual concerts in the nearer cities of New England. It will also at midwinter make the annual visit to five or six cities of the nearer West. Here in Boston, of course, the twenty-four pairs of concerts will befall as of old—the first on Oct. 11 and 12 next; the last on May 1 and 2, 1919.

SYMPHONY PLAN AGAIN CHANGED

Herald — Oct. 13/18
Further Postponement of Season's Opening to
Oct. 25

Again must the opening of the Symphony season be postponed. It is a great disappointment to the patrons, but it is a very necessary feature of the work to subdue the epidemic.

According to present plans, the season will now open on Friday afternoon, Oct. 25, and Saturday evening, Oct. 26. Health Commissioner Woodward has held out hope that this week will be the last week of the ban on theatres, music halls and other places of public assemblage.

The postponement means another reconstruction of programs. Josef Hoffman's appearance in Cambridge and Boston must be postponed, but arrangements will be made by which he will appear later. Under present conditions there are only two concerts before the orchestra leaves on its first southern trip. There will be no soloist at the first concerts Oct. 25-26, and at the next pair of concerts on Nov. 1 and 2 the soloist will be Florence Easton, the brilliant soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York. Subscribers to the Symphony season will not lose the two concerts in October which have been postponed; at least, they will be given in May, and it is within the realm of possibility that one pair may be given during the winter.

The first concert of the Cambridge series will be given either one or two weeks later.

Mr. Monteux is hard at work with the orchestra. Rehearsals are held every morning of the six weekdays from 10 to 1. The orchestra is rapidly getting into prime condition, and Mr. Monteux expresses himself as being more than satisfied.

No word has yet been received regarding the sailing of Mr. Rakand. It is expected that he will sail within the next 10 days, which will bring him to Boston in ample time to make himself familiar with his new environment and begin his work with the orchestra in the second week of November.

SYMPHONY MEN GREET MONTEUX

Herald — Oct. 2/18
New Conductor Welcomed at First Rehearsal

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday at rehearsal introduced Pierre Monteux, who is to conduct the October concerts of the organization, appearing for the first time in his official capacity. There are nine trustees and Judge Cabot humorously raised the question whether, according to the old saying that it takes nine tailors to make a man, these nine trustees will make one Maj. Higginson.

They are making their attempt to do for music in America something of what he has done, he declared, because they feel sure of the orchestra itself. It has had the benefit of a succession of able conductors, and the members themselves have always been chosen with the greatest care as artists and as men. Their work in public has proved to all the world what true artists they are. Their work in private has proved them to be true men with whom the trustees are looking forward to a long future of friendly co-operation, he said.

He referred to the world disturbance that has made some changes in the orchestra, as elsewhere, and while voicing regret declared that the orchestra was fortunate in obtaining new members of the highest character and tried excellence.

"We begin the year," said he, "under one who brings with him every advantage of experience and authority. He comes as a musician and a gentleman, with whom an association of a few weeks will seem altogether too short."

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

After two postponements due to the influenza the Symphony season will open next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 25 and 26. Ordinarily this concert would be the third of the series. Mr. Brennan, the manager, announces that for this concert the tickets for the third concert, Oct. 25-26, shall be used. Concerts one and two will be given later.

The postponement has not been without its benefit. Mr. Monteux has had rehearsals every weekday, with the result that before the orchestra makes its first public appearance it will have had four weeks of solid rehearsing. As 25 per cent. of the orchestra is new this period of rehearsal has been invaluable.

The program that Mr. Monteux will play comprises Franck's symphony in D minor, Schumann's overture to "Manfred," the music of the ballet-phantomime "La Peri" by Dukas and the "Iberia" of Debussy.

Dukas's work is new to Boston. "La Peri" is a ballet-phantomime, employing two mimes. It was written for production at the opera in Paris by the Ballet Russe in 1911. It is dedicated to the Russian dancer, Mlle. Trouhanowa, and Dukas intended to have it danced by her in collaboration with Nijinsky. Trouhanowa was not a member of M. Diagheleff's company. The work was put into rehearsal at the opera under Mr. Monteux; the scenery was built, but it was not produced there because Diagheleff refused to allow Nijinsky to dance with Trouhanowa. As a result, a production of the ballet-phantomime was made at the Chatelet by Trouhanowa and another Russian dancer, and Dukas conducted. It is based on the oriental story of Iskender, who goes to the ends of the world to find the flower of immortality. He finds it in the hands of a peri at the court of Ormuzd. In the course of the phantomime he finds that the flower is not for him and that his end is near. The entire score of the phantomime is a work of exceeding brilliance.

The form of the program is as follows:
Cesar Franck.....Symphony in D minor
Schumann.....Overture to "Manfred"
Dukas....."La Peri" Debussy.....Iberia

TAK, SYMPHONY PLAYER, PUT IN DRAFT CLASS 1A

The differences between Edward Tak, violin player in the Symphony Orchestra, and the United States Government were all settled amicably yesterday when Tak received back his citizenship papers, waived his claim for exemption and was placed in Class 1A, ready to serve immediately in the Army. It is understood also that he will be reinstated in the orchestra.

The trouble started when Tak, a citizen of Holland, who has taken out his first applications for citizenship in this country, was registered in the draft on Sept. 12. He immediately made every effort to be exempted, and finally, in the face of the opposition of Freeman O. Emerson and other draft officials, renounced his first papers and waived all future chances to be either an American citizen or an American soldier.

When Manager A. J. Brennan heard of this action, he discharged Tak. In other ways also, it is understood, Tak came to realize the significance of his act. Yesterday he returned to the draft headquarters at 200 Huntington av. and announced that he had changed his mind and was anxious for immediate service in the Army.

His original reason for trying to avoid service, he said, was that his mother in Holland is sick. He expressed himself as genuinely sorry for his disloyalty and after Mr. Emerson had consulted the authorities, received his first citizenship papers, and his questionnaire, on which he waived exemption claims, and was immediately placed in Class 1A. Manager Brennan stated that he would probably reinstate Mr. Tak as violin player. Tak's disloyalty, it is said, was due as much to artistic temperament as anything else.

SOLDIERS IN THE SYMPHONY

Trans. — Oct. 21/18
Director Monteux and Seven Members of Orchestra Have Taken Part in War—Organization Has Eleven-Star Service Flag

When the patrons of the Symphony Orchestra go into Symphony Hall Friday afternoon for the first concert, they will see two flags—one, the 100 per cent pennant issued by the Liberty loan committee, and the other the service flag of the orchestra. The Symphony Orchestra and the employees of Symphony Hall went over the top in the Liberty loan Friday. Every member of the orchestra and every employee in Symphony Hall bought bonds. The total for the organization was $15,150, which averaged something more than $100 for each individual.

The service flag contains eleven stars, which represent nine members of the orchestra and two members of the business staff who have so far entered the service of the United States or the Allies. Georges Grisez, first clarinet of the orchestra until 1914, has been in service as a brancardier since the beginning of the war and has been practically all of the time in the East. He went through the campaign of Gallipoli, and when the Allied armies established themselves at Salonica he accompanied them and has been there since. Pierre Fossé, third oboe in the season of 1913-14, went into the French army in August, 1914, served with the Forty-Second Regiment of Territorials for several months, and since then has been French interpreter with the British forces. Paul Mimart, second clarinet for many years, left Boston last July and is now with his regiment on the front in France.

Modeste Alloo, a Belgian subject, first trombone, for the past year has been director and trainer of bands at Camp Devens. André Gietzen, another Belgian subject, joined the American Army as interpreter last winter. Leslie J. Rogers, librarian of the orchestra, Charles Pinfield, Joseph

30
Gewirtz and Samuel Rosen, violinists, entered the Army last summer in the draft. Leon Roby of the business staff has been in France as a sergeant in the Quartermaster's Corps since August, 1917, and Miss Florence Hayford, also of the business staff, sailed early this month for Red Cross service overseas.

There are also in the orchestra seven veterans of the French service, not including Mr. Monteux, who is conducting the early concerts and who had twenty-five months' active service at the beginning of the war. These veterans, not represented by stars on the service flag, are Ferdinand Thillois, violin; Claude Barrier, first viola, who was fourteen months in active service, which was followed by twenty-two months in the hospital; Georges Miquelle, cellist; Georges Mager, viola; Louis Speyer, oboe; Emile Stievenard, bass clarinet, and Abdon Laus, first bassoon.

SYMPHONY TO FLY TWO HONOR FLAGS

One for Members in War Service, the Other Loan Purchases

Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have a record of 100 per cent. in the fighting fourth Liberty loan. Besides this, 11 members of the organization are in the service of the allied governments in the present war. To commemorate these facts, two flags will be unfurled at the first concert to be held on Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall. One of the flags will be the one issued by the Liberty loan committee to the members for going over the top in regard to the Liberty loan. The total subscriptions amounted to $15,150.

The service flag will contain 11 stars, representing nine members of the orchestra and two members of the business staff who have so far entered the fighting service of the United States or the allies. Three stars belong to France. Modeste Alloo, a Belgian subject, first trombone of the orchestra, has for the past year been director and trainer of bands at Camp Devens. Much of the work done in regard to the fourth Liberty loan was by Joseph Mann, the librarian. It is fairly safe to state that no large orchestra in the country can show a like record. Herald Oct. 2/18

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA NOT TO BE UNIONIZED Trans. — June 6/18 NEGOTIATIONS END IN AN IMPASSE —CONTRACTS RENEWED ON A NON- UNION, BUT GENEROUS, BASIS

The negotiations, recently set afoot, toward the "unionizing" of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have come definitively to an end, and the men of the band are now renewing their contracts with the trustees upon the former "non-union" basis, but upon appreciably better terms which make them the best-paid and the most generously considered orchestra in the United States. Especially has this considerate disposition of the new management appeared in provision for income through the summer to the men whose salaries are not the highest. These new arrangements have contributed not a little to general good will between the players in the orchestra and the new trustees.

The failure of the "unionizing" negotiations was, in a sense, amicable. The management of the orchestra offered no opposition to the "unionizing," so long as it retained undiminished its freedom to recruit the band, in vacancy or at need, with the best men obtainable, whether in Boston or New York, in America or in Europe, inside or outside the union. Rightly it regarded this liberty of choice as essential and fundamental to the standards of the orchestra. The spokesmen of the Boston union of the American Federation of Musicians were seemingly willing to concede this freedom of choice. When, however, the national officers of the Federation were consulted, as they had to be, they declared that any such concession was impossible under the constitution and the rules of the Federation and that, as long as these stood, no local modification of them was permissible. Since the management of the orchestra stood righteously firm for its freedom of choice and since the highest authorities of the Federation held to the rules limiting this liberty, the men in the orchestra who had been advocating entrance into the union perceived that there was an impasse beyond negotiations to alter, and dropped the matter with the outcome already indicated.

NEW MEMBERS OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

NEW SYMPHONY VIOLIN LEADER

Herald — Aug. 30/18
Fredric Fradkin Succeeds
Anton Witek as Concert Master

IS 26 YEARS OLD AND AN AMERICAN

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced yesterday that Fredric Fradkin, American violinist, had been engaged as concert master of the orchestra to succeed Anton Witek. Besides being a native born American, Mr. Fradkin has youth in his favor, and is an artist of unusual gifts. Only 26 years old, he is the youngest man to occupy this important post since Franz Kneisel came to Boston in 1895.

The new member of the Symphony Orchestra attracted much attention as the violinist who was concert master of the Ballet Russe Orchestra during the two Boston engagements of that company. Musically speaking, he is decidedly of the French school.

Is of Russian Parentage

Born in Troy, of Russian parents, April 2, 1892, he was 5 years old when his father placed him under the tuition of Henry Schradieck, the famous teacher. His next teacher was Max Bendix, for many years concert master of the Chicago orchestra. In 1905 he went to Paris, where his first teachers were Remy and Joseph White, and in 1907 he entered the Conservatoire in the class of Professor Lefort. He received the first prize of the Conservatoire for violin playing in 1909, the jury being composed of Gabriel Faure, Edouard Colonne, Paul Vidal, D'Ambrosio, Jacques Thibaud, Pierre Salo, and others. His first engagement was as concert master and soloist under Pennequin. The following year he was engaged by Louis Ganne as soloist in Monte Carlo, where he had a decided success. Then, feeling that he needed more work, he went to Brussels and studied with Ysaye.

Led Ballet Russe

Fradkin's first important appearance in America was in Carnegie Hall, New York, in January, 1911, when he was the last soloist to appear with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra under the late Gustav Mahler. Exceedingly laudatory notices followed his appearance. He went to London in the spring of 1911 and played under Landon Ronald. In 1912 he was engaged as concert master and soloist of the Wiener-Concert Verein, Vienna, where he had more success. He returned to this country in the fall of 1915 to be concert master and soloist of the orchestra organized for the Ballet Russe, and held this position during the life of that organization in this country.

Mr. Fradkin plans to reach Boston toward the end of next month.

FRADKIN, NEW CONCERTMASTER

Trans. — Aug. 30, 1918
American Violinist with Fine Record Engaged for Boston Symphony Orchestra

Judge Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces that Frederic Fradkin, the young American violinist, had been engaged as concertmaster of the orchestra. It is considered fortunate for the orchestra and its patrons in Boston and elsewhere that the difficult problem of filling the first seat of the violin section has been successfully solved and that an American has been found for it. Besides being a native-born American, Mr. Fradkin has not only youth in his favor, but he is an artist of unusual gifts and achievements. Only twenty-six years old, he is the youngest man to occupy this most important post since Franz Kneisel came to Boston in 1885.

Mr. Fradkin will be remembered by the musical public of Boston as the violinist who was concertmaster of the Ballet Russe Orchestra and roused such enthusiasm with the various incidental solos he had to play during the two Boston engagements of that company. His career, though necessarily brief, is interesting.

He is, musically speaking, decidedly of the French school. Born in Troy, N. Y., of Russian parents, April 2, 1892, when he was five years old his father placed him under the tuition of Henry Schradieck, the famous teacher. His next teacher was Max Bendix, for many years concertmaster of the Chicago Orchestra. In 1906 he went to Paris, where his first teachers were Remy and Joseph White, and in 1907 he entered the Conservatoire in the class of Professor Lefort. He received the first prize of the Conservatoire for violin playing in 1909, the jury being composed of Gabriel Fauré, Edouard Colonne, Paul Vidal, D'Ambrosio, Jacques Thibaud, Pierre Lalo, etc.

His first engagement was as concertmaster and soloist under Pannequin. The following year he was engaged by Louis Ganne as soloist in Monte Carlo, where he had a decided success. Then, feeling that he needed more work, he went to Brussels and studied with Ysaye. His important appearance in America was in Carnegie Hall, New York, January, 1911, when he was the last soloist to appear with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra under the late Gustav Mahler. Exceedingly laudatory notices followed his appearance. Mr. Finck in the New York Evening Post saying that in young Fradkin "the whole world has an artist of the first order, whose playing will make an epoch in the history of famous violinists."

He went to London in the spring of 1911 and played under Landon Ronald. In 1912 he was engaged as concertmaster and so-

Fredric Fradkin, native born American violinist, engaged by the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as concert master to succeed Witek, is only 26 years of age.

Fredric Fradkin, the American violinist engaged to succeed Anton Witek as concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is only 26 years old, and the youngest man to occupy the post since Franz Kneisel held it, more than 20 years ago. He is a native born American, of Russian parents. He has studied under Schradieck, Bendix, Remy, Pannequin and Ysaye. He had pronounced success as concert master and soloist of the Wiener-Concert Verein, Vienna, and was concert master of the Ballet Russe Orchestra during its existence in this country. Mr. Fradkin plans to reach Boston late in September. Soloist of the Wiener-Concert Verein, Vienna where he had his usual success. He returned to this country in the fall of 1915 to be concertmaster and soloist of the orchestra organized for the Ballet Russe, and held this position during the life of that organization in this country. Mr. Fradkin plans to reach Boston toward the end of next month.

Boston's Symphony and Musical Union Friendly

Post — June 16, 1918

The negotiations between the Boston Symphony and the Musical Union regarding the unionization of the Symphony Orchestra have come to an end, but they have come to an end in a way which promises well for the future—in an amicable spirit and with a friendly understanding on both sides of the difficulties which at present make the combination impossible. Whether the Boston Symphony remains an entity itself, unrelated to the Musical Union and uninfluenced by its policies as Major Higginson desired, or whether it eventually reverses its long tradition in this respect, the fact remains that a more cordial understanding has been reached between the two parties as never before. This is a substantial gain. "Live and let live" should be the policy observed by all big organizations, whether private or public, whether representing corporate or union interests. The day in which the Musical Union realizes that the existence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a help and not a hindrance to its progress, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra knows that the Musical Union has no thought of interfering with its chosen course in matters which are for the benefit of the public, will mark an advance and a happy one in musical conditions in America.

The public and the reviewers are still at liberty to speculate as to the name of the next conductor of the Boston Symphony. No agreement, it appears, has been reached up to the time of writing as to the future leader. From authoritative sources comes the implication that the negotiations with Sir Henry Wood of London are not yet at an end.

Mr. Wood, it appears, has several contracts in England which he considers binding. It is hoped that these contracts may be so adjusted as to bring him here. It is essential that Mr. Wood or some other conductor whose people are unequivocally the allies of America should be chosen as the head of the Symphony organization. This would give Mr. Wood preference, even over a Russian conductor, in view of the present state of the public mind toward that country. It is all very well to keep music out of politics. This has been the cry in the past, particularly of those pro-Germans, pacifists and supporters of the recent conductor, who was quick to take advantage of the broadmindedness and courtesy of the Boston public toward the very man who so notoriously abused its trust. But aside from that isolated instance the fact remains not only that war is a very actual thing, but that it is present today, and that the prosecution of that war in the most effective manner, a manner which will command the support of the entire American public, is the immediate necessity and one far more pressing than all the orchestras in the land. Not only this we are fighting to protect our art institutions as well as everything else that we in America call civilization and we can no longer afford to quibble over fine points of differentiation between the enemy alien who is or is not harmful. Those who appear before the American public must be with us, heart and soul, in the present conflict. That is the principal reason why the candidacy of Henry Wood, whose skill at the baton might be matched by other available men, is so favorably looked upon by representative men of this city.

Symphony Proves Patriotism Discharges Germans; Hires French

The expulsion of all German artists from the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the engagement of a number of players, principally of wind instruments, from the French Military Band which recently performed so brilliantly in this city, is a move which will be welcomed on all sides. The news comes that Alwin Schroeder, for many years a member of the Symphony, then resigned, has now returned again to its ranks. There will be other changes. Emil Ferir, first violin for many years of the Boston Symphony, has resigned his position to occupy the same post in the Philadelphia orchestra.

There are many vacancies to be filled. Georges Longy, now in Europe, is expected to bring back some players with him. There are orchestral players by no means inferior to players now in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of American birth and experience, who could well be called on to contribute to filling the gaps in the ranks.

We do not believe in chauvinism, in provincial favoritism, in anything less than the highest orchestral standards, but there are certainly many instrumentalists born and trained in this country who should now be given employment and encouragement in this city as well as European players—even those of our allies. Dr. Muck, when he came back to Boston for his second term, discharged for reason of his own many excellent musicians in the orchestra. He replaced them in more than one instance with players, mostly of German birth, who were inferior artists to the men who departed, with, apparently, no better reason than the caprice of the conductor. It is high time that Americans who are able to do so, and meet the severest practical tests of their ability, should take part in the restoration of the Boston Symphony to its unequalled excellence under Gericke. Now is the moment for a wise and discriminating encouragement of national talent in the greatest of our national orchestras.

FRENCH VETERAN FOR SYMPHONY

Claude Barrier, the new solo viola of the Symphony Orchestra, arrived in Boston Friday morning direct from France.

Mr. Barrier is 30 years old. He took first prize in the Conservatoire in 1909, and while still there he played with the Lamoureux Orchestra at Scheveningen. He has had much experience in concert work, both orchestral and quartet.

Mr. Barrier, like so many of the other Frenchmen who have become members of the orchestra, is a veteran of the war. He went out at the first call in August, 1914, and was continually in the front line in the Champagne until September, 1915, when he was wounded in the thigh. Following his wound he spent 22 months in the hospital and then was discharged unfit for further military duty.

Mr. Barrier said that a great change had come over Paris since the Germans were turned back at the Marne last summer. The normal life had been resumed; the theatres were all open and doing well; the music season promised to be very active. The French people, he said, were very cheerful, and the morale had never been higher. Mr. Barrier remarked that when he came into New York Thursday night his first and deepest impression was received by the sight of a great transport crowded with American soldiers sailing for France.

FRENCH PLAYERS IN SYMPHONY Trustees of Boston Orchestra Engage Five Members of Military Band

Following the visit here a few days ago of the French Military Band the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have engaged the services of five of its members. Before the musicians left France their Government gave them the privilege of accepting engagements in this country, as it was felt they had already rendered their share of service in the war.

Contracts have accordingly been signed with Abdon Laus, bassoon; Emile Stievenard, bass clarinet; Louis Speyer, oboe and English horn; Fernand Thillois, violinist, and Georges Miquelle, violoncello.

M. Speyer played a solo at the concert in Symphony Hall Tuesday night and aroused great admiration with his tone and technique. He took a first prize at the Paris Conservatoire in 1911 and has played with several leading Continental orchestras.

Louis Speyer, Oboe.

Fradkin and Thillois

Last spring it was announced that five members of the French military band had been engaged. Other musicians of reputations will be found in the personnel.

In the first violins there will be two new faces—Frederic Fradkin, who will be concertmaster, and Ferdinand Thillois.

Mr. Thillois, who came to Boston last spring with the French band, was born at Charleville, July 19, 1890. A graduate of the Paris Conservatoire, he won the first prize for violin in 1913. He was a member of both the Colonne and Lamoureux orchestras. Called to duty in the 91st infantry he fought through the battles of the Marne, the Argonne and the Chemin-des-Dames. In the last battle he was wounded and spent 11 months in the hospital at Nantes. During the latter part of his convalescence he went from hospital to hospital, playing for his wounded comrades. Both his parents have been prisoners in Germany since 1914, and he does not know what has become of them.

Some New "Strings"

In the second violin section will be several new men, all of them Americans. The leader of the viola section will be M. Barrier, who comes from Paris purposely for this post; and in the same section will be Georges Mager, who was a member of the French band. Mr. Mager, when the French band appeared at the Pop concerts last spring, sang a solo. A versatile musician, in addition to being a gifted viola player, he is one of the best trombone players in France. He was taken prisoner early in the war and was exchanged in July, 1915. He has since served in Serbia and Salonica.

Mr. Malkin becomes the head of the cello section, and sharing the first desk with him, will be Alwin Schroeder. An interesting member of the section will be Georges Miquelle, also from the French band, whose playing here made a profound impression. He is a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire, a veteran, and has been one of the principal cellists in the Colonne orchestra of Paris. Another newcomer is the Dutch cellist, Philipp Abbas, a graduate of the Amsterdam Conservatoire. When he was 17 he was solo cellist of the orchestra at Aix-la-Chapelle. He has been soloist with Wood of the Queen's Hall orchestra, London; from 1907 to 1911 of the Brighton municipal orchestra, England, and for three years of the orchestras at Nice, Aix-les-Bains and Bi-could well be called on to contribute to filling the gaps in the ranks.

We do not believe in chauvinism, in provincial favoritism, in anything less than the highest orchestral standards, but there are certainly many instrumentalists born and trained in this country who should now be given employment and encouragement in this city as well as European players—even those of our allies. Dr. Muck, when he came back to Boston for his second term, discharged for reason of his own many excellent musicians in the orchestra. He replaced them in more than one instance with players, mostly of German birth, who were inferior artists to the men who departed, with, apparently, no better reason than the caprice of the conductor. It is high time that Americans who are able to do so, and meet the severest practical tests of their ability, should take part in the restoration of the Boston Symphony to its unequalled excellence under Gericke. Now is the moment for a wise and discriminating encouragement of national talent in the greatest of our national orchestras.

FRENCH VETERAN FOR SYMPHONY

Claude Barrier, the new solo viola of the Symphony Orchestra, arrived in Boston Friday morning direct from France.

Mr. Barrier is 30 years old. He took first prize in the Conservatoire in 1909, and while still there he played with the Lamoureux Orchestra, at Scheveningen. He has had much experience in concert work, both orchestral and quartet.

Mr. Barrier, like so many of the other Frenchmen who have become members of the orchestra, is a veteran of the war. He went out at the first call in August, 1914, and was continually in the front line in the Champagne until September, 1915, when he was wounded in the thigh. Following his wound he spent 22 months in the hospital and then was discharged unfit for further military duty.

Mr. Barrier said that a great change had come over Paris since the Germans were turned back at the Marne last summer. The normal life had been resumed; the theatres were all open and doing well; the music season promised to be very active. The French people, he said, were very cheerful, and the morale had never been higher. Mr. Barrier remarked that when he came into New York Thursday night his first and deepest impression was received by the sight of a great transport crowded with American soldiers sailing for France.

FRENCH PLAYERS IN SYMPHONY Trustees of Boston Orchestra Engage Five Members of Military Band

Following the visit here a few days ago of the French Military Band the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have engaged the services of five of its members. Before the musicians left France their Government gave them the privilege of accepting engagements in this country, as it was felt they had already rendered their share of service in the war.

Contracts have accordingly been signed with Abdon Laus, bassoon; Emile Stievenard, bass clarinet; Louis Speyer, oboe and English horn; Fernand Thillois, violinist, and Georges Miquelle, violoncello.

M. Speyer played a solo at the concert in Symphony Hall Tuesday night and aroused great admiration with his tone and technique. He took a first prize at the Paris Conservatoire in 1911 and has played with several leading Continental orchestras.

M. Stievenard has the reputation of being the greatest master of this instrument in France. He received a first prize at the Paris Conservatoire, has been a member of the Lamoureux and Opéra Comique orchestras, and is a professor in Vincent d'Indy's Schola Cantorum. M. Stievenard was wounded at the Battle of the Yser.

M. Laus is a first prize man. He has played at the Théâtre des Champs Elysées and Ballet Russe, under the direction of Pierre Monteux.

M. Thillois received second prize at the Paris Conservatoire in 1912. He was called away immediately for his military service of two years and he served continuously until this spring.

M. Miquelle is regarded as a player of most unusual talent. He won a first prize at the Paris Conservatoire, and has been a soloist at the Concerts Wurmser in Paris.

Fradkin and Thillois

Last spring it was announced that members of the French military band had been engaged. Other musicians' reputations will be found in the personnel.

In the first violins there will be new faces—Frederic Fradkin, who is concertmaster, and Ferdinand Thillois.

Mr. Thillois, who came to Boston spring with the French band, was born at Charleville, July 19, 1890. A graduate of the Paris Conservatoire, he won first prize for violin in 1913. He was member of both the Colonne and Lamoureux orchestras. Called to duty in the 91st infantry he fought through battles of the Marne, the Argonne, the Chemin-des-Dames. In the battle he was wounded and spent months in the hospital at Nantes. During the latter part of his convalescence he went from hospital to hospital, playing for his wounded comrades. Both parents have been prisoners in Germany since 1914, and he does not know what has become of them.

Some New "Strings"

In the second violin section will be several new men, all of them Americans. The leader of the viola section will be M. Barrier, who comes from Paris purposely for this post; and in the same section will be Georges Mager, who was a member of the French band. Mager, when the French band appeared at the Pop concerts last spring, sang solo. A versatile musician, in addition to being a gifted viola player, he is one of the best trombone players in France. He was taken prisoner early in the war and was exchanged in July, 1915. He has since served in Serbia and Salonika.

Mr. Malkin becomes the head of the cello section, and sharing the first duty with him, will be Alwin Schroeder, an interesting member of the section. He will be Georges Miquelle, also from the French band, whose playing here made a profound impression. He is a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire, a veteran, and has been one of the principal cellists in the Colonne orchestra in Paris. Another newcomer is the Dutch cellist, Philipp Abbas, a graduate of the Amsterdam Conservatoire. When he was 17 he was solo cellist of the orchestra at Aix-la-Chapelle. He has been soloist with Wood of the Queen's Hall orchestra, London; from 1907 to 1910 of the Brighton municipal orchestra, England, and for three years of the orchestras at Nice, Aix-les-Bains and Biarritz.

arritz. He has also traveled in France with Vincent d'Indy. In 1916-17 he was at the desk of the first 'cellist of the Philadelphia orchestra.

Other New Players

A new double-bass player is Agesilao Villano, a graduate of the Royal Conservatory of Parma. He began his career in the Scala Orchestra, whose director then was Faccio. He went to South America and for the last 15 years has been principal double-bass in the Colon Theatre of Buenos Ayres. In the winters he returned to Europe and played in France, England, Italy and Germany, under the direction of Mascagni, Martucci, Mancinelli, Toscanini, Campanini, Serafin, Saint-Saens, Rabaud, Messager, Leroux and others. In Italy he has also played under distinguished guest conductors.

A new oboe player is Louis Speyer, also from the French Military Band, and an artist of most unusual gifts. He was a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire in 1911.

The two new clarinets are Leo Croes (succeeding Paul Minart, who was called to military duty in France last spring), and Emile Stievenard, who will be the new bass clarinet. Mr. Croes served in the 8th regiment of territorial infantry and was severely wounded at the battle of the Yser in November, 1914. A first prize of the Conservatoire of Lille, he has played at the Monteux concerts and at the Theatre des Champs Elysees, Paris. Mr. Stievenard has been a professor at D'Indy's Schola Cantorum. He is a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire and has been bass clarinet of the Lamoureux concerts and the Opera-Comiques. He also was wounded at the battle of the Yser.

Abdon Laus, the new first bassoon, is 30 years old. A first prize of the Paris Conservatoire, he has played in the principal orchestras of Paris and has given four years to the Grand Opera.

The new first trombone is Mr. Sordillo of this city.

The First Pair of Symphony Concerts to Become the Last, with Beginning on Oct. 18 and 19—Other Postponements

Trans. — Oct. 3, 1918
As for concerts, for the first time in the thirty-eight years of the Symphony Orchestra, the season in Boston will not begin according to schedule. The first pair of concerts, announced for Friday afternoon, Oct. 11, and Saturday evening, Oct. 12, will not take place. They will become the twenty-fourth and final pair of concerts and will befall on Friday afternoon, May 9, and Saturday evening, May 10, at the end of the season. Tickets for the first pair of concerts will thus become the tickets for the last. No other arrangement was advisable, since the orchestra has concerts in hand, here or elsewhere, for every Friday and Saturday from Oct. 11 and 12 through May 2 and 3 and since the succession of soloists cannot easily be altered.

Accordingly, the second pair of concerts (on the original schedule) will begin the series on Friday afternoon, Oct. 18 and Saturday evening, Oct. 19. Mr. Monteux will then lead the orchestra for the first time in Boston in public; Mr. Hofmann will be the assisting pianist; and the programme, unless the conductor chooses to alter it, will stand as announced. Mr. Monteux, moreover, will have his three pairs of concerts as originally intended. The Metropolitan Opera House has extended his leave of absence through Saturday, Nov. 9, setting him free to conduct at the Symphony Concerts in Boston on Oct. 18 and 19, Oct. 25 and 26, Nov. 1 and 2, and at the concerts of the orchestra in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington through the week beginning Nov. 4. When the band comes back to Boston on Nov. 11, the expectation is that another conductor will be available.

Concerts in Prospect

The management of the Symphony Orchestra announces the usual series of eight concerts in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge. They will fall on Thursday evenings, Oct. 17, Nov. 14, Dec. 12, Jan. 16, Feb. 13, March 6, April 3 and April 24. Mr. Monteux will, of course, conduct at the first of the concerts. Whoever succeeds him at Symphony Hall will lead in the rest. There is no change in the price of tickets. Until Tuesday, Oct. 8, subscribers to the series of 1917-18 may renew their subscriptions and retain their seats. On Friday, Oct. 11, the sale of tickets to the general public will begin at Kent's University Book Store in Harvard Square. The "assisting artists" at present announced are the pianists Josef Hofmann and Rosita Renard; the singer, Merle Alcock and from the orchestra itself, Mr. Fradkin, the first violinist, and Mr. Makin, the first violoncellist. Mr. Hofmann will be heard at the concert of Oct. 17, for the first time hereabouts in some years. Miss Renard is a young woman of Chilean birth and European training who seemed an uncommonly promising pianist when she first appeared in Boston a year ago. Mme. Alcock is the young alto singer, of excellent voice and keen musical intelligence who sang in choral concerts at Symphony Hall last winter.

cone per-
g Mr.
them-on this thori-ncerts alling

arritz. He has also traveled in France with Vincent d'Indy. In 1916-17 he was at the desk of the first cellist of the Philadelphia orchestra.

Other New Players

A new double-bass player is Agostino Villano, a graduate of the Royal Conservatory of Parma. He began his career in the Scala Orchestra, whose director then was Faccio. He went to South America and for the last 15 years has been principal double-bass in the Colon Theatre of Buenos Ayres. In the winters he returned to Europe and played in France, England, Italy and Germany, under the direction of Mascagni, Martucci, Mancinelli, Toscanini, Campanini, Serafin, Saint-Saens, Raubaud, Messager, Leroux and others. In Italy he has also played under distinguished guest conductors.

A new oboe player is Louis Speyer, also from the French Military Band, and an artist of most unusual gifts. He was a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire in 1911.

The two new clarinets are Leo Croes (succeeding Paul Minart, who was called to military duty in France last spring), and Emile Stievenard, who will be the new bass clarinet. Mr. Croes served in the 8th regiment of territorial infantry and was severely wounded at the battle of the Yser in November, 1914. A first prize of the Conservatoire of Lille, he has played at the Monteux concerts and at the Theatre des Champs Elysees, Paris. Mr. Stievenard has been a professor at D'Indy's Schola Cantorum. He is a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire and has been bass clarinet of the Lamoureux concerts and the Opera-Comiques. He also was wounded at the battle of the Yser.

Abdon Laus, the new first bassoon, 16 3/4 years old. A first prize of the Paris Conservatoire, he has played in the principal orchestras of Paris and has given four years to the Grand Opera.

The new first trombone is Mr. Sordillo of this city.

The First

Pair of Symphony Concerts to Become the Last, with Beginning on Oct. 18 and 19—Other Postponements

Trans. — Oct. 3, 1918

As for concerts, for the first time in the thirty-eight years of the Symphony Orchestra, the season in Boston will not begin according to schedule. The first pair of concerts, announced for Friday afternoon, Oct. 11, and Saturday evening, Oct. 12, will not take place. They will become the twenty-fourth and final pair of concerts and will befall on Friday afternoon, May 9, and Saturday evening, May 10, at the end of the season. Tickets for the first pair of concerts will thus become the tickets for the last. No other arrangement was advisable, since the orchestra has concerts in hand, here or elsewhere, for every Friday and Saturday from Oct. 11 and 12 through May 2 and 3 and since the succession of soloists cannot easily be altered.

Accordingly, the second pair of concerts (on the original schedule) will begin the series on Friday afternoon, Oct. 18 and Saturday evening, Oct. 19. Mr. Monteux will then lead the orchestra for the first time in Boston in public; Mr. Hofmann will be the assisting pianist; and the programme, unless the conductor chooses to alter it, will stand as announced. Mr. Monteux, moreover, will have his three pairs of concerts as originally intended. The Metropolitan Opera House has extended his leave of absence through Saturday, Nov. 9, setting him free to conduct at the Symphony Concerts in Boston on Oct. 18 and 19, Oct. 25 and 26, Nov. 1 and 2, and at the concerts of the orchestra in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington through the week beginning Nov. 4. When the band comes back to Boston on Nov. 11, the expectation is that another conductor will be available.

Concerts in Prospect

The orchestra concert.

They

17, No

March

teux w

the co

Symph

is no c

Tuesday

of 1917

and ret

the sal

will beg in Harv

at prese

Hofman

Merle A

Mr. Fr

Ma kin, man w

17, for years.

Chilean seemed when s

ago. M of excel lence

Sympho

HENRI RABAUD, the distinguished French conductor and musician, has been selected to be the permanent conductor of the Orchestra, succeeding Mr. MONTEUX in November. The trustees consider themselves most fortunate in having secured for Boston this eminent French musician.

Complying with the ruling of the health authorities, the opening of the season of Symphony concerts has been postponed one week, the first concerts falling on October 18-19 instead of October 11-12.

MONTEUX BARS WAGNER MUSIC

Strauss, Arrogant and Insolent, Also on His Blacklist

WILL, HOWEVER, GIVE GERMAN CLASSICS

Herald—Sept. 24/18

"If I can help win the war by giving up sugar, I will give up sugar gladly. I will give up gasoline. I will go on short rations of bread. In fact, as a Frenchman, I will do anything to help win the struggle; and if anyone can convince me that the end will be brought nearer by giving up the classics of German music—Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Schumann, Schubert, Brahms—I am willing to give them up. So far, however I cannot see how the silencing of the music of these masters can do the least to help win the war, and it is my purpose (as it is the purpose, I am sure, of all French conductors) to give the great classics due place on concert programs. Personally, I will not play Wagner, nor will I play the works of any living German or Austrian composer."

Such was the statement made yesterday by Pierre Monteux, who was in Boston for the day for the purpose of going through the library of the Symphony Orchestra, that he may prepare the programs for the October concerts which he will conduct. Mr. Monteux returned to New York last night, but will be in Boston again the first of the week to start rehearsals, for it is his purpose to have two weeks' rehearsals precede the first pair of concerts on Oct. 11-12.

Rehearsals in English

Mr. Monteux is a man of very pleasing personality, in his mid-forties, and he speaks excellent English. Incidentally, rehearsals will be conducted in the English language. In common with most French musicians, he holds that Beethoven and the other great German and Austrian composers of the past are in no wise responsible for the war. He even goes so far as to say that he is quite certain that Beethoven, who was at heart a republican, would have been against the war had he been living. He holds that the music of these masters has become the property of the world, and this music is a very integral and necessary part of the repertoire of musicians.

"I will not play Wagner," said Mr. Monteux, "because of his attitude toward France in the war of '70-'71. Moreover, looked at from another point of view, much of the best music that Wagner wrote—"The Ring" and "Die Meistersinger"—is in glorification of German ideals as are found in the Kultur of today. Generally speaking, I disapprove of the playing of the music of any living German composer in the allied countries, and I particularly specifically object to the performance of any music of Richard Strauss during the war."

"I believe I was the first one in this country to refuse to play the music of Strauss. That was two years ago, when I came to this country as conductor for the Ballet Russe. Arriving in New York, they told me that my first work was to superintend and direct the first performance in this country of the ballet founded on "Till Eulenspiegel," whereupon I informed the management that I would take the next ship back to France."

Strauss Was Unbearable

"It was my fortune in May, 1914, to prepare for Strauss the production in Paris of his ballet "Joseph." This was a little more than two months before the beginning of the war. Strauss's attitude toward France, French art, French music and French musicians was even then unbearable. He was arrogant and insulting and, even without war, I was almost persuaded to give up playing his music; but in view of what followed, Strauss became impossible for me. Nor was it only Richard Strauss. His wife was with him in Paris. I recall with a certain amount of amusement that when she came into the Opera House for the rehearsal, she looked around and said to me: 'M. Monteux, this beautiful theatre may soon have an Emperor in it.'"

"I have not fully decided on my programs as yet. Naturally, having only three programs to make, it is rather difficult, for there are so many things I wish to play. I look forward with anticipations of greatest pleasure to my brief stay in Boston at the head of the famous Symphony Orchestra."

MONTEUX WORKS WONDERS WITH NEW SYMPHONY

Record—Oct. 18, 1918

New Orchestra Will Amaze

Music Lovers at First

Concert Oct. 25

By J. V. CLARK

A week from this afternoon a new conductor will walk onto the stage at Symphony Hall and will face a particularly new orchestra. The day will be an epoch-making one in the history of Boston music. The premier orchestra of America ended its season last spring with a finale worthy of an Elizabethan melodrama. Out of the old situation has developed a beautiful orchestra, one that in finesses, its delicacy of tone, its lovely euphony equals any orchestra heard in Boston since the days when the great taskmaster, Wilhelm Gericke, drilled our musicians.

It is not permissible for a reviewer to review the playing of an orchestra before it gives its first public performance—even if he has tiptoed into the back of the hall to spend an hour hearing a master hand prepare a Ravel work. It is not permissible even to hint that the orchestra in quality of tone, in continuity of tone and in balance, will surprise its auditors. Therefore please consider these things unsaid.

When you attend the opening concert you will notice many changes in the grouping of the various choirs of the orchestra. The harps, once at the front of the stage, are now half way back behind the first violins. The woods winds are arranged in straight lines, not grouped. Dr. Muck used inets in one little group, anyone who has another, the flutes and orchestra becomes other and so on. Pierre knows just what new conductor of these wants to get it. put them in straight. A woodwind in the brasses and per- note. Mr. Monteux are minor and the. A phrase was ss viols keep their old the right color.

It was repeated I will like the tone pro- I repeated correct- new arrangement," said signals recalled. discussing the tone qual- say, "is the man's orchestra after rehearsal. ly what he should think, should not be ar- lob, every conductor old manner as if for onductors are rare s. Their tone is over ot one in 500 who I they distract attention. y and successfully angement of the wood as Mr. Monteux. a commingling of tone mparison. I have s very effective. Please uted as great con- it I have pulled the or- effort over the re- er. The men sit nearer nestnut like "Trov- under the old regime. onteux made over ae orchestra to feel that work, that is new misphere, they in anoth- it demands almost t think the arrangement n from the players.

a great orchestra Mr. Monteux that I con- k. His programs he both in quality and r his first he has atively fine that his ac- i's, the Symphony n a comparatively short k and Schumann's ed wonderful he was. The Schumann ified.

no narrow prej- him overlook the I, and I think I can say if the classical and certgoers will find that for modern French I have been given to chosen Debussy's make a superb orchestra. s' "La Peri". He

s, I think, in every case, ply that he did not than their predecessors." s to know Dukas teux discussed the pecu- "Sorcerer Appren- t to play a Rabaud ment of perform- each case the man's is. "Mr. Rabaud, vely work. It is not permissible even he had discovered it. ably play this for to hint that the orchestra in quality of ie time for us to under- u are going to like tone, in continuity of tone and in bal- ier," continued the con- permanent conduc- know we Frenchmen y fine man, very style of conducting. We a gentleman. You ness that is —er, er—t interesting as a ad to know me, I had to htful to know. to talk music for n, whose work had master, and who personal pronoun. quickly. A man working on and who spoke fected terms of his lines, not grouped. Dr. Muck used lively. Watching Mr.

MONTEUX BARS WAGNER MUSIC

Strauss, Arrogant and Insolent, Also on His Blacklist

WILL, HOWEVER, GIVE GERMAN CLASSICS

Herald Sept. 24/18

"If I can help win the war by giving up sugar, I will give up sugar gladly. I will give up gasoline. I will go on short rations of bread. In fact, as a Frenchman, I will do anything to help win the struggle; and if anyone can convince me that the end will be brought nearer by giving up the classics of German music—Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Schumann, Schubert, Brahms—I am willing to give them up. So far, however I cannot see how the silencing of the music of these masters can do the least to help win the war, and it is my purpose (as it is the purpose, I am sure, of all French conductors) to give the great classics due place on concert programs. Personally, I will not play Wagner, nor will I play the works of any living German or Austrian composer."

Such was the statement made yesterday by Pierre Monteux, who was in Boston for the day for the purpose of going through the library of the Symphony Orchestra that he may prepare the programs for the October concerts which he will conduct. Mr. Monteux returned to New York last night, but will be in Boston again the first of the week to start rehearsals, for it is his purpose to have two weeks' rehearsals precede the first pair of concerts on Oct. 11-12.

Rehearsals in English

Mr. Monteux is a man of very pleasing personality, in his mid-forties, and he speaks excellent English. Incidentally, rehearsals will be conducted in the English language. In common with most French musicians, he holds that Beethoven and the other great German and Austrian composers of the past are in no wise responsible for the war. He even goes so far as to say that he is quite certain that Beethoven, who was at heart a republican, would have been against the war had he been living. He holds that the music of these masters has become the property of the world, and this music is a very integral and necessary part of the repertoire of musicians.

"I will not play Wagner," said Mr. Monteux, "because of his attitude toward France in the war of '70-'71. Moreover, looked at from another point of view, much of the best music that Wagner wrote—"The Ring" and "Die Meistersinger"—is in glorification of German ideals as are found in the Kultur of today. Generally speaking, I disapprove of the playing of the music of any living German composer in the allied countries, and I particularly specifically object to the performance of any music of Richard Strauss during the war."

"I believe I was the first one in this country to refuse to play the music of Strauss. That was two years ago, when I came to this country as conductor for the Ballet Russe. Arriving in New York, they told me that my first work was to superintend and direct the first performance in this country of the ballet founded on "Till Eulenspiegel," whereupon I informed the management that I would take the next ship back to France."

Strauss Was Unbearable

"It was my fortune in May, 1914, to prepare for Strauss the production in Paris of his ballet "Joseph." This was a little more than two months before the beginning of the war. Strauss's attitude toward France, French art, French music and French musicians was even then unbearable. He was arrogant and insulting and, even without war, I was almost persuaded to give up playing his music; but in view of what followed, Strauss became impossible for me. Nor was it only Richard Strauss. His wife was with him in Paris. I recall with a certain amount of amusement that when she came into the Opera House for the rehearsal, she looked around and said to me: "M. Monteux, this beautiful theatre may soon have an Emperor in it."

"I have not fully decided on my programs as yet. Naturally, having only three programs to make, it is rather difficult, for there are so many things I wish to play. I look forward with anticipations of greatest pleasure to my brief stay in Boston at the head of the famous Symphony Orchestra."

N EVENING

Probate Not

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.—Suffolk, ss.—Probate Court, at Boston, in said County, do hereby certify that the following is a true and correct copy of the will of the late ARTHUR W. D. deceased, as the same appears from the records of said Court, to be the last will and testament of said deceased, as the same appears from the records of said Court, by AGNES WINCHESTER, in the County of Suffolk, who prays that letters testamentary be issued to her, the executrix, without giving a surety bond.—You are hereby cited to appear at said Probate Court, to be held at said County of Suffolk, at the first day of October, A.D. 1918, at ten o'clock in the forenoon, to show cause, if any you have, why the same should not be granted. And said petition is hereby cited to give public notice thereof, by publication of this citation for three successive weeks in the Evening Record, a newspaper published in said Boston, the last publication at least before said mailing, postpaid, or delivery of this citation to all known interested parties, seven days before said Court. Witness my hand and seal of said Court, the tenth day of October, A.D. 1918, at Boston, Massachusetts, at the Court House, at the age of one thousand nine hundred and eighteen.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.—Suffolk, ss.—Probate Court, at Boston, in said County, do hereby certify that the following is a true and correct copy of the will of the late WARD J. CARROLL, deceased, as the same appears from the records of said Court, to be the last will and testament of said deceased, as the same appears from the records of said Court, by AGNES WINCHESTER, in the County of Suffolk, who prays that letters testamentary be issued to her, the executrix, without giving a surety bond.—You are hereby cited to appear at said Probate Court, to be held at said County of Suffolk, at the first day of October, A.D. 1918, at ten o'clock in the forenoon, to show cause, if any you have, why the same should not be granted. And said petition is hereby cited to give public notice thereof, by publication of this citation for three successive weeks in the Evening Record, a newspaper published in said Boston, the last publication at least before said mailing, postpaid, or delivery of this citation to all known interested parties, seven days before said Court. Witness my hand and seal of said Court, the tenth day of October, A.D. 1918, at Boston, Massachusetts, at the Court House, at the age of one thousand nine hundred and eighteen.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.—Middlesex, ss.—Probate Court, at Boston, in said County, do hereby certify that the following is a true and correct copy of the will of the late CUTLER, of Somerville, deceased, as the same appears from the records of said Court, to be the last will and testament of said deceased, as the same appears from the records of said Court, by AGNES WINCHESTER, in the County of Suffolk, who prays that letters testamentary be issued to her, the executrix, without giving a surety bond.—You are hereby cited to appear at said Probate Court, to be held at said County of Suffolk, at the first day of October, A.D. 1918, at ten o'clock in the forenoon, to show cause, if any you have, why the same should not be granted. And said petition is hereby cited to give public notice thereof, by publication of this citation for three successive weeks in the Evening Record, a newspaper published in said Boston, the last publication at least before said mailing, postpaid, or delivery of this citation to all known interested parties, seven days before said Court. Witness my hand and seal of said Court, the tenth day of October, A.D. 1918, at Boston, Massachusetts, at the Court House, at the age of one thousand nine hundred and eighteen.

to put the clarinets in one little group, anyone who has the oboes in another, the flutes and orchestra becomes piccolos in another and so on. Pierre knows just what Monteux, the new conductor of these wants to get it. first concerts, put them in straight. A woodwind in lines. Changes in the brasses and percussion. Mr. Monteux's instruments are minor and the. A phrase was cellos and bass viols keep their old the right color. position.

"I think you will like the tone produced by this new arrangement," said signals recalled. Mr. Monteux discussing the tone quality of the orchestra after rehearsal. "The harps, I think, should not be arranged in the old manner as if for harp concertos. Their tone is over emphasized and they distract attention. The new arrangement of the woodwinds will give a commingling of tone that, I think, is very effective. Please notice, too, that I have pulled the orchestra together. The men sit nearer together than under the old regime. I don't want the orchestra to feel that I am in one hemisphere, they in another. Did you not think the arrangement effective?"

When I told Mr. Monteux that I considered the tone both in quality and balance superlatively fine that his accomplishment in a comparatively short time was indeed wonderful he was obviously gratified.

"We have worked hard, the symphony men and I, and I think I can say that your concertgoers will find that the men, whom I have been given to work with, make a superb orchestra. The newcomers, I think, in every case are far better than their predecessors. Then Mr. Monteux discussed the peculiar abilities of this player and who substituted for some old player, pointing out in each case the man's superiority, as he had discovered it.

"It took some time for us to understand each other," continued the conductor, "You know we Frenchmen have our own style of conducting. We have an exactness that is exact. They had to know me, I had to know them. I think we are succeeding."

This last was said with the utmost modesty. The men got to know Mr. Monteux very quickly. A man working at any trade knows the master of his trade instinctively. Watching Mr.

"How refreshing to talk music for an hour with a man, whose work had just revealed him a master, and who almost excluded the personal pronoun from the conversation and who spoke in glowing and unaffected terms of his successor."

A Great Trinity of French Conductors en Famille in Boston

(By Courtesy of the Boston Sunday Post)

That Boston Reached a Musical Perihelion Last Week Is Well Illustrated Above

She May Well Feel Proud of Bringing So Celebrated a Group Together. From Left to Right They Are: André Messager, Conductor of the Paris Conservatoire; Mrs. Pierre Monteux; Miss Denise Monteux; Pierre Monteux, Who Has Been Leading the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Alfred Cortot, French Pianist-Composer; Henri Rabaud, New Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra

42

Henri Rabaud Sketched on His First Day in America

43

An Ingratiating, but Reticent, Man

The New Conductor

(From a Photograph by Bain Taken in New York on Monday)

44

HENRI RABAUD TO LEAD THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Trans. — Oct. 4 1918
THE PARISIAN CONDUCTOR AND COMPOSER ACCEPTS THE POST FOR SEASON OF 1918-19—TO BEGIN WORK IN NOVEMBER

Henri Rabaud, the Parisian composer and conductor, will be the new leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season of 1918-1919. A cablegram from Paris, received at Symphony Hall this morning, contains his acceptance of the post and records the thanks of the Department of Fine Arts in the Government for the honor so given to a French musician. Mr. Rabaud expects to be soon on his way to Boston—in time to begin work here—early in November. In all probability, he will conduct for the first time at the Symphony Concerts of Nov. 15 and 16. Born in Paris in 1873, Mr. Rabaud will come to Boston in the prime of his years—a tall, slender, dark and bearded man somewhat oriental in aspect. His own city knew him first as composer rather than conductor and his music has similarly carried his name abroad. He has written symphonies and tone-poems, some of which have been heard in the United States. One of his symphonies, for example, was played at Mr. Damrosch's concerts in New York, at Mr. Stock's in Chicago, and at the Worcester Festival last autumn. His tone-poem, "Le Procession Nocturne," has also been heard in America and is announced for performance at the Symphony Concerts this month. He has written operas as well as symphonic music and the newest of them, "Marouf, Savetier de Caire," was heard at the Metropolitan Opera House last winter. Others, like "La Fille de Roland," are known only to the Parisian stage. As composer, Mr. Rabaud is neither academic nor "advanced." Rather, as his music for both the theatre and the concert-hall suggests, he is eclectic, following no formula, but choosing such forms and procedures as best serve his purpose. Presumably, he will be of no less catholic mind in the choice of programmes as conductor in Boston. His actual experience as leader of an orchestra has been gained chiefly in opera houses, first at the Opéra-Comique and more recently at the Opéra in Paris.

NEW SYMPHONY DIRECTOR ARRIVES

Henri Rabaud Has Several Novelties

1918
[Special Dispatch to Herald and Journal.]
AN ATLANTIC PORT, Oct. 27—Among the passengers arriving today from France on a French steamship was Henri Rabaud, the new director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who has come over to replace Dr. Karl Muck. M. Rabaud has been for some years the musical director of the orchestra at the National Opera House, Paris, and is the composer of the French opera "Marouf," performed last season in New York, as well as of a symphony already heard here, and of several symphonic poems. He won the award of the Grand Prix de Rome in 1894 for the excellence of his musical works.

The new director of the Boston Symphony does not in any way look like the customary leader of an orchestra. He is tall, slight, has gray hair, mustache and whiskers, and wears a frock coat, with a small clerical type of wide brimmed soft hat. He does not speak any English at present, he explained, but hopes to learn during the coming season in America. He said he believed he had several novelties, but did not know whether they had been played in the United States.

On this and other matters he preferred to wait until he consulted with the nine trustees who have taken charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since Maj. Higginson retired after the dismissal of Dr. Muck.

On the same steamship were two artists for the Metropolitan Opera House, Robert Couzinou, the new French baritone, and Mme. Raymonde Delanois, a young contralto who has sung here for the last four seasons.

45

RABAUD ACCEPTS NEW SYMPHONY SYMPHONY POST CONDUCTOR HERE

Conductor of Paris Grand Opera to Direct Boston's Famed Orchestra

FIRST APPEARANCE PROBABLY ON NOV. 15

Herald — Oct. 5/18

Henri Rabaud, principal conductor of the Paris Grand Opera, a composer of very high rank and descendant of celebrated musicians, is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the season of 1918-19.

Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees, made the announcement yesterday following a cable from the French ministry of fine arts stating that Mr. Rabaud was pleased to accept the offer made him, and would sail for the United States at once. The ministry added its own appreciation of the fact that the Boston orchestra had chosen an eminent French musician as its conductor.

To Conduct First Concert Nov. 15

Mr. Rabaud was born in Paris in 1873. His father was a celebrated cellist and professor of the violoncello in the Conservatoire. Mme. Dorus-Gros, the famous singer, was his grandmother. He was graduated from the Conservatoire and in 1894 won the prix de Rome. For 20 years Mr. Rabaud has been one of the most prominent figures in the musical and artistic life of Paris. Aside from his work at the Grand Opera he has been conductor at the Opéra Comique and has often conducted at the Concerts Lamoureux, the Concerts Colonne, and the Concerts Monteux.

One of the principals novelties of the last season at the Metropolitan Opera House was his opera, "Marouf," which held its premiere in Paris in 1914. It is expected that Mr. Rabaud will make his debut as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra at the concerts to be given Nov. 15 and 16. Mr. Monteux will conduct all the concerts on the first southern trip in November.

Henri Rabaud Enthusiastic Over Prospects of Work Here

Herald — Oct. 3/18

STATES ATTITUDE ON GERMAN MUSIC

Henri Rabaud, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, reached this city last night fresh from his successes in Paris and full of enthusiasm for the work he is to take up here.

Accompanied from New York by Manager W. H. Brennan, he preceded at once to the Copley-Plaza, where he was welcomed by a group of admirers and friends. He is a man above average height, slimly built, with iron-gray beard and hair, alert of movement and still in the forties; he wears a loose frock coat and a soft hat with a wide brim. He is modestly personified, thinks more than he speaks, but can warm up on subjects that interest him and is not averse to being questioned. The only reserve he showed last night in his talk with newspaper men arose out of his wish not to embarrass the nine trustees of the orchestra with any definite pronouncements of his own.

Cannot Outline Program

"I cannot definitely outline any program I shall follow," he said, "for being here in a friendly country, under invitation to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, I feel that before consultation with the trustees it would be indelicate, even indiscreet, were I to discuss matters which will have to be taken up with them. All I would say of German music is that I see no reason why I should not conduct the orchestra in classical productions, such as those of Beethoven, Mozart, Schumann, Schubert and Brahms; as to Wagner, Strauss and other composers, I need not mention, all I would say is that in the allied countries there is a tacit agreement that they should not be played."

Speaking in French, for his English is not yet mature enough for conversation, M. Rabaud went on to chat pleasantly about his work for seven years past as director of the orchestra at the National Opera House in Paris, and about the numerous trips he has made to Sweden, Denmark and Italy. He sees as yet no direct influence of the war on French music, but he looks for a distinct revival of interest in music generally after the war, extending to composers as well as to the musical public. The war, he said, had called a number of artists from their accustomed places in Paris, but that was only to be expected; in some cases women had been called in to act as substitutes for the men. Asked how he liked the present war situation, with Germany and Austria begging for peace, the conductor's face lighted up for his emphatic reply: "It pleases me—I like it immensely."

M. Rabaud arrived in this country from France on Sunday last and remained only a day in New York before hastening to take up his engagement here. He will confer with the trustees today and will make his first appearance as conductor on Nov. 14 in Cambridge. He will conduct in Boston for the first time at the concerts to be given on Nov. 15 and 16.

WAGNER'S WORKS BARRED IN BOSTON

Geobe ——— Oct. 30/18
But New Symphony Leader
Approves of "Classics"

While the works of Wagner will be barred by the Boston Symphony Orchestra throughout the war, as essentially German, those of Beethoven, Mozart, Schubert and Brahms, being world classics, will not be banned, so far as the new French conductor of that orchestra, Henri Rabaud, is concerned.

Mr Rabaud so stated last evening to newspaper men on his arrival from New York. He said that the "classics" mentioned have been freely rendered in Paris during the war and he could see no reason for any other policy in Boston.

The new conductor, who is at the Copley-Plaza for the present, was disinclined to talk further about the local situation till he had seen his orchestra and familiarized himself with conditions generally.

Mr Rabaud is aged 45, yet quite gray; has a full beard, is rather tall and slender, unpretentious in dress and unmistakably of a retiring tendency. He speaks no English. He came to this country alone, his wife remaining for the present in Paris. From New York to Boston he was accompanied by W. H. Brennan, representing the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and by Alfred Costot, French pianist, who is to appear here as a soloist within a day or two.

Mr Rabaud will begin rehearsing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Nov. 11. His first public appearance in America will be on Nov. 14, when he will lead that organization at its second concert in Cambridge. He will conduct in Boston on Nov. 15 and 16.

Mr Rabaud is of distinguished musical ancestry, a native of Paris. He graduated from the famous Paris Conservatoire and when quite young organized and conducted orchestras in Rome and Vienna. For 20 years his work has been largely as a conductor in Paris, the last seven years at the Grand Opera.

He has composed three operas, several symphonies and two important choral works.

NO UNIONISM AT SYMPHONY

To the Editor of the Herald:

In your morning issue of Oct. 24, copied from the Nation, under the signature of Henry T. Finck, the statement is made that the Boston Symphony orchestra has been unionized.

This statement is not true. An effort was made to unionize the orchestra, but negotiations were broken off owing to the fact that the cardinal principle of the American Federation of Musicians stands for American musicians first, to which the management of the Boston Symphony orchestra took exception.

Will you please correct this statement in your next issue?

FREDERIC C. KINGMAN,
President Local 9, A. F. of M.
Boston, Oct. 24, 1918.

New Symphony Conductor Is Composer of "Marouf"

Henri Rabaud.

Herald ——— Nov. 3, 1918.

Henri Rabaud, the French conductor and composer, who will wield the baton over the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season (in place of its former leader, Dr. Karl Muck, now interned at Fort Oglethorpe, Ga.), comes direct from where he was born 53 years ago. He is the son of a professor of the Conservatoire, from which he also was graduated.

Composer of "Marouf"

He comes now from the position of director of the Opera, Paris. At that theatre his lyric opera "Marouf," with text by Lucien Nepoté as based on a tale of the Arabian Nights, was produced in the spring of 1914 and then straightway proved to be one of the most popular novelties of years heard in Paris. Rabaud's "Marouf" was produced with success in New York at the Metropolitan Opera House last season, and his Second Symphony (second at that time at least) was played in the same city at two of the New York Symphony concerts.

M. Rabaud was a leading conductor for seven years at the Grand Opera of Paris, and during the direction at that house of Andre Messager, who is the conductor of the famous French orchestra, the Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire, which is now visiting this country on a concert tour in behalf of the French American Association for Musical Art.

Style Entirely Modern

As composer Rabaud has further written an opera, "La Fille de Roland," and brought out several years ago at the Opera Comique a string quartet, and various smaller works. He composes in a style entirely modern. In his "Marouf," as W. J. Henderson wrote at the time of its New York premiere, "Oriental color is laid on not merely with a brush but with a palette knife," while his Second Symphony the same critic pronounced as being "delightful."

HENRI RABAUD, who succeeds Karl Muck, interned, as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when asked in New York, while en route to Boston, the other day, if he intended to include music by German composers in his concert program for the coming season, replied: "Such questions are never asked in Paris. Why should we not play beautiful music like Beethoven's C Minor Symphony?" The answer to this is simple enough; it is not necessary to play it; at least for the present. Germany has used her beautiful music in the United States to cloak deceit; let her pay the price of her treachery in this as in every other particular, so that she may never commit such offenses again. Monitor

Trans. Oct. 29/18

I HAVE no attitude except that of a stranger who has been honored by the appointment to conduct one of your great orchestras," was the carefully-phrased and dignified response of Henri Rabaud, newly-appointed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to the question of his attitude towards German music. It was no easy matter to see Mr. Rabaud. Either because he had been carefully coached regarding the insistent American newspaper man or because he prefers to let his work speak for his opinions, or because of a natural gentleman-like courtesy towards the trustees of the orchestra he is to conduct, he has kept in New York to an extreme reticence. But in addition Mr. Rabaud was tired from his long journey and when The Transcript representative called at his hotel he had been out of touch with the management of the Symphony Orchestra for many hours. Telephoning his room for an interview was of little avail, but the casual knock on the door of that room brought the response sought. As the reporter entered Mr. Rabaud was stretched flat on the bed, tired out by the fatigue of a first day ashore. His only companion, the New York representative of the Renault Automobile Company, said that Mr. Rabaud was tired, had refused admittance to everyone, but would see The Transcript's correspondent for a very few minutes.

In appearance Mr. Rabaud bears little resemblance to the stereotyped ideas of European composers. Tall, spare, with stooping shoulders, he presents rather the appearance of an easy-going, genial scholar. There are hundreds of serious clergymen throughout New England who might well bear the same form and face. It is a kindly, gentle face, small in comparison to the long length of body—in repose quiet and dignified, almost patriarchal with full gray beard and moustache. The nose, not prominent, is crowned by deep-set eyes of gray—or are they of that indeterminate color we describe as gray-green?—; the hair, sparse, especially towards the back of the head, is carefully brushed. Mr. Rabaud wore a suit of dull gray and brown, the clothes of a modest American business man. It fitted loosely his lank form.

As Mr. Rabaud talks, however, particularly as his interest increases, his eyes, at first lack-lustreless, grow into a sparkling animation until his face breaks gradually into a succession of swiftly moving smiles. Almost as ripples on a summer lake do these smiles follow one another. Mild mannered, quiet of speech, dignified, courteous—such was the swiftly drawn first impression.

So far as plans for Mr. Rabaud's year with the orchestra are concerned he has nothing to say; they must be left until he has taken counsel with the trustees of the orchestra. He has with him certain novel pieces. What they are and how highly he values them he preferred not to say until later. He did admit almost unwittingly that his attitude towards "la musique allemande" might well be that of any other French musician. W. B. M.

Symphony Now to Take Up French Works

S. M. Adm. — Oct. 20/18

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

THIS week, after considerable hope deferred, the Symphony Concerts are to begin, with the added interest of a partially changed orchestra and a new conductor. Before turning the new leaf it may be of interest to look over a few of the old pages. Our orchestra has been overwhelmingly German and its leaders have all been Teutonic. Now there is to be an infusion of Belgian, French and American blood and the conductors are to be French.

When the orchestra began it was in some degree an Old Musicians Home; Listemann, Fries, Eichler, and many other veterans were in the ranks, good players all, but by no means in their prime. Georg Henschel, the first conductor, had not quite the courage to found a radically new organization. He was not then an experienced conductor. Dr. Reinecke, of the Leipzig Conservatory once said to me—"I hear that Mr. Henschel is being paid ten thousand a year in Boston to learn conducting!"

He made some odd experiments in placing the men, which he explained to me when we were judges together at a Mechanics Fair exhibition. He divided the violins, the violas, the violoncellos, and even the contrabasses, each into two groups, which by no means led to good ensemble, and it was interesting to watch how in subsequent seasons he gradually slipped them back to the more recognized positions. He was, however, a splendid program-maker.

Gericke, who came next, swept away all the superannuated ones and brought Kneisel, Schuecker, Roth and a host of other excellent young musicians from Austria to grow up with the new orchestra. He was building for the future, and the great technical excellence of the organization today is chiefly due to his foresight and his drillmastership. He was really the maker of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He was an eminent conservative. His rehearsals were most strenuous. There was an excellent clarinetist in the band who too frequently magnified his part into a solo. "Why do you always look at me when you scold us for playing too loud?" asked the musician. "Because I generally mean you," was the sharp reply, and the clarinetist resigned.

Gericke was not much in sympathy with the modern French school, and he once confessed to me that Debussy's "Après-midi d'un Faun" was an utter puzzle to him. Beethoven's Ninth Symphony was the apex of all music to him, and it almost broke his heart when he once gave it with more people on the platform than in the audience.

With Nikisch, in 1889, the orchestra entered upon a romantic period. Here was an actual virtuoso upon the instrument, but he took very little care of the instrument itself. The superb discipline which Gericke had established went by the board. He had his favorites among the men, and he was capricious even with these. When the choice lay between a poker party and a postponed or shortened rehearsal, all the men knew which would carry the day. It was, in a sense, the greatest conductor in the world, but no longer the greatest orchestra.

Paur was a remarkable technical performer (he had been a celebrated teacher) and a composer, but his greatness as a conductor lay in certain special schools. He was greatly in sympathy with Russian music, and once told me that he believed that in fifty years Russia would win the orchestral supremacy of composition from Germany. His reading of Tchaikowsky's "Pathetic Symphony" was something wonderful, and he was also at his very best in Richard Strauss' works, but he never caught the more elusive French style.

Much the same might be said of Fiedler. He was intensely German in nature, taste and inclination. Some of his recent compositions breathe Teutonic defiance to all the world, but in orchestral matters he was by no means a Prussian disciplinarian. He was too genial for the most thorough routine work at rehearsals.

Of Dr. Muck it is unnecessary to speak, yet I may allude to the crowning points of his career as the readings of Brahms' first symphony, Liszt's "Faust" symphony and Beethoven's Ninth. He was approaching the very apex of his work in choral concerts when the secret police swept down. He was not much in sympathy with the ultra-modern school, yet he gave many most radical selections in spite of this, or perhaps because of it, for he once said to a friend: "I'll give them this stuff until they vomit."

Looking over such a short outline of the character of the conductors we have had in Music and Symphony Halls, it will be readily seen that the new French works have not yet had their most authoritative interpretation. The pendulum may now swing in the other direction. We are to have the important Gallic school probably at its very best. There will be an opportunity to study in a new direction.

Not but what the new conductors will scrupulously present the classics of every nation, including Germany, but the real revelations will probably come in the domain of finesse, of elegance, of nuances.

This is by no means the place to weigh the comparative merits of the various schools. It will be sufficient if we are awake to the new opportunities offered, and if we are ready to study in a new direction. It will also be most interesting to compare the forthcoming Gallic readings of Bach and Beethoven with those of our former conductors.

The Boston Symphony Chorus Alive Again and Likely to Continue Work—Mr.

Trans. — Oct. 24/18
THERE is good news of the Boston Symphony Chorus that under Mr. Townsend's training and Dr. Muck's leadership so distinguished itself last winter. It was good to believe then that its vogue and quality signalled a new era in choral music in this town and that the orchestra had at last a choir worthy to join with it in pieces that exacted the devoted and expert service of both. Next came the débacle of last spring, now happily repaired, and for the time, the Symphony Chorus seemed to sink below the horizon. Now, it has risen again with auspicious sign for the future. The first suite that Ravel drew from his ballet of "Daphnis and Chloe" has choral parts, sung "off stage," as from remote and eery distance, by men's and women's voices—choral parts so essential to the music that the composer quarrelled bitterly with Mr. Diaghilev of the Russian Ballet when the manager omitted them in his performance in London. Next week that suite is to be played at the Symphony Concerts for the first times in Boston and, according to the standards of conductor and management, in integrity as the composer wrote it. Accordingly, Mr. Townsend has made ready a choir of thirty-two voices "from the Boston Symphony Chorus."

Evidently, then, that chorus still exists, at least in skeleton, and is ready to return to its new-old place in the scheme of the Symphony Concerts and in the musical pleasure and profit of Boston. If Mr. Townsend can assemble and prepare a choir of thirty-two for Mr. Monteux—and the audiences—next week, presumably he could later assemble a much larger and not less willing body of singers for Mr. Rabaud and an appreciative public. No doubt, on the masculine side, Mr. Townsend's cadres, as the military term is, have been somewhat depleted by calls and classifications, since last spring, for the colors. On the other hand, none in Boston knows better than him the resources of the region in choral music or is more expert in the summoning and preliminary training of them. Mr. Rabaud, in turn, has led a chorus often in the opera houses and the concert-halls of Paris, with mastery and eloquence. He is almost sure to include in his twenty-two programmes of the season, symphonic pieces that ask voices as well as instruments, while he would not be the diligent, ambitious conductor that he is were he not eager, if opportunity served, to undertake such choral pieces as Berlioz's mighty Requiem or Schmitt's resplendent psalm. The Boston Symphony Chorus, as it was last winter, as, doubtless, Mr. Townsend could reconstitute it, drafts to the contrary notwithstanding, would be a superb instrument for such music. Now that the chorus, like all the other essentials to the Symphony Concerts, has flowered anew, the trustees of the orchestra have their inherited obligations to choral music also to fulfil.

Here in Boston

Subscribers to the Symphony Concerts may be reminded once more that they should bring to Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening their tickets for the actual day, Oct. 25 or 26, and not their tickets for the first concert of the series. They should begin with the tickets numbered 3 in the left-hand corner. The tickets numbered 1 and 2 will be available later in the season when concerts are substituted for those that the epidemic of influenza prevented.

REDUCTION

RATIO

16x

As Paris Sends Him to Boston

Henri Rabaud

Conductor of the Symphony Orchestra for 1918-19

many most radical selections in spite of this, or perhaps because of it, for he once said to a friend: "I'll give them this stuff until they vomit."

Looking over such a short outline of the character of the conductors we have had in Music and Symphony Halls, it will be readily seen that the new French works have not yet had their most authoritative interpretation. The pendulum may now swing in the other direction. We are to have the important Gallic school probably at its very best. There will be an opportunity to study in a new direction.

Not but what the new conductors will scrupulously present the classics of every nation, including Germany, but the real revelations will probably come in the domain of finesse, of elegance, of nuances.

This is by no means the place to weigh the comparative merits of the various schools. It will be sufficient if we are awake to the new opportunities offered, and if we are ready to study in a new direction. It will also be most interesting to compare the forthcoming Gallic readings of Bach and Beethoven with those of our former conductors.

The Boston Symphony Chorus Alive Again and Likely to Continue Work — Mr. Townsend

Trans. — Oct. 24/18

THERE is good news of the Boston Symphony Chorus that under Mr. Townsend's training and Dr. Muck's leadership so distinguished itself last winter. It was good to believe then that its vogue and quality signalled a new era in choral music in this town and that the orchestra had at last a choir worthy to join with it in pieces that exacted the devoted and expert service of both. Next came the debacle of last spring, now happily repaired, and for the time, the Symphony Chorus seemed to sink below the horizon. Now, it has risen again with auspicious sign for the future. The first suite that Ravel drew from his ballet of "Daphnis and Chloe" has choral parts, sung "off stage," as from remote and very distance, by men's and women's voices—choral parts so essential to the music that the composer quarrelled bitterly with Mr. Diaghilev of the Russian Ballet when the manager omitted them in his performance in London. Next week that suite is to be played at the Symphony Concerts for the first times in Boston and, according to the standards of conductor and management, the composer wrote it. As Townsend has made ready twenty-two voices "from the Boston Chorus."

Evidently, then, that choir at least in skeleton, and is to its new-old place in the Symphony Concerts and pleasure and profit of B. Townsend can assemble a choir of thirty-two for Mr. the audiences—next week, could later assemble a not less willing body of Rabaud and an appreciation, doubt, on the masculine side, and's cadres, as the military been somewhat depleted by flections, since last spring. On the other hand, none is better than him the resource in choral music or in more summoning and preliminary them. Mr. Rabaud, in tu chorus often in the opera concert-halls of Paris, w eloquence. He is almost his twenty-two programme symphonic pieces that ask instruments, while he would gent, ambitious conductor, he not eager, if opportunity dertake such choral piece mighty Requiem or Schre psalm. The Boston Symph was last winter, as, doubt end could reconstitute it, c trary notwithstanding, w instrument for such music chorus, like all the other Symphony Concerts, has the trustees of the orches herited obligations to cho fulfil.

Here in Boston

Subscribers to the Sy may be reminded once should bring to Symph afternoon and Saturday ets for the actual day, not their tickets for the series. They should tickets numbered 3 in ner. The tickets numbe be available later in the certs are substituted for epidemic of influenza pr morning by cable, his acceptance of their proffer along with acknowledgment from the Department of Fine Arts in the Government of the bestowal of so distinguished a post upon a French musician. Mr. Rabaud expects to be soon on his way to Boston—in time to begin work early in November. In all probability he will conduct for the first times before his new audience at the Symphony Concerts of Nov. 15 and 16, when Mr. Monteux, the present leader, has returned to the Metropolitan Opera House.

HENRI RABAUD, the Parisian composer and conductor, will be the new leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season of 1918-1919.

Man and Music

Americans who have frequented the Opéra, the Opéra-Comique and symphony concerts in Paris will readily recall Mr. Rabaud—an unusual and pictorial figure, whether he was conductor or only intent listener, tall, gaunt, bearded, olive-skinned, grave of glance and quick of gesture, oriental rather than Parisian in impression to the eye. None the less, he was born in Paris in 1873, the son of a professor at the Conservatory. In that school he was educated as a musician and in the nineties began the practice of his calling in Paris. As conductor he served with increasing skill and reputation at the Opéra, at the Opéra-Comique and in occasional orchestral concerts. As composer, he wrote symphonies, tone-poems, operas and a single oratorio, "Job." The second of his two symphonies has been heard relatively often in America—at the hands of the Boston Orchestral Club under Mr. Longy, of the New York Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Damrosch, of the Philadelphia Orchestra under Mr. Stokowski, and at the Worcester Festival last autumn. His symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne," has been less frequently played in the United States, but Mr. Longy ventured it several years ago in Boston, and it is announced for performance next month at the Symphony Concerts. Of his three operas, only one, "Marouf, Savetier de Calre," produced at the Metropolitan last December, is known by actual representation in America. The other two, "La Fille de Roland" and "Par le Glaive"—heroic pieces drawn from the like-named plays of de Bornier and Richelpin—have been heard only in Paris and, possibly, Brussels. In contrast, "Marouf" recounts with no little humor and fantasy a fable from The Arabian Nights.

The Composer

As composer, Mr. Rabaud is neither academic nor ultra-modern. Rather, as his music for both the theatre and the concert-hall suggests, he is eclectic, following no formula, but seeking such forms and procedures as best suit the substance, mood and progress of his music. When his symphony in E minor was played at Worcester a year ago, the reviewer for the Transcript wrote of Mr. Rabaud as the piece disclosed him.

els—or little groups of Parisian composers, practising like methods and pursuing like ends—that are both bane and blessing to French music. He is too robust-minded to be of the "chapel" in the ways of Saint-Saëns; less austere and cerebral than d'Indy's faith and practice exact; more willing to continue the long symphonic line and to hear the voices of the German romantics than is Ravel. Like Schmitt, his quest, standards, procedure are his own and of the accepted goal, quality, ways and means of symphonic music in our time. That is to say, Mr. Rabaud employs the usual modern orchestra, without "additional instruments" and with no arbitrary divisions or abortive unions of the different choirs. In his instrumental coloring, so far as this second symphony, in E minor, goes, he makes no use of the vaporous harmonies, the chordal juxtapositions, the hollow progressions commonly called ultra-modern and Parisian. Yet with an open ear, he has heard the pungent or penetrating semi-tones of Franck. He accepts the orthodox symphonic form—the four movements in the accustomed order, each written with a terseness and economy of matter and means that is curiously Brahmsian and not at all of the fashion of this luxuriant tonal day.

On the other hand, Mr. Rabaud seems to treat his first movement as a kind of prologue; while through the rest of the symphony occurs and recurs a "motto-motive" variously treated and transformed that in the finale largely and fervently dominates the music. Side by side with it and ultimately gathered within it returns a stern and sombre motive of the prologue. Thus Mr. Rabaud gives his symphony the unity, justly dear to the Gallic mind; glances slantwise at Tchaikovsky's practice to send a haunting theme through the varying course of a symphony; and accepts in his own fashion the Lisztian gospel of community of music idea and the Franckian "cyclic" theory of ascendant theme in fuller and fuller voice. Academic prescriptions of repetitions and return within the symphonic form he waves aside, like every other sensible composer of today, when they might hinder his musical design and expressive ends; but unlike many a Parisian, he does not eschew the full-throated Wagnerian harmonies or the large Wagnerian climax. Clearly an eclectic symphony.

"Marouf," in the performance at the Metropolitan Opera House, with Mr. Monteux as conductor and with a serviceable cast, made like impression of an eclectic mind and spirit in the composer. Again the reviewer for The Transcript wrote:

If from time to time the hearer finds himself in doubt whether to take the piece as burlesque, or romantic comedy, or romantic tragedy, the fault lies with the music, which, when it remains one thing for any single extended passage, is usually capital. In the narrower, technical matters of modulation, Rabaud seems impeccable. But in the problems of taste, of style and manner, and in general of musical creation, he is strangely at sea. One can enumerate half a dozen distinct strains of which the music is composed—a pro-

escape, Massenet, Ravel, Franck and Chabrier, are all there, and in nearly equal proportions. The music is now and then with "Thais"-like melody, now sparkling with the intricate harmonies of Dukas, now throbbing with the breath-like accomplishment which we associate with "Pelléas." And except in a few passages, it never remains the same for more than a few successive seconds.

In the problem of style, no less than this problem of manner, Rabaud seems to be at a loss to come to a clear realization of what he wishes to do. There are moments when the music seems to sparkle as in the 18 opera-bouffe of Lecocq and Audran. Yet even the early Wagner could not be more thunderously expressive than is the composer in the passages, such as that of the threat to the vizier, which he chooses to take as dramatic. Again, Thais and Louise never told their loves more ardently than does the Princess in her air in the fourth act. Whether the piece is to be dramatic, or pictorial, or humorous, or exotic or frankly romantic, the composer never seems able to decide. Now he seeks florid expression, now the lithelessness of realistic comment in voice and orchestra, and again an accompaniment of symphonic breadth and proportions. It is in this latter style that he seems most happy, especially in the really brilliant passage describing the approach of the caravan in the last act.

The Conductor

As conductor, Mr. Rabaud, like many of his predecessors, will come to the Symphony Orchestra, from the opera house rather than the concert-hall. Deservedly his Parisian reputation as orchestral leader is high, if not signal; while here in Boston he will have forces, freedom and opportunity such as he has never enjoyed before and such as are sure to stimulate him. He is practised master of orchestral routine; he is diligent in rehearsal; he wins the respect and the good will of his men as he does, indeed, of all who come into close contact with him. By the warrant of his eclectic music his programmes through twenty pairs of concerts with the Symphony Orchestra, should be catholic enough to please the most exacting. Clearly, in all that pertains to music, he is open-minded. As plainly, by the token of his symphonic pieces and his opera of "Marouf," he lacks neither sense of rhythm nor sense of color—both essential qualities in a conductor. Above all, by many a sign on the pages of his music, Mr. Rabaud has a true Gallic lucidity of mind. He sets down unmistakably what he would say in tones and indicates as precisely the manner in which it should be said. A like sense of design, procedure, result, presumably distinguishes him as conductor. In the familiar phrase that orchestras apply to leaders whom they serve willingly, "he will know what he wants and get it."

REDUCTION

RATIO

12x

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
 abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm

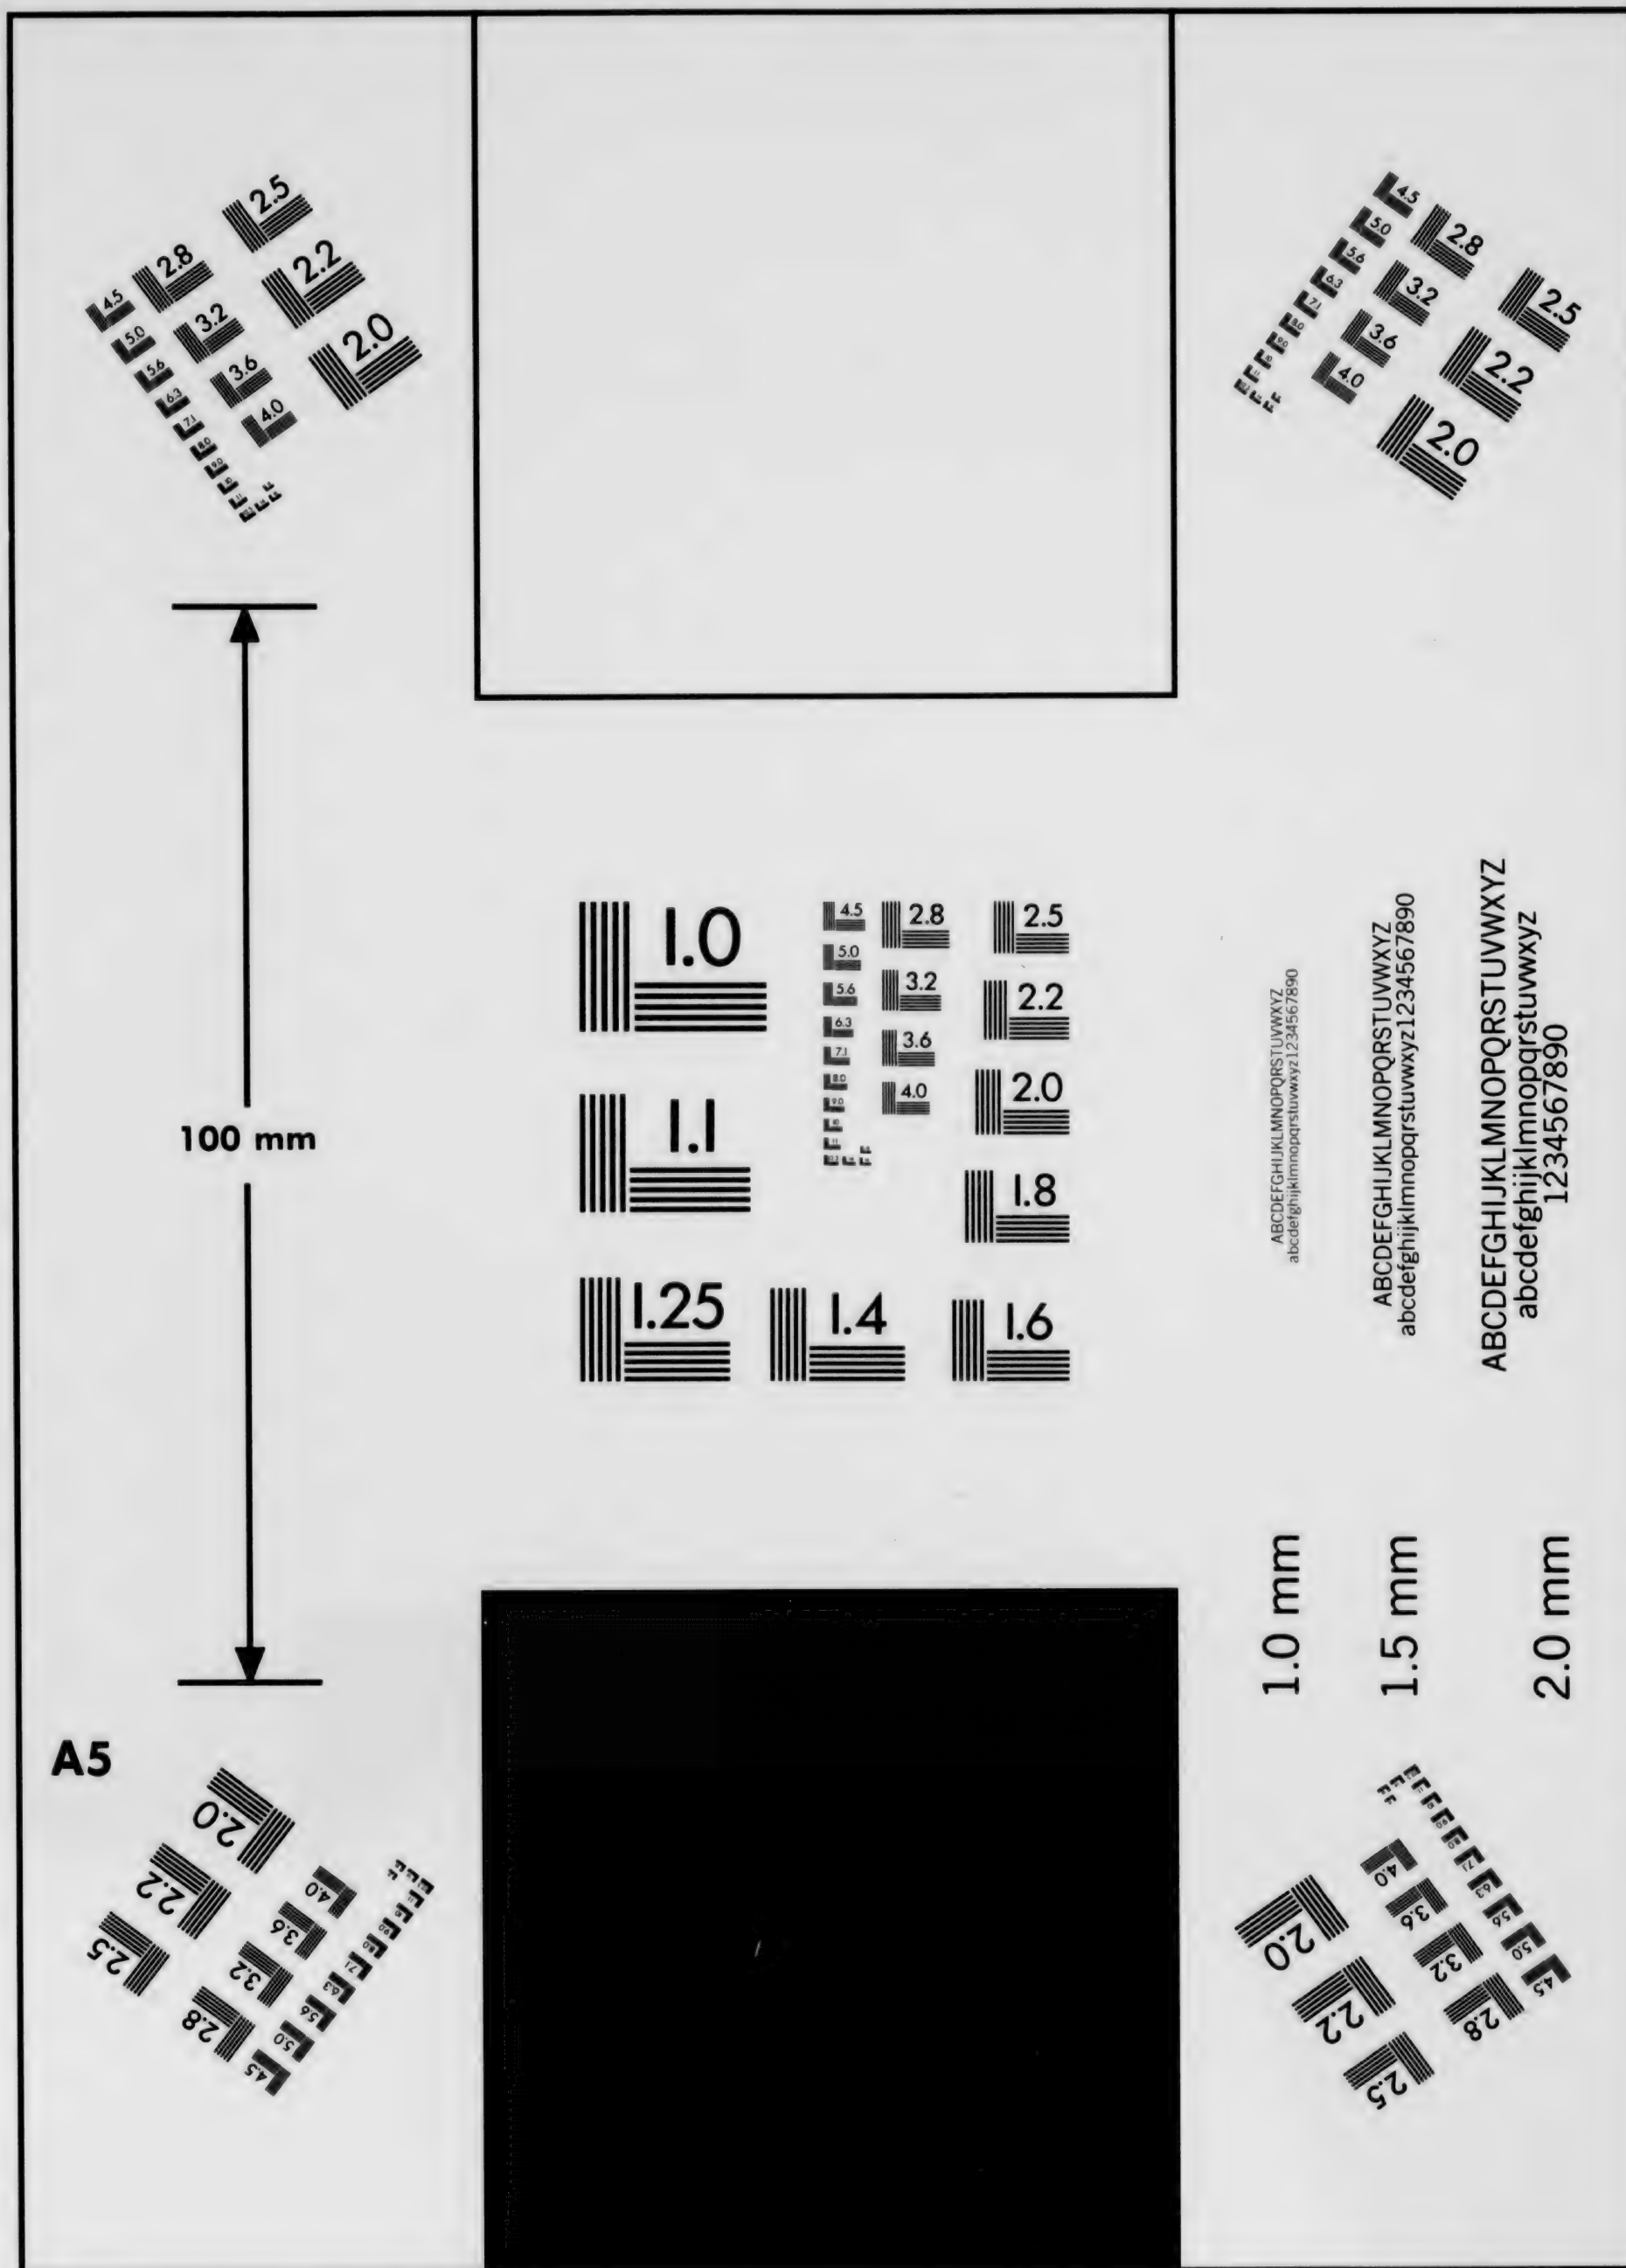

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
 abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
 abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

PM-MGP 13"x18"
 METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
 PHOTOGRAPHIC

PRECISIONSM RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
 St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
 abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

50 52

7-1

53

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1918--19.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

HENRI RABAUD, Conductor.

FIRST PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 25, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 26, AT 8 P. M.

PIERRE MONTEUX Conducts these Concerts

FRANCK,

SYMPHONY in D minor

- I. Lento: Allegro non troppo
 - II. Allegretto
 - III. Allegro non troppo
-

SCHUMANN,

OVERTURE to Byron's "Manfred," op. 115

DUKAS,

"LA PERI, POEME DANSÉ," ("The Peri: a Danced Poem")

DEBUSSY,

"IBERIA:" "Images" for Orchestra, No. 2

- I. Par le rues et par les chemins, (in the streets and way-sides)
- II. Les parfums de la nuit. (The odorous night)
- III. Le matin d'un jour de fête. (The morning of a festal day)

SYMPHONY GIVES FIRST CONCERT

Herald Oct. 26/18
Conspicuously Beautiful and Brilliant Under Baton of Monteux

WARM TRIBUTE PAID TO NEW CONDUCTOR

By PHILIP HALE

The first concert of the 38th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Pierre Monteux conducted. The program was as follows: Franck, Symphony in D minor; Schumann, Overture to "Manfred"; Dukas, "La Peri" (first time in Boston); Debussy, "Iberia."

The answer to the many erroneous, some of them malicious, statements published abroad concerning the present condition of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the concert of yesterday; a concert that was conspicuously beautiful and brilliant; a concert long to be remembered gratefully, one that aroused the large audience to enthusiastic approval.

While Mr. Monteux had ample time, as it would seem to some, for preparation, his task was not an easy one. He had never conducted the orchestra in former years; he was musically unacquainted with the older members; no matter how skilful the new players may be, the orchestra could not reasonably be expected to be at once a homogeneous and plastic body. The tribute paid Mr. Monteux yesterday by audience and orchestra must have recompensed him for his indefatigable labor. There was spontaneous and public acknowledgment of his technical mastery as a conductor; of his sensitiveness and poetic insight as an interpreter; of the modest and ingratiating personality of the man himself.

Mr. Monteux has an exquisite sense of tonal values, of tonal balance and proportion. He is an invoker of euphony. He has the respect for clarity and logical development that characterizes his nation in literature and art. Mr. Gericke had these qualities, the exercise of which gave the Boston Symphony orchestra international reputation; but Mr. Monteux has, in addition, warmth, imagination, emotional expressiveness, qualities that were foreign to Mr. Gericke's nature.

Led by Mr. Monteux and played by an admirable orchestra, Franck's symphony is more than ever music of noble outlines, music rich in beauty, music that beginning in doubt and questioning finds consolation even on earth, and at the end rejoices, as a mighty alleluia of the celestial hosts. The loving attention paid the wealth of detail did not check the continuity of the composer's thought, did not stay the imperious rush in the two allegros. Inner voices were heard, but were not unduly prominent; they were not brought out by the conductor with the exulting air of a discoverer. And in the symphony one noted at once a marked improvement in the strings. They sang melodic passages with musical sensuousness. Pizzicati measures for once had body and significance. So, too, the brass choir had more character than in former years. Its full force was impressive, never blatant. Here, as in the other choirs, there was delightful precision.

Some time ago Mr. Monteux said he saw no reason why the music of German masters, as Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, should not be performed in these troublous times. He chose for his first concert Schumann's overture to Byron's tragedy, an overture that has long been regarded as a classic, like unto a book "without which no gentleman's library is complete." The thunderbolts may fall on us for blasphemy, but the overture now seems to us singularly un-Byronic in thought and expression, and, save for the final measures, devoid of true poetic feeling. We find in it neither the gloomy Manfred nor the Witch of the Alps, nor the form and voice of the loved Astarte.

"La Peri" of Dukas was played here for the first time. Composed as a ballet for Miss Trouhanowa, it was reproached by some in Paris for being too "symphonic," fit for the concert hall rather than the stage. However this may be, the music is for the most part engrossing and not only by reason of exciting rhythms and gorgeous instrumentation. There are charming harmonic inventions; haunting modulations; delicate nuances—and Mr. Monteux is a master of nuances—melodic lines that are more noteworthy in measures for "stage business," or descriptive measures, than in those evidently designed for the solo dancer.

A brilliant performance of "Iberia" brought the end of a concert that held the attention of the hearers throughout.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week, Friday and Saturday, is as follows: Orchestral pieces, Beethoven's Symphony No. 7; Loeffler's "La Bonne Chanson"; Ravel, "Daphnis and Chloe," Suite No. 1, with chorus (first time here). Mme. Florence Easton of the Metropolitan Opera Company will sing "Dove Sono" from "The Marriage of Figaro" and Lia's air from Debussy's "Prodigal Son."

Franco-German Program by Symphony

Sun. Adv. — Oct. 27, 1918
By LOUIS C. ELSON,

PROGRAM

D minor, Symphony.....Cesar Franck
Manfred Overture.....Schumann
"The Peri".....Dukas
"Iberia".....Debussy

THE wind that blows nobody good. Our east wind may have blown in a little extra influenza, but that caused the postponement of all concerts and gave M. Monteux, the new conductor, a chance to become well acquainted with his orchestra, which in itself was about one-quarter new, and four weeks of steady rehearsals instead of two made the opening concert something really remarkable. We cannot recall a first concert which presented such excellent ensemble, such elasticity, such refinements of shading as the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

And it was well to begin the season with Franck's D minor symphony, which shows that there are great symphonies besides those "made in Germany." Nevertheless, art (and especially the musical art) unites all countries, and the trained auditor can observe that the three-noted figure from which most of the first movement is derived (D, C-sharp and F) was also used by Beethoven, Liszt and most powerfully by Wagner as his "Fate" or "Destiny" motive. We can compliment M. Monteux on the skill with which he displayed the many evolutions of this figure. He did not always thunder it out, but made it clear without exaggeration.

The canonic work, in which Franck excelled, was finely balanced, and the more extended figure (12 notes), which is afterwards interwoven with the shorter one, was finely shaded. There was some excellent work both on the English horn and the French horns in the second movement. This second movement, although labelled as a slow movement, contained a scherzo effect within itself, which gives the symphony the regular four-movement shape, although the careless auditor may perceive but three. This second movement M. Monteux read better than we have yet heard it in Boston.

The finale is a noble climax, reminding of the power of the last movement of Brahms' C-minor symphony, and in fact there is more than a passing resemblance in the style of Franck and Brahms. It is more in major than in minor, and the great chorale theme which forms its climax was given forth as if Franck pictured triumph after struggle, and as if M. Monteux were portraying our present victories. If Gounod's "Gallia" pictured defeated France (in 1871) surely this work is a French exultation; and it takes on a new meaning in these present times.

The audience was exuberantly applause. M. Monteux was welcomed with enormous enthusiasm, which repeated itself after the first movement and after the finale of the symphony. He modestly tried to share the honors with the orchestra, but the audience led him plainly to understand that the ovation was intended for him personally. Mr. Schroeder also received a personal welcome as he came back to the violoncello desk. It was inspiring to find the audience about as large as usual, in spite of war time, and the orchestra still the most prominent one of America.

Schumann ought to have made a good contrast to Franck. The brooding character of Byron's hero appealed deeply to the German composer, yet one may doubt whether he fully comprehended the English tragedy. Had he done so he never would have ended his cantata with a Catholic requiem (a good example of double cannon, which fits to Manfred about as well as it would to Bob Ingersoll).

The overture calls for magnificent contrasts all through. Of all composers Schumann was the most strikingly dual nature. We do not mean a "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde" type, but he could be powerfully masculine and most tenderly feminine with equal effect. He called these two sides of his nature "Florestan and Eusebius," and they are nobly exhibited in this work in the virile defiance of Manfred and the sweet yearning of Astarte.

Here M. Monteux was not as brilliant as he had been in the symphony. Spasmodic vehemence took the place of loftiness and breadth. The great passages for trumpets were not very impressive and Astarte was not sufficiently in the foreground. It is not given to many Frenchmen to comprehend Schumann. D'Indy belittles him and Debussy spoke slightly of his compositions. Nevertheless, one should thank M. Monteux for placing Schumann on his first program and Beethoven on his second.

How many French, Russians and Norwegians seek their musical inspiration in Spain (Iberia)! And how few of them catch the true flavor of the garlic. Spite of a liberal garnishing the Spanish dance rhythms, some parts of this "Iberia" might as well be labelled "Siberia" or "Liberia" for all that they represent.

We do not know whether "Three Blind Mice" is Spanish in origin, and we were mystified to hear this old tune made prominent in the work. The final movement became a Spanish Fourth of July and was fully as American as exotic. But M. Monteux read the work excellently and brought out its shifting rhythms and its strong contrasts with excellent power. His beat is decisive, and he evidently knows what he wants and generally succeeds in getting it.

There was also a new work by Dukas upon the program, making this first program preponderantly French in character. Dukas labors under the handicap of having excelled himself once, in "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," and all his other works suffer by comparison.

In spite of its very large score, "Le Peri" is but a high order of musical confectionery, highly-flavored tonal candy. It is quite a tinkle-feast, with its tambourine, triangle, xylophone, celesta, etc., and it deals heavily in percussion, as witness its three kettle-drums, bass-drum and snare-drum.

It has some seductive dance rhythms, as for example a swiny waltz, which becomes prominent once or twice. It deals heavily in chromatics, has a good climax and exhibits all the modern skill in orchestration, in which the French are becoming so adept. There was some commendable flute-playing in the work, but it was all excellently executed.

Summing up, one can say that the Franck symphony was the nub of the concert, and the especially excellent readings of the second movement here and of the finale of "Iberia" were points which show M. Monteux to possess poetry and originality; his excellence of routine was evident all through the performance.

SEASON OF SYMPHONY IS OPENED

Post Oct 26/18
Famous Band Better Than Ever Under Monteux

BY OLIN DOWNES

For the first time in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a French conductor, Mr. Pierre Monteux, stood at its head when the season of 1918-1919 opened yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

The reception given conductor and band, the quality of the performances, the make-up, as well as the evident enthusiasm of the audience, augur very happily for the future of Boston's famous musical organization. The same subscribers, in the great majority of cases, occupied the same seats. The audience was a large one, animated by the sentiment, "Stand by the orchestra."

CHANGES IN PERSONNEL

There have been many important changes of personnel in the orchestra since last season. There will be later occasions to particularize as to the effect of these changes. The band has undoubtedly gained by many of the substitutions. This is particularly evident in the string division, led by the new concertmaster, Mr. Fradkin, not only the rarely talented violinist he showed himself to be when he visited Boston, under Mr. Monteux, with the orchestra of the Russian ballet, but is evidently a leader of musical stability and authority.

the improvements in the quality of the orchestra are not only in the string division. They show everywhere. The tone is warmer, more beautiful, more transparent; the intonation is purer; there is greater technical finish and eloquence of detail. The main responsibility for this is not the changes in personnel, valuable, on the whole, as they undoubtedly have been. The responsibility is Mr. Monteux's.

Mr. Monteux is a very simple man, rather under medium height, erect, uncommonly clear-eyed, unostentatious, self-possessed in the presence of an audience, and quietly master of his men. He had not conducted two minutes before it was apparent that he had made of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a finer instrument than it has been for many seasons. He is a supremely artistic interpreter, a man profoundly in earnest, and thoroughly equipped for his task.

There may be a number of conductors equally gifted in France. If this is so, it is time that the American musical public should awaken to the fact, and realize that conductors are not exclusively manufactured in Germany.

Interpretation of Symphony

The fact, we believe, was yesterday self-evident that Mr. Monteux's interpretation of Franck's symphony surpassed in eloquence, in mastery of line and mood, in sympathy with the genius of the composer, that of his predecessor. It had warmer feeling, more sensitive color, more dramatic emotion. It was more vital as it was more elastic in its rhythmical current. A great flood of music ebbed and flowed, sank to whispers of the most intimate self-communion, or mounted to the very heavens in its supplications and its ecstasies. There was heard the voice of the man alone with his maker, the terrors and exaltations of him who in his secret hour cries out, "Lord, I believe. Help thou mine unbelief." Each solo instrument, every atom of the orchestra, in tender dialogue or prophetic acclamation, was possessed of the emotion of music, now compassionate, now beseeching, now lofty contemplative, or aflame with the vision of the day to come. In this sensitiveness of mood and plasticity of phrase lies much of the secret of Franck's genius, whose genius was felt and profoundly impressed on the audience by the conductor.

This symphony, which hymns the compassion of God and the ultimate triumph of the meek and the humble, was composed by a man of Liege, the city which gave its life that freedom might live.

The other works on the programme were Schumann's "Manfred" overture, Dukas, ballet music, "Le Péri: Poème Danse," composed in 1910 for Mademoiselle Trouhanowa, and performed yesterday for the first time in Boston; and Debussy's "Iberia." The performance of Schumann's work, a remarkable testimony of Mr. Monteux's catholicity of taste, was perhaps the most sympathetic that we have heard of this work, genuinely Schumannish, and as romantic as might be. As for the music itself, it seemed yesterday of another period, and a combination of good Schumann and waterly Mendelssohn, beautifully as it was played. The music of Dukas, while not perhaps of great intrinsic worth, is as gorgeous as a peacock's wing. For its full effect it would require scenery and pantomime, but it sounds superbly, and the modern French musical idiom is employed with consummate skill. It also served as a superb display of the virtuosity of the orchestra.

Debussy's "Iberia"

In "Iberia"—surely one of his very greatest scores—Debussy is found astray on the highways and byways of Spain, meeting life at first hand, putting down his impressions with the recklessness of genius and the technical certainty of his past mastery of his medium.

Snatches of song are heard, scraps of melody, coming from here and there, mingling and colliding with each other with the most enchanting effects. A hundred rhythms, and vibrations the most various, are afoot in the orchestra. There is an indescribable sense of the inarticulate gladness of nature; of the poignant beauty of the night; the sighing of the winds and the murmur of a love song; and finally, the noise and blare of a fete day. The orchestra indulges in Rabelaisian laughter. It echoes the shouts of the people, jest and jibe, songs, marches, the thrumming of guitars—overwhelming life, in which the spirit of an artist immerses itself to give out fresh beauty and joy to the world.

Mr. Monteux was the expert and precise director of all this wonder. The humor of the finale was particularly his. Whether a vaguer outline, a less definite contour, might have obtained in the movement called "Sounds and perfumes of the night," is a question for each hearer to ask himself. Some might say that in this movement a blur of color, a mood, less distinct and definable than that portrayed would have been more native to the composer. The question is one of temperament, opinion, and many practical considerations which confront a conductor. For both conductor and orchestra the concert was a triumph. Mr. Monteux's stay in Boston promises to be brief, but he will remember his welcome and his audience will gratefully remember him.

BEGINNING BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON

Oct. 26/18
Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, first concert of thirty-eighth season, Symphony Hall, afternoon of Oct. 25, 1918. The program: César Franck, Symphony in D minor; Schumann, Overture to Byron's "Manfred," Op. 115; Dukas, "Le Péri, Poème Dansé," (first time in Boston); Debussy, "Iberia," "Images" for Orchestra, No. 2.

BOSTON, Mass.—An emancipated orchestra stood up to play "The Star-Spangled Banner" at the first concert of the thirty-eighth Boston Symphony season. Above them hung a huge American flag; elsewhere in the hall were a service flag and the "Hundred Per Cent" Liberty Loan flag. And the emancipation was evident in the playing of the air. Uniform bowing, feeling phrasing, vigorous attack,—these and the spirited playing made of the anthem something other than an empty ceremony, grudgingly performed.

Since its foundation this organization has been under German domination. Now that domination has been broken and the freedom is already apparent in the different spirit of the orchestra. A French conductor, an American concert master, various new faces in the ranks and a slight rearrangement of the players are outward signs of change. All the technical enemy aliens are gone.

The real change, however, is not to be seen with the eye, and it is hardly to be heard with the ear. It is an indefinable air of freedom that pervades, a conscious loss of hampering traditions. The efficiency of this body of players has been a matter of envious emulation among orchestras. The precision of its playing has been a cause for remark. Its slavish attention to detail has afforded a topic for many a complimentary criticism. In short, as a heretical spirit has sometimes given voice, the content of the music has often been lost sight of in the meticulousness of its production. The manner has received more attention than the matter.

Now, however, that the emancipation from Teutonic methods and ideals has taken place, the orchestra stands at the threshold of a new epoch in its career. In place of the chill of efficiency will come the warmth of color; succeeding the meticulous reading of a score will be a gratifying elasticity. In short the days of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a wonderful machine are over; instead it will be an organization made up of men subject to like passions as those in its audiences are. All of which is by way of saying that an era of humanity has dawned for it.

This was apparent in the playing of the satisfactory program which Mr. Monteux had put together. Not within long memory has the César Franck symphony had such a performance as it had yesterday afternoon. It is a work to which superlatives naturally apply. In its high nobility it transcends most of the other music of this noble composer because cast in a more heroic mold. The exaltation of Franck's music is perhaps its outstanding characteristic; it shines through the sonata for piano and violin and the wonderful piano quintet, it touches the second movement of the symphony like glints of golden sunlight on mountain tops, it lights up certain high moments in the first movement with an unworldly radiance. To César Franck's influence has been ascribed the flow of the current of French composition away from the fascinating but treacherous influence of Wagner and his music dramas toward the classical lines of symphony and opera. In the fen of stagnant water which German scholarship and uninspired writing have got us into we have need of César Franck at this hour. May it not be that as his example and kindly encouragement exerted such powerful appeal on the French composers of his day, so his music shall exercise its benign suasion on us who are in process of forming new musical standards?

The novelty of the program, Dukas' "Le Péri," made an excellent impression. It was presented with authority by Mr. Monteux, as would be expected from a conductor of ballet. From the program notes telling the story of the dance one can easily see why it would be possible to consider the music as more adapted to symphonic than choreographic purposes. Decidedly in what we have come to consider as the modern French idiom, it gave opportunity for a display of orchestral coloring which would have been impossible with the old orchestra.

Mr. Monteux was warmly applauded and made an excellent impression on his audience. He conducted without a score, ably and capably.

Maintained, Refreshed, Rekindled

Trans. — Oct. 26, 1918.

The Symphony Concerts Begin with a New Orchestra Worthy of the Old, an Engrossing Conductor, a Novel and Notable Piece

SINCE the very first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Oct. 22, 1881, none, probably, has marked so many new beginnings as that of yesterday, Oct. 25, 1918, at the outset of the thirty-eighth season. To the single proprietorship of Mr. Higginson had succeeded the more representative and democratic control of a board of nine trustees. Saved by them from the perils threatening its existence last spring, the Boston Symphony Orchestra Incorporated (as the programme-book labels it) now sat upon the stage, with one-quarter and more of the players new to its ranks. For the first time, since the passing visit of Mr. d'Indy, twelve years ago, a Parisian, Mr. Monteux, led the band, new, likewise, to Bostonian ears as conductor in symphonic music. Even the programme, divided between three French pieces and a single German classic, was conditioned by the obligations and the prejudices of wartime.

Details of the day likewise bore witness to a new and open-minded régime, less self-centred and remote, more responsive to the reasonable wishes of its public. From the ceiling nearly in line with the edge of the platform hung, for example, a large United States flag; on the rear rails of the balconies were a service flag and the pennant of a full subscription to the recent war-loan. For the first time within the memory of the oldest frequenter of the concerts, the lights in the auditorium were lowered during performance, while those above the stage threw orchestra and conductor into high relief—a salutary and grateful change, contributing not a little to the enjoyment of the music. At every turn, some minor departure from old routine caught the eye. The harps, for example, had receded from the front of the stage to the rear of the first violins; familiar faces in the orchestra sat in unfamiliar places; even the plush upon the rails of the balconies, the carpets upon the aisles were new. For the first time, finally, throughout a Symphony Concert, a conductor led without a score before him, Toscanini-wise. Unchanged only were the programme-book, familiar repository of learning made entertainment, and the audience. Doubtless a few chairs were empty, but the listeners at cursory glance seemed to fill the hall. In aspect, they might have been any audience, for ten years past, of a Friday afternoon.

Details of the Day

No incident diversified the preliminaries of the concert until, lingering long after the rest of the orchestra, old Mr. Schroeder, who has been recalled to the violoncellos, come conspicuously to his place, was immediately recognized and received a hearty round of applause. Much less conspicuously and by no means so warmly clapped, followed the conductor himself, Mr. Monteux. Almost before the audience had recognized him, he set to "The Star-Spangled Banner," in a version for full orchestra, prepared by Mr. Converse, here and there retouched by the conductor, and heard for the first time hereabouts. The composer has set down the hymn as played in the Army and the Navy, then harmonized it richly and distributed the instrumental voices sonorously, treating it less as a tune that might be sung by an audience than as an anthem to be eloquently intoned by the orchestra. Even his counterpoint moves in stately progress. The result was a nobler voice than usual for music that as such bears repetition none too well—a dignity and largeness accented by Mr. Monteux's pace, phrasing, emphasis. Somehow, as Mr. Messager will again demonstrate next Wednesday, these French conductors make much more of our national hymn than do most Americans. Perhaps they respect it more.

So far as applause may go, the audience made ample amends to Mr. Monteux at each pause in Franck's symphony, the first item of the programme, and at the end. By that time, it had discovered that the reorganized orchestra was in every respect the peer of the old; that in some particulars it excelled it; that the conductor himself had ear, intelligence, imagination, sensibility and force; that he and his men were perfectly responsive to each other. To them, indeed, Mr. Monteux would transfer the plaudits. He called them to their feet as soon as the clapping began; he turned to them before he turned to the audience. Not until, at the third acknowledgment, when the orchestra, with happy tact, obstinately kept its seat, would he take the applause for himself—a conductor as modest and generous as he is able and eloquent. So onward through the rest of the concert, though it was beyond expectation that so beclouded a piece as Schumann's overture to "Manfred" would excite the plaudits that answered Franck's luminous symphony; while not all ears hear too gladly such ultra-modern Parisian pieces as Dukas's "danced poem" of "The Peri," or Debussy's more familiar "Iberia." So the end crowned the day. A single concert had dispelled doubts and fears. The new orchestra was no less the Boston Symphony Orchestra of old—unmatched in America, unexcelled in Europe. If no genius led it—such are few and far between—a conductor of signal ability and persuasive personality held it in the hollow of his hand. In programme, performance, personnel not a standard had abated. The Symphony Orchestra, the Symphony Concerts go on. A thrilled public heard and knew.

The New Orchestra

Four-fold has been the good fortune of the band; first in the tireless pains and the relentless exaction with which Mr. Monteux and Mr. Fradkin, the concert-master, have tested and chosen many of the new recruits; second, in the month, instead of a fortnight, that the postponement of the concerts yielded for daily rehearsals; third, in the diligence, ambition and good will of the men themselves; fourth, above and beyond the rest, in the work of Mr. Monteux in the fusing of the orchestra into a sensitive and responsive body, in the schooling of it to plasticity, euphony and the whole gamut of symphonic eloquence. What Mr. Gericke or Dr. Muck, at his coming to the concerts, spreads over a season, Mr. Monteux, without haste, without waste, has largely accomplished in a month. Few conductors have done the Symphony Orchestra such signal service. Two weeks hence, Mr. Rabaud may well marvel at the instrument that awaits his hand. He has known none such in the Paris that has enclosed, hitherto, his whole working life.

To write so of the orchestra is not to imply that it is beyond betterment. A maturer first flute than Mr. de Mailly would serve it well. The English horn, under the exactions of Dukas and Debussy, left something to be desired; the present tuba-player is by no means the equal of his predecessor; Mr. Schroeder in his sixties hardly replaces Mr. Warnke in his prime. The three horns to be added to the orchestra should be of the finest obtainable quality. On the other hand, there is no doubting that the reorganization of the string choir and its reaction to the abilities of Mr. Fradkin as concert-master have bettered it. In particular, the second violins now escape the dryness, the suggestion of mechanism that were beginning to beset them in Dr. Muck's final year. They and the whole body of strings now play with an exceeding sensibility and plasticity, losing nothing in essential precision yet sloughing away a tendency to a hard accuracy. Their tone gains in sensuous beauty, delicate euphonies, soft and glamorous shimmer. Yet, as in the climaxes of Franck's symphony, it lacked not a radiant power.

The oboes with Mr. Longy, the clarinets with Mr. Sand, the horns with Mr. Wendler keep familiar quality; while Mr. Monteux has mellowed the brass choir and tempered certain inclinations among the instruments of percussion to an excess of metallic zeal. As of old, the orchestra is master of adroit euphonies, as it proved time and again with Franck's music and the second division of Debussy's "Iberia"; throughout the afternoon, it phrased like such a singing woman as was Mme. Sembrich in her golden prime, while its gradations of long ascents and descents were as flawless. Its rhythm in "Iberia" whipped the ear; in "The Peri," it often overlaid the body of Dukas's music with a very jewelry of harmonies and timbres. To listen to it from the first darkling measures of Franck's symphony to the final flash of Debussy's "Image" was to renew old, to discover new delights.

The Conductor

Unless it was in Mr. Monteux's own concerts, a few years ago in Paris, never before has he had so free a hand as that which the undeviating tradition of the Symphony Orchestra gives the conductor. Never before in America, and probably in Europe as well, has he had so responsive and rounded an instrument eager to do his interpretative will. In a sense he had attuned and polished that instrument. Though he is to play upon it—the more the regret!—through only four concerts in Boston and a bare eight elsewhere, he must have felt that, for the time, it was his very own, since he had made it. No wonder that he excelled the rhythmic fire, the delineative force of his "Pétouchka" with the Russian Ballet; the lyric and romantic warmth, the adroit modulation, the astute shading and detailing, the pervading fineness of feeling in his "Faust" of last winter at the Metropolitan; the freshness of fancy, the glow of color, the lusciousness of tone that he shed over "The Golden Cockerel" of last spring in both New York and Boston. No doubt the whole occasion of yesterday stimulated him, simple, self-subordinating, altogether modest as he was before both orchestra and audience. He had himself, as is the way of such quiet, gentle men, admirably in hand, but the nervous tension of the hour flashed occasionally out of his exact, incisive beat, the swift, impending fall of his gesture. Hardly before in the United States has he seemed so resourceful, so masterful a conductor, alike in design, progress, achievement.

62

First of all, Mr. Monteux has the most sensitive ear possessed by any conductor of the Symphony Orchestra since Mr. Gericke. To him, no less than to themselves, the strings owe the soft lustres, the fine shimmer, the unfailing vibrancy of their present tone. Of him, in equal measure, are the new mellowness of the brass, the present clear, characteristic voice of the instruments of percussion, the melting euphonies of flutes, oboes, clarinets. The sheer loveliness of many a period, phrase, transition in Franck's symphony was the play of such an ear; it heard the visioning beauty of the final measures of the overture to "Manfred"; it heightened the sensuous beauty in which Debussy has drenched his pages of the throbbing Spanish night. At the other extreme, Mr. Monteux's ear—and the mind behind—measured as faultlessly the choral-like sonorities of Franck, the climaxes of the theatre in Dukas's "Poème Dansé." So to poise and proportion tonal power is only to be the finer master of it. Again, Mr. Monteux feels rhythm, imposes it upon the orchestra, transmits it penetratingly to his hearers. The rhythmic zest and piliancy that he infused into the first and the third divisions of "Iberia" bettered Debussy himself. Chabrier, hearing from Paradise, surely bounced about with envy. Again, how delicate, how artful was the conductor's hand with the light rhythms of the Allegretto that is Franck's Scherzo.

Not less keen and of Gallic clarity, precision, fineness is Mr. Monteux's sense of musical design and of revelation thereof to his hearers. Every frequenter of serious concerts knows nowadays the long unfolding and upbuilding of Franck's symphony out of abyss of darkness into summit of light. Yet that course is as various of ascent, descent, ascent again, as a long mountain trail. Mr. Monteux perfectly profiled it upon the ears, the imaginations of his hearers. Again in "The Peri" Dukas weaves his music in fine or large strands of polyphony and then jewels them with scintillant modulations; or else he splinters them into gleaming fragments—a star-dust of tones. Mr. Monteux understood, realized, transmitted. If penetrating perception and imparting skill could clarify that muddy, striving overture to "Manfred," he would have illuminated it.

To this insight, Mr. Monteux adds the musical intuition and experience that mould the phrase, shape the period, graduate the climax as with the composer's voice and ear. To all three he lends the imagination that discovers the just accent, that distributes and shades color, that vibrates to the subtle modulations of a Dukas or a Debussy. Best of all, he finds the pace that discloses the inherent voice, the characteristic qualities of the music in hand and, having found it, is sensitively plastic in the revelation. His pace with Franck's symphony—the quickest, the most elastic Bostonian ears have known—gave the music the vivid march, the various beauty, the changeful impulse, the emotional ardor inherent in the music. It captured, as more heavily handed performances do not, the luminosity, the spiritual, at moments the ethereal, quality of Franck inspired. He is so in nearly every measure of this master-symphony. Only here and there does he decline into his equally characteristic homeliness. Again, thanks to Mr. Monteux's choice and elasticity of pace, when has "Iberia" seemed such sensuous imagery in the rhythms, the colors, the whole implication of tones? The divine fire may not have touched the conductor—it touches so few mortals!—but a manifold ability, intelligence, imagination, devotion dwell in him. He possesses the true artist's mind and—what is equally essential—the true artist's conscience.

The Pieces

It was the day of the orchestra and the conductor, the concert of new beginnings; whereas Franck's symphony, Schumann's overture, Debussy's tone-picture are familiar items, in America at least, of the "standard repertory." There is no need now to recur to them; but, for the first time hereabouts was heard "The Peri: Danced Poem: the Legend and the Music by Paul Dukas," originally represented, as such on two Parisian stages, since variously heard as a symphonic piece. The origins of the music, its subsequent fate at the hands of Mr. Diaghilev and Miss Trouhanowa have already been set down in this place. Here also the Persian tale has been told: how the Prince went forth to seek the Flower of Immortality; how he found it in the hand of a sleeping Peri; how looking upon her, he desired her beauty; how she danced for him and so won back the flower; how she vanished as in pale flame; how the Prince submitted to his end. A fable of wistful seeking, pensive longing, melancholy resignation, moving against a background of flower and flame, that dissolve into nothingness—legend old, remote, recalled only to be forgotten. Yet a fable to jewel with many lustres—of the beauty of the Peri, the glow of her flower, the flame-tints with which it changes. For, from the days of his music-drama of Ariana, Bluebeard and the cascading treasure of precious stones, Paul Abraham Dukas, with Jewish blood in his veins (as Paris gossips) has loved this process of tonal jewellery.

It is as jeweller and weaver of atmosphere that Dukas best succeeds with "The Peri." Of course, in a "dance-poem" no less than in his symphony, his opera, his miscellaneous pieces, he writes a closely knit, artfully advancing, self-expanding and self-propelled music. For no Parisian composer of our time, except Mr. d'Indy and Saint-Saëns before he fell into dotage, matches Dukas in formal resource, in constructive scholarship. Beyond all question, "The Peri" as symphonic piece is a well-made tone-poem. The music upsprings resourcefully from itself, yet in the grooves of the legend and at pace with them, elastic as they. On the other hand, there is reason to doubt at a single hearing whether the motives giving birth to the music disclose in themselves alert invention and warm imagination. With "The Peri," as with many another contemporary piece, the treatment is everything. Yet within it again Dukas sometimes flags. There are sudden commonplaces in the music; the dance of the Peri is no more than effective work for the choreographic theatre; at least one climax upswells—and is hollow.

Per contra, measure after measure, so fertile, rich and imaginative are the modulations, so poetizing the harmonies, so glamorous the instrumental colors, summons and sustains the very atmosphere of the legend, flashes its progress upon the fancy of the hearer, pierces him for the instant with its emotions. It is so, for example, when the Prince looks upon the beauty of the Peri and covets it; or when she vanishes into pale flame and the darkness of dissolution steals upon him. Rare and fine indeed are these sensations of tones. Again, those same means jewel the music till it is like the changeful glows of the Flower of Immortality or the sprays of light that dazzle Prince Iskender's longing eyes and heavy heart. Then 's Dukas alchemist, magician.

H. T. P.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA RESUMES IN TRIUMPH

Monteux Gives Brilliant Opening Concert

Globe ——— Oct. 26/18

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began yesterday afternoon its 38th season and a new epoch in its career. For reasons the war has made clear, nearly a quarter of its personnel had been changed since last May, and before it stood a new conductor.

Pierre Monteux, known here through appearances with the Ballet Russe and the Metropolitan Opera Company, by whose direction he was loaned temporarily to the Boston trustees, conducted in concert for the first time in this city. The audience was much as in other years. It welcomed the new conductor, before and after "The Star Spangled Banner," and gave both Mr. Monteux and his players a demonstration after the symphony.

It was expressly fitting that Mr. Monteux should have chosen for the first work of the first Symphony concerts in this new epoch of the orchestra, a work of a Belgian by birth and a Frenchman by his later residence, affiliation, artistic style and sympathy. But beyond the point of occasion and timely tribute, the great symphony of Cesar Franck is music gloriously attuned to the hour.

Mr. Monteux conducted this music without score—as he did throughout the afternoon—with ardor and sensibility; with the manner of a man who himself loved and revered it. For him, Cesar Franck is more than a mystic; there was the note of flaming rapture, of triumph of sweeping exaltation.

Awakened New Spirit

All reasonably have been solicitous as to what this reorganization of the orchestra would mean. The audience had no need to wait long in doubt yesterday. In the first movement of the symphony, Mr. Monteux showed that he not only had evolved a remarkable degree of plastic unanimity and precision, but he had begun to find the soul of the orchestra.

Where before now some have been conscious of a fire smouldering under a repression which at times had its appropriate place and cast, yesterday more than once the flame of a great mood shot through, enkindling insupporting, overpowering.

Mr. Monteux is not a man of one school or style. He could share Schumann's romantic enthusiasm for the melodramatic pomposity and sentiment of his idol Byron in his more or less autobiographical "Manfred," but it was in Dukas' ballet of the Peri and her flower of immortality, played here for the first time, and in Debussy's "Iberia" that Mr. Monteux particularly revealed his own finesse, taste and authority and the new virtuosity and understanding of the orchestra.

New Members Welcomed

The "Danced Poem" of Dukas is a piece of exquisite, often enchanting orchestration, embellishing graceful, yet not profoundly significant, ideas.

Debussy's beautiful series of pictures of Spain found Mr. Monteux sympathetic and imaginative, with its rioting rhythms and colors, with the sensuous languor of its music of the night, as with a new and italicized vividness in the calls, songs and pungently awakening life of the festal day, flamingly realistic, filled with character, yet not crossing the bounds of impressionism. These graphic folk measures smelled of the soil, were exultantly garish or, upon occasion, made no pretense to blush for an idealized vulgarity.

Changes in the orchestra itself have been accompanied by those among its caretakers. Mr. Ellis will be missed, but Mr. Brennan, an executive of judgment, experience, sagacity and unfailing courtesy is his logical successor. Mr. Monteux will conduct one more pair of concerts before Mr. Rabaud takes his place for the remainder of the season.

PRAISES PHILIP HALE

To the Editor of the Herald:

Which is going to be the first college in America to honor itself by conferring the highest honorary literary degree on Philip Hale, our great Boston music critic and litterateur? Coming practically from a stranger I hope this suggestion will not shock Mr. Hale, but for the past 25 years I have felt personally indebted to him for his keen, constructive, incisive, clear-eyed, yet keenly estimate of things and people and matters musical.

What fine research and knowledge was revealed in his Lowell lectures a year or two ago! With what gentle satire he has riddled the German bombast and claims to musical omnipotence for years before the war broke out! How truly he has always seen the light on the individual pretensions of the German race! What wit, what sympathy, what learning has ever been displayed in his many writings! What an inspiration he has been to all music critics and performers and writers—a perennial source of technical knowledge, bonhomie and charm of expression.

What a constructive, upbuilding power for good! Why wait until too late to honor one who has given so much to elevate our literary, critical and dramatic standards? Always he has stood for truth and has seen all things well.

FRANCIS H. OWEN.

Brookline, Sept. 20.

1918

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1918-19.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

HENRI RABAUD, Conductor.

SECOND PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 1, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 2, AT 8 P. M.

PIERRE MONTEUX Conducts these Concerts

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY in A major, No. 7, op. 92

- I. Poco sostenuto; Vivace
- II. Allegretto
- III. Presto: Presto meno assai
- IV. Allegro con brio

MOZART,

RECITATIVE, "E Susanna non vien!" ("How Susanna delays!") and ARIA, "Dove Sono," ("Flown forever"), from "The Marriage of Figaro," Act III, Scene 8

LOEFFLER,

POEME, "La Bonne Chanson"

DEBUSSY,

RECITATIVE, "L'année en vain," ("The Years roll by"), and ARIA of LIA, "Azael! Azael! from "L'Enfant Prodigue"

FRANCK,

SYMPHONIC POEM: "Les Eolides" (The Aeolide)

RAVEL,

"Daphnis et Chloé" Ballet in one Act, Orchestral Fragments, First Series: "Nocturne," "Interlude," "Danse Guerrière"
First time in Boston

Soloist:

Mme. FLORENCE EASTON

In Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloé" a Chorus of thirty-two, prepared by Stephen Townsend, will assist.

There will be no Rehearsal and Concert next week

New Members Welcomed

The "Danced Poem" of Dukas is a piece of exquisite, often enchanting orchestration, embellishing graceful, yet not profoundly significant, ideas.

Debussy's beautiful series of pictures of Spain found Mr. Monteux sympathetic and imaginative, with its rioting rhythms and colors, with the sensuous languor of its music of the night, as with a new and italicized vividness in the calls, songs and pungently awakening life of the festal day, flamingly realistic, filled with character, yet not crossing the bounds of impressionism. These graphic folk measures smelled of the soil, were exultantly garish or, upon occasion, made no pretense to blush for an idealized vulgarity.

Changes in the orchestra itself have been accompanied by those among its caretakers. Mr. Ellis will be missed, but Mr. Brennan, an executive of judgment, experience, sagacity and unfailing courtesy is his logical successor. Mr. Monteux will conduct one more pair of concerts before Mr. Rabaud takes his place for the remainder of the season.

PRAISES PHILIP HALE

To the Editor of the Herald:

Which is going to be the first college in America to honor itself by conferring the highest honorary literary degree on Philip Hale, our great Boston music critic and litterateur? Coming practically from a stranger I hope this suggestion will not shock Mr. Hale, but for the past 25 years I have felt personally indebted to him for his keen, constructive, incisive, clear-eyed, yet keenly estimate of things and people and matters musical.

What fine research and knowledge was revealed in his Lowell lectures a year or two ago! With what gentle satire he has riddled the German bombast and claims to musical omnipotence for years before the war broke out! How truly he has always seen the light on the individual pretensions of the German race! What wit, what sympathy, what learning has ever been displayed in his many writings! What an inspiration he has been to all music critics and performers and writers—a perennial source of technical knowledge, bonhomie and charm of expression.

What a constructive, upbuilding power for good! Why wait until too late to honor one who has given so much to elevate our literary, critical and dramatic standards? Always he has stood for truth and has seen all things well.

FRANCIS H. OWEN.

Brookline, Sept. 20.

1918

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1918--19.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

HENRI RABAUD, Conductor.

SECOND PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 1, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 2, AT 8 P. M.

PIERRE MONTEUX Conducts these Concerts

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY in A major, No. 7, op. 92

- I. Poco sostenuto; Vivace
- II. Allegretto
- III. Presto: Presto meno assai
- IV. Allegro con brio

MOZART,

RECITATIVE, "E Susanna non vien!" ("How Susanna delays!") and ARIA, "Dove Sono," ("Flown forever"), from "The Marriage of Figaro," Act III, Scene 8

LOEFFLER,

POEME, "La Bonne Chanson"

DEBUSSY,

RECITATIVE, "L'année en vain," ("The Years roll by"), and ARIA of LIA, "Azael! Azael! from "L'Enfant Prodigue"

FRANCK,

SYMPHONIC POEM: "Les Eolides" (The Aeolide)

RAVEL,

"Daphnis et Chloé" Ballet in one Act, Orchestral Fragments, First Series: "Nocturne," "Interlude," "Danse Guerrière"
First time in Boston

Soloist:

Mme. FLORENCE EASTON

In Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloé" a Chorus of thirty-two, prepared by Stephen Townsend, will assist.

There will be no Rehearsal and Concert next week

FLORENCE EASTON

Mme. FLORENCE GERTRUDE EASTON (Mrs. Francis MacLennan), soprano, was born in Yorkshire, England, on October 25, 1887, the daughter of John Thomas and Isabella (Yarrow) Easton, concert singers in England and Canada. As pianist, she accompanied her parents and even sang at one of their concerts before she was seven. She went with them to Toronto, Canada, where she studied in the schools, took piano lessons of J. D. A. Irysp and played in one of his concerts when she was eleven. Returning to London she continued her studies at the Royal Academy of Music. She afterwards went to Paris and studied singing with Elliott Haslain. She made her first appearance in opera at Covent Garden, London, a member of the Moody-Manners English Opera Company, and sang with this company for two years. In 1904 she married Francis MacLennan, operatic tenor. Coming to the United States she was engaged for Henry W. Savage's English Grand Opera Company. She was first heard in Boston at the Tremont Theatre as Gilda in "Rigoletto,"* November 1, 1905. The following year she was one of the four engaged by Mr. Savage for the part of the heroine in "Madama Butterfly." In 1907 she and her husband went to Berlin, where they were leading members of the Royal Opera House. She also sang at Hamburg, London, Antwerp, etc. During the season of 1916-17 she was a leading member of the Chicago Opera Company. She sang at

* Her associates in the opera were Miss Newman (now Mme. Fornia), Messrs. Wegener, Goff, Cranston, and Richards.

the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, during the season of 1917-18; Santuzza, Lodoletta (in Mascagni's opera), Ah-Yoe (in "L'Oracolo"), Elisabeth (in Liszt's oratorio of "The Legend of St. Elisabeth," performed as an oratorio), etc.

She took the part of Ah-Yoe in "L'Oracolo," when that opera was performed at the Boston Opera House, April 5, 1918, for the first time in this city.

SECOND CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Herald Nov. 2, 1918
Conductor Monteux Gives
Noble Performance of
Beethoven Work

ORCHESTRA TO GO ON TOUR NEXT WEEK

By PHILIP HALE

The second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Monteux conducted. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Symphony in A major, No. 7; Mozart, recitative, "E Susanna non vien?" and aria "Dove Sono," from "Le Nozze di Figaro"; Loeffler, poem, "La Bonne Chanson"; Debussy, recitative, "L'Annee en vain" and aria "Azael! Azael!" from "L'Enfant Prodigue"; Franck, symphonic poem, "Les Eolides"; Ravel, First Suite from the ballet "Daphnis et Chloe." Mme. Florence Easton of the Metropolitan Opera company was the singer.

There was an engrossing performance of the symphony, a musical and poetic performance that should have disabused any person laboring under the delusion that only a German can fitly interpret the music of Beethoven. It was a singularly clear and well balanced performance, rhythmically exciting, but without extravagance; the imposing climaxes were admirably prepared; the wonderful Allegretto, one of the fullest manifestations of Beethoven's genius, was played in the requisite spirit of simplicity, nobly, without a suspicion of sentimentalism, while the Finale, in which Beethoven shouts and throws his hat in the air, was a revelation of Dionysiac fury.

Mr. Loeffler's "Bonne Chanson" was first performed under another title at a Symphony concert in 1902. When it was then heard, it appealed to all by its lyric flight and its unsophisticated beauty. The composition, suggested by a poem in Paul Verlaine's cycle "La Bonne Chanson," has been thoroughly revised and re-orchestrated. In many instances in music as in literature revision has enfeebled the original. The sandpapering and the polishing have brought tameness; the pursuit of perfection has resulted in finicalness. It has not been so with this composition, which must now be ranked for its spontaneity, its warmth, its poetic feeling with the finest and most mature of Mr. Loeffler's works. There is no over-elaboration, no anxious search after the unusual, no apparently deliberate avoidance of frankly melodic expression. There is no suggestion of Flaubertian toil and agony in shunning what might be considered conventional and obvious. Richly scored, this "poem" has substance in thought as well as gorgeousness in expression. Surely Mr. Loeffler will now be willing to allow the publication of it.

The eloquent performance of "La Bonne Chanson" was followed by a delightful reading of Franck's "Eolides" with its exquisite treatment of the short chromatic phrase, with its infinite harmonic variety.

The fragments from Ravel's ballet are not so interesting in a concert hall as those contained in the Suite played last season. They are more in need of scenery and pantomime. The Nocturne has some charming bits of color; the Interlude has curious vocal effects off-stage, difficult intervals for the singers who had been well trained by Mr. Stephen Townsend; the warlike dance of the pirates has a ferocity that is not displeasing, but as a whole the music, as absolute music, disappointed expectation. By some unaccountable negligence Daphnis was referred to in the program book as a woman.

Mme. Easton did not do herself full justice yesterday. We have heard her sing here in opera with freer voice. Yesterday her upper tones were sometimes pinched and without body. The middle and lower tones were rich and beautiful. She phrased as an accomplished musician. Lia's recitative and aria were sung dramatically. In the aria of Mozart she was less successful, but the singers of Mozart's perfect melodic line are few.

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concert next week, for the orchestra will go on its first trip this season. Mr. Rabaud will conduct the concerts of Nov. 15, 16. The program has not yet been determined.

The public owes Mr. Monteux a heavy debt of gratitude. By his skill, patience and unflinching courtesy as a disciplinarian he has already brought the new orchestra to a high stage of efficiency. Mr. Rabaud has a sonorous, euphonious, plastic orchestra at his command. As an interpreter Mr. Monteux has given memorable performances of works known and unfamiliar, performances that have been sane as well as brilliant and imaginative. As a man he has in a short time endeared himself to orchestra and public. And he with orchestra and public now bids his friend Mr. Rabaud welcome and wishes him all success.

FLORENCE EASTON

Mme. FLORENCE GERTRUDE EASTON (Mrs. Francis MacLennan), soprano, was born in Yorkshire, England, on October 25, 1887, the daughter of John Thomas and Isabella (Yarrow) Easton, concert singers in England and Canada. As pianist, she accompanied her parents and even sang at one of their concerts before she was seven. She went with them to Toronto, Canada, where she studied in the schools, took piano lessons of J. D. A. Irysp and played in one of his concerts when she was eleven. Returning to London she continued her studies at the Royal Academy of Music. She afterwards went to Paris and studied singing with Elliott Haslain. She made her first appearance in opera at Covent Garden, London, a member of the Moody-Manners English Opera Company, and sang with this company for two years. In 1904 she married Francis MacLennan, operatic tenor. Coming to the United States she was engaged for Henry W. Savage's English Grand Opera Company. She was first heard in Boston at the Tremont Theatre as Gilda in "Rigoletto,"* November 1, 1905. The following year she was one of the four engaged by Mr. Savage for the part of the heroine in "Madama Butterfly." In 1907 she and her husband went to Berlin, where they were leading members of the Royal Opera House. She also sang at Hamburg, London, Antwerp, etc. During the season of 1916-17 she was a leading member of the Chicago Opera Company. She sang at

* Her associates in the opera were Miss Newman (now Mme. Fornia), Messrs. Wegener, Goff, Cranston, and Richards.

the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, during the season of 1917-18; Santuzza, Lodoletta (in Mascagni's opera), Ah-Yoe (in "L' Oracolo"), Elisabeth (in Liszt's oratorio of "The Legend of St. Elisabeth," performed as an oratorio), etc.

She took the part of Ah-Yoe in "L' Oracolo," when that opera was performed at the Boston Opera House, April 5, 1918, for the first time in this city.

SECOND CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Herald Nov. 2, 1918
Conductor Monteux Gives
Noble Performance of
Beethoven Work

ORCHESTRA TO GO ON TOUR NEXT WEEK

By PHILIP HALE

The second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Monteux conducted. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Symphony in A major, No. 7; Mozart, recitative, "E Susanna non vien?" and aria "Dove Sono," from "Le Nozze di Figaro"; Loeffler, poem, "La Bonne Chanson"; Debussy, recitative, "L'Annee en vain" and aria "Azael! Azael!" from "L'Enfant Prodigue"; Franck, symphonie poem, "Les Eclides"; Ravel, First Suite from the ballet "Daphnis et Chloe." Mme. Florence Easton of the Metropolitan Opera company was the singer.

There was an engrossing performance of the symphony, a musical and poetic performance that should have disabused any person laboring under the delusion that only a German can fitly interpret the music of Beethoven. It was a singularly clear and well balanced performance, rhythmically exciting, but without extravagance; the imposing climaxes were admirably prepared; the wonderful Allegretto, one of the fullest manifestations of Beethoven's genius, was played in the requisite spirit of simplicity, nobly, without a suspicion of sentimentalism, while the Finale, in which Beethoven shouts and throws his hat in the air, was a revelation of Dionysiac fury.

Mr. Loeffler's "Bonne Chanson" was first performed under another title at a Symphony concert in 1902. When it was then heard, it appealed to all by its lyric flight and its unsophisticated beauty. The composition, suggested by a poem in Paul Verlaine's cycle "La Bonne Chanson," has been thoroughly revised and re-orchestrated. In many instances in music as in literature revision has enfeebled the original. The sandpapering and the polishing have brought tameness; the pursuit of perfection has resulted in finicalness. It has not been so with this composition, which must now be ranked for its spontaneity, its warmth, its poetic feeling with the finest and most mature of Mr. Loeffler's works. There is no over-elaboration, no anxious search after the unusual, no apparently deliberate avoidance of frankly melodic expression. There is no suggestion of Flaubertian toil and agony in shunning what might be considered conventional and obvious. Richly scored, this "poem" has substance in thought as well as gorgeousness in expression. Surely Mr. Loeffler will now be willing to allow the publication of it.

The eloquent performance of "La Bonne Chanson" was followed by a delightful reading of Franck's "Eclides" with its exquisite treatment of the short chromatic phrase, with its infinite harmonic variety.

The fragments from Ravel's ballet are not so interesting in a concert hall as those contained in the Suite played last season. They are more in need of scenery and pantomime. The Nocturne has some charming bits of color; the Interlude has curious vocal effects off-stage, difficult intervals for the singers who had been well trained by Mr. Stephen Townsend; the warlike dance of the pirates has a ferocity that is not displeasing, but as a whole the music, as absolute music, disappointed expectation. By some unaccountable negligence Daphnis was referred to in the program book as a woman.

Mme. Easton did not do herself full justice yesterday. We have heard her sing here in opera with freer voice. Yesterday her upper tones were sometimes pinched and without body. The middle and lower tones were rich and beautiful. She phrased as an accomplished musician. Lia's recitative and aria were sung dramatically. In the aria of Mozart she was less successful, but the singers of Mozart's perfect melodic line are few.

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concert next week, for the orchestra will go on its first trip this season. Mr. Rabaud will conduct the concerts of Nov. 15, 16. The program has not yet been determined.

The public owes Mr. Monteux a heavy debt of gratitude. By his skill, patience and unfailing courtesy as a disciplinarian he has already brought the new orchestra to a high stage of efficiency. Mr. Rabaud has a sonorous, euphonious, plastic orchestra at his command. As an interpreter Mr. Monteux has given memorable performances of works known and unfamiliar, performances that have been sane as well as brilliant and imaginative. As a man he has in a short time endeared himself to orchestra and public. And he with orchestra and public now bids his friend Mr. Rabaud welcome and wishes him all success.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Post Nov. 2/18
BY OLIN DOWNES

The second programme of the Boston Symphony season, which Pierre Monteux interpreted yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was as interesting as the first of a week ago, and as brilliantly presented. Beethoven's seventh symphony, the tone poem, "La Bonne Chanson," of Loeffler; Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Eolides," and music from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis et Chloe," performed for the first time in Boston, were the orchestral compositions. The soloist was Miss Florence Easton of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who sang the recitative and the aria, "Dove sono," from "The Marriage of Figaro," and the recitative and aria, "Azac; Azacel," from Debussy's early cantata, "L'Enfant Prodigue."

ANOTHER TRIUMPH

Some had wondered if Mr. Monteux as interpreter of classic masterpieces would be equal to Mr. Monteux as the interpreter of modern music. The doubts of those who heard the performance of Beethoven's symphony were quickly dispelled. The sense of form, the appreciation of the boldness and virility of Beethoven's symphonic architecture, were as apparent as was Mr. Monteux's appreciation of the arch-impressionistic music of Ravel which came later on the programme.

Again the glory of the orchestral tone was a thing to wonder at, as was the enthusiasm and conviction which permeated a reverent and classical conception of the composer's thought. This was another triumph, and not the least notable, of Mr. Monteux's brief season in Boston.

Mr. Loeffler's Tone Poem

Mr. Loeffler's work, inspired by Verlaine's incredibly beautiful poem to the sunrise, was first performed in 1902 at these concerts. Since that time it has been reorchestrated. Rarely has the composer painted in such beautiful tone colors. Neither has he forgotten "line"—that is, melody. There is noble polyphony almost throughout. Developments of "line" and "color" go hand in hand, and are ordered with masterly art. Perhaps there is overluxuriance in the development of the theme, which seems first to hesitate as it steps from an exquisitely tinted instrumental background, then gathers strength, power, rhythmical life, as it rushes forward to a climax in which the orchestra fairly blazes in its sonority. Perhaps a short cut in the first half of the work would have made it more concise. Nor is the melodic speech of the composer as radically individual as it is in later works. Some would say it was more direct, as it is of more obvious appeal.

However these things may be, the audience greeted with marked enthusiasm the simplicity, the directness, the nature-mood of this music, and applauded until the composer, in the audience, rose to his feet.

Chorus of 32 Voices

What can compare with the simplicity of Franck? His music is of the winds which whisper and caress the earth. A short, Tristan-like phrase is the thematic basis of the work, which evokes a mood as delicately and fancifully sensuous as could possibly be. The unconsciousness, the absolute lack of artifice, with which the miracle is wrought, is a miracle of genius.

A chorus of 32 voices, trained by Stephen Townsend and singing behind the scenes, assisted in the performance of the strange, Pagan music of Ravel. Today this music seems the extreme of impressionism. The ear cannot analyze the laws of its harmony, yet these harmonies seem to sit as squarely as any chord in the work of a classic master. The composer has formulated a whole new speech of his own in one of the most original and astonishing scores, in the writer's opinion, in modern French music. The chorus performed admirably in very difficult passages. Mr. Monteux, who again conducted everything from memory, gave a superb performance.

Miss Easton's Singing

Miss Easton sang music, which in the hands of too many performers is merely decorative, with sincerity and emotion. She has a fresh and beautiful voice, peculiarly rich and dark in its lower registers. Her earnestness and talent impressed the audience and she was recalled with marked enthusiasm.

At the last the audience was loth to let Mr. Monteux depart. The recent epidemic deprived the symphony audience of three more programmes interpreted by a conductor of the most exceptional talents, to be numbered as one of the most gifted leaders who have stood at the head of this orchestra.

Welcome for the French Orchestra

Boston Am. & Adv. Nov. 3/18
By LOUIS C. ELSON.

WE have had two important symphony concerts during the week.

Place aux Etrangers! The orchestra of the Paris Conservatoire made its debut on Wednesday evening. It played:

Bizet....."Patrie" overture
Beethoven.....Fifth Symphony
Debussy....."The Afternoon of a Faun"
St. Saens.....Fourth Piano Concerto, C minor
Soloist, M. Alfred Cortet.

Franck, Symphonic Poem, "The Redemption"
Berlioz.....Carnaval Romaine Overture

The welcome was a grand one. A standing audience, wild cheers, enthusiastic applause greeted the great French organization at the outset. Most naturally the auditor made mental comparisons with our own orchestra, yet such comparisons are not quite fair. To know entirely what this band is one should hear them in Paris when they are in the thick of their rehearsals and in the old hall of the Conservatoire, the best hall for music in all Europe.

Yet just as they were, directly from a long voyage and amid strange surroundings, they made a most artistic impression. It is a slightly smaller orchestra than our own, perhaps not superior in its brasses, but very effective in its wood-wind, and its strings playing as if they were a solo quartet. Such crisp attacks, such perfect crescendos, such steady ensemble was worth traveling far to hear.

But while paying homage to the orchestra we reserve our chief enthusiasm for the conductor. M. Andre Messager is clearly a sensible conservative. We have heard great conductors (Mahler and Stravinsky, for example), try to squeeze out new thoughts from the old Fifth symphony and we were prepared for something equally bizarre in the present instance. Well, we were gloriously disappointed. M. Messager gave us Beethoven pure, unexaggerated and undefiled. He did not try to crush us with the opening figure, nor whip up the finale to fury. He seemed a French Gericks.

Also in the Faun's Afternoon he was far less sentimental than any conductor who has read it here. We have frequently had that Faun sighing himself to death, but this time he became a fairly virile party and gained much by the process.

The pianist, M. Cortet, created a furor. He displayed a superb technique, his double-octave and chord playing and his scale and arpeggio work being especially remarkable. He gave a most exciting performance of the pianoforte concerto, which ought rather to be called a "Forte" concerto, for it has much heavy work and the piano is constantly in the foreground. The old G minor, No. 3, is better, but St. Saens is always interesting, melodic and sanely musical. M. Cortet was recalled again and again, and forced to an encore.

Neither the Bizet nor the Franck work is a great composition, yet one may regard the "Patrie" overture as a kind of musical prophecy (from humiliation to victory) which is being fulfilled at the present. But, as already noted, the chief point to record about this concert was the advent of a commendable French conductor, sensible in the make-up of his program, free from the modern demon of "individualization," remarkable in the drilling and control of his men. We wish we had him in Boston.

It is always pleasant to return to the home table after banquetting abroad, and we came to our Boston Symphony concert with especial zest, but were a little disappointed at the first of it.

The program was as follows:

Beethoven—Seventh Symphony.

Mozart Aria—"Dove Sono."

Loeffler—"Une Bonne Chanson," Symphonic Poem.

Debussy—Lia's Aria from "L'Enfant Prodigue."

Franck—"Les Eolides," Symphonic Poem.

Ravel—"Daphnis and Chloe," Suite No. 1.

Vocalist, Florence Easton.

The program was too long and not well made up, for some of the later movements neutralized each other. We have had three symphonic concerts in eight days, each giving about two-thirds of their contents to the modern French school. We respect and admire much of this school, therefore we do not desire to see it wearing out its welcome. There are Norwegian, Finnish, English and Russian composers, not to speak of dead Germans from Bach to Wagner, and a few Americans who are well worth hearing. Let the programs be more varied in the near future.

The performance of the Beethoven symphony was not very subtle. It idealizes the dance, but should not become mere dance music at any time. The brass was often too prominent, and the brusque end of the scherzo not well brought out. But M. Monteux did not make the second movement mawkish, as some conductors do, and he read the first movement with considerable spirit.

Mme. Easton sang very finely. Her voice was broad, her intonation always secure even in highest register; there was sufficient flexibility and good expression in the Mozart aria, while the dramatic fervor and sympathetic quality in the Debussy air won the audience completely. She was recalled over and again. M. Monteux and the orchestra were commendably elastic in their support in these numbers.

To us the gem of the concert was Mr. Loeffler's poem. He is probably the finest master of orchestration on this side of the Atlantic, and the intelligible and logical working-up of the noble musical ideas in this work make it something long to remember. Perhaps we have grown, perhaps the new scoring of the work has made it more powerful, but we certainly found infinitely more greatness in it than when we heard it years ago. And we were glad to see that the audience also came under its spell.

But coming directly after it, Franck's "Eolides" seemed entirely "de trop," and so did the Nocturne which began Ravel's Suite. We consider Ravel the chief French orchestral composer of the present, yet one cannot live on rhapsody alone, and the last half of the concert dealt entirely in rhapsodical effects.

But we were glad to have Mr. Townsend's chorus assist in the last number, even if they had a semi-inaudible and comparatively unimportant part to play, but it was at least a promise that we might have this excellent choral trainer as co-worker in some future symphonic concerts, as we did last season.

The final movement of the suite (which was a continuous work) was a Danse Guerriere, which was bizarre, powerful and attractive. We should like to hear it again. If the French dance on the Germans like that it will hurt them.

M. Monteux was commendable in his readings of the last five numbers of the program, but we much prefer M. Messager in Beethoven.

The week began with a concert in Symphony Hall (last Sunday) in which Messrs. Thibaud and Bauer snared the honors. Each won success in solos, but the union of the two in Grieg's C Minor sonata was the chief point of the afternoon. This was the first of Mr. Mudgett's regular Sunday concerts, which are the finest combination of the artistic and the popular which Boston possesses in its crowded musical season.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe — Nov. 2/18
Monteux' Last Matinee—

Mme Easton Soloist

Mr Monteux yesterday took leave of the Friday afternoon Symphony audience, which in the fortnight of his sojourn here has brought him into high favor for his modest, gentlemanly bearing as for his musicianship. Yesterday it received him warmly throughout the concert and called him out again at its close.

Mme Florence Easton, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, appeared as soloist for the first time at these concerts. The program was as follows:

Beethoven, 7th symphony; Mozart, Recit and Aria "Dove Sono," from "Marriage of Figaro," Mme Easton; Loeffler, poem "La Bonne Chanson," Debussy, Recit and Aria of Lia from "The Prodigal Son"; Franck, "Les Eolides"; Ravel, orchestral fragments, first series, "Nocturne," "Interlude," "Danse Guerriere," from ballet in one act, "Daphnis and Chloe," first performance in Boston.

A long program, ordinarily too long, but holding so much of beauty that one might well pause before making an elimination—even of Cesar Franck's poem, with its curious foreshadowing of thoughts in his symphony.

Mr Monteux' Beethoven had clearness and spirit. He finds here a ruddy, folk joyousness; makes the allegretto much less weighty than it has been, the fugue crisp and lucid, and the finale music for a chorus of dervishes in the whirlwind of the dance. No wonder the pictorial character of these pages has invited the visions of analysts. Whatever Mr Monteux' tendency to drive the orchestra in passages where an accelerando hardly is intended, he saves from the ponderous or tragic music which is more often naive.

Mr Loeffler's revised poem to Verlaine's imaginative verse has lain in seclusion too long. Composer and poet are well matched in their instinctive sense of color, line, rare and significant expression. The music appropriately touches the note of the idyl upon the one side and of impassioned rhapsody inspired by love within consonant nature upon the other. Both overtake beauty, the harmonically enriched morning song of the strings over their insistent pedal point, no less than the sonorous tribute to the sun and the poet's beloved. The composer twice bowed his acknowledgments to the applauding audience.

Mme Easton gave pleasure by her pure, expressive voice, finding herself and her audience more particularly in Debussy's aria of his Massenet period. Although hurried by Mr Monteux a trifle in the climax, she made her points, and that in music which asks preferably a deeper timbred voice.

Ravel's suite, more recondite and challenging in its impressionism than its fellow, pleasantly remembered from last year, is probably the more dependent upon stage pantomime, lights and pictures. But the daring in harmonic color and instrumentation is not that of the mere fantasist. There is suggestion of Daphnis in supplication and the pirates are fine fellows. Mr Townsend's chorus, singing well the difficult music, defined their two moods. Had the voices sounded from a greater distance they might have been yet more effective.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Trans. — Nov. 2/18
THE COMPOSERS' DAY MORE THAN THE CONDUCTOR'S

A Novel Piece from Mr. Loeffler in His Earlier Manner—More Fragments from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe", with Many a Characteristic Stroke—Franck Again in the Middle Way of a Tone-Poem—Beethoven, Orchestra and Leader in Triple Worth—Miss Easton Sings

WITH a novel piece by Mr. Loeffler and another by Ravel to grace the programme, interest shifted at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon from the quality of the orchestra and the conductor, Mr. Monteux, to the quality of the music in hand. The keener was this interest because Mr. Loeffler is the most individual of present American composers, while Ravel stands in like place among the Parisian. Yet, as the outcome was, Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem seemed rather of the composer who fashioned "The Death of Tintagiles" in 1897 than of the composer who wrote the symphony of 1916. It was early Loeffler, so to say, reproduced at a time when a later Loeffler prompted the anticipating ear. Perhaps, however, this impression was inevitable from a piece revived for reproduction seventeen years after it had been first written. As "Poem for Orchestra: 'Avant que Tu ne t'en Ailles,'" the music heard yesterday was set to paper in 1901 and played at Symphony Concerts of 1902 and 1903. As "La Bonne Chanson," it had been rescored and otherwise altered by Mr. Loeffler for performance yesterday. The subject-matter of the earlier and the later draft is the same, Verlaine's verses, likewise "La Bonne Chanson"—verses that salute the paling star of morning with the images of an unspiced dawn and that underlay the apostrophe with pulsing affection for her who, waking, stirs beside the poet. The form as well as the substance of the poem may readily stir so imaginative and yet so reflective a spirit as the composer's since the summoned images of nature—the call of the quail, the ascent of the lark, the glint of the dew, the final glowing of the sun—are like to festoons about the poet's apostrophe. So may the chief motive and the main body of the music bear the impulse of Verlaine's song, while around it variants of the motive may weave garlands of imagery like to his. Needless, almost, to say that the resulting tone-poem thus keeps pace and mood with the suggesting verses, and also develops itself in sustained and unfolding integrity. Once more, as their abominable way is to the truly orthodox, these so-called "impressionists" are unrelaxing logicians of music, formulating their design, pursuing it, at once pliant and unflinching, to the end.

Now, in the new version of "Avant que Tu ne t'en Ailles," Mr. Loeffler adheres to his original scheme, maintains his developed and dominant motive and little alters the festooning variants he deduces from it. On the other hand, he has entirely rescored the piece, distributing anew harmonies and timbres, modulations and progressions; but by a curious concentration of will and mind, he has effected this rescoring in the early manner of "The Death of Tintagiles" rather than in the later manner of the symphony. That is to say, the listener hears the Loeffler of aerial harmonies, piercing progressions, quivering modulations and iridescent instrumental color only in the preluding to "La Bonne Chanson" and here and there in the tonal imagery of the variants to the main motive with hint of sensations from the dawn. In some ears yesterday, those introductory measures surpassed in imagination and illusion all the rest of the tone-poem: for in them is reflection of the pale, suffusing light, the quiver of earth and air and watching human spirit, when night ebbs and day poises as for spring upon a trembling world. At once fanciful and dexterous is the later suggestion by similar and quickly passing means of other sensations of the kindling shimmers of day.

In contrast, the rest of the tone-poem is the opulent and passionate development of a manifestly melodious motive. It is upborne to a climax of ardent apostrophe; is lifted again to what the composer designs as the splendors of sunrise. At every turn it is enriched harmonically, amplified instrumentally, deepened by modulation, broadened by progression—yet, as it seemed yesterday, with curious lack of Mr. Loeffler's wonted individuality. His motive sings full and strong to his hearers; he uses at will every one of these semi-conventional processes of opulent music-making. His climax, his sunrise follow the best models, but they are of the Loeffler, making his way with the rest of the young composers sixteen years ago rather than of the Loeffler of 1918, matured and isolated master. Perhaps thereby he preserves the consistency of this new version of an early piece.

Nor, as the luck of the day went, did Ravel's novel piece altogether fulfil expectation. It was the first and the shorter of the two suites that he drew for the concert-hall from his celebrated ballet of "Daphnis and Chloe," announced more than once, but never yet mimed and danced in the American theatre—the suite beginning with the miracle of the sculptured nymphs called to life to comfort the shepherd bereft of his mistress, continuing with the mysterious voices, perhaps merely of the quivering night, perhaps also of Pan's distinct train and ending with one of the furious dances of the abducting pirates. The music is all matter drawn from the earlier scenes of the ballet, whereas the second suite, heard at the Symphony Concerts last winter assembles and coordinates excerpts from the later episodes. This second suite had, moreover, symphonic continuity, roundness of impression, integral musical being apart from the mimed action and the scenic backgrounds it illuminated, the dances that it bore.

The first suite, on the other hand, seems, rather, a more or less arbitrary assemblage of detached fragments, yields no unity of impression, bids the mind recall the pale flames that flickered above the heads of the circling nymphs or the red cliffs of Bakst amongst which the red-clad pirates lurched and plunged. Time and again the hearer finds himself summoning his memories of the Russian Ballet rather than listening to Ravel's music as music. Yet there are moments in it of beauty that melts the heart, of illusion that wraps the imagination, of rhythmic power and flare of tonal color flung full-fisted upon stage and orchestra. The music at the beginning—of the tremors of the night-wind, of the stirrings of the pitying nymphs, of the pale flicker of the flame that crowns them, lambent in the darkness—achieves both intrinsic beauty and penetrating illusion, and by novel means. The much-debated, the much-scorned polyharmonic chords of the "ulche dest" Parisian composer make tremulous, titillating underbody and background, against which dart in pale lines measures for various solo-instruments. As Ravel thereby perfectly achieves his end of beauty and illusion, is he not altogether justified of the means his imagination and resource fashioned and used? Again, the remote, wandering voices of the night invoke the mystery, the vague tremors of the moment in the ballet when a god condescends to comfort the woes of his servants. What then, does it matter, if the intervals seem as though Ravel had splotted them upon his music-paper, if they taxed to the utmost, yesterday, Mr. Townsend's expert choir, gaining none the less the illusion the composer sought. And when faint and far, a single trumpet sounds pale and clear against this murmur, the stroke is of genius itself. Quickly rhythm mounts from power to frenzy in the pirates' dishevelled dance; drunken, yet always in Ravel's masterful hands the orchestra reels, with plunging flares. So also genius writes and spares not.

The rest of the programme made an agreeable miscellany in which Beethoven's seventh symphony, strangely long unheard "at these concerts"; Franck's tone-poem, "The Daughters of Æolus," at relatively long intervals restored to them; and two operatic airs sung by Miss Easton of the Metropolitan Company were the chief items. Appearing in her own fresh, comely, youthful person, which is not at all that of Chinese maiden of Italian music-drama as Boston knew her last spring, the singer quickly won the eye as she soon pleased the ear of her new audience. Heard in the waiting Countess's soliloquy "Dove Sono i Bei Momenti" from Mozart's lyric comedy of "Figaro's Wedding" and in the musing monologue of the mother from Debussy's cantata of "The Prodigal Son," her voice quickly disclosed a crystalline quality, likening it in measure to that of Mme. Eames in her prime. There is like limpidity, like measured radiance of tone, like hint of cool control, but Miss Easton's voice is at present the warmer, the more susceptible to play of characterizing color. On the other hand, the younger singer's tones thin perceptibly in the higher ranges and "skips" that Mozart exacts, hinting at the metallic hardness that is pitfall to these crystalline transparent voices. In both airs, Miss Easton proved herself accomplished singer, with sense of the music as music and also as speech of an operatic personage and token of an operatic moment.

Debussy set the easier task, since this "Air of Leah" in the manner of that connoisseur of women, the late Monsieur Massenet, runs in smooth, fluent, songful measures, prettily dappled with tender sentiment. Miss Easton's song was as purling as Debussy's; the neat lights and shades of the music played also in her tones. The listener heard as he might taste the "Floating Island" of domestic desserts. On the other hand, her singing of Mozart's more exacting recitative ("E Susanna non Vien") and air was hardly so successful. The declamation she achieved uncommonly well. The hearer felt the thrill of suspense and scene that dwells in those seemingly simple measures; orchestra and singer sprang into them as at the impulse of a quick-coming emotion. Yet Mr. Monteux and Miss Easton beautifully rounded each phrase. Passing to the air, the singer seemed too straightforward, too literal, thereby missing the light undulation of contour and contents in many a measure. Agreed, moreover, that the piece ends rather ornately, yet even there the melancholy of the Countess, pursuing with many a haunting memory the intrigues of her careless husband, colors the music. There and elsewhere it did not color Miss Easton's tones.

In turn, "The Daughters of Æolus" completed the progress of Bostonian ears, in the short space of a week, through all the degrees of Father Franck—the inspired Franck of the symphony of last week, the commonplace, mediocre Franck of the fragment from "The Redemption" and the Franck betwixt and between, who is doing a good job in his own way as in this tone-poem of the winds. There are chromatic, melodic phrases in the music that float upon the air with the ethereal quality, alike in gossamer substance and in attendant harmonies, that is Franck's unique possession. In tonal substance they are the purest alabaster; in illusion they summon the breezes that were daughters to the wind-god, "the nymphs of winged feet," "the dove-like virgins" about whom in Leconte de Lisle's suggesting poem they play. There are exquisite measures in which these breezes seem to move and murmur from choir to choir of the orchestra in a perfect Franckian speech. Then, the composer, being a conscientious man, and at the time in which he wrote the tone-poem, a man also with his way to make, bethinks himself of the necessities of the concert-room and the music upswells as though Æolus, rather than his daughters, were blowing resounding blast. To hear Debussy's sea-pieces is to resent the occasional boisterousness of the music, true to the ocean bye and large, but not to his particular, personally conducted and colored waves. So with the winds of Franck's tone-poem. They illude most when they whisper in his ears and skim his imagination.

In Beethoven's symphony, as in all the pieces of the day, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra, renewed, intensified, amplified the virtues and distinctions already and with one accord, repeated of them in print and by word of mouth. The conductor, surer, after the performance in Cambridge on Thursday, of both his forces and himself, set a yet more flying pace, darting rhythm and exuberant voice for the finale; the orchestra answered like thoroughbreds to the flick of a whip. Yet as the music flashed and tumbled by, there was not a blur upon its outline, a jolt in its progress. Hearty and full-bodied, yet withal in lightness of mood, went the scherzo in the true and characteristic voice of Beethoven in these difficult movements, while as truly sounded the deeper and contrasting hymn of the horn-filled trio. Mr. Monteux's sense of instrumental melody, his ear for shaded and sublimated orchestral song has not stood clearer than in the simple, sincere loveliness, free from every hint of abstruse or wilful manipulation, with which conductor and orchestra clothed the slow movement. From linked measure through linked measure the poetic beauty of the music glowed out of the sensuous beauty of the tone of stringed and wind choirs. As at Cambridge, the evening before, the introduction quivered into the first allegro and playful stars might have danced to its rhythms, half-halted and began anew at its "holds" and transitions. Without an outward quail sat those in the audience who were sure last spring that only a conductor from "Mittel-Europa" could "really" read a symphonic score. Perhaps, as it surely became them to do, they blushed within. Once and for all, in this symphony of Beethoven, as in all the other pieces of his concerts, hereabouts, Mr. Monteux has answered them. Conductors of distinction are bred in Paris as well as in Berlin or Vienna. They can also fashion orchestras in their own image.

H. T. P.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

There will be no Symphony concerts this week, as the orchestra will be away on its first Southern trip. The usual concerts will be given: Monday night in Philadelphia, Tuesday afternoon in Washington, Wednesday night in Baltimore, Thursday night in New York, Friday night in Brooklyn, and Saturday afternoon in New York. All these concerts will have Mr. Monteux as conductor. He will end his connection with the orchestra next Saturday afternoon for the matinee concert in New York, and then resume his work at the Metropolitan Opera House, where he will have charge of the French opera. When it became evident that Mr. Rabaud could not reach America in time properly to prepare for these Southern concerts, Mr. Gatti-Casazza courteously released Mr. Monteux in order that he might stay with the orchestra another week.

In all the cities except New York the soloist will be Florence Easton, who will sing the same arias that she has just sung here. With two exceptions, the programs will be made entirely of works which Mr. Monteux has performed in Boston. These two exceptions are the D major Concerto Grosso of Handel for strings alone, which will be played in Washington, Baltimore and at the afternoon concert in New York, and d'Indy's "Istar" variations, which will be played in Brooklyn. At all the concerts except the matinee concert in New York the symphony will be Franck's in D minor, and at this concert in New York Beethoven's Seventh Symphony will be played. Mr. Rabaud remains in Boston while the orchestra is away. He will have his first meeting with his men at the rehearsal on Monday morning, Nov. 11.

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CARNEGIE HALL

[Special Dispatch to the Herald.]

NEW YORK, Nov. 9.—The first matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Carnegie Hall this afternoon before a large audience which enthusiastically demanded the "Marsellaise" after Pierre Monteux had conducted the national anthem. It was delivered with accustomed Gallic spirit.

Whether he be considered as a temporary conductor or as a skilled and versatile musician, M. Monteux deserves the gratitude of our musical public. Today his brief connection with the band from Boston came to a close, and Sunday evening we hope to see him in his familiar place at the head of the Metropolitan opera forces. The music at the matinee went with more precision and spirit than at the opening concert last Thursday evening. And the musical scheme was more interesting—Handel, Loeffler, D'Indy and Beethoven—two old-timers, one American and one Frenchman.

The tonality D major began and ended the matinee. Handel's concerto grosso No. 5, for string orchestra, was no doubt, selected to show the paces of that particular development. The introduction and allegro were rather wiry in tone, nor was the largo ingratiating to the ear. The various solos were played by Frederick Fradkin, the new concert master, his colleague Mr. S. Noyack, Mr. C. Barrier, violin and Mr. J. Calkin, violocello.

MR. HOFMANN RETURNS

Trans. — Nov. 1/18
A FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT AT CAMBRIDGE

At Last the Illustrious Pianist Rejoins the Boston Orchestra and Transfigures Chopin's Concerto in E Minor—Mr. Monteux's Beethoven, Excelling That of His Parisian Rivals—A Hall That Pointed the New Virtues of the Band

IT was the turn of Cambridge last evening to listen for the first time to Mr. Monteux and the new Symphony Orchestra; while to them for full measure was added Mr. Hofmann, the pianist, long unheard hereabouts either in recital of his own or in a symphony concert. The faithful audience of many seasons filled Sanders Theatre nearly to the last seat, receiving the conductor cordially, but happily eschewing the curious parish custom, that steadily gains ground in Symphony Hall, of rising when this, that or the other celebrity appears first upon the stage. The applause redoubled when Mr. Monteux and the orchestra had finished Beethoven's seventh symphony, since their hearers could then measure with no less pleasure than justice the quality of orchestra and leader. The finer acoustics of the compact, circular, wooden-walled Sanders Theatre disclosed even better than did Symphony Hall, the suave beauty, the flowing progress, the bright sensibility of tone in violins and violas, the richness and smoothness of the horns, the ringing clarity of the trumpets, and the mellow sonorities of the deeper brass. Sanders Theatre was, moreover, ideal place to hear the euphonies, instrument to instrument, choir to choir, with which the adroit ears of Mr. Monteux and the men themselves seldom err. Those flawless acoustics likewise revealed the fineness of detail of which the new orchestra is capable and the subtleties of shading and of varied repetition in which the Parisian conductor has practised it. Often in the progress of Beethoven's symphony the band yielded a glowing mass of tone in rhythmical motion; as often, when the composer feathers his orchestra, as it were, the two or three chosen voices stood forth soft and clear. Mr. Monteux and the newcomers to the band has not only respected its standard that would blend perfection with power, but are also lifting it.

Heard for a second time in German music, the conductor achieved much more with Beethoven's symphony in A major than he had with Schumann's overture to "Manfred"; while if his material was much more fertile, so also was it the more exacting. Good to hear was Mr. Monteux's delicate phrasing of the introduction and the light suspense of his transition into the full and gladsome flow of the first movement. Embarked upon it, not once did he stay its fleet progress, yet for the passing instant the hearer felt each of the momentary holds, the thinning or the thickening of the tonal mass with which Beethoven dissipates monotony; while at once intuitive and expert were the conductor's modulations of a rhythm, in which apt variation is no less to be desired. Phrased like song, modulated like song, clothed steadily in warm richness of velvety tone, the allegretto shone anew, as conductor and orchestra turned facet upon facet to the ear. The alternate spring and suavity of the scherzo were astutely balanced; while the swirling pace, the light sure touch, the sheer tonal gayety of the flying finale were winged with the speed, certainty and shimmer that were accounted feats under the last preceding régime. Others, it now appears, may likewise accomplish them. Throughout, moreover, while Mr. Monteux never "fussed" with minutiae, while he maintained in bright integrity the whole design and progress of a symphony that is music of dancing light and air, he let hardly a measure become the mere mechanism of getting forward. Now, it is possible, in the vernacular of one of the youth of Cambridge, to make the Beethoven of the Society of the Concerts of the Conservatory "sound like twenty-three cents" and by our own orchestra among our own people.

Absence has altered Mr. Hofmann as man only in the grizzling of his hair and a somewhat less forbidding manner toward his audience. As pianist it has deepened or refined the attributes that distinguish him even among his few peers. His concerto—Chopin's in E minor—is music of which he, like other finely tempered pianists, is continuously fond; but in which hearers have been known to take less pleasure. Years of devotion to the concerto—to discover its very voice, to find the true mould and color for its every phrase, the true pace and contour for its every progression—now make it sound as more than half Mr. Hofmann's own. Under his hand the familiar ennui of the first movement vanish; Chopin no longer cramps himself through formal processes, seeks to give the music a body and stride alien to him. Instead, the listener hears the composer's manipulation of his melodies through the iridescent mantle of

Mr. Hofmann's tone when his touch is subtlety and surety themselves, when the half-tints of his palette seem inexhaustible, when each modulation seems as momentary divination. The largeness, the stateliness that Chopin sought in this "majestical" allegro, no pianist may wrap about it, but it is possible to robe it in the grace of line, the loveliness of color that Mr. Hofmann now lays upon it. So again with the instrumental song of the middle movement. Admittedly, it is of Chopin near to sentimentality; but, as Mr. Hofmann plays it, to sweetness the pianist adds light. The music undulates at his studious and intuitive hand as with impulses of musing fancy or shimmers with the color that imagination glimpses and Hofmannesque fingers bring to light, while, as always with the pianist in such music continence guides felicity. In the final rondo, Mr. Hofmann's tone was all lightness and brightness; his pace, his rhythm of air when it plays with fire. He drove the orchestra and the discerning and sympathetic Monteux as in silken reins with silken lash. Their twin fires seemed to melt the music into new euphonies. . . . The public cared not a whit for the quarrel that long estranged Mr. Hofmann and the Symphony Orchestra. It cares much for a pianist who can so transfigure his music.

JOSEF HOFMANN FAMOUS AT TEN

Herald — Nov. 10/18

It was 31 years ago this November that Josef Hofmann, the famous Polish pianist, who is appearing at concerts of early dates in America this season, was first heard in this country. Hofmann had his 41st birthday on the 20th of last June. Born at Cracow, Poland, he came to this country when a very young boy and straightway proceeded to astonish his audiences wherever he played by his fine pianistic performance as also by his extraordinary power for extemporizing upon themes given him at random from those among his hearers who had an inspiration he was all in all pronounced a boy prodigy.

It was now that Mr. Gerry, the head of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, came forward and succeeded in the face of public opposition in having him withdrawn from the concert field. After this time, by means of the patronage of a certain wealthy man, Hofmann went back to Europe and engaged in further musical study, which lasted for some 10 years or more.

Josef Hofmann.

The boy artist made his first appearance in this country at New York on Nov. 29, 1887, in an orchestral concert with Adolf Neuendorff, conductor. He played Beethoven's concerto No. 1, and the Weber-Liszt polacca and as solos Rameau's Variations, his own Berceuse and waltz and a Chopin nocturne. After this concert a well known music critic wrote of him as follows:

"Josef Hofmann is a little over 10 years of age. He appeared on the stage last evening in a blue and gray striped sailor shirt, knee breeches and stockings, and looked, if anything, younger than he is. The audience was plainly surprised at his appearance and a general exclamation resulted. The little fellow surprised many in another way.

He had none of the attenuated physical appearance which often accompanies early development of the brain. He was in looks a bright, healthy, strong, normal boy, with sturdy legs and arms.

"When he played the Beethoven concerto a thunder of applause swept through the house. Many people leaped to their feet. Men shouted 'Bravo!' and women waved their handkerchiefs. Pianists of repute were moved almost to tears. Some wiped the moisture from their eyes. The child had astonished the assembly. He was a marvel."

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1918-19.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

HENRI RABAUD, Conductor.

THIRD PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 15, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 16, AT 8 P. M.

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY No. 3, in E flat major, "Eroica," op. 55

- I. Allegro con brio
- II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai
- III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace; Trio
- IV. Finale: Allegro molto

SAINT-SAËNS,

SYMPHONIC POEM, No. 4, op. 50. "La Jeunesse d'Hercule," ("The Youth of Hercules")

RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF, CAPRICE on Spanish Themes, op. 34

- I. Alborada
 - II. Variations
 - III. Alborada
 - IV. Scene and Gypsy Song
 - V. Fandango of the Asturias
- (Played without pause)

Josef Hofmann.

engaged in further musical study, which lasted for some 10 years or more.

The boy artist made his first appearance in this country at New York on Nov. 29, 1887, in an orchestral concert with Adolf Neuendorff, conductor. He played Beethoven's concerto No. 1, and the Weber-Liszt polacca and as solos Rameau's Variations, his own Berceuse and waltz and a Chopin nocturne. After this concert a well known music critic wrote of him as follows:

"Josef Hofmann is a little over 10 years of age. He appeared on the stage last evening in a blue and gray striped sailor shirt, knee breeches and stockings, and looked, if anything, younger than he is. The audience was plainly surprised at his appearance and a general exclamation resulted. The little fellow surprised many in another way. He had none of the attenuated physical appearance which often accompanies early development of the brain. He was in looks a bright, healthy, strong, normal boy, with sturdy legs and arms. "When he played the Beethoven concerto a thunder of applause swept through the house. Many people leaped to their feet. Men shouted 'Bravo!' and women waved their handkerchiefs. Pianists of repute were moved almost to tears. Some wiped the moisture from their eyes. The child had astonished the assembly. He was a marvel."

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1918--19.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

HENRI RABAUD, Conductor.

THIRD PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 15, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 16, AT 8 P. M.

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY No. 3, in E flat major, "Eroica," op. 55

- I. Allegro con brio
- II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai
- III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace; Trio
- IV. Finale: Allegro molto

SAINT-SAENS,

SYMPHONIC POEM, No. 4, op. 50. "La Jeunesse d'Hercule," ("The Youth of Hercules")

RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF, CAPRICE on Spanish Themes, op. 34

- I. Alborada
 - II. Variations
 - III. Alborada
 - IV. Scene and Gypsy Song
 - V. Fandango of the Asturias
- (Played without pause)

SYMPHONY UNDER NEW CONDUCTOR

Post — Nov. 15/18
Mr. Rabaud Makes First Formal Bow
in Cambridge

BY OLIN DOWNES

Henri Rabaud, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season of 1918-19, made his first formal appearance before an American audience at the Symphony concert given last night in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge. His programme, part of which will be repeated this afternoon in Symphony Hall, consisted of compositions tried and true, compositions with which Symphony audiences are familiar—the Beethoven of the Eroica symphony, Cesar Franck's "Les Eolides," Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. Mme. Merle Alcock, contralto, was soloist, singing the "Ombra mai fu" of Handel, otherwise known as the "Largo," and the familiar song of Daulah from the second act of Saint-Saens' opera.

STANDS ACID TEST

Though evidently not a man of self-assertive qualities, Mr. Rabaud is none the less a striking personality, tall, of distinguished bearing, dignified without stiffness, a conductor of experience and authority, who obtains the effects he requires none the less surely despite his modest bearing and his undemonstrative manner. If the reading of the orchestral pieces heard last night is an index of his abilities in works demanding a greater range of style than those of yesterday evening, it may be said that the Boston Symphony audiences are again very fortunate in their orchestra leader.

Mr. Rabaud's reading of Beethoven's heroic work was both virile and poetic, thoroughly in the classic spirit, yet not slavishly subservient to tradition, evidently the result of profound study and an equally profound sincerity. Of such a symphony one neither expects nor desires a "new" reading. If the conductor is a musician of calibre sufficient to transmit the gigantic spirit of a Beethoven, there is no more to ask. If he accomplishes this, not merely with objective fidelity to his task, but with a burning conviction, and the love of every tone and every phrase of the work evident on the part of Mr. Rabaud, his audience is more than fortunate.

Faithful to Beethoven

It may be added that whenever a musician is thoughtful and sincere, his interpretation, no matter how scrupulous in its regard for the composer's intention, will differ in detail if not in essentials from the interpretations of his colleagues. The differences between Mr. Rabaud's treatment of the symphony and the various achievements in it of his predecessors were not of a kind to detract from the interest and artistic quality of his accomplishment.

For one of these details we may be thankful indeed. That is, his reversal of the atrocious practice of Dr. Muck in using eight horns in the trio of the scherzo—a proceeding which made heavy and crude one of the most poetic effects in all Beethoven. Last night the modest and poetic orchestration of the master in this passage was restored, and welcome it was to the ear. The finale was particularly impressive. Seldom, indeed, has it been the writer's privilege to hear this movement interpreted with so much vividness, plasticity, and clearness and coherency of detail. Notable was the mysterious announcement of the theme, the interest and tonal beauty of individual parts, the humor, tender, and colossal strength felt in the whole movement.

Mme. Alcock's Singing

The interpretation of Franck's piece was not naturally very different from Mr. Monteux's conducting of the same work, as shown at a recent symphony concert. But what a charming work it is! What a bossamer web of tone; how sensitive the harmonic scheme; how sensuous and tender the themes! An occasional Wagnerism scarcely de-from the exquisite originality and visibility of this music. Between these pieces and the overture which brought the concert to an end, Mme. Alcock delighted the audience with the rich and beautiful quality of her voice. She might have sung Dalilah's air with more abandon, but she could scarcely have bestowed upon this air a quality of tone more ideally suited to the character of the music. Nor did she lack appreciation of the long breath of Handel's superb air.

Euryanthe Made Youthful

There are those who would retire the Weber of the Euryanthe overture to the dust-bin. But Weber is not so easily retired, even when he indulges in the stock theatrical flourishes which open the "Euryanthe" overture. That overture is valuable today, if only for the romantic middle portion, the music which paints a supernatural scene of the drama that follows its performance in the theatre. Mr. Rabaud reminded the audience very forcibly of these things. The "Euryanthe" overture might have been composed yesterday, to judge by the fresh enthusiasm, the gallant, youthful spirit with which the conductor performed the work.

Bear in mind that this vigorous spirit, this heartfelt understanding of the German romanticism of Weber came from a French conductor, a representative of the school traditionally, and probably quite wrongly, considered incapable of entering thoroughly into the spirit of German music. The playing of the middle portion of the overture is not to be readily forgotten. It was testimony equally to the imagination and musicianship of the leader.

The audience responded heartily to Mr. Rabaud's efforts, and he was repeatedly recalled after the symphony and at the end of the concert. In Beethoven, in Franck, in Weber, he gave abundant promise of an interesting symphony season.

In a Third Trial, the New Conductor of the Symphony Orchestra Betters Both the First and the Second—The Pianist in Full, Free and Fine Play of His Distinctive Qualities Before a Rapt Audience—Pieces and Performance

Trans. Nov. 18/18
THOSE whom it may interest to follow the progress of a new conductor with orchestra and public have the opportunity of years, here in Boston, in the present evolution of Mr. Rabaud. One or two of his predecessors at the Symphony Concerts have come, seen and conquered from their first appearance at Symphony Hall. One or two more have been easily appraised on that occasion and in the course of longer or shorter stay little altered general or particular judgment of their abilities. In contrast, alike with his band, his audience and himself, Mr. Rabaud seems to advance from concert to concert. He was, for example, well received at Cambridge last Thursday evening, when he led for the first time on this side of the Atlantic; he was more warmly applauded on Friday afternoon at his first concert in Boston; while on Saturday evening his third audience outdid the other two in cordiality toward the man and approval of the conductor. Possibly, the fact that the company of Saturday contains not a few of the more zealous advocates of a new régime at Symphony Hall accounts for some of this energy of welcoming applause; but the larger part of the assembly, long aloof from these old controversies, joined in it hardly less heartily. Again, at the end of the concert, the audience deferred its usual speedy departure until it had insistently and twice recalled Mr. Rabaud. It is hard to remember when a new conductor at the Symphony Concerts has been so well assured, at the outset of the good will of his hearers.

The reaction to this atmosphere, increasing familiarity with the orchestra in public performance and waxing, but still modest, confidence in himself were plain in the manner and the work of the new conductor on Saturday. He led with more exactness of beat, more energy of personal will, more resort to the vigorous gesture that commands a stroke or enjoins a mood than he had at either of the preceding concerts. Again he built climaxes in the large, suspensive, operatic fashion that his way with orchestra and music had suggested at Cambridge; again he was skillful and stirring in the manipulation of long tonal gradients; but more than hitherto he gained a frequent incisiveness of detail and a pervading fire of performance. It is the connoisseurs of symphonic music and the performance thereof who have seemed most cool toward Mr. Rabaud; while the miscellaneous public of the Symphony Concerts has quickly warmed to him. Yet those connoisseurs must have noted with pleasure, the skill with which, on Saturday, he maintained the Lisztian scheme, the Lisztian progressions and sonorities of Saint-Saëns's tone-poem, "The Death of Hercules," yet set upon them the distinctive niceties and exactitudes of reflective, polished Parisian workmanship. With equal satisfaction, they must have noted likewise the elasticity of pace and rhythm, the warm yet transparent tonal coloring that he and the orchestra lent to Rimsky-Korsakov's pseudo-Spanish music. The end of Mr. Rabaud's "debuts," as his own Parisians say, crowned them.

NEW CONDUCTOR WARMLY APPLAUDED

Rabaud Leads Orchestra at First Concert Here

Globe Nov. 17/18
Henri Rabaud made his first appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concert yesterday afternoon. He was received with increasing favor by the audience as the program advanced, at his entrance, after the "Eroica" symphony, when he shared the applause with the players, and finally by repeated recalls to the platform after a brilliant performance of Rimsky-Korsakov's Caprice on Spanish Themes.

To the eye, the new conductor, whom Paris knew for seven years at the Opera, who for the last four visited neutral and allied capitals as a "guest," might be the scholar, the man of letters absorbed in research or in his library, urbane in bearing, with the casual marks of an instinctive rather than an acquired or assumed gentility, but by choice evading rather than courting public demonstration.

Tall, slender, hair and beard moderately tinged with gray, his manner has a certain distinction of the old school in a quiet dignity blended with elegance. Some may have missed something of authority in the opening movement of the symphony. The performance of it was not as impressive as that of Thursday night at Cambridge, nor Mr. Rabaud as much at his ease, but with later movements, the refined mind, the characteristically Gallic love of clearness and precision, the respect for form and tradition, without ossifying or academic sterility, marked his interpretation and were made known to the orchestra with a well-defined beat and a pantomime conforming to the mood.

The symphony, noble in content and architecture, bears now a curious analogy and pertinence to the time. There are the sufficient proofs of Beethoven's admiration for Napoleon Bonaparte, "the enemy of Kings," his anger upon hearing that the conqueror had had himself declared Emperor, and at Napoleon's death his reported remark about the prophetic funeral march. The two middle movements in particular were beautifully done yesterday. The trio of the scherzo, scored for three horns, for the first time here in recent years, was played by three.

Mr. Rabaud, who had been with his orchestra but the four mornings of this week, showed an admirable plasticity and sense of color in the more modern music — Saint-Saëns' "Youth of Hercules" and the Rimsky-Korsakov. For some, the intoxicating rhythm of the second number of the suite is better found at a tempo less slow, but this gorgeous, sensuous score, with its unvarnished folk flavor, found Mr. Rabaud sympathetic and the orchestra euphonious and inspiring. In all Mr. Rabaud's grateful manifestations his talent as conductor was reassuring and of true promise, and on a day when his opera, "Marouf," was performed at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York for the first time this season.

CONDUCTS HIS FIRST CONCERT

Mr. Rabaud Is Warmly Greeted by Large Audi- ence at Symphony

DIGNITY, BREADTH TO INTERPRETATIONS

Herald Nov. 16, 1918
By PHILIP HALE

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Henri Rabaud conducted for the first time a symphony concert in Boston. The program was as follows: Beethoven, "Eroica" symphony; Saint-Saëns, "The Youth of Hercules"; Rimsky-Korsakov, Caprice on Spanish Themes.

The selection of the symphony was fortunate, not merely because Beethoven had in mind Napoleon, the Consul, the enemy of kings, the young liberator, but also by reason of its mighty funeral march, a heroic lamentation over heroes slain in defence of freedom, a lamentation in which there is exultation even in grief. That Beethoven erased the name of Bonaparte on the title page when he learned that the conqueror had declared himself Emperor only enlarges the significance of the symphony in this week of worldwide tumultuous rejoicing.

It was a pleasure to hear the symphonic poem of Saint-Saëns again. It had not been performed at these concerts for over 13 years. May we not hope to hear the "Phaeton" of this composer, a symphonic poem that has not been played since 1899? "Le Rouet d'Omphale" and "Danse Macabre" would also be welcome. For in his symphonic poems, Saint-Saens is not mastered by his subject; he does not take it too seriously; one might even see him smiling ironically on hearing his own music. Anatole France might have written the three symphonic poems with mythological subjects if he had turned composer. Hercules had his choice, according to Prodicus and other men of wisdom: Pleasure or Virtue. Ten to one, Saint-Saens wrote the prose argument of this composition with his tongue in his cheek, saying to himself, "The apparition and the seductive words of Pleasure will give me opportunity for a riotously voluptuous Bacchanale; I must not make the music of Virtue too austere." He wrote in the spirit that moved him to take the part of Calchas when Regnault, the painter, played Helen in Offenbach's delightful "La Belle Helene." These symphonic poems are admirable if only for the absence of any attempt at interlinear translation of fable into music. They are not too programmatic. As absolute music they are characterized by Gallic clarity and logic. The effects are gained by an economy of means, as Marshal Foch understands the secret of warfare. Now that Saint-Saens is over 80, he is a reactionary, which might be pardoned if one did not remember that Verdi was 80 when "Falstaff" was produced. In his days of brilliant productiveness Saint-Saens was reproached by his countrymen for his modernism strongly tinged with German flavoring extracts. In 1918 he looks askance at Debussy and Ravel, and even at Cesar Franck, and is loud in his praise of Mendelssohn. Does he regret his own symphonic poems?

Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice" is music of a Russian thinking of Spain rather than living there, observing the wild dancing of the gypsy girls, shouting "Ole" in his delirious joy. There is much more of Spain in Chabrier's "Espana," Debussy's "Night in Seville" and "Iberia," Laparra's "Il Habanera." There are a few glowing pages in the Russian's score; there are many that are perfunctorily Spanish, some that are only thunderous platitudes.

Mr. Rabaud, who was greeted heartily by the large audience, conducted in a manner that at once inspired confidence in his ability. He has dignity and poise without being rigid and academic. His beat is singularly decisive; his gestures have interpretative significance. One might say, after this concert, that he takes a broad view of a composition, catches the pervading spirit, is not anxious over details that are unessential. In nearly every elaborate composition there are measures of padding. This padding may be sonorous, euphonious; but it should not be emphasized; otherwise continuity may be checked and that which is really important lose vital meaning. Mr. Rabaud gave a sound, impressive reading of the symphony, for he let Beethoven have his own way. In Saint-Saens's symphonic poem he showed a fine sense of proportion and dynamic contrasts. The interpretation was poetic; it was dramatic, not theatrical. Rimsky-Korsakoff's music was strongly rhythmed, read with fire and abandon. The audience was enthusiastic throughout the concert. The orchestra, whose performance was of the traditional high standard, and the city of Boston may well plume themselves on having secured the services of this conductor.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, Grieg's Pianoforte Concerto (Mme. Samaroff, pianist), Saint-Saens's Symphony No. 3, with organ.

Rabaud's Debut in Symphony a Success

adv. + am. Nov. 17/18

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

PROGRAM.

Beethoven—Heroic Symphony.
St. Saens—"Youth of Hercules," Symphonic Poem.
Rimski-Korsakoff—Spanish Caprice.

NOT a very remarkable program for our orchestral series. Can it be that M. Rabaud, the new conductor, thinks us provincial compared with Paris? But each one of the new Frenchmen, Monteux, Messager and Rabaud, have played Beethoven as their trump card at each of their debuts, and, therefore, it is possible that they assume the interpretation of this master to be the touchstone of directorial ability.

And Beethoven's Heroic Symphony fits well to the present times, for it was the composer's cry for Liberty, and he pictures his hero, in the first movement, as pulling down all kinds of tyrants, and M. Rabaud demolished them with sufficient emphasis. The new conductor was received with the wildest Boston enthusiasm, and those who think the Boston audiences frigid ought to attend the orchestral concerts this season.

M. Rabaud began well. He made an excellent impression at this concert.

Even "The Star Spangled Banner" went more broadly and less sentimentally than it has recently been done, and, by the way, the removal of that banner from the middle of the hall was an acoustical necessity. The resonance is better with the flag placed against a wall.

M. Rabaud read the Heroic symphony in a sensible, well-balanced and unaffected manner. This was very evident in the first movement. The Funeral March, no matter how well interpreted, is too long. Beethoven was altogether too prolix in the planting of his hero, but thanks to the conservative conductor there was no sentimentality exhibited in the movement, and the oboe playing was especially exquisite. Coleridge called this "A funeral in purple," and that best describes its earnest vein. The horns did good work in the next movement, and the final variations were given with superb ensemble. M. Rabaud was applauded to the echo after this excellent reading of a great work.

St. Saens' views about Hercules as a young man have not led to his greatest music, but we are glad to see that all of the French newcomers give this sterling composer a good place upon their programs. St. Saens is an adept at modern scoring without indulging in too much bigness, he is always intelligible, his musical architecture does not run to the crazy-quilt style and he does not discard pleasant melody. We predict that in the music of the near future tune will come back into music again, and we agree with St. Saens' own recent saying, "Music is sick"—at least at present.

We can recall performances of this work under Gerike when the music was taken too gently to portray the champion heavy-weight of Olympus. In these performances, of last Friday and yesterday, there was more of power and it fitted well to the subject. It would be easy to sketch a story to the music. Hercules is a young man, enters college and is admitted to the "Dickey" Club at Harvard because of his athletic capabilities. A lively drinking theme pictures the young hero going over the bridge to take up an extra chemistry course at the Parker house. Tinkle of triangle and cymbals picture the return (2 a. m.) heavily loaded with chemicals. In the Scherzando, which might be called "At Play," Hercules holds two horns. In the draw he gets two more and a bugle. He wins, of course, four horns against a small pair of oboes. A subsequent minor passage may portray a later interview with the dean.

Seriously, however, this symphonic poem is a portrayal of a struggle between virtue and vice, a topic which Wagner has set forth with tremendously greater power in the "Tannhaeuser Overture." M. Rabaud exhibited commendable abandon in this work and had the elasticity required by its rhapsodical character. The piccolo did some good work in the "Path of Pleasure" portion; vice and the piccolo always go hand in hand; and there were also some stirring climaxes, of which the conductor made the most.

The concert ended with Rimski-Korsakoff. By the way, a pupil of this composer once told the present writer that he always accented the next to last syllable of his name, which is against the statement of the musical dictionaries. The caprice is a good deal more truly Spanish than the recent Spanish concert of M. Laparra was. Extremes meet, and the Russians and Scandinavians seem to catch up the Spanish swing readily. Not only are the Spanish rhythms well carried out, but there is a piquancy in the scoring that gives an agreeable and fitting spiciness to the subject. The work contains some fine obligato work for solo violin, clarinette and for harp, and these were especially well done. The reading of the caprice was commendable, and M. Rabaud caught up its spirit finely. We enjoy this caprice more thoroughly with repeated hearings. Its spicy contrasts, its rhythmic dance effects, and its theatrical climaxes are all calculated to arouse the public and certainly did so on this occasion.

Altogether then, M. Rabaud has made a very successful debut. He is graphic and decisive in his beat and gestures, has sufficient freedom in his interpretation, is by no means as operative in orchestral work as we had feared, and evidently has correct ideas about the length of the program. A good acquisition with which musical Boston may be heartily satisfied.

We may end with a mention of Mr. Mudgett's concert of a week ago. It brought us Senor De Gogorza, the favorite baritone, but we desire especially to mention Miss Rosita Renard, the Chilean pianist, who is likely to replace the great Teresa Carreno, who was also a South American. Miss Renard is the most promising female pianist that we have heard in a long time. She has both technique and temperament and will win a high place among the pianists of today.

AMAROFF

anoforte used

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

QUICK, WARM, PUBLIC FAVOR FOR

MR. RABAUD

Trans. — Nov. 16, 1918
A Pleased Audience and a Responsive Orchestra Answer to the New Conductor — His Bettered Beethoven of the "Eroica" Symphony — Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice" for Display — Timely and Agreeable Revival from Saint-Saëns

HERE is no mistaking the favor that Mr. Rabaud has quickly won with the public of the Symphony Orchestra. It was manifest in the concert of Thursday evening at Cambridge; under more auspicious circumstances and with more justifying reason, it was plain in the concert of yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. The audience of Friday received the new conductor with applause that seemed to signify not only kindly courtesy but warm expectation. It answered to his leading and the playing of the orchestra in the first movement of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, as with anticipation fulfilled. It was hardly less responsive after the Funeral March and the scherzo, while at the end of the finale, it recalled Mr. Rabaud once, twice and thrice, swelling the plaudits when at length he stood with the band standing around him. The succeeding piece, Saint-Saëns's tone-poem, "The Youth of Hercules," heard for the first time in thirteen years "at these concerts" gave little less pleasure, reaped only little less applause. Then ensued that pictorial and plangent, ornate and dazzling orchestral show-piece, Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice," and so pleased with music and performance were the hearers that they would not depart until their clapping had twice summoned Mr. Rabaud back to the stage. As at Cambridge, his programme was neither too short, nor too long; while the light pieces filling the second half of it, were much to the audience's liking. Throughout the orchestra was more on its mettle than it had been, than perhaps it could be, in the chilly concert-room of Sanders Theatre; at every turn it served the conductor well. In the intermission and at the end of the concert, the corridors buzzed with praise; and those in particular who cherish memories of Mr. Paur and Mr. Fiedler were warm with it. In fine, all things worked together for good. Mr. Rabaud could hardly have had a more auspicious debut.

More confident of himself, more at ease with his orchestra, quietly kindled, doubtless, by the new occasion, the conductor was more eloquent with Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony than he had been the evening before at Cambridge. He led his band with more energy and elasticity of spirit as well as with new vigor of gesture; while it returned a warmer and more euphonious tone, a more songful voice, a livelier rhythmic accent. Again it phrased sensitively, sensuously; again it was pliant and responsive. In turn, Mr. Rabaud was less concerned with the large manipulation of tonal masses; became more assiduous with luminous and finely moulded detail, gave heed to the contour as well as to the content of the symphony. The first movement gained richness of voice and plasticity of progress; the long, melodic line in which Mr. Rabaud now shaped the slow movement, the warm expansion of phrase into phrase, the grave lucidity in which he clothed the whole music, pleased ear, mind, imagination as with the voice of Beethoven. The scherzo may have lacked the characteristic Beethovenish brusqueness; but it was good to hear it so light-footedly. The finale, in turn, was crisp with rhythmic life and the contrast of the variations, while at need it marched with becomingly joyous tumult. Discerningly, Mr. Rabaud differentiated the Beethoven writing in the first two movements a music fraught with feeling and the Beethoven who fashioned the last two in sheer exuberance of ardent music-making. Throughout the conductor was the transparent and painstaking medium of the composer. If the symphony came to the ear otherwise uncolored by the personality of the leader, the listener heard the "Eroica" symphony neither in angular over-elaboration, nor in easy-going carelessness. Mr. Rabaud thinks of Beethoven before he thinks of himself.

Possibly a new conductor and in some degree a new orchestra might advisedly have waited a month or two before they essayed Rimsky-Korsakov's displayful "Spanish Caprice." Once more in the abundance of cadenzas for single or for paired instruments, Mr. Holy at the harp, Mr. Sand at the clarinet, indeed the whole wood-wind choir, less, perhaps, the first flute, renewed a vivid and familiar virtuosity; while in the recurring measures for solo violin Mr. Fradkin gave such proof of the brightness and the fineness of his tone, the warmth of his phrasing and the zest of his rhythm as he used to do when he sat in the orchestra of the Russian Ballet. Of course, Mr. Rabaud caught the clamorous rush of the repeated serenade that must have riven the Spanish dawn; the rhythmic fervors of the final fan-dango; the contrasts of the variations; the fitfulness of the gypsy tune when once the successive cadenzas have set it free. So far, indeed, music and conductor carry each other in mutual reaction upon a gradually excited audience. On the other hand, it is possible to make this "Spanish Caprice" a very kaleidoscope of tones, whirling as it were from shape to shape yet endlessly flashing with Rimsky-Korsakov's dexterity and imagination with instrumental timbres. So viewed the playing of the piece did not lack ardor; it did lack fine distinctions. More than usual the listener felt the conventional matter of the music in contrast with the invention of the workmanship. Ravel and Laparra hearing music of Spain had tarnished many a platitude that Rimsky-Korsakov prefers to burnish with the magic of his instrumental color.

With reason Mr. Rabaud seems to be on the way to restore the tone-poems of Saint-Saëns's prime to the active repertory of the Symphony Concerts. More, probably, by chance than by design, they have fallen from it, until just desert as well as the exigencies of the lingering wartime hour are bringing them back again. Under the test of yesterday, when "The Youth of Hercules" sounded almost like a new piece, the tone-poem disclosed not a few of Saint-Saëns's characteristic virtues. The design of the piece stood clear as the day—the measures that bear the grave incitements of Virtue to the musing hero; the contrasting measures in which Pleasure trips and tinkles; the return of the voice of Virtue, first assertive, finally triumphant. Not for nothing has Saint-Saëns in these seventies when he was still open-minded and fertile, heard the overture to "Tannhäuser" or perused the symphonic poems of Liszt. Yet his own piece is Gallic in tonal logic, tonal symmetry, the even progress of musical and (in this instance) moral idea. Again, how appropriate the motives whence the music springs, winning the mind by fitness, providing neither too much nor too little stimulation to the attendant fancy. Finally, how poised, how adroit the workmanship. Not an inflection is wasted; not a note is in the wrong place; not a jointure is rough-edged; every harmony, progression, play of color is polished, but seldom into sandpapered lifelessness. In the completeness of the whole, almost, is its beauty. Such music, moreover, lies as completely within Mr. Rabaud's powers, so far as two concerts have disclosed them. He was luminous, flowing, apt and elegant as Saint-Saëns himself. More than once, indeed, he and his orchestra refined upon refinement.

H. T. P.

MUSIC IN BOSTON

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor
Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud conductor, third program of thirty-eighth season, Boston, Mass., afternoon of Nov. 15, 1918. The program: Beethoven, Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, Op. 55; Saint-Saëns, "La Jeunesse d'Hercule" ("The Youth of Hercules") symphonic poem, No. 4, Op. 50; Rimsky-Korsakov, Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34.

BOSTON, Massachusetts — Henri Rabaud, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was formally introduced this week to his publics hereabouts, first at the concert of the orchestra in Cambridge on Thursday evening, and next day at the regular Friday afternoon concert in Boston. There can be no doubt of the immediate favor into which the new conductor has sprung. As he came on the stage he was warmly greeted and at the close of the concert the audience remained to applaud.

There is justification for this favor. No such performance of the "Eroica" symphony has been heard here for many years. The first feeling was one of nobility and grandeur, then came a realization of the wonderful richness of color, and lastly grew the impression—and this was the one that remained strongest—of a correct perspective, an intricate estimate of phrases and configurations, each with its proper stress. So in the Saint-Saëns tone poem of the young Hercules, that strange mixture of classic and romantic, depending on an emphasis of its contrasts to hold attention. So also in the gorgeously colored Spanish Caprice of Rimsky-Korsakov, music that fires conductor, players and audience alike. In all of these—and what a program it was!—Mr. Rabaud's scholarship, tempered with the fervor the music demanded, was clearly dominant. All this, of course, stamps him as a different sort of leader altogether from what Boston has been accustomed to. Mention has been made in these columns of the emancipation of the orchestra from a machine and its endowment with a humanity that has previously been in abeyance. It is evident that Mr. Rabaud is to have a considerable part in this humanizing process. No one can question his authority or his scholarship; there is also present in his work the courage to feel the emotion of the work he is interpreting and the ability to convey the feeling to his listeners.

As he stands on the platform he is tall, gaunt and a trifle stiff. The stiffness disappears, however, as he takes up the baton, to be reassumed as he lays it down. His beat is decisive, easy to follow and authoritative. Body, head and legs as well as hands and eyes, are used to control the players and to get effects. The austerity of his appearance belies the strength of feeling underlying, but insures that there will be no turbid emotionalism in his work. Altogether there was good reason for the favor with which Mr. Rabaud was received in Boston.

At the concert in Cambridge on Thursday night, the soloist was the contralto of luscious voice, Mrs. Merle Alcock, who sang to the great pleasure of the audience the familiar air from Handel's opera "Xerxes" and the equally familiar passage from Saint-Saëns' "Samson and Delilah." Here Mr. Rabaud proved himself a true accompanist, for the orchestra, adequately supporting and encouraging, never overshadowed the singer.

In the concert at Symphony Hall, on Sunday, Nov. 10, Emilio de Gogorza, baritone, and Rosita Renard, pianist, shared the honors. Mr. de Gogorza gave a varied but well-selected program designed to show the versatility and technical perfection of his art. Miss Renard's numbers ranged from Mendelssohn to Debussy and Albeniz, with mastery of technique, with intellectual and emotional power. Nov. 16, 1918

MR. RABAUD CONDUCTS

Trans. — Nov. 15/18
A "Trial Heat" at Cambridge Last Evening for the New Leader of the Symphony Orchestra in Preparation for the Concerts in Boston—Warm Applause and Many a Token of an Excellent and Pleasurable Ability

CONDUCTING in public for the first time on this side of the Atlantic at the concert of the Symphony Orchestra last evening in Cambridge, Mr. Rabaud was exceedingly well received. Susceptible and well disposed as always, the audience applauded him heartily when he first came to the stage and listened intently when he and the band set to Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. At the end of each movement, it renewed its clapping more and more heartily, until at the end of the music, it had recalled him once or twice to the stage. The plaudits were hardly less when he and the orchestra had made their way through Franck's tone-poem of "The Daughters of Æolus" and Weber's familiar overture to his opera of "Euryanthe." Perhaps, even, a little of the applause that fell to the singer of the evening Mme. Alcock, after airs from Handel's "Xerxes" and Saint-Saëns's "Samson" belonged of right to Mr. Rabaud. For as practised operatic conductor of the orthodox Parisian school, he was consideration itself for her. Not once did the orchestra cover her tones; in pace, in phrasing, in accent, it was deferentially at one with her. By every sign of last evening, Mr. Rabaud, unlike his more masterful and dominating predecessor from Berlin, will be a favorite with the "soloists" at the Symphony Concerts. Nor could the reactionary cavil at his programme. It filled almost to a minute the accustomed hour and three-quarters; no Debussy, no Dukas, no Ravel, no Loeffler tainted it with that "modernism" which, even though it come from Paris, is vexation to so many well-meaning but much-enduring souls of the concert-room. Classic and perennial Beethoven, mellifluous Handel, good old Weber, Saint-Saëns, in the long, sliding, sensuous, altogether Itallante curves of Delilah's wooings of her Hebrew Hercules, a Franck innocuous filled it. O, terque quaterque beatus, the regular thing in the regular way. No wonder Mr. Rabaud made good impression in what in racing phrase was his "trial heat."

On the conductor's stand before an audience, in the practice of his profession, Mr. Rabaud is a much more worldly and human figure than he seemed when he sat, as often of late, a mere listener before the orchestra he was soon to lead. Evening clothes become him as they have not every conductor upon the stage of Symphony Hall or Sanders Theatre. Unmistakably, he has what the dialect of the concert-room about conductors calls "A good back." He carries himself unaffectedly and well and his gaunt figure pulls itself together, gains dignity, when it is poised as it were between orchestra and audience. Contrary to mistaken report there is hardly a trace of physical extravagance in his conducting. Occasionally he taps with his foot after the manner of the departed Fiedler but not so audibly; once or twice in the evening, he crouched a little as one about to spring for the desired effect; but for the most part he was calm authority (as the word is) itself. His beat, so far as a single concert disclosed it, has no salient quality. It is not graceful and elegant like Mr. Messenger's, insistent like Mr. Monteux's or exact and goading as was Dr. Muck's. It is a simple beat, so to say; uncommonly sparing in indication of effect as distinguished from pace and rhythm. Yet the orchestra seems readily to follow and obey it. Mr. Messenger, for contrast, was the man of the world who happens to be conductor by profession. Mr. Rabaud is the musician who devotedly pursues a chosen branch of his calling.

As with Mr. Monteux, the listener readily perceives Mr. Rabaud's operatic antecedents. He has no such passion for tonal design, for the exploiting and the sustaining of tonal outline, however various the accent, however rich the color, however ardent the mood, as used, for example, to preoccupy Dr. Muck. He lacks as clearly the zest for the momentarily revealed, the artfully moulded detail that often possessed Mr. Monteux. Nor, as yet, being relatively unacquainted with his orchestra, has he developed that conductor's fastidious ear for quality of instrumental tone, for fine and artful euphonies. Throughout Beethoven's symphony, he sought and gained the large outline, the ample contracts, the projecting force, the direct effect upon ear and upon emotions, of masses of tone largely assembled and manipulated, of ascendant and impinging climaxes that plainly disclosed a conductor versed in the music-dramas of Wagner. Like most French conductors, in contrast with German, he tended to brisk pace, notably in the first and the last movement of Beethoven's symphony; while not once did he fall prey to the easy temptation to drag the slow movement. In all that he does, Mr. Rabaud does not lack a quick spirit. He would keep the music that he undertakes in motion large and sweeping, rather than finely undulant. He knows well the art of quickening long, ascendant progressions until they begin to play upon the hearer's nerves; he sustains rhythm; he is less disposed to would his phrases into sensuous beauty for its own sake than to give them character as he did with the wisp-like bursts of Franck's music for the breezes of Æolus. It was easier to admire his sprightly accentuation of Beethoven's scherzo than the quality of song or of tone that he—or the horns for him—infused into the intervening trio.

Least of all did Mr. Rabaud seem last evening a cerebral, an analytical conductor, bent upon the formal outline, the abstract musical content, the intellectual process and the minutæ of the pieces in hand. On the contrary, he "read" them altogether straight forwardly, opening their lain content to the ear, the fancy the emotions of the hearer, singing unaffectedly with the composer, marching as honestly with him, bringing off his strokes, projecting his effects whole-heartedly upon a stirred and sympathetic audience. As it is always possible to imagine "Aida," for example, better sung than by his particular singing-players in presence, so it is always possible to believe that Franck's tone-poem of the winds should move lighter-footed and sound more like to a music of the air than somehow any performance hereabouts from Gericke through Muck and Monteux to Rabaud has made it. Yet perhaps the shortcoming is Franck's rather than conductor's, since between the beginning and the end in those wisp-like phrases that are like shreds of flying alabaster, he has written a deal of more energetic concert-room filling. Those first, those last measures, Mr. Rabaud achieved with no little sensibility and plasticity. Between he was as conventional as the composer. On the other hand, in the overture to "Euryanthe" Mr. Rabaud was the operatic conductor taking and distributing the pleasures of his calling. There the music was thick, songful, ardent of progress, plain of mood, void of contrast, "effective" from first measure to last. He and the orchestra with him made no effort to clarify, sharpen, illuminate and enrich it. They merely made it sound as though the ringing little auditorium of Sanders were the large dull spaces of an opera house. A public that there six years has not been quite pleased with the Symphony Concerts bids fair to rejoice in Mr. Rabaud.

Items and Announcements

Mme. Samaroff, the pianist, will be heard or the first time in many years with the Symphony Orchestra at the concerts of next week when she will play Grieg's concerto in A minor, nearly as long unknown to its programmes. Schubert's "unfinished" symphony will precede the concerto and Saint-Saëns's symphony with organ follow it.

Mr. Rabaud's music is clearly profiting by the presence of the composer in this country in so notable a post as that which he now occupies. The Chicago Orchestra will play his symphony in E minor next week; while the Metropolitan Opera House will reproduce his comedy of "Marouf," drawn from The Arabian Nights, though its public was none too interested in the piece last winter. H. T. P.

Steinway Pianoforte used

Boston Symphony's Director Far Excels Muck, Says Olin Downes

Post BY OLIN DOWNES Nov. 1918

Our New York brethren did not like either the tone quality or, particularly, the conducting of Mr. Monteux when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first New York concert of the season last Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall. Some people are hard to please. Mr. Hunkeler, now writing for the New York Times, had "the unmistakable sensation that the entire symphony of Franck was overblown." Mr. Henderson of the Sun found the reading of the same symphony "very vigorous, not to say robustious . . . deficient in delicate shades of color, insistent in style, overdrawn in most respects and sadly opaque in the treatment of the instrumental parts. All the crystalline clarity, the sunny tone quality and the exquisite precision of the old orchestra were missing."

"Exquisite precision!" But in none of the performances of the Franck's symphony by the Boston orchestra were the rhythmical accents of the string figures in the middle movement so inaccurate and smudged as they were under Karl Muck in his last seasons in Boston, while if Mr. Monteux's performance has had one inescapable characteristic it has been the precision of attack and of intonation—notoriously false under his predecessor of the different choirs.

Admitted that criticism is in large degree a matter of conditions attending particular performances, the temperament and esthetic standpoint of the critic, etc., we believe that the reviewers of this city, with one voice, would acclaim in Mr. Monteux these very qualities in which our colleagues profess to have found him lacking. Perhaps in Carnegie Hall, where the acoustics are doubtless different than in Symphony Hall, the orchestra sounded "opaque in the treatment of the instrumental parts," but surely Mr. Henderson would agree that the rich and sombre coloring of Franck's symphony is intentional on the part of the composer, and that the conductor should make an effort to reproduce this carefully contrived coloring in his performance.

Perhaps Mr. Monteux was in a tense mood when he conducted in New York, yet in view of the exquisite tone qualities of his performance here, and especially the roundness and glory of the brass tone, which contrasted so happily with the hard brilliancy to which

Dr. Muck was prone—remember the trumpet?—it is difficult to understand Mr. Hunkeler's impressions of a symphony "over-blown."

The Tribune did find, what Boston musicians, with practically one accord, agree on, that "Mr. Monteux has worked something like a miracle with the band" and that "in his new capacity he seemed as admirable as in that in which he had already won our admiration," meaning as French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House.

Are the gentlemen in New York still laboring under the mistake that conductors are born only in Germany? Or are ears and acoustics so different in different parts of the world that no scale of comparison can be instituted? Or did the Boston Symphony Orchestra, forgetful of its Puritan ideals, excited by the peace talk or the noise of the great city, go on a sudden tear and escape the control of that admirable musician, Mr. Monteux? Or is it merely the custom, which gossip says is immemorial, for the critics of the one city to contradict the critics of the other city, whatever the occasion or the subject? We in Boston confess that, while warmly welcoming Mr. Rabaud, we regret that Mr. Monteux, owing to the epidemic, was heard so little here. We find his conducting to be replete with "delicate shades of color," "crystalline clarity," "sunny tone quality," "exquisite precision." We feel that in these precious qualities he unites the temperament and imagination of a great musician.

War's Effects on Symphony Programs

Adv.

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

IN speaking of the new conductors of symphonic music in Boston, those that we have recently heard and the one whom we are to hear this week, very little has been said about their abilities as program-makers. It sometimes happens that we get a great conductor who seems not to have studied this essential part of concert-giving. Henschel was only moderate as a conductor when we had him in Boston, but he was one of the best of program-makers. Gerike was infinitely higher as a conductor, yet inferior in the matter of the make-up of his programs, leaning much too heavily to the classical side, and looking askance at almost everything that was modern. Dr. Muck was only modern on the German side. Fiedler, not our greatest conductor, was as good a program-maker as we ever had.

We may sound a note of warning against drawing too heavily in the near future on the modern French school. Cesar Franck is almost the only modern Frenchman (or Belgian) who will stand much repetition. We must have the Russian, Finnish, Norwegian, English and Italian works as well, and frequently. With regard to the American composer it was but natural that the German conductors should be better acquainted with him than the French leaders, for Paine, Chadwick, MacDowell, Hadley, Bird, Parker, Strong, Whiting, Bullard and many others, studied in Germany, taught there, and had their works played sometimes, in that country, while France drew chiefly to itself a few American organ students. Naturally, therefore, the Frenchmen are not as familiar with what American composers can do, or have done, as the Germans are.

And this leads to another point in connection with Germany. How many of the Teutonic composers shall be excluded from the programs because of the German barbarities of the last four years? In England they are playing many Wagner works without cavil. One would think that we have nothing to do in the concert room with the nationality or the personality of Wagner, but only with the standard of his music. If we thrilled to his music for years while we knew that the composer was selfish, ungrateful and almost a criminal, we should be able to enjoy it today even though we know that he was anti-French.

One of the new conductors draws the line at Wagner, but admits Brahms wrote a song of triumph over prostrate France, at the end of the Franco-Prussian war. We can understand the ostracism of Richard Strauss, for his music is often the embodiment of modern Prussian arrogance and brute force, yet even here we should be sorry to lose "Death and Transfiguration," or "Don Quixote." As regards the German classics we do not anticipate that any of the new conductors will be led by the adverse views of D'Indy or Debussy into excluding any of them. We can transmute the old saying about the Indians and read it—"A dead German is a good German."

The public will always demand soloists as an attraction in the symphony concerts, and when some great operatic star appears the great orchestra is thrown into the background, even in a symphony concert, and the tail temporarily wags the dog. For ourselves we wish that no vocalists were ever engaged for these concerts, for even in an operatic aria, where the orchestra is a partner in the work, the footlight flavor disagrees with the symphonic, and the lack of costume, scenery and dramatic action make themselves felt. It is different with pianists or violinists appearing in a concert, for here we still have the sonata-form, the true spirit of the concert room.

Mr. Gerike always insisted strongly upon the dignity of these concerts, and gave the symphony the preponderance. He generally placed the symphony last upon the program so that the author might leave the hall with the greatest work strongly impressed upon his mind. Perhaps so earnest a view might make the concerts too heavily educational for the general public; a lighter program, a la Theodore Thomas, would certainly be welcome once in a while. Thomas even admitted Strauss (not the great Richard, but the three-quarter Johann) to an occasional program.

But there are younger concert-goers growing up who need to hear the chief classic works which have become familiar to our veterans, and we must have at least a sprinkling of these. In the old times we used faithfully to go through Beethoven's first eight symphonies every season. Dr. Ferdinand Hiller once said to the present writer: "You Americans are jumping at once into the heavily scored modern works. It is much safer to grow up to these through Mozart and Beethoven."

We may trust the tactful Frenchmen to give some graceful touches of lightness and humor to their programs. We wish that some time M. Rabaud would let us have a program of musical curiosities. Such a program would include Beethoven's "Rattle of Vittoria," sometimes called the tenth symphony, which not one in a hundred concert auditors has ever heard. Then we might give our excellent kettle-drummer a chance with Tausch's concerto for kettle-drums, which we think has never been heard in America, a composition which is the symphonic world turned upside down, the kettle-drums (five of them played the single pounder) being for the once the chief instrument of the composition. A Lully score for string orchestra would be a very old novelty also.

NOVEMBER 8, 1918.

CRITICS AT ODDS ON SYMPHONY.

A wide difference of opinion as to the merits of the Boston Symphony orchestra's first New York appearance this season, in Carnegie Hall last evening, is to be found in the reviews by the musical critics of that city in the morning papers. The Sun's reviewer calls the reconstructed orchestra "a sad disappointment," and the same opinion is expressed by the critics on the Times and Herald.

The Telegraph critic, however, goes into raptures over the performance, declaring that it marked the emergence from the shadows of gradually dominating alien influences and un-American artistic bigotries.

Each critic, however, is agreed upon the fact that the audience became wildly enthusiastic at the rendition of "The Star Spangled Banner" and "America."

"To Simmer Down"

Reginald De Koven, in the Herald, writes of the performance: "Apart from Schumann's overture to Byron's 'Manfred,' which on this occasion sounded as dry as dust and as hard as nails, the program was composed entirely of music by French composers—M. Monteux is a very insistent conductor, anxious, as it were, to dig out effects by the roots, and if the Franck's D minor symphony, through his reading, gained somewhat in force and dynamic effect it lost definitely the mystic color, elasticity of nuance and subtle charm which should characterize the work."

"It seems to me after the concert of last night that they need, as it were, to simmer and settle down to the revisions and reconstruction of personnel which they have been obliged to undergo and to a process of reclarification and readjustment."

"Not Noteworthy"

James G. Huneker, the Times' critic, Franck's work and "Manfred" is "not noteworthy." "The first movement was opaque, the second was heavy in touch and the final allegro noisy," he says, of the Franck work.

"Altogether there was much to raise question as to the present state of music in Boston. Last evening's concert provided an uncertain answer," says the Sun critic. "M. Monteux, who conducted, is a fortunately temporary leader of the Boston forces. Possibly for that reason it might not be amiss to defer analytical consideration of the reconstructed orchestra until it is heard under M. Rabaud. Of a certainty, all the old friends of the gentlemen from Boston will hope that they will not contract a habit of playing as they played the Cesar Franck symphony. All the crystalline clarity, the sunny tone quality and the exquisite precision of the old orchestra were missing."

The Symphony Orchestra Returns, Not Too Auspiciously, to New York—Band and Conductor Various Viewed—Mr. Rabaud's First Programmes—Mr. Hofmann's Return—Items and Opinions

Traveller. — Nov. 8/18
LAYING in New York for the first time last evening, the reorganized Boston Symphony Orchestra underwent a test no whit less exacting than it had undergone at home two weeks before, and one, besides, likely to set both band and conductor on nervous edge. Mr. Monteux, fresh from the garnered praises of Boston, was to meet an audience that knew him only as a conductor of the theatre and which there had taken him only as a cog in a big and busy operatic wheel. The new orchestra, in turn, was to face an audience sure to be quick with comparisons. Evidently, for all concerned the concert was uneasy occasion, to inevitable detriment of the outcome. Trying to do his best, nearly every one from the conductor downward, overdid himself. Moreover, the din of the street filled with a merry crowd celebrating the end of the war, penetrated Carnegie Hall; while the audience plainly shared some of the excitement without delaying the beginning of the concert until it had heard the national airs of the victors.

The reviewers for the New York newspapers judge variously the quality of the reorganized orchestra, but not one of them thinks well of Mr. Monteux, who in the stress of the moment, must have been another conductor to what he was in Boston. Frankly, they counted him unequal to his post. Writing in The Times, Mr. Huneker is kindest:

The new band from Boston is still the old band, and there were moments, nay stretches, when the strings were celestial, the woodwind euphonious as no other orchestra's, and the brass, both massive and mellow. Nevertheless, one had the unmistakable sensation that the entire symphony of Franck was overblown. The new and temporary conductor, Mr. Monteux, was at the head of the famous orchestra. A familiar figure his; New York has known and liked him at our Opera House. His routine in operatic work doubtless led him to transpose to the symphonic region something of broader tonal masses, something of tendency to shifting rhythms. There was less balance of the various instrumental choirs than a certain aiming at picturesque, even sweeping effects, in a word, operatic. In Schumann's "Manfred" Overture Mr. Monteux's reading did not reveal the eloquence, stammering as it sometimes is, of the composer. The conductor received a warm greeting from a large audience, both modish and musical. We await with curiosity his second and last concert tomorrow afternoon. No doubt the serenity and search for shadings will be gratifying. Any fear that the Boston Symphony Orchestra had changed was dispelled after the first clangorous chords. Our musical community breathed easier last night.

In the Sun, Mr. Henderson is more severe, writing:

Mr. Monteux, who conducted, is a fortunately temporary leader of the Boston forces. Possibly for that reason it might not be amiss to defer analytical consideration of the reconstructed orchestra till it is heard under Mr. Rabaud. Of a certainty, all old friends of the gentlemen from Boston will hope that they will not contract a habit of playing as they played in Franck's symphony. It was a very vigorous, not to say robustious, reading that Mr. Monteux gave, deficient in delicate shades of color, insistent in style, overdrawn in most respects and sadly opaque in the treatment of the instrumental parts. All the crystalline clarity, the sunny tone quality and the exquisite precision of the old orchestra were missing. There was more smoothness in the number from Schumann, the overture to Byron's "Manfred," but there was little vitality of tone and a want of shading throughout.

Programmes in Prospect

Three pieces fill the programme in which, on Friday afternoon, Nov. 15 and Saturday evening, Nov. 16, Mr. Rabaud will conduct for the first times before the public of the Symphony Concerts. They are Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, last heard here in the final concerts of May; Saint-Saëns's tone-poem, "The Youth of Hercules," unknown to Bostonian ears for many a year; and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice" long a hallowed piece for the display of the virtuosity of an orchestra and a conductor. On Thursday evening, Nov. 14, when at Cambridge, Mr. Rabaud conducts for the first time on this side of the Atlantic, the orchestral numbers will be the "Eroica" symphony as aforesaid; Franck's tone-poem, "The Daughters of Aeolus" and Weber's overture to his opera, "Euryanthe." Mme. Alcock, the alto singer, will also be heard in airs from Handel's "Xerxes" and Saint-Saëns's "Samson and Delilah."

Mr. Rabaud, who will conduct for the first time in this country next Thursday night at Cambridge, does not believe in long concerts. He thinks that a concert of an hour and a half is long enough; at the utmost, it should not exceed an hour and three-quarters.

And it is evident that Mr. Rabaud is not a chauvinist. An overture by Weber is on the program of the Cambridge concert; a symphony by Beethoven will be played in Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday.

A little sketch of Mr. Rabaud has already been published in the Herald. A more complete one is now pertinent. Born at Paris in 1873, he is the son of Hippolyte Francois Rabaud (1839-1900), who took the first prize for violoncello playing at the Paris Conservatory in 1861. He was violoncellist of the Opera orchestra (1859-1889), professor of the violoncello at the Paris Conservatory (1886-1900) and for many years the solo violoncellist of the famous Conservatory orchestra. He wrote a method for his instrument, 12 études for it, also violoncello pieces.

The celebrated singer, Mme. Dorus-Gras, was the sister of Mr. Rabaud's grandfather, the flute player, equally distinguished. Vincent Joseph Van Steenkiste, better known by the name of Dorus. Mr. Rabaud is therefore the grand-nephew of the singer, not the grandson, as has been stated. The singer (1805-1896) and the flute player were born at Valenciennes.

Mr. Rabaud, a pupil of Massenet at the Paris Conservatory, took the prix de Rome in 1894. He spent four years at the Villa Medici. With his colleague, Max d'Ollone, he gave in Rome (1898) and in Vienna (1899) orchestral concerts to introduce in those cities the works of contemporary French composers.

In 1908 he was chosen a conductor at the Paris Opera. His debut was on Feb. 1 and the opera was "Lohengrin." His command of the orchestra and singers and his musical taste at once excited attention. Among the operas he conducted that year were "Tristan und Isolde," "Thais" and "Tannhauser." In 1912 he produced "Cobzar," an opera by Mme. Ferrari. On Jan. 3, 1914, he was named first conductor of the Opera in the place of Paul Vidal. The war came.

92.

In 1914-15 he conducted the orchestra of the Conservatory Orchestra, which were then given at the Sorbonne.

On June 30, 1915, at a performance of his opera "Marouf," the minister of fine arts announced that he was made chevalier of the Legion of Honor. Mr. Rabaud was then and there loudly applauded "for this honor spontaneously awarded to a true though very modest artist, to a musician of great and fine talent, to the composer of a beautiful musical work that is genuinely French." It is to be noted that in all the reviews of Mr. Rabaud's career published in Paris emphasis is laid on the refreshing modesty of the man as well as on his skill as a conductor and talent as a composer.

Mr. Rabaud is on the committee of performances for the Societe Nationale de Musique.

The list of his chief compositions is as follows:

OPERAS: "La Fille de Roland," musical tragedy in four acts, libretto based by Paul Ferrier on the tragedy of Henri de Bornier. Opera Comique, Paris, March 16, 1904. There were 10 performances that year. Chief singers: Mmes. Carre, Mumesnil, Muratore; Messrs. Beyle, Dufranne, Vieuille, Sizes, Allard, Huberdeau, Vignie. Messenger conducted.

"Marouf," opera comique in five acts, book by Lucien Nepoty, based on a tale in "The Thousand Nights and a Night" (translation of Dr. Mardrus). Opera Comique, Paris, May 15, 1914. Chief singers: Mmes. Davelli, Tiphaine; Messrs. Perier, Vieuille, Delvoys, Vigneau. Ruhlmann conducted. The opera was produced at the Metropolitan House, Dec. 19, 1917. Mr. Morieux was the conductor.

STAGE MUSIC: For Shakespeare's "Merchant of Venice" at the Theatre Antoine, Paris, 1916-17. Mr. Rabaud took his themes from English composers of the 16th century, employing an orchestra that was not too palpably modern.

For "Antony and Cleopatra" (Shakespeare's) at the Theatre Antoine, Paris, 1917.

CHORAL WORKS, etc.: "Job," an oratorio for solo voices, chorus and orchestra, performed at the Conservatory, for the Academy of Fine Arts, 1900. This was Mr. Rabaud's "Envoi de Rome."

"Daphne," the work with which Mr. Rabaud won the prix de Rome. Performed at the Institute in 1894.

Second Lyric Poem on Job, for baritone solo and orchestra. Colonne concert, 1905.

Psalm IV., for solo voices, chorus and orchestra, 1901, Societe des Compositeurs and Societe Guillot de Saint-bris.

Hymn a la France Eternelle (Victor Hugo), for tenor solo, chorus and orchestra. Opera House, Paris, December, 1916, at a performance "Theatre aux Armees."

Songs.

INSTRUMENTAL: Symphony in D minor, No. 1, Concert d'Harcourt, 1895. This symphony was written while Mr. Rabaud was still in the Conservatory.

Symphony, E minor, No. 2, Colonne Concert. Performed in Boston on Jan. 21, 1903, at Mrs. R. J. Hall's concert conducted by Mr. Longy. This symphony was awarded the Prix Mobinne.

Diversissement sur les Chansons Russe. Colonne Concert, 1901. Performed in Boston by the Orchestral Club, Mr. Longy conductor, April 1, 1902.

"La Procession Nocturne" (after Lenau). Colonne Concert, Jan. 15, 1899. Performed in Boston by the Orchestral Club, Mr. Longy conductor, Jan. 7, 1903. Performed in Boston by the orchestra of the New England Conservatory of Music, Nov. 19, 1903, Mr. Chadwick conductor.

Eglogue: Pieme Virgillen. Colonne Concert. Performed in Boston by the Orchestral Club, Mr. Longy conductor, Jan. 5, 1904.

String quartet.

Andante and Scherzo for flute, violin and piano.

Mr. Rabaud orchestrated "Dolly."

Six piano pieces by Gabriel Faure. Nancy, Feb. 9, 1903.

He has made an orchestral suite from the stage music to "The Merchant of Venice." Herald Nov. 10, 1918

My dear Miss Breten

It has been suggested by some friends of Major Henry L. Higginson that it would be pleasing to him, and a privilege for them, to send him a testimonial of their affection and gratitude on his eighty-fourth birthday which occurs very soon.

A suitable letter has been written by Pres. C. W. Eliot, and if you would like to testify to your appreciation of what he has done for each and all of us, will you sign your name to one of the slips enclosed in addressed envelope? And will you procure the names of those who had tickets for the concerts or rehearsals with you? These autograph signatures will be inserted in an appropriate book to be presented to Mr. Higginson on his birthday.

We beg that this will receive your immediate attention, as delay would be fatal to the completion of the book.

Sincerely yours,

Rose L. Dexter

In 1914-15 he conducted concerts of the Conservatory Orchestra, which were then given at the Sorbonne.

On June 30, 1915, at a performance of his opera "Marouf," the minister of fine arts announced that he was made chevalier of the Legion of Honor. Mr. Rabaud was then and there loudly applauded "for this honor spontaneously awarded to a true though very modest artist, to a musician of great and fine talent, to the composer of a beautiful musical work that is genuinely French." It is to be noted that in all the reviews of Mr. Rabaud's career published in Paris emphasis is laid on the refreshing modesty of the man as well as on his skill as a conductor and talent as a composer.

Mr. Rabaud is on the committee of performances for the Societe Nationale de Musique.

The list of his chief compositions is as follows:

OPERAS: "La Fille de Roland," musical tragedy in four acts, libretto based by Paul Ferrier on the tragedy of Henri de Bornier. Opera Comique, Paris, March 16, 1904. There were 10 performances that year. Chief singers: Mmes. Carre, Mumesnil, Muratore; Messrs. Beyle, Dufranne, Vieuille, Sizès, Allard, Huberdeau, Vignie. Messenger conducted.

"Marouf," opera comique in five acts, book by Lucien Nepoté, based on a tale in "The Thousand Nights and a Night" (translation of Dr. Mardrus). Opera Comique, Paris, May 15, 1914. Chief singers: Mmes. Davelli, Tiphaine; Messrs. Perier, Vieuille, Delvoys, Vigneau. Ruhlmann conducted. The opera was produced at the Metropolitan House, Dec. 19, 1917. Mr. Moreux was the conductor.

STAGE MUSIC: For Shakespeare's "Merchant of Venice" at the Theatre Antoine, Paris, 1916-17. Mr. Rabaud took his themes from English composers of the 16th century, employing an orchestra that was not too palpably modern.

For "Antony and Cleopatra" (Shakespeare's) at the Theatre Antoine, Paris, 1917.

CHORAL WORKS, etc.: "Job," an oratorio for solo voices, chorus and orchestra, performed at the Conservatory, for the Academy of Fine Arts, 1900. This was Mr. Rabaud's "Envoi de Rome."

"Daphne," the work with which Mr. Rabaud won the prix de Rome. Performed at the Institute in 1894.

Second Lyric Poem on Job, for baritone solo and orchestra. Colonne concert, 1905.

Psalm IV., for solo voices, chorus and orchestra, 1901. Societe des Compositeurs and Societe Guillot de Saint-bris.

Hymn a la France Eternelle (Victor Hugo), for tenor solo, chorus and orchestra. Opera House, Paris, December, 1916, at a performance "Theatre aux Armees."

Songs.

INSTRUMENTAL: Symphony in D minor, No. 1, Concert d'Harcourt, 1895. This symphony was written while Mr. Rabaud was still in the Conservatory.

Symphony, E minor, No. 2, Colonne Concert. Performed in Boston on Jan. 21, 1903, at Mrs. R. J. Hall's concert conducted by Mr. Longy. This symphony was awarded the Prix Moinne.

Divertissement sur les Chansons Russe. Colonne Concert, 1901. Performed in Boston by the Orchestral Club, Mr. Longy conductor, April 1, 1902.

"La Procession Nocturne" (after Lenau). Colonne Concert, Jan. 15, 1899. Performed in Boston by the Orchestral Club, Mr. Longy conductor, Jan. 7, 1903. Performed in Boston by the orchestra of the New England Conservatory of Music, Nov. 19, 1903, Mr. Chadwick conductor.

Eglogue: Pieme Virgillen. Colonne Concert. Performed in Boston by the Orchestral Club, Mr. Longy conductor, Jan. 5, 1904.

String quartet.

Andante and Scherzo for flute, violin and piano.

Mr. Rabaud orchestrated "Dolly." Six piano pieces by Gabriel Faure. Nancy, Feb. 9, 1908.

He has made an orchestral suite from the stage music to "The Merchant of Venice." Herald Nov. 10, 1918

My dear

Miss Buren

It has been suggested by some friends of Major Henry L. Higginson that it would be pleasing to him, and a privilege for them, to send him a testimonial of their affection and gratitude on his eighty-fourth birthday which occurs very soon.

A suitable letter has been written by Pres. C. W. Eliot, and if you would like to testify to your appreciation of what he has done for each and all of us, will you sign your name to one of the slips enclosed in addressed envelope? And will you procure the names of those who had tickets for the concerts or rehearsals with you? These autograph signatures will be inserted in an appropriate book to be presented to Mr. Higginson on his birthday.

We beg that this will receive your immediate attention, as delay would be fatal to the completion of the book.

Sincerely yours,

Herbert L. Dexter

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

A5

A4

PRECISIONSM RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

4.5 mm

3.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

From the Public of the Symphony Concerts to Henry L. Higginson

A Memorial Volume Containing 4000 Signatures and a Preface by President Eliot Given Him Today, His Eighty-Fourth Birthday

The Tooled Cover of the Book

TODAY is the eighty-fourth birthday of Mr. Henry L. Higginson, the founder and, for thirty-seven years, the sustainer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. To signal the occasion, to surprise and please Mr. Higginson, to recall the end, last spring, of his active connection with the Symphony Concerts, a few of his friends gave him this afternoon a unique book to be memorial of this long proprietorship. It is bound in full crushed brown levant leather with light brown morocco lining and fly-leaves. The covers, inside and outside, are tooled by hand in gold to a design suggested in the picture above, and made for the book by Mr. F. C. D. Palmer of the Rose Bindery. The pages are of vellum and on them are pasted the names of some 4000 subscribers to the Symphony Concerts, each in his or her own signature upon a little slip of white paper. On the first pages of the book as message and preface to Mr. Higginson stands the following letter to him written by his old friend, President Eliot of Harvard:

Dear Major Higginson:

Some of the thousands of persons who have had their lives made more interesting and happier by the concerts of your Symphony Orchestra in Boston and its vicinity during the past thirty-seven years wish to declare to you on your eighty-fourth birthday their personal gratitude and their strong sense of the public benefits which have resulted and will result from your disinterested and patient labors on behalf of the orchestra and the community it has served. Many of the signers of this Memorial are acquaintances who have long cherished high respect for you and your good works, or friends, old and young, who feel for you the sincerest affection; but most of them are strangers who gladly embrace this their first opportunity to tell you directly that you have gladdened and exalted their physical and spiritual lives.

Boston was historically the right place in the United States to develop an orchestra of high merit. The soil in which you planted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1880-81 had been well prepared during the forty years preceding by a series of earlier organizations for providing orchestral concerts in the community where you and I grew up. These pioneering organizations were the Boston Academy of Music, the Musical Fund Society, the Germania Orchestra, the Philharmonic Society, and the Harvard Musical Association. Their resources were limited, and their achievements modest; but they made ready a supporting public for you. Your purpose was to create an orchestra out of the best available material in all the world competent to render to perfection the best music in the world. In this very difficult undertaking your success has been marvelous. Your plans and policies have been wise, and generous towards both your public and the artists whom you employed. Your orchestra has given year by year a demonstration of the exceeding value of coöperative discipline. You have steadily insisted that the skilled musician's occupation is not a mechanical trade but an artistic profession. You have given your public the pure, refining, exalting, inspiring music of all nations and all periods. You have enlarged and strengthened the appreciation of sweet and noble music in this community.

We shall all better appreciate the work you have done for Boston and the country, if we bear in mind that good music sustains and consoles the human spirit in times of adversity, and is, next to good literature, the best expression of public prosperity, social joy, and religious transport. It transcends the limits of language or race, requires no versions or translations, and ranges freely through all the civilized world and the successive generations of men. Your success in creating the Symphony Orchestra as a permanent institution will have a high educational value in the future; for common enjoyment of immortal music allied with immortal poetry will prove an exalting and binding influence among the various elements of the American population.

On behalf of the signers of this Memorial I greet you and Mrs. Higginson with heartiest congratulations on the principal work of your useful life, warmest thanks, and best wishes for your enjoyment of serene content as you look backward, and still more as you look forward.

Your old friend,

CHARLES W. ELIOT

Major Henry L. Higginson.

Trans. Nov. 18. 1918.

REDUCTION

RATIO

12x

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

4-1
97

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1918--19.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

HENRI RABAUD, Conductor.

FOURTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 22, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 23, AT 8 P. M.

SCHUBERT,

UNFINISHED SYMPHONY in B minor.

- I. Allegro moderato
- II. Andante con moto

GRIEG,

CONCERTO in A minor for Pianoforte op. 16

- I. Allegro molto moderato
 - II. Adagio
 - III. Allegro moderato molto e marcato
-

SAINT-SAËNS,

SYMPHONY No. 3 in C minor, op. 78

- I. Adagio; Allegro moderato: Poco adagio
 - II. Allegro moderato: Presto; Maestoso; Allegro
- Mr. ALBERT SNOW, Organist
-

Soloist:

Mme. OLGA SAMAROFF

Steinway Pianoforte used

OLGA SAMAROFF

FOURTH-CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Herald Nov. 28/18
Mr. Rabaud Gives Delightful Reading of Schubert's
"Unfinished" Work

REPEAT THE SAME PROGRAM TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Rabaud, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Schubert, "Unfinished" Symphony; Grieg, piano concerto (Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianist); Saint-Saens, Symphony in C minor, No. 3.

When Joachim, one of the most important and stupid conductors we ever knew, was about to give a performance of the "Unfinished" symphony, he asked many musicians of Berlin what they thought the pace of the second theme, first announced by the violoncellos, in the first movement, should be. Some conductors sentimentalize this theme, dragging the pace until the song becomes lackadaisical. Mr. Rabaud is a musician of fine taste and judgment; he did not fall into this error. The symphony is eminently Schubertian in its beauty and in its weakness. For the most part the composer pipes his songs of innocence as the boy heard by William Blake; but in the first movement there are measures of a grandeur that is seldom found in Schubert's compositions. In these measures we recognize the Schubert that conceived the "Doppelgänger," the "Gruppe aus Tartarus," the "Dwarf" and a few other songs in which dramatic force comes before charming lyricism.

Mr. Rabaud gave a most impressive interpretation of these measures. The whole movement by the force of the contrast gained thereby. As for the second movement, which shows Schubert's tendency toward prolixity, and is so inferior to the first that one re-joices because the symphony was left unfinished, all that is to be done with it is to let the composer pipe his pretty tunes. Some day a conductor may have the courage to play the first movement alone, a noble fragment, comparable with that torso in literature, the "Hyperion," of Keats.

Schubert wrote "Current a Calamo." It was otherwise with the Saint-Saens of the C minor symphony. We doubt whether his head were hot and his feet cold when he was engaged in the composition; but that head was full of invention and contrapuntal skill. We spoke last Saturday, discussing Saint-Saens's symphonic poems, of the clearness and the logic of his musical thought. These qualities are as fully displayed in the symphony, which is more than a triumph of cunning workmanship. The serenity of the adagio, the fantastic presto, and the majesty of the section before the brilliant coda, with its jubilant blasts of brass, are imaginative pages, not merely the carefully written measures of an accomplished technician. The symphony had been heard at these concerts on at least four occasions. It was also played here by this orchestra when the composer was present, but as pianist and composer, not as conductor. Never was it so interesting, never so imposing, as it was yesterday under the direction of Mr. Rabaud.

When Mme. Samaroff played here with the orchestra from 1906 till late in 1909, her performance was distinguished chiefly by a peculiar brilliance. Her treatment of emotional passages left one cold. Yesterday one noticed a change of style. Her touch had a more poetic quality. She was lyrical, rather than defiantly theatrical, although there was sufficient force in the stormier pages. This concerto, which some think has had its day, gives delight solely by its purely lyrical quality; not by any suggestion of folk dance; not by the bravura measures and the crashing apotheosis, which are of decidedly secondary quality. Mme. Samaroff did well to discriminate in this manner; to sing rather than to declaim. In doing this, she unfortunately too often made the mistake of underemphasis. There were times when the piano part, being of the first importance, was heard only with strained ears, so that the first movement was on the whole pale, without vitality. Nor was this in any way the fault of Mr. Rabaud, whose accompaniment was sympathetic and delightful throughout.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Weber, Overture to "Euryanthe"; Mozart "Jupiter" Symphony; Dukas: Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice"; Borodin, Symphony in B minor, No. 2.

OLGA SAMAROFF

FOURTH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Herald Nov. 23 / 18

Mr. Rabaud Gives Delightful Reading of Schubert's
"Unfinished" Work

REPEAT THE SAME PROGRAM TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Rabaud, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Schubert, "Unfinished" Symphony; Grieg, piano concerto (Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianist); Saint-Saens, Symphony in C minor, No. 3.

When Joachim, one of the most impotent and stupid conductors we ever knew, was about to give a performance of the "Unfinished" symphony, he asked many musicians of Berlin what they thought the pace of the second theme, first announced by the violoncelles, in the first movement, should be. Some conductors sentimentalize this theme, dragging the pace until the song becomes lackadaisical. Mr. Rabaud is a musician of fine taste and judgment; he did not fall into this error. The symphony is eminently Schubertian in its beauty and in its weakness. For the most part the composer pipes his songs of innocence as the boy heard by William Blake; but in the first movement there are measures of a grandeur that is seldom found in Schubert's compositions. In these measures we recognize the Schubert that conceived the "Doppelganger," the "Gruppe aus Tartarus," the "Dwarf" and a few other songs in which dramatic force comes before charming lyricism.

Mr. Rabaud gave a most impressive interpretation of these measures. The whole movement by the force of the contrast gained thereby. As for the second movement, which shows Schubert's tendency toward prolixity, and is so inferior to the first that one rejoices because the symphony was left unfinished, all that is to be done with it is to let the composer pipe his pretty tunes. Some day a conductor may have the courage to play the first movement alone, a noble fragment, comparable with that torso in literature, the "Hyperion," of Keats.

Schubert wrote "Current a Calamo." It was otherwise with the Saint-Saens of the C minor symphony. We doubt whether his head were hot and his feet cold when he was engaged in the composition; but that head was full of invention and contrapuntal skill. We spoke last Saturday, discussing Saint-Saens's symphonic poems, of the clearness and the logic of his musical thought. These qualities are as fully displayed in the symphony, which is more than a triumph of cunning workmanship. The serenity of the adagio, the fantastic presto, and the majesty of the section before the brilliant coda, with its jubilant blasts of brass, are imaginative pages, not merely the carefully written measures of an accomplished technician. The symphony had been heard at these concerts on at least four occasions. It was also played here by this orchestra when the composer was present, but as pianist and composer, not as conductor. Never was it so interesting, never so imposing, as it was yesterday under the direction of Mr. Rabaud.

When Mme. Samaroff played here with the orchestra from 1903 till late in 1909, her performance was distinguished chiefly by a peculiar brilliance. Her treatment of emotional passages left one cold. Yesterday one noticed a change of style. Her touch had a more poetic quality. She was lyrical, rather than defiantly theatrical, although there was sufficient force in the stormier pages. This concerto, which some think has had its day, gives delight solely by its purely lyrical quality; not by any suggestion of folk dance; not by the bravura measures and the crashing apotheosis, which are of decidedly secondary quality. Mme. Samaroff did well to discriminate in this manner; to sing rather than to declaim. In doing this, she unfortunately too often made the mistake of underemphasis. There were times when the piano part, being of the first importance, was heard only with strained ears, so that the first movement was on the whole pale, without vitality. Nor was this in any way the fault of Mr. Rabaud, whose accompaniment was sympathetic and delightful throughout.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Weber, Overture to "Euryanthe"; Mozart "Jupiter" Symphony; Dukas: Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice"; Borodin, Symphony in B minor, No. 2.

ELSON REVIEWS MUSICAL WEEK

Adv. + Her. Ed. Nov. 24/18
Conductor Seems Melancholy, but Nothing Gloomy in the Minors

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

THE SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Unfinished symphony, B minor.....Schubert
Concerto for piano and orchestra, A minor.....Grieg Soloist, Mme. Olga Samaroff.
Symphony No. 3, C minor.....Saint-Saëns

M. Rabaud seems to have been in a melancholy mood to choose three works in the minor mode for his entire program, but there was little gloom in the succession of minors, and there was a sufficient degree of contrast in the three works.

Schubert's two-movement symphony is the most melodious ever written, so richly tuneful that no composer of the world dare add the two movements which are missing. One conceited musician named Ludwig once tried to finish it, but he finished only his own reputation instead. Schubert left the work unfinished simply because he felt that he had not influence enough to bring a symphony of his own to public performance.

We again heartily admired the elasticity of M. Rabaud in his interpretation. Charming did he take that transition of the horns from the end of the chief theme into the most tuneful subordinate theme of the whole repertoire; clearly yet mysteriously was the ever-present phrase of the contra-basses and cellos brought out through the first movement; beautiful also were the pizzicato effects of the second movement, and all was given simply and without affectation.

M. Rabaud sensibly omitted the report of the exposition of the first movement. One does not want to be too prolix in these older works. The symphony made a strong contrast with the St. Saëns work. The simplicity of the old school against the inflation and complexity of the new. And yet St. Saëns is now classed among the conservatives.

We cordially welcome Olga Samaroff back to these concerts, where she has not been heard for a long time. She always had excellent technique and considerable temperament. She seems to have ripened in the last quality and has an earnestness and breadth which suits well to the Grieg Concerto which she chose for her rentree. The work itself, in spite of certain touches of sadness (the Norse composers are always wholesale dealers in melancholy), is splendidly masculine, and might well be called the Heroic Concerto. It is splendidly masculine, and it was played with virility. If that word may be applied to a female artist.

The concerto is greater in its ideas than in its workmanship. It presents what Addison might have called "The pale, unripened beauties of the North," for it does not unfold and develop its themes in the manner of a true concerto. Mme. Samaroff made a very great success with this same concerto in Boston a dozen years ago, and she repeated the triumph in the Symphony concerts of Friday and Saturday. Her cadenza work in the first movement was most massive, with heavy chords and double octave work of remarkable power. This fitted well to the heroic character of the concerto. But the adagio, with its more gentle sadness, is the musical gem of the work, and was also well interpreted.

Mme. Samaroff was well supported throughout by the orchestra, and M. Rabaud, in this and in the final symphony, proved that he could catch up "King Cambyse's vein" when necessary. The pianist was recalled with much enthusiasm and richly deserved her triumph.

Next to "Samson and Delilah," the third symphony is St. Saëns' most ambitious work. It was very proper for a symphony dedicated to the memory of Liszt to have an obligato piano part, and the organ is interwoven here in one of the finest of climaxes for that instrument with orchestra. Although the piano is not made very prominent (it is used as an orchestral tone color, not as a solo instrument) there are some very piquant effects in its part, notably its unusual combination in scale work with the piccolo. The organ, played by Albert Snow, was sometimes too heavy in its registration, although played with accuracy and generally good effect.

The work is not in the strictest symphony form, but that is not a fault in these modern days. Its first two and last two movements are connected, thus making the symphony in two large sections. The second section is much finer than the first. There is much fine figure treatment all through the work, this being foreshadowed even in the introduction.

The overlapping of the figure of the chief theme into the subordinate theme in the first movement reminds of Beethoven's style of figure treatment.

Perhaps there is a trifle too much of such treatment in the last part of the symphony, but the tossing to and fro of a tonic-dominant motive from violins and violas to the humble kettle-drums is very quaint, and the constant changes of rhythm of the theme of the violins and violas is at least ingenious: 6-8, 9-8, 2-2 (as a march) and finally 3-1 all follow each other, the rhythms sometimes being effectively accepted by cymbal strokes, all easily followed, and in the finale there is some excellent fugal work.

Truly a masterpiece and it received a rousing that was worthy.

M. Rabaud in this work reached his highest point in Boston thus far. The conclusion of the end was magnificent and the three minors in succession we can compliment the conductor upon the make-up of the program for there was not one atom of dullness, monotony, puzzle, or St. Vitus' dance in it from beginning to end.

The Albigetti concert of last Sunday brought back Josef Hofmann after an absence of several years. Ever since his arrival led Dr. Muck and his merry men a steeplechase through Schumann's piano concerto, long ago, there has been something of a feud which kept the soloist out of Symphony concerts and Symphony Hall, which was a great pity, for Hofmann is one of the most sterling pianists of the present. His recital proved him an excellent Beethoven interpreter, but somewhat less great in Chopin. He is more intellectual than temperamental, which is odd when one remembers what a "wonder-child" he once was. He will be heard again this season with the Symphony Orchestra.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Thurs. — Nov. 23/18
A TRANQUIL AND INTERESTING AFTERNOON

Mr. Rabaud and the Orchestra in a Remarkably Eloquent and Engrossing Performance of Saint-Saëns' "Organ Symphony," but in a Somewhat Dry and Rigid Version of Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" — Between, Grieg's Fading Concerto, with Mme. Samaroff Repressed

QUICKLY comes routine. To all appearances at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, Mr. Rabaud might have been the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra for two years instead of two weeks, with his hearers and his forces correspondingly accustomed to him. The usual applause greeted him as he came to his place; the usual playing of "The Star-Spangled Banner" ensued; for it is doubtful whether two ears in twenty in the audience note that Mr. Converse's arrangement is a new orchestral version of the hymn, stately and sonorous to its purpose. Conductor, orchestra and listeners then passed to a programme that might have been made for any Symphony Concert within the past twenty years—Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, the concerto for piano by Grieg, Saint-Saëns's symphony in C minor with conspicuous organ part. The audience listened intently, applauded warmly—least for the concerto, most for the Parisian symphony. Outside a few restless spirits and tongues, few debated the quality of either the new orchestra or the new conductor. Every one stayed to the end; nearly every one departed content.

Not a ripple disturbed the tranquil pleasure of the day except, possibly, the watery green dress that clothed Mme. Samaroff, the pianist of the afternoon, as though she were come to play Ravel's aquatic "Undine" and not Grieg's high and dry concerto. There was even opportunity to speculate upon the seeming perplexities of the management in the arrangement of a United States flag above the stage. At the beginning of the season it hung pendant from the ceiling; a week ago it was outspread upon the pipes of the organ; yesterday it stood in perpendicular folds against them. So runs the calm record of a day that brought back recollection of the "soothing" quality once attributed to the Symphony Concerts by a well-intentioned man of business in a speech to a retiring conductor. The speaker meant to please; the conductor chose to be irritated—all of which is neither here nor there. Suffice it that yesterday the afternoon audience had regained nearly normal numbers—happy omen for the new régime if only the company assembling on Saturday evenings similarly mounts.

If every conductor must have a "specialty" as well as be the "all-round" leader that the office implies, then Mr. Rabaud's, so far as two pairs of concerts have disclosed him, is the music of Saint-Saëns. A week ago, he and the orchestra wove with blended exactitude and elasticity the pattern of the Parisian's tone-poem, "The Youth of Hercules," set the music in the clearest possible light, polished every detail of an assiduous workmanship, fused in perfect unity poetic imagery and tonal progress. Not within memory hereabouts has the cool music of Saint-Saëns been so artfully chiselled. Yesterday, with the symphony in C minor, Mr. Rabaud and his forces excelled even this achievement, not only continuing the chiselling, but actually warming the material and the method into emotional heat. For once a piece by Saint-Saëns not only interested the mind of the hearer, pleased his taste, intrigued his musical scholarship, but warmed his heart as well. Out of himself, as it seemed, out of a deep and congenial devotion, Mr. Rabaud often transformed what usually seems a music of calculation and reflection into a music of propulsive power and eloquence.

This symphony in C minor is no new thing. For years it has had intermittent place in the repertory of the Symphony Concerts, whoever the conductor. Every one who reads the programme-book—and who does not?—knows by this time the composer's somewhat proclamatory attitude with regard to it—his intention to enrich the orchestra, as enrichment went modestly in the eighties, with the swelling voice of the organ, the scintillant voice of the piano; his inclination to freedom of form, since these were the days in which Saint-Saëns was studious of the ways of Liszt and well disposed toward the procedures of Wagner. Hence the division of the symphony into two parts with a single pause, which is no more than discreet veiling and mild transmutation of orthodox process, since the first "part" obviously consists of slow introduction, concise allegro and more expansive slow movement; while the second leads as transparently through introduction and scherzo into sonorous finale. Hence, also, a Lisztian fondness for recurring motives as a means to unity and a snapping, scintillant scherzo with hint here and there of Lisztian devilry. Hence, too, as in the more songful measures of the slow movement, an occasional clear Wagnerian tang. From his eighth to his eightieth year processes, workmanship have preoccupied Saint-Saëns. Being luminous, exact, sedulous with them, he would have them equally preoccupy his audiences. Possibly, by this very quality, his music endures the years so well, is heard so often. For upon style and the pleasures of style Time blunts its gnawing teeth.

Unlike many a predecessor with the symphony Mr. Rabaud was not content with lucid revelation of Saint-Saëns's design, clear exposition, cool manipulation and large cumulation of his melodies, dutiful and pointing heed to details, calm transmission of surface-voice and mood. Rather, he woke a music that can seem all cerebral exactitude and superficial dexterity into an inner and emotional life of its own steadily and eloquently pulsing outward. He achieved these remarkable things—for to his more sophisticated auditors they were such—by a pace that vitalized Saint-Saëns's motives into melody, that imparted to them a clear ardor of progress; by a rhythmic zest that heightened their vitality and motion; by incisiveness of accent and warmth of color as the music variously bade; by play of large design and upswelling climax; by sincere emotional response to a music often presumed to bear no emotion except that of a symphonic scheme well planned and well accomplished. With the orchestra yielding him a sensuous, elastic, euphonious and expressive tone, he gave the slow movement with which the first part ends, a veritable beauty, dry if the listener will, but beauty still and beauty born of as veritable a contemplative emotion. For once, albeit in his own way, Saint-Saëns was scaling the heavens and bearing his hearers on his quest. If the Parisian may not write a mystical tonal poetry in the manner of Franck, he may at least achieve a mystical tonal prose. Again with the scherzo of the second part, Mr. Rabaud gained a fantastic diablerie of mood, fancy, stroke, which was no mere technical jugglery with showering arpeggi, slithering scales and chopped rhythms. Then the finale, in which the conductor attained the long, spacious, ardent advance, the mighty outspreading and enfolding cumulation that elsewhere have proved him a master of climax. So the symphony sounded by no small addition of Henri Rabaud to Camille Saint-Saëns.

On the other hand, with the fragment that is Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, neither conductor nor orchestra succeeded as well. Especially in the more strenuous measures of the allegro moderato, the music seemed to lack the transparency, the elasticity, the edgeless flow of Schubert lyric, even sentimental. For the first time in Boston, the band seemed to be playing as report says it played on those two beset days in New York. Particularly in the slow movement, somewhere between conductor and orchestra, the fine ear essential to the full beauty and charm of Schubert's music was missing. Moreover, was not Mr. Rabaud, in curious contrast to the Rabaud of Saint-Saëns's symphony, somewhat too cerebral, too austere with the whole music? Agreed that this gravity, this force suits the more impassioned voice, the occasional grimness even, of many a period, of many a solemn intervention in the first movement. Here, unmistakably, is music of a Schubert deepening, capable of tragic mood, courting power in the expression of it. Granted the elegiac, the mourning vein of other measures varying, continuing such mood. Yet soon emerges Schubert, the long-breathed singer for the sake of song, wreathing it in flowing counterpoint, smiling, almost, in innocent delight with spontaneous process, even when the mood behind is as troubled as that of this allegro moderato. The zest of music-making softens, as the movement proceeds, even a tragically-minded Schubert, while Mr. Rabaud would hold him grim to the end.

Still more with the succeeding andante of pure lyric flow, of melody welling from one choir to another, almost from instrument to instrument, ever finding new garlands of counterpoint or ornament, modulated as by a hundred quick impulses, warmed by the sentiment that in Schubert breeds song. The outcome is the loveliness of such sound upon ear and fancy. The mind does not measure, but sensation and sentiment stir in the hearer no less than in the composer. Now, as it seemed yesterday, Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra stopped short at pains-taking exposition of this second movement; they missed grace, charm, spontaneity, euphonious flow. They were dry and firm where they should have been lissome, transparent. A sentimental music of the heart and impulse is such and nothing else. There is no making it music of the brain and meditation and not stripping it thereby out of a sun-shot poetry into a lustreless prose. There have been better days than yesterday for Schubert at the Symphony Concerts.

Between the two symphonies, alike in the sequence of the programme and the quality of the performance, stood Grieg's concerto. The enthusiasts, either for praise or dispraise of Grieg's music, will allow mere detached listeners to it no privilege of middle ground. Like all the rest of the Norwegian's pieces in their ears, this concerto is either a work of plenary inspiration from shadowy beginning to vociferous close, or else a dull, halting, threadbare thing on the way to deserved oblivion. The more precarious, then, the footing of those who will not take sides. The detractors hold out hands, the apostles withdraw them, when such listeners regret Grieg's tendency to over-emphasis as though he were never quite sure that his thoughts and moods in music would speak for themselves, or hint that not a few measures in the concerto now sound empty and inflated. The advocates are kindly, the opponents resentful, when those same moderates find pleasure in the springy melodies, the spirited rhythms, the happy up-leapings of the finale or in the moody charm and romantic glamor of the slow movement. All three can agree only that in the concerto Grieg is adroit in fusing or contrasting such opposed voices as those of piano and orchestra and that in the whole piece he is more sustained and less fitful of speech than was his later wont.

Again, moreover, the music seemed somewhat dryly played, with Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra faithful, sensitive, supple in accompaniment, but with Mme. Samaroff foregoing her usual nervous energy. Of old it was her most characteristic possession as pianist. Often it tipped her playing with fire, touched it, even, with brilliance. There were hints, indeed, yesterday, of this animating glow in the rhythmic verve and quick plasticity of her playing of the finale; but in the first movement she was content with little more than exposition of the music in hand. Dry was her touch; brittle was her tone. Even in the slow song, when Grieg seemed to soften her fingers, round her tone, mould and melt her phrases, the listener still heard the piano less as the transfigured voice of music than as an instrument in which little felt hammers fall upon vibrating wires at the touch of keys.

H. T. P.

SYMPHONY PRESENTS EXTREMES

Post Nov. 23 '18
Sweet Lyrical and Ultra Modern Words Heard

BY OLIN DOWNES

The fourth programme of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianist, was soloist, playing the Grieg concerto. The purely orchestral compositions were Schubert's symphony in B minor and Saint-Saëns's symphony in C minor, for big modern orchestra, including the organ and piano, four hands.

WIDELY SEPARATED WORKS

No juxtaposition of two symphonies could have offered a more provocative comparison—on the one hand, the lyrical and profoundly emotional outpouring of the dreamer, Schubert, who left in this tragically uncomplete work the record of his last days as an artist, on the other, the elaborate architecture of Saint-Saëns, an intellectual, a man of the world, author of a symphony which embodies modern ideas of musical development of which the simple Schubert surely never dreamed.

Neither man could have come remotely within distance of the other. Therefore it is the more interesting to consider the manner in which Saint-Saens treats a theme which has its genesis in a musical figure having more than a remote resemblance to a figure heard at the beginning of the symphony of Schubert!

Saint-Saens' Masterpiece

Saint-Saens would have understood Schubert's symphony better than the unsophisticated and comparatively unlearned Schubert would have understood the symphony of Saint-Saens. The symphony of Schubert is of course greater music, while as a musical edifice the symphony of Saint-Saens is considerably the more significant work of the two. Saint-Saens' themes assume a Proteus-like variety of manifestation. They are transformed, lengthened, broken apart, and one part pitted against the other. At last the thematic fragments cohere and combine in a sonorous and impressive finale. The structure is a colossal one. If all of the ideas are not in themselves worthy of the composer's intention, his skill in manipulating and building with them is past the praise of a dilettante who writes on a newspaper.

One realizes not only the breadth of Saint-Saens' musical knowledge and taste, but the profound earnestness shown by him in his desire to produce a French orchestral work worthy of the highest traditions of the symphonic form. Everything that modern composers had discovered when this work was written is exemplified in it. And yet—when a man writes music his head cannot be greater than his heart. Saint-Saens' symphony has everything except the all-compelling spiritual urge that begets enduring masterpiece. The symphony of Schubert says things more personal, more profound, and much more romantic.

It is curious. The latter work is almost exactly in the symphonic mould approved by the strict formulas, largely cast off today, of the early 19th century, yet it is subjective romanticism itself in tones. The symphony of Saint-Saens confesses its indebtedness to Liszt in particular, to Beethoven, to half a dozen others by whose discoveries and experiments the later composer profits. Yet this modern and elaborate symphony, comparatively free in its form, full of rich colors, and striking effects, seems today a classic of the most strictly classic sort, a monument of proportion, emotional restraint, enduring tradition.

It may be added that Saint-Saens' work had not been dreamed of as possessing so much force and formal grandeur as it was seen to have under Mr. Rabaud's baton yesterday. His performance was literally a revelation of the composition, which Dr. Muck played here under the eye of Saint-Saens himself in 1906. Mr. Rabaud's reading was a memorable one, and one which we are certain Saint-Saens himself would have gratefully applauded had he been present. Mr. Snow gave an admirable performance of the organ part.

Much could be said of the slow movement of Schubert's symphony, a movement in which every phrase was exquisitely moulded, when the orchestra played with that beauty of tone, and of individual parts—notably Mr. Longy's cello—for which it has long been famous.

Mme. Samaroff's Playing

Mr. Rabaud grows on one as a conductor. His reading of standard orchestral works is never slavish routine, and always distinguished by the utmost conviction and the finest taste. He will be heard next week in more modern music. His performances of yesterday afternoon were of the most admirable quality—this though the tone of the horn choir was lacking at times in clearness and brilliancy.

Then there was Mme. Samaroff, flourishing her pretty paws in the Grieg concerto. She gave an authoritative and often poetic rendering of the work. From a tendency to over-brilliance and to a certain dryness of tone in the past she has gone over to a tone fuller, rounder and more singing than of yore, and a discretion in balancing with the orchestra, which was almost too pronounced on her part yesterday afternoon. She was recalled with much enthusiasm.

RABAUD LEADS FINE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe — Nov. 23/18
Mme Samaroff Pleases in Grieg Concerto

Mr Rabaud gave further proof of the fine qualities of his conducting yesterday. His "unfinished" symphony was exquisite romantic lyricism. The orchestra, attuning its voice to sheer and transparent beauty, sang the heavenly melodies of Schubert with tenderness, with grace, with a vernal freshness and animation, always as though with devotion. The strand was finely woven, one instrument taking with gallantry or with a curtsy the theme from the mouth of another, and spinning it into new loveliness. The slow movement was enchanting in its gentle melancholy, in the answering solace of its imperturbable calm, in a classic repose which by the plasticity and sympathy of Mr Rabaud's treatment became imaginative, even improvisational.

If the conductor brought to us Schubert as a charming and spontaneous singer, he only went from one romanticist to another of more modern idiom and palette in Grieg's piano concerto in A minor, for which Mme Olga Samaroff was the soloist. Mr Rabaud's reading of this poignantly imaginative score was one of many moments of happy appreciation and sympathy. How hauntingly beautiful the introduction to the adagio for muted strings, with the darkly impassioned song of the cellos, and how autobiographical of Grieg!

Again in Saint-Saens' organ symphony, Mr Rabaud took due note of the polished expression, the characteristic pomp in sonorities as in rhythmical figuration; the equally characteristic elegance which never fails the conductor's senior countryman, and on occasion becomes majestic, as in the pontifical entrance of the organ, the pedals supporting the pageantry of the strings and rearing in dim vastness the curve of the cathedral nave. The organ was played yesterday by Albert Snow with discreet and expressive registration, with precision and taste.

Mme Samaroff has now in her playing a warmer feeling for the poetic content. The interim has added imagination and perception to performance. Fortunately she is not a heroic pianist. May she never become one. Her playing suggests visions. That is enough for the piano. It need not claim dominion over the air, the land and the sea. There was distinction, a fine sense of proportion in the curve of many a phrase—in the rhythmically satisfying announcement of the first theme of the first movement, which the pianist developed admirably in the cadenza, in the lyric quality of the second, and in the sturdy dance figure of the last. While there are pianists who play louder or with more theatrical brilliance, Mme Samaroff has given very rewarding attention to some of the most vital phases of the great art of expression.

MUSIC IN BOSTON

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor
Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, fourth concert of thirty-eighth season, Symphony Hall, Boston, afternoon of Nov. 22, 1918, Olga Samaroff, pianist, soloist. The program: Schubert, "Unfinished" Symphony in B minor; Grieg, Concerto in A minor for pianoforte, Op. 16; Saint-Saens, Symphony in C minor, No. 3, Op. 78. (Albert Snow, organist). Nov. 23, 1918.

BOSTON, Massachusetts—Gradually his Boston public is coming to form a comprehensive and just estimate of Mr. Rabaud as it has opportunity to analyze his work. Previous to the concerts of this week, he had disclosed himself through Beethoven as a dignified, scholarly, yet fervid director. He had also shown remarkable skill as an accompanying conductor. This week he strengthened these impressions and gave in addition through the Homeric measures of Saint-Saens, a glimpse of capabilities hitherto not in evidence. On the last occasion when Boston heard this symphony, the orchestra was under a constricting Teutonic domination; this time it had achieved a Gallic freedom and played with a warmth and spontaneity that the former rendition lacked. It was perhaps only to be expected that Mr. Rabaud should give a reading of his friend's work that should bear the stamp of authority; the breadth of vision and the depth of understanding he put into it, however, were welcome earnestness of his unfolding genius.

It is a profitable topic for debate whether if Schubert had completed his B Minor Symphony it would have the degree of popularity which it enjoys in its unfinished state. Four movements of such melancholy sweetness might cloy. Mr. Rabaud gave fortunately just a tinge of austerity to his reading of the score. The result was pleasant romance, not sentimentality.

Mme. Olga Samaroff played the Grieg piano Concerto spiritedly, a rendering more notable in tone perhaps than in interpretation. Mr. Rabaud gave what must be a most gratifying accompaniment to a soloist, although in this instance the soloist notably deferred to the conductor, a proceeding whereby the composer gained most of all.

On Sunday, Nov. 17 Josef Hofmann appeared in piano recital, playing a familiar program—so familiar it even included the Rubinstein "Melody in F"—with great power and in scholarly fashion. Mr. Hofmann's ability to pick out and emphasize the salient phrases of a composition—even of the Rubinstein "Melody in F"—makes a recital by him musically profitable both in an educative and a pleasurable sense.

As a result of the changes in personnel and management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Longy Club of wind instruments has had to be reorganized, and Mr. Georges Longy, the leader, announces that concerts are in contemplation by a group of players appearing under the same name and drawn from the faculty of the Longy School of Music.

1106

Mme. OLGA SAMAROFF (Mrs. Leopold Stokowski) was born at San Antonio, Tex., August 8, 1880. Her maiden name was Lucy Hickenlooper. As a child, she was taught the pianoforte by her grandmother and her mother. At the age of nine she studied with Constantin von Sternberg. In Paris she studied with Marmontel the elder and Widor. Entering the Paris Conservatory in 1895, she was for five years in the class of Delaborde. She took lessons of Ernest Hutcheson and Jedliczka in Berlin. Her first appearance with orchestra in public was in New York, January 18, 1905. Her first appearance in Boston was at a concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet, April 10, 1905, when she played with Mr. Krasselt, Saint-Saëns's violoncello sonata in C minor.

She has played in Boston at concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra:—

1906, April 21, Grieg's Concerto.

1907, February 9, Tschaikowsky's Concerto, B-flat minor.

1908, April 4, Liszt's Concerto, E-flat major.

1909, November 27, Rubinstein's Concerto, D minor, No. 4.

She took part in the concert given in aid of the San Francisco Fund by the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, April 29, 1906 (Liszt's Concerto, E-flat major), and at the concert in aid of the Pension Fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, November 20, 1909.

Mme. Samaroff has also been heard here in various recitals and concerts. Her last appearance in Boston was at a Kneisel Quartet concert, January 2, 1917 (César Franck's pianoforte quintet).

5-1

785
67

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1918-19.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

HENRI RABAUD, Conductor.

FIFTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 29, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 30, AT 8 P. M.

WEBER,

OVERTURE to "Euryanthe"

MOZART,

SYMPHONY in C major, "Jupiter" (K. 551)

I. Allegro vivace

II. Andante cantabile

III. Menuetto; Allegretto; Trio

IV. Finale: Allegro molto

DUKAS,

SCHERZO, "L'Apprenti Sorcier," "The Sorcerer's Apprentice.") after a Ballad by Goethe

BORODIN,

SYMPHONY in B minor, No. 2

I. Allegro moderato

II. Molto vivo

III. Andante

IV. Allegro

There will be no Rehearsal and Concert next week

SYMPHONY'S FIFTH CONCERT

Herald — Nov. 30, 1918
Mr. Rabaud Gives Dramatic Reading of Dukas's
Music

NEW SIGNIFICANCE TO COMPOSER'S WORKS

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fifth concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Rabaud conducted. The program was as follows: Weber, Overture to "Euryanthe"; Mozart, "Jupiter" symphony; Dukas, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice"; Borodin, Symphony No. 2, B minor.

Mr. Apthorp frequently spoke of the "Weberian flourish," of the chivalric spirit shown, not only in Weber's overtures to "Euryanthe" and "Oberon," but in much of his music for piano. Weber's operas are wholly unknown as stage-works to the younger generation in Boston. "Der Freischuetz" has not been seen here since 1896, when a German company gave a wretched performance. "Oberon" has not been performed here since the early seventies. It's a dull opera, with some beautiful music. There is talk of reviving it at the Metropolitan, where, if it is produced, it will no doubt be a gorgeous spectacle. Has "Euryanthe" been performed in Boston? It, too, is dull, dull beyond redemption, although at Dresden years ago we saw a most carefully prepared performance, for the cult of Weber in that city was then firmly established, and nowhere else was "Der Freischuetz" so admirably performed. Yet Weber was a mighty man in his day, influencing composers of other countries than his own, praised to the skies by Berlioz and Wagner. The latter had good reason for his enthusiasm; the influence of "Euryanthe" is observed in his early operas. Weber was a romanticist of the E. T. A. Hoffmann order. The music for the scene of the Wolf's Glen in "Der Freischuetz" is in no need of fireworks and ghostly apparitions for its terrifying effects. There is charming fairy music in "Oberon."

Then there is the mysterious Largo in the overture played yesterday. The grand arias, the set pieces for a soprano, with the final allegro section better suited to an orchestral instrument than the human voice, are now singularly out of fashion, but what could be better as music for a particular text than that for the opening scenes of "Der Freischuetz"? The three overtures will long preserve the composer's name. The orchestra performed the "Euryanthe" overture brilliantly.

The Scherzo of Dukas has become so familiar that performances of late at these concerts were more or less perfunctory, but we never really heard "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" till yesterday, when Mr. Rabaud gave a most dramatic reading of it, a reading that electrified the audience, which had listened apathetically to Mozart's symphony, so that, by reason also of the dim lighting the hall had resembled a family vault. Dukas's music, as played under Mr. Rabaud, had new significance. For once, the blasts of brass announcing the magician's return were awe-inspiring; for once, the water rushed and roared.

Few Frenchmen like the music of Tchaikowsky; they prefer that of Balakireff, Borodin, and Rimsky-Korsakoff, and not merely because Tchaikowsky, except in his Fourth symphony, was a cosmopolitan while the three were nationalists. No one but a Russian could have written this symphony of Borodin, a symphony that is now wild and barbaric, now gorgeous even in its folk tune melancholy. It is easy to see that legends and the ancient history of Russia were in his head when he invented this music; that he had in mind convocations of princes, songs of Slav troubadors, feasts where music of old instruments swelled the exultation.

This symphony is not only program music: it brings before the hearer the stage and a superb show of feudal Russia. Mr. Rabaud, duly emphasizing the oriental insistence of themes, caught the frenzied spirit of the headlong finale, while in the two middle movements there was the requisite contrasting delicacy. And now will not Mr. Rabaud this season let us hear Borodin's first symphony, which has not been performed here since the reign of Mr. Nikisch?

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concerts next week, for the orchestra will make its second trip. The program of the concerts Dec. 13, 14 is as follows: Beethoven, Symphony, No. 8; Converse, Orchestral Fantasy, "The Mystic Trumpeter" (after Walt Whitman's poem); Guilmant, Symphony No. 1, for organ and orchestra (Joseph Bonnet, organist).

There will be no Rehearsal and Concert next week

RABAUD LIKE ST. SAENS ON EXPERIMENTS

Adv. — Dec. 1, 1918 Symphony Program Is Evidently Free From Ultra-Modernism

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

PROGRAM.

"Euryanthe Overture".....Weber
"Jupiter Symphony".....Mozart
"The Sorcerer's Apprentice".....Dukas
Symphony in B-Minor, No. 2.....Borodin

Entirely orchestral and without any novelty (for Dr. Muck has given us excellent performances of the Borodin work), but well-contrasted and a program which was free from ultra-modernism. We begin to suspect that M. Rabaud is somewhat akin to Saint-Saens and regards some of the recent radical musical experiments with suspicion. The above program, given in Symphony Hall Friday and yesterday, was the only musical occasion of Thanksgiving week, except the Sunday concert which introduced Raoul Vidal to Boston.

We emphatically indorse M. Rabaud's reading of the Weber overture. Strong contrasts, crashing chords, and a touch of sensationalism suit well to this composer who was theatrical even in his sonatas. The French operatic conductor kept up this footlight flavor excellently, and the spicy performance was much appreciated. The horns did some excellent work, and Weber always has more horns than a dilemma — and more agreeable ones. The brilliancy of the entire work was remarkable, and it was the prelude to a very sparkling concert.

RABAUD A CLASSICIST.

But the Mozart "Jupiter" symphony showed M. Rabaud as a thorough classicist also. He did not take the virility out of Mozart but gave to the symphony something of modern vigor and power. But nothing can reconcile the modern concertgoer to the old Andantes and Minuets. They are as tame in their repetitions and suavities as an eighteenth century sentimental novel ("Clarissa Harlowe" for example) would be. It is the first and last movements only which sustain the interest.

Some day a conductor will have the courage to give us single movements from the symphonies of Mozart, Haydn or Schubert. The glory of the fugue of the Finale will never grow dim. It is the only bit of quadruple counterpoint that we know of that does not seem pedantic or strained. The four voices are constantly inverting among themselves yet make fluent music in all their various positions, and they could be put in many more inversions and still be correct, had the composer defied the fear of monotony and carried them out.

This Finale was especially clear and well-balanced, making the intricate counterpoint clear even to the untrained auditor, yet probably few understood the tremendous skill of this part of the composition. It was not applauded as vehemently as some more obvious effects in the subsequent parts of the program. But to the trained musician it showed M. Rabaud in the very best light. He is proving himself a very worthy successor to his great predecessors.

PREPARING FOR JULY.

Dukas' setting of Goethe's subject is not new to Boston, but it bears repetition very well. The sorcerer's apprentice manages to change a broomstick into a water-carrier, but forgets the incantation to change him back. He remains an industrious bassoon bringing water without stint. The frenzied apprentice saws the broomstick in two; it only makes matters worse, for now he has two bassoons bringing twice as much water. Finally the master-magician returns and shuts off the water. This French "Overture to the Water-Carrier" will fit excellently after next July. It received an unctuously humorous reading and the bassoons were deserving of high praise. Poor Dukas! all his other works fall flat after this humorous masterpiece. It never pays to be as funny as one can. All in all this was the best performance of the quaint piece that we have yet had in Boston. But it was a mistake to follow this bizarrerie with more eccentricity. Mozart's symphony should have been placed between the Dukas and Borodin numbers.

Thus far the program had been theatrical, with Weber, classical and contrapuntal, with Mozart, humorous, with Dukas. It now became pompous, but in a wild, barbaric style, with Borodin. The B minor symphony is very innocent of counterpoint and of complexity. It would shrivel up before the learning of Brahms or even of Mendelssohn. It has many crudities, but it is brimful of original ideas, has an attractive splendor and gives many a new flavor. Borodin is a direct descendant from Caucasian monarchs and may claim a genealogy reaching back to King David, and the oriental rhythms of his ancestors are often present in this striking symphony. The Andante has a lofty rhapsodical character which is intended to picture the songs of the ancient bards at some Russian court. The first movement and also the Finale has the character of some barbaric festival, not in the wild, vodka-inspired vein which Tschai-kovsky sometimes used, but sufficiently gorgeous nevertheless. When I first missed the mark in my sketches we feel doubly grateful to Borodin for giving some-thing old saying runs — and you find a Borodin has scratched the veneering.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Trans. — Nov. 30, 1918
MR. RABAUD NEATLY BALANCES A PROGRAMME

Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe" and Dukas's "Sorcerer's Apprentice," a Symphony by Mozart and a Symphony by Borodin — Objective Performance of All Four Pieces—Contrasts, and Also Reflections, Along the Way

IN the days in which Maurice Grau was director of the Metropolitan Opera House, complaint arose, as it does perennially in that theatre, over the disturbance of the audience by late comers. One and another complainant suggested to the manager that performances begin a quarter or a half hour later and so give the tardy more leeway. "If we did not begin till midnight," returned the manager in his meditative voice, "there are people who would come in toward one o'clock. They're built that way." Now at the Symphony Concerts here in Boston, Mr. Rabaud's programmes are the shortest that the audiences have known in a dozen years. Intermission included, they run barely an hour and forty minutes. Yet yesterday afternoon there were enough departures before the final number to draw the attention of the casual listener. Possibly imperative engagements or the exigencies of suburban time-tables compelled them.

Quite as likely mere habit prompted them. Possibly, having heard one symphony by Mozart, some retreated before another by Borodin, even though the two musics are as far apart as the poles. Seemingly, Mr. Rabaud is inclined to programmes containing two symphonies. A fortnight hence, he proposes for the same pair of concerts one by Beethoven and another by Guilmant. A week ago Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, though only two movements span it, began the programme, while another, very complete indeed, by Saint-Saens ended it. In the nature of things, there is no reason why a conductor should not include two symphonies in a single concert, if so to do rounds his programmatic scheme and the contrast between them in matter and manner sufficiently offsets the repetition of form. Yet, in concrete practice, seldom do two symphonies stand upon one programme in orchestral concerts in the United States. Audiences are unaccustomed to more than one at a time; when they have been served with two, they used to believe that conductors were superfluously cultivating a pretentiously serious German way. Mr. Rabaud may easily escape this reproach, but it is not necessary for him to take too literally the phrase, "Symphony Concerts." Yet, one symphony or two, the early goers will hardly alter the custom that every conductor at Symphony Hall has openly or secretly resented. Mr. Grau summed the practice and the necessary resignation to it in "They're built that way."

Admirable was Mr. Rabaud's exposition of the four familiar pieces that yesterday filled his programme. He struck fire in the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," though there were moments at the beginning and at the end when the orchestra seemed hardly so ardent as he. Better the chosen strings gained the moonlit and remote beauty of the intervening slow measures. Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony rose from the conductor's hand clearly outlined, aptly paced, discreetly modulated, with more warmth and spring in the first and the final Allegros than with melancholy sentiment in the Andante or formal elegance in the Minuet. The listener heard the symphony as he might look upon a well posed, well wrought photograph of a familiar object. As fully Mr. Rabaud imparted the pictorial quality of Borodin's symphony in B minor. There was no need of printed list of the images that consciously or unconsciously crossed the composer's mind as he wrote. Rather they outstood from the clangorous music of the beginning and the end when the boyards of old Russia, throng the scene striding, feasting, exulting in their pride and power; or, again, for the slow movement, when ancient minstrels touch the strings of their gusli and sing the fates or the prowess of old legend.

There will be no Rehearsal and Concert next week

112
or when Russian fantasy and nervous exhilaration whip through the scherzo and, even so, may not quite flee melancholy.

Alike, however, for conductor, orchestra and audience, the piece of the afternoon was Dukas's tonal tale of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." For the fifteenth time it was played "at these concerts" to a public in whom familiarity seems only to multiply enjoyment. It is not distinguished music as the pieces of Dukas's Parisian generation go; in more than one quality, it is no more than workaday composition well devised for the concert-hall. As little is it distinctive of the Dukas who ascends to high and deep tonal emotion, to radiant tonal picture in his music-drama of "Ariana and Bluebeard" or who gains the poetic atmosphere, the piteous illusion of the "dance-poem" of "The Peri." In fact, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" is a homely, transparent, well made, piece of programme-music that sets a scene and tells a tale with plentiful vivacity and occasional humor. The progress of the Scherzo as such, the unfolding and the pointing of the motives whence it springs, are plain to the simplest ear; the progress and the pointing of the watery adventures of the magician and his apprentice are as clear and entertaining to the easiest-going mind. The impression, the pleasure of the whole is complete, satisfying—the more yesterday for the freshening energy, the pervading liveliness, the senso of tonal picture and tonal humor that a new conductor and a new orchestra brought to the piece. To rhythmic exactness and verve, to fancy with the conjuring measures that summon and dismiss the tale, Mr. Rabaud added a hearty plain-spoken humor, laid on a touch of burlesquing exaggeration more in accord with the piece than a forcing quest of subtle, sardonic innuendo. Dukas is still in his early fifties; he still ripens; he may yet excel "Ariana" or "The Peri," but to the public of his time, at home and abroad, he will remain Dukas of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." How many conductors and how often have blessed him for the gap in their programmes his Scherzo stands perennially ready to fill!

So ran a tranquil and pleasurable concert with room for those wandering reflections which are sauce to familiar music so objectively played as seems Mr. Rabaud's way with whatever piece he undertakes. Suppose, for example, a very courageous conductor should restore the small orchestra, as orchestras go nowadays, for which Mozart wrote this "Jupiter" symphony. Such a band need not approximate the actual numbers, if they can be ascertained, of the bands the composer himself led in such music, but it should diminish the weight of string-tone that an orchestra of 1918 by sheer body gives to measures intended to run more lightly, more pliantly than sixteen first violins, fourteen second, and the attendant violas, violoncellos and double-basses can possibly move. The unescapable volume of string tone that now encloses these eighteenth-century symphonies tends to make them rigid, precise, angular. Recall for a moment the so-called fugued finale of this "Jupiter" symphony. For a century and a quarter, it has justly passed as a masterpiece of musical scholarship, resource, elaboration. None the less it is music designed to move fleetly, brightly, as in swift and glinting pattern upon the air. Yet so many-voiced a string choir as played it yesterday, as play it nowadays wherever it is heard, thicken and stay such a music, no matter how transparent the tone, how light the figuration, how quick the pace.

From like "unavoidable circumstances," eighteenth-century minuets tend to become heavy-footed in twentieth-century performance; Allegros, like that at the beginning of the "Jupiter" symphony, in which fitful mood plays, lose the force of contrast that the composer designed from period to period; while the charm of melancholy and sentimental music-making that he would infuse into his slow movements, smothers under too ample performance. Admittedly these eighteenth-century symphonies were a thin music as modern ears measure harmonic and instrumental vesture. But, being a thin music, they are supple to the slightest inflection of the composer, turn readily into whatever arabesque his fancy or workmanship summons, are translucent to every ray of his moods. However discerning the conductor, however light-fingered and light-lipped the orchestra, the mere numbers of the band stiffen and darken this music. Moreover, if an orchestra of thirty "sounded" in the theatres where Strauss's "Ariadne on Naxos" was installed, why should not an orchestra of forty "sound" in Mozart's or Haydn's symphonies in the halls of Boston or New York, A. D. 1918?

If ever there was pure music, contained within itself and in the response of hearers, sufficient unto itself and to them, it is this "Jupiter" symphony of Vienna in 1787. In contrast, Borodin's symphony of Petrograd, ninety years later, cries out for a setting of the stage, for the mutually heightening illusion of the theatre. Mr. Diaghilev has spared not the Russian composers to meet the exigencies of his ballet. Rimsky-Korsakov's surging sea-music in "Scheherazade," has underscored the vengeance of a Sultan upon a faithless Sultana, caught in the arms of her slave. Wholly unrelated measures from Glazunov and other Muscovites have been pinned upon a choreographic tale of one of Cleopatra's nights. Only with the tone poem of Balakirev, "Thamar," has it occurred to

5-11
Mr. Diaghilev that Russians have written symphonic music that invited the picturing, the miming of the choreographic stage. The pedantic may repine as they will at the lack of "development" in Borodin's second symphony, at his short-breathed processes, less fertilizing than re-clothing his motives in whatever rhythmic and harmonic garb he can devise; at his open-voiced melodies, his candid progressions.

Yet no sooner does this music fall upon the hearer's ear than pictures, actions take shape, color, motion upon the stage of the imagination. There throng the capped, furred, multi-colored boyards between the high straight walls, under the bulging domes of monastery or castle courtyard. Then weapons clank; their march rings; loud are their voices; turbulent their bearing. Or else they feast in like barbaric splendor and tumult, their vassals shouting around them, the hot glare of Russian summer upon their heads. Or in the shadowed hall of the old king weary, minstrels touch their strings and in choir retell the legends of his folk. Music of picture, of ancient, passionate fable, of old forgotten splendors, remote but unfading; yet to no stage except that of the imagination will any one summon them. The Musorgsky of "Boris," the Rimsky of "Sadko" and many another opera is not more pictorial than the Borodin of this symphony. His opera, "Prince Igor" is often less a music of the theatre.

H. T. P.

GAY AND GRAVE BY SYMPHONY

Well Balanced and Interesting List Played

Post

Nov. 30, 1918

BY OLIN DOWNES

The programme given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, which will be repeated this evening, was one uncommonly well balanced and interesting from beginning to end: Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," Mozart's C major, or "Jupiter" symphony; Dukas' ingenious piece, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" and Borodin's second symphony.

ENTERING "MODERN" FIELD

Mr. Rabaud appears to be building, slowly but surely, commencing with classic masterworks, wherein he is sure of technical perfection already established on the part of the orchestra, and gradually entering the modern field. It may here be admitted that the words "classic" and "modern" are not as easy to define as they may appear to be. It is likely that the virile and gorgeously colored symphony of Borodin will be less modern than the "Jupiter" symphony of Mozart in years to come. The finale of this latter symphony is still a wonder of wonders of workmanship and inspiration. The slow movement is one of pure and ineffable beauty, a beauty found only in Mozart, and in no other composer of his time or this one. It is a symphony for which Mr. Rabaud is apparently exceptionally equipped by tastes and training.

He gives a romantic reading of a romantic work—the "Euryanthe" overture, which, despite its measures of fustian in the opening, and in the more or less conventional flourishes of the reprise, is ultra-romantic in the mysterious middle portion. Dukas' "Sorcerer's Apprentice" is about as far as one work could be from another, when one compares it with Weber's music. It is an extra brilliant piece. Whether it matches in value the superbly colored ballet music from "The Peri," which Mr. Monteux introduced in this city, is another question. The infernal cleverness of Dukas is not for us so happily distinguished in "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" as it is in the later ballet. The themes of the former are not modern French nor pleasingly exotic, as they are in the ballet. They are, in fact, commonplace in a Gounodish manner. Nevertheless the piece is witty, very well made, and instrumentated with a master hand.

Borodin's music is more natural, echoing, to be sure, his opera, "Prince Igor," but having in it something of the vigor and the freedom of those epic days of ancient Russia of which one has a taste in literature, such as the "Taras Bulba" of Gogol. The winds of the steps, the clash of arms, the joy of roving peoples, are strongly felt, at least by the writer, in these pages.

RABAUD CONDUCTS DUKAS BRILLIANTLY

9 Cobe Nov. 30, 1918
Treats Mozart With Fine
Taste and Skill

Mr Rabaud showed at yesterday afternoon's concert with what authority, taste and skill he could discriminate among three compositions for orchestra as radically diverse in character and school as a symphony of Mozart, a modern French tone-poem, a symphony from one of the Russian nationalists, in part racial if not highly distinctive or representative, and as a prelude to all, an overture of Weber's, that to "Eury-anthe," of flamboyant romanticism and a passage for the upper strings of real musical beauty.

The "Jupiter" symphony yesterday was an instructive study in color, style and regard for period. It would not have been easy to believe that it was the same body of strings playing the finely spun Mozart that immediately after contributed to the scintillating performance of Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." The fineness of Mozart's structure, its classic purity of line, its faultless proportion, its cool order and repose even in the ardent fugal dialogue of the remarkable last movement and the transparent clearness of every bar—all were to be found in a reading no less admirable for the quiet authority with which it was set forth than for the perception and sensibility which were its source.

But the feature of the afternoon was Mr Rabaud's brilliant performance of Dukas' scherzo. At last this score of exquisite conceit and fantasy has been heard favored with a resilient Gallic wit and imagination. There was piquant, pungent incisiveness, drollery elbowing flashing humor, in all, the satire of champagne or of the poignard, never of the bludgeon. The composer of the fanciful "Marouf" illumined Dukas' score as neither of his two immediate predecessors. The orchestra played superbly for him and the performance was applauded with unwonted vigor.

Borodin's second symphony is more Russian in the chanting theme of the first movement and some of its ponderous variants than, for example, in the second. Composed of material originally intended for other works, the score lacks coherence and sustained interest, as it does evidences of marked invention. There is not the color of Rimsky-Korsakow nor the sheer dramatic force of Moussorgsky. Mr Rabaud did not sandpaper the Slavic virility in the first movement and made the most of the last.

Nov. 30, Music in Boston 1918.
Specially for The Christian Science Monitor
Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, fifth concert of thirty-eighth season, Symphony Hall, Boston, afternoon of Nov. 29, 1918. The program: Weber, Overture to "Euryanthe"; Mozart, Symphony in C major, "Jupiter" (K. 551); Dukas, Scherzo, "L'Apprenti Sorcier" ("The Sorcerer's Apprentice"); Borodin, Symphony in B minor, No. 2.

BOSTON, Massachusetts — Some day a conductor may be found who will have the courage to dismiss half of his strings just before a Mozart number, gather the rest in a compact body about the small group of wood winds and brass which are specified by a Mozart score, and the result will be a tonally sufficient but plastic orchestra that might make the music sound as it is written. The restful and pleasantly definite music of Mozart, with no uncertainties of development and no astounding statements of ideas, is good to hear occasionally in the midst of the clamant outpourings of our own day. The restfulness of the "Jupiter" symphony was misinterpreted by the men of the Boston Orchestra as somnolence, and in spite of the efforts of the conductor, and these were vigorous and earnest, the symphony had a sluggishness and rigidity that must have enraged Mr. Rabaud as much as it bored the audience. Mr. Rabaud's efforts had been unable to rouse the players in the "Euryanthe" overture. Only with the second half of the program did the orchestra show anywhere near the verve which Mr. Rabaud had been demanding. "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" had the dash which the baffled conductor had been seeking and the men succeeded in furnishing, at its climax, the great moment of the afternoon.

The rigidity and heaviness of the strings, anathema in Mozart, were just what Borodin demanded for the sombre grandiloquence of the opening measures of his Second Symphony. Borodin, after all, does not have a great deal to say in this symphony, and its chief merit lies in the fact that its dimensions are compacted into correspondence with its paucity of ideas. The sonorous quality and the strongly tinged national feeling are of interest, but there is a disturbing lack of skill in transition and a want of cleverness in invention.

On Sunday, Nov. 24, Raoul Vidas, the new young French violinist, appeared in Boston, sharing his program with Miss Rosita Renard, the Chilean pianist. Mr. Vidas made a marked impression for he has a remarkable tone and a gracious approach to his audience. He is a young man who is fully capable of making his own way and that without the artificial methods that have attended the advance of some of his colleagues among the younger violinists.

Items and Announcements

The Symphony Orchestra left Boston last evening for its second journey of the season to New York and the other cities southward that it regularly visits. In none of them has Mr. Rabaud yet been heard as conductor, and curiosity runs correspondingly high. In New York on Thursday evening he will repeat the programme of his first concerts in Boston—Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Saint-Saëns's tone-poem, "The Youth of Hercules," and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice." In the same city on Saturday afternoon, he and the orchestra will play the pieces in which they were heard here last week—the "Jupiter" symphony of Mozart, the second symphony of Borodin, Dukas's tonal tale of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," and Weber's overture to his opera "Euryanthe." Elsewhere one and another of these numbers, plus Beethoven's seventh symphony, furnish forth the programme.

F. S. CONVERSE,

ORCHESTRAL
peter," after

GUILMANT,

SYMPHONY Orchestra
Cadenza

Solo

JOSEPH

The Listener's Mind

That's the worst symphony I ever heard in my life. I don't see how the orchestra can play it and keep their faces straight. I almost wish I hadn't come. And the symbolistic explanation in the programme notes is ridiculous. Still, a sense of humor doesn't go with the musical temperament. We can't have everything.

I hope I can carry that hat ahead of me in my mind until I get home to a pencil and paper. Aline can copy it perfectly. The brim is brought right up in the back and continued as the crown. It's an awfully smart idea.

That number was better. Such a contrast! I feel so uplifted when I listen to great music. It brings the tattered ends of existence right together, somehow. Art is wonderful. I'm definitely convinced by this time that I like it better than nature. Of course I might like nature better if I weren't so near-sighted and could tell the flowers and birds apart with greater ease, but even so, I'm pretty sure that I like the things man has made better than the things God has made. I don't think it's sacrilegious, either. God made man, so it's all the same. And man is only working out his own divinity when he produces art. What's that Joyce Kilmer couplet?

Poems are made by fools like me,
But only God can make a tree.

I don't know. Perhaps I'm wrong.

I must ask the superintendent tomorrow if he'll let me have my bedroom floor painted. If he won't, there's no use putting all that money into having the furniture redone. And I want all the side lights in the entire apartment yanked out. They're so unæsthetic. I can have lamps at different levels.

Thank Heaven the pianist is good-looking! One critic said she had the poise of a Paderewski. I hate this side of the hall. You never can see their fingers. . . . This is the last time I shall bring Elena to a concert. When she talks, she talks right out loud. And I can't very well shush her. She's older than I am.

My watch has stopped! And I shan't have the slightest idea when to go out. Ned said he'd be at the Ritz at 4.30. It says 3.45 now, but of course I haven't any idea how long it hasn't been going. Life is hard. . . . They're going to play the "Love-Death" from "Tristan." If I'd known that, wild horses couldn't have dragged me away early. Not only do I adore it but I want to see if Mrs. William Jay stalks out and leaves Mr. Stransky flat. [Baird Leonard in The New York Telegraph].

116

6-1

117

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1918--19.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

HENRI RABAUD, Conductor.

SIXTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 13, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 14, AT 8 P. M.

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY in F major, No. 8, op. 93

- I. Allegro vivace e con brio
 - II. Allegretto Scherzando
 - III. Tempo di menuetto
 - IV. Allegro vivace
-

CONVERSE,

ORCHESTRAL FANTASY, "The Mystic Trumpeter," op. 19, (after the Poem by Walt Whitman)

GUILMANT,

SYMPHONY in D minor, No. 1, for Organ and Orchestra, op. 42

- I. Largo e maestoso. Allegro
- II. Pastorale: Andante quasi allegretto
- III. Finale: Allegro assai

Cadenza by Joseph Bonnet

Soloist:

JOSEPH BONNET

Drawn for The Christian Science Monitor

Joseph Bonnet, organist

SIXTH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Opens with Beethoven
Work—Converse's "Mystic Trumpeter" Given

ORGANIST BONNET'S FIRST APPEARANCE

By PHILIP HALE

The sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Rabaud, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Symphony, No. 8; Converse, "The Mystic Trumpeter," Orchestral Fantasy (after the poem of Walt Whitman); Guilmant, Symphony, No. 1, for organ and orchestra. Joseph Bonnet, organist, played for the first time at these concerts.

By this time no one in Boston believes that only a German can interpret the music of Beethoven. Messrs. Rabaud, Monteux and Messager have proved that the old idea, long entertained by some in this city, was absurdly false. Beethoven did not write his music for a parish or a country; he wrote it for the world. Nowhere has Beethoven's purely orchestral music been performed with greater reverence and with more brilliant and emotional results than in the city of Paris. Nowhere has it been more appreciated and with finer discrimination than in Paris. The performances by the Société des Concerts du Conservatoire under Habeneck moved Richard Wagner to enthusiasm. Habeneck's successors maintained the reputation of the preceding performances. At the Chatelot and at the Lamoureux concerts the symphonies of Beethoven have been often and superbly performed, nor has the public appreciation of these works, awakened by Habeneck, waned with the years.

Too often in Boston a symphony by Beethoven has been treated by conductor, orchestra and audience as an old and highly respectable relative whose annual visits were to be treated with perfunctory courtesy. Four or five symphonies were expected in the season; the sooner they were over, the better. Tribute to a great man had been paid.

Yesterday Beethoven's Eighth, which has not been the most "popular" of the last seven, assumed an importance that made some wonder why its peculiar eminence had not been sooner recognized. Mr. Rabaud did not bring about this result by any extravagance in tempo, in phrasing, or by the discovery of "inner and concealed" melodic phrases. He brought it about by legitimate and musical means. His choice of tempi was happy; the cantabile phrases were sung expressively, but without too great freedom; there was elasticity, not licentiousness. How effectively he prepared the climaxes, with inevitable quickening of the pace that carried with it the expectation of the hearer! The climax, then, was as convincing as any natural phenomenon. There was no attempt to give passing measures, more or less conventional grave significance. There was clear and logical thought; there was truly musical rhetoric. In this symphony there are pages that reveal as in no other one of the Nine, characteristics of Beethoven: whimsicality, even freakishness; humor that is akin to practical joking, a certain coarseness that is to be found in the work of nearly every genius; the coarseness, not vulgarity, not commonness, of a virile, mighty nature. These characteristics are plainly shown in the last movement; and in this movement, near the end, is an unexpected, almost irrelevant episode, that sets the hearer a-dreaming, measures that only Beethoven could have written; an irresistible effect gained by a surprising economy of means.

Mr. Converse's "Mystic Trumpeter," first performed in Philadelphia nearly 13 years ago, was suggested, as is well known, by a poem of Walt Whitman. The fantasia follows with one exception the sections of the poem: the visions of a rapt bard excited by the notes of a wild trumpeter, "some strange musician, hovering unseen in air"; of "the cool, refreshing night, the walks of Paradise"; of love, with Whitman's apostrophe that might be compared with the opening of Swinburne's Prelude to his "Tristram and Iseult"; of shipwreck, murder, war; of all humiliated, offended, dejected; of mankind at last a reborn race, joyous, exultant. This poem, surely, enwrapped the composer, for without being literal in translation, without the attempt at realism that is too often impotent, he has rhapsodically turned the poet's free verse into glowing, and dramatic, musical expression.

It has been said that the foreign conductors of this orchestra have not rehearse faithfully the pieces of American composers. The statement, unjust and peevish, came as a rule from composers whose music made no marked impression on the audience. We do not believe that any conductor deliberately slighted in rehearsal any American composer. Whether his interpretation was intelligent is another matter. That depended on the nature and ability of the conductor. Mr. Rabaud, who has shown since his arrival, genuine interest in orchestral works of Americans, gave a most eloquent reading of Mr. Converse's Fantasia. The music itself and the performance of the orchestra awakened the enthusiasm of the audience. The applause, which Mr. Converse acknowledged modestly, was much more than a genial compliment to him; it was the public expression of delight at hearing an engrossing and imaginative work by an American sympathetically interpreted by a Frenchman.

Mr. Bonnet is not a stranger in Boston. A virtuoso of the first rank and an accomplished musician, he has awakened interest in the organ and in its ancient and modern literature. He chose yesterday the symphony of Guilmant, familiar to all organists in the form of a solo sonata. The Pastorale is charming in every way. The other movements are effective for concert use, although the thematic material in itself and in its development is not of conspicuous quality. Guilmant afterwards wrote compositions that redound more to his credit than the first and third movements of this symphony. Mr. Bonnet, who introduced a cadenza of his own, played in a masterly manner.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: D'Indy, "Wallenstein," trilogy after Schiller's poem; Chopin, concerto in E minor (Josef Hofmann, pianist); Berlioz, overture to "King Lear."

An Organist at the Symphony Concert

Adm. & Anti. — Dec. 15, 1918

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

PROGRAM.

Beethoven, Eighth Symphony.

Converse, The Mystic Trumpeter. Orchestral Fantasy.

Guilmant, Symphony in D minor, for Organ and Orchestra.

Soloist—M. Joseph Bonnet.

OUR French conductors have given us a rather continuous succession of Beethoven this season. Can it be possible that they have the idea that we need to be educated in the standard classics? We can assure them that we are familiar with Beethoven, and while familiarity does not breed contempt, in this case, much repetition may lead to a craving for a change; we may even hanker for the fleshpots of Wagner.

But the eighth symphony is short and bright and never wears out its welcome. We can imagine the modern symphonists, who take more room than the Mauritania to turn about in, sniffing at a symphony only a half an hour in length. All the dainty and piquant points were brought out broadly (sometimes too broadly) in the reading. The pretty dialogue in the second movement between the violins and the cellos was exquisitely played, and the sudden capricious end of this movement had just the right brusquerie. The playful antique minuet was like an echo of Mozart, but the finale was the gem of it all. The contrabasses interrupted the innocent flute in the most comical manner—in a sudden jump from the garret to the basement of the orchestra—and the kettle-drums and bassoons played their very unusual duet in the properly grotesque manner. In one sense the bassoon was Beethoven's favorite instrument; he was almost always jolly when he wrote for it. In this symphony bassoons, contrabasses and kettle-drums are dragged curiously into the foreground, and the whole work is humor shaped in a most classical form. It was, however, a little over-emphasized.

Converse's composition is founded on Walt Whitman's poem of the same title. How many errors literary people make when they get on musical ground! Here is Whitman (in the full version of the poem) telling his musician to sound

"Thy cornet, echoing, pealing;" whereas a true trumpeter would decline to play a cornet. In like manner Coleridge speaks of the wedding guest hearing "the loud bassoon," while the bassoon is neither loud nor likely to be especially prominent at weddings. And Tennyson invites Maud to come into the garden to hear a band composed of "violin, flute, bassoon," which would rival the worst street band one could possibly hear. The poets are not reliable musical guides.

However, Mr. Converse has given the trumpeter his proper instrument and made it fairly prominent (it might have been more so), and it was well played in this tone picture. We have always considered Mr. Converse one of the best masters of orchestration that we possess on this side of the Atlantic, and he here makes some fine contrasts between Peace and War which come home to us more pregnantly than when we heard the work ten years ago. The note of Triumph, which forms the climax, is also very fitting today, and the composition comes very close to us because it fits well to the present times.

There is much obbligate work in the piece and harp, oboe, bass clarinet and piccolo were almost as prominent as the trumpeter aforesaid, especially the piccolo with its reminiscence of "Marching Through Georgia." The climaxes are gloriously worked up, even if the work is somewhat fragmentary, not sufficiently unified. It received a finer reading than it has ever had in Boston. M. Rabaud interpreted it magnificently and the result was an overwhelming public enthusiasm which was poured out upon both conductor and composer, the latter being obliged to rise twice from his seat in acknowledgment.

The concert ended with a prominent and unusual display of organ combined with orchestra. We have far too little organ-music in Boston concerts. Considering that Boston possesses such great concert organists as George E. Whiting, Wallace Goodrich, Henry M. Dunham, and others, we ought to have regular organ recitals here as they have in Portland.

The instrument in Symphony Hall is a peculiar one. It is excellent in quality and has enough variety of stops. It would be better if it had four manuals (as the organs in Emmanuel, Old South and Immaculate Conception) instead of three. The console, designed by Mr. Lang, is rather complicated, so much so that Mr. Clarence Eddy once spent an entire week in practice upon it, in order to get full control of its resources.

The Guilmant symphony (originally a solo sonata written for the inauguration of the new organ in Notre Dame, Paris), was made by him into an organ concerto, under the symphonic title. It is very difficult to combine the two forces successfully. The best method is to have the work largely antiphonal, between organ and orchestra, and Guilmant has made full use of this device. He has achieved a popular work, in the best sense of the word, and the last movement is something more than that. In the first movement there are some frank efforts to catch the public, some moments of mere prettiness. The second movement is a good compromise between the classical and popular, for the untrained auditor will find plenty of melody to enjoy, while the musician will note some very good counterpoint in the treatment, particularly canonic work.

But the Finale is the really artistic part of the symphony. Here one finds all the difficulty of an advanced organ toccata, and yet the orchestral development is by no means slighted. There is good, logical figure treatment, clean through to the Coda, with most brilliant organ work for both manuals and pedals, and M. Joseph Bonnet was very effective in this most difficult movement. His own cadenza added to the display work of the symphony, and was not only well played, but was a good piece of musical construction. It had some difficult and rapid pedalling. All through the work Guilmant's skill and tact in working up to a climax was in evidence. If there was occasionally a touch of French confectionery there was also a fine exhibition of Gallic tact, grace and skill in working up climaxes, which made the work a triumph for the composer, for M. Bonnet, for M. Rabaud, and for our great orchestra, which has proved recently that it is not going backwards under the new regime, great as its preceding conductors have been. M. Bonnet was recalled at the end with great applause. Instead of rushing for coatroom and trolleys almost the entire audience remained to show their appreciation of the great work and the great organist who had interpreted it.

BONNET SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY

Organ Virtuoso Plays Guilmant's First
Symphony

Post — Dec. 14, 1918
BY OLIN DOWNES

Joseph Bonnet, organist and composer, was soloist at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Bonnet played the symphony for organ and orchestra, No. 1, op. 42, of his master, Alexandre Guilmant.

The other compositions performed were F. S. Converse's tone-poem after Walt Whitman, "The Mystic Trumpeter," and Beethoven's eighth symphony.

BONNET THE PAST MASTER

It is rarely indeed that an organist, not a regular member of an orchestra, but a traveling virtuoso and composer, is invited to officiate at a symphony concert. The organ is seldom thought of as a solo instrument. Perhaps the unusual sight of the organist laboring manfully at his instrument, hands, head and feet moving with vigor if not precision, is prejudicial to his chances with the managers. Where should the organist be seated? Yesterday Mr. Bonnet set in full view of the audience, and for those who are appreciative of organ technic his mastery of pedals as well as manuals was evident to the eye as to the ear.

Mr. Bonnet is indeed a past master of his instrument and in every respect a great musician. It would be superfluous to refer to the extraordinary finish and brilliancy of his technic, his infallibly precise attack and release, the cleanness of his rapid passages and the perfect legato which he maintains when he desires it in passages of the most complicated voice-leading. This is the machinery of his art, long since perfected. It served to conceal the difficulty of his enormous physical accomplishment and to make certain the force and breadth of his style, the authority with which he now supported and now led on the orchestra; his skill in color obtained through the most artistic registration; and the astonishing vitality and precision of his rhythm. The concerto itself is conspicuous for its solid workmanship, the master, of form and the very effective and harmonious instrumentation. But with a less effective opportunity to display his mastery, Mr. Bonnet would have made a lasting impression on his audience.

Converse's Tone Poem

Mr. Converse's tone-poem wears well with the years. It was composed in 1904 and was first heard in Boston in 1907. The mood is lofty, the prelude and the opening solo of the mystic trumpeter establish a noble and poetic mood. The principal phases of Whitman's verses are freely followed. The harmonic scheme of the love-music is well conceived as a contrast to that of the opening. The music of war is stirring, nor is the quotation of a few measures from "Marching Through Georgia" incongruous. The conclusion is highly effective, and a worthy capstone of the work which we personally consider Mr. Converse's finest accomplishment for orchestra. This work should be heard much oftener. The performance of Mr. Rabaud was a very brilliant one, and the composer bowed his acknowledgements from an obscure corner of the hall.

Rabaud the Classicist

Mr. Rabaud strengthens one's impressions of his exceptional gift as a classicist. His readings of symphonic music of the classic school revitalize these works, not in an impudent or unduly modernist spirit, but in a manner which impresses anew on the hearer the vigor and human meaning of the music, and the incalculable significance of great musical form.

As for the symphony—is it not one of the most unique accomplishments of genius? The traditions of the symphony and the orchestra were maintained in this performance, one of uncommon eloquence.

ANOTHER BRILLIANT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mr Bonnet Plays Superbly in Guilmant Symphony

9 cols — Dec. 14/18
In "The Mystic Trumpeter" of Mr. Frederick S. Converse of this city, Mr. Rabaud conducted a score yesterday afternoon with which he probably was less familiar, if at all, than other modern works on his programs thus far, such as Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

There was the greater admiration for his brilliant performance, admiration, for it was euphonious, plastic, emotional and at moments highly dramatic orchestral playing irrespective of a program. It was also a performance throwing into new relief admirable qualities in workmanship and expression in Mr. Converse's treatment of Walt Whitman's poem, which for his purpose he divided into five parts. "elemental phases—mystery and peace, love, war or struggle, humiliation and finally joy." The inspiring vision—the human, wholesome, heartening optimism of the poet—is reflected in many of these pages, and Mr. Rabaud, consciously or unconsciously, was partner to it. There was idealism in the love music, a noble sympathy in the slow movement which did not become lachrymose, and in the last pages an exultation—yesterday even a fine frenzy—which did not become bombast. A score with qualities which may be called characteristically "American," one curiously appropriate in thought and illuminating in expression for this time,

The composer twice acknowledged the enthusiastic reception by the audience. No remembered performance of it was to be compared to this.

Joseph Bonnet, the distinguished French organist, appeared as soloist for the first time at these concerts, playing Guilmant's first symphony in D minor for organ and orchestra. By his appearances here in recital on this same organ, the beauty of which is too rarely heard, and on the fine instrument at the New Old South Church, Mr. Bonnet revealed the true distinction of his art. Yesterday he again played as a master in his consummate skill with pedals and manuals, in his judicious and illuminating registration, in the breath and repose of his style, his virtuosity in bravura, his taste and characteristic sense of proportion, and no less than these, in the invention and admirable development found in his own cadenza and the brilliance with which he played it.

Many gladly would have heard Mr. Bonnet, whose repertory is extensive, add solo numbers more representative of his modern school. Mr. Rabaud aided in a splendid performance.

An excellent performance of Beethoven's "little" symphony, the 8th, began the concert.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Trans. — Dec. 14, 1918
BEETHOVEN, MR. CONVERSE AND AN ORGANIST

Mr. Bonnet as "Assisting Artist" in a Piece That Well Displays Him as Virtuoso and Musician — "The Mystic Trumpeter" Deservedly Heard Again—Mr. Rabaud Freshens Another Classic

SUPER-SENSITIVE persons, unable to divorce the impressions of the eye from the impressions of the ear, have sometimes suggested that for the full enjoyment of symphonic music, the playing orchestra should be invisible. Then would the listener hear with mind and heart, understanding, imagination, emotion, a seeming music of the air to produce which no visible violinists laid bows to strings, no horn-players perceptibly puffed their cheeks; no drum-sticks rose and fell flail-like; while the conductor was a spiritual rather than a bodily presence. Finical desires no doubt, born often of amiable, amusing affectation, perilously touching the institutional habits of the concert-hall, yet desires that an incident of the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon seemed in measure to justify. For the first time within the longest memory, a visiting organist was the "assisting artist" of the day, no other, indeed, than Joseph Bonnet, most noted in Europe and in America of all his Parisian generation. To display the better, perhaps, one side of his technical skill, the organ was set close to the front of the stage with keyboard, stops and pedals in full view. Upon the bench, back to the audience, in sight of every eye that chose to seek him, sat Mr. Bonnet, pulling stops at need, plying feet or hands or both as the measures of the music demanded, occasionally swinging his body, as it were, into his playing, doing whatever the manifold and exacting technique of the organ requires. He was as unobtrusive as he might be in these spirited exercises; he gave them, even, pictorial quality; unquestionably they much interested the spectators which most hearers became; presumably to not a few they were clearest proof of Mr. Bonnet's high resource as a virtuoso. Yet would the impression have been diminished had Mr. Bonnet's "footwork," for example, been discreetly concealed behind his instrument, had Guilmant's symphony for organ and orchestra seemed less to the eye energetic and fluent manufacture on the part of the organist? After all the profit that students drew from such observation of "the master" is only a detail of the Symphony Concerts, designed as they are rather to be heard than seen.

The obvious retort is, of course, that Guilmant's symphony is a displayful piece, existing by and for the abilities and distinctions of the organist whom it joins to the orchestra; that when that organist is as illustrious as Mr. Bonnet his hearers are nothing loth to see him also at his task. The symphony has indeed little intrinsic quality except as a "vehicle." The motives whence it springs, the course that they follow, the meagre transformations and enrichments that they undergo interest only as they serve the range of the organ. In the course of the piece it is heard in sonorous proclamation and peroration, in rapid and ornate passages, in songful measures, in intricate unions of diverse voices in deep or delicate play of color. It joins itself to the orchestra; it makes contrast to it; it exchanges measures with the other choirs; it seeks now and then artful euphonies. But it remains essentially an instrument to be displayed while the music is the means to that display. Thus the symphony, plus the organist's own cadenza, disclosed almost to the full his mastery of nearly every process that summons diversifies or controls the voice of the organ. Mr. Bonnet's resource therewith was inexhaustible, his surety unshakable; his ease the mantle that hid his pains. Furthermore, this organ part of Guilmant's studious fashioning revealed him as the musician alert to rhythm, sensitive to color, at once precise and plastic, designing, accomplishing not for himself but for his instrument and for a symphony that at moments seemed hardly to deserve such pains. For steadily Mr. Bonnet took thought of the orchestra as partner with him. Glorifying his instrument, glorifying his piece he shone the more for himself.

For one of the two numbers that fell to Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra the conductor made significantly wise choice. The Symphony Concerts have long been hospitable to the music of American composers; one after another, five and six in a given season. Their pieces have been played to be well or ill received, to show enduring or only passing deserts. Yet, whatever the intrinsic merit, the temper of the audience or the judgment of the conductor, they have forthwith in many an instance been laid aside and speedily forgotten. Their fate in this respect has been in no wise different from that which has befallen other novel pieces from European pens. Once the "novelty" has vanished the choosing conductors have lost interest. Yet manifestly not a little of this music deserves to be established in the active repertory of the orchestra, would yield quite as much pleasure as many a reiterated number that it now contains. In 1907, for example, Dr. Muck produced Mr. Converse's fantasia upon Walt Whitman's poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter." It was meritorious music, interesting to all concerned, illusory and impressive to many, bearing witness, above almost any other of his work, to the composer's abilities. Yet until Mr. Rabaud revived it yesterday, through eleven years it had been heard not at all, or only once at most, in the course of nearly three hundred Symphony Concerts. To all intents and purposes Mr. Rabaud was producing a new piece; once more it proved worth; once more music and composer were warmly applauded; yet again presumably into the archives it will go—perhaps for another term of years. Now the way to foster American music is not merely to play it as novelty, but to keep so much of it as deserves such place in the active repertory of symphony concerts.

Again, yesterday, there was no questioning the fair deserts of Mr. Converse's fantasia. Whitman's poem invites translation into tones. In it, he hears his "Mystic trumpeter" sounding as in the music of the air, amorous longing, the zests and the struggle of men as in warfare, the pains of defeat, humiliation, self-abasement, the joy of full and ardent life. Whitman could summon these sensations only in the illusion and the emotion of words. Mr. Converse invokes them in the music in which the poet feigned to hear them. The design of his fantasia lies ready to his hand—the prelude that calls the trumpeter into tonal being as in a rapture of listening; the divisions in which, in Whitman's word, the trumpet "blows" of love, of struggle, of humiliation, of exultation; the linking measures in which the trumpet changes voice for new song. Such a fantasia cannot miss unity, progress, contrast. In the fulfilling of this design, Mr. Converse writes with an invention and imagination, a fullness and freedom not always at his command. As music, the fantasia interests the ear in matter and movement, in skilful and fertile treatment. As expression of the mood, emotion, illusion of the poem, it is graphic, eloquent. Seldom has Mr. Converse so well sustained a tonal flight, seldom has he written music to which his hearers make so ready answer with understanding and mood. It is quite true that fantasia bears no mark of genius; it is not necessary that it should. It is true as well that Mr. Converse's music does not teem with an innate or a willed originality. On the other hand it is music that by able means and an honest eloquence altogether achieves its end. Now much of the music heard at symphony concerts anywhere is no more than such.

The other of Mr. Rabaud's purely orchestral numbers was a repertory piece reanimated—Beethoven's eighth symphony—the symphony of the composer in the highest of playful spirits—ticking Allegretto, sportive rather than stately Minuet, gayly bristling Finale and all the familiar rest. At moments it is music of a careless energy as when toward the end Beethoven piles chord upon chord in sheer caprice of hearty reiteration; again, it is light running fancy as when the Allegretto ticks out its tune; again as in the first movement, it sounds as music written from sheer exuberant impulse; while of a sudden, as in the Finale, it becomes for a space the music of Beethoven, dreamer of dreams—and for no reason at all except his own impulse. Beyond any other of his symphonies, it is music flung off as the mood prompted, in a kind of happy release, falling on the instant into the form that will most readily contain it, into the progress that will best give it life. Objective as always, but discerningly, communicatively objective, Mr. Rabaud caught in pace and accent, transition, climax, contrast, this animation, fitfulness, exuberance. Nor had the orchestra lost skill in the feats of fleetness that the music bids it do. Mr. Rabaud's hand was brisk and keen; at every stroke his band answered to it.

H. T. P.

WHAT N. Y. SAID OF RABAUD

Henri Rabaud made his first appearance in New York as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Thursday night in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Huneker, reviewing his performance for the Times, made this witty summary of the characteristics of Boston Symphony conductors, past and present: "George Henschel, a singer whose orchestra did not sing; Wilhelm Gericke, a drillmaster of exquisite taste; Arthur Nikisch, a poet plus a prima donna; Emil Paur, a temperament without style; Fiedler, a German; Karl Muck, a stylist without dramatic temperament; Pierre Monteux, French, but not Gallic; Henri Rabaud—a conductor, and, as conductors go nowadays, that is praise, indeed."

"He is," continues Mr. Huneker, "a cerebral conductor. He is sensitive to form. His phrasing reveals not only the large pulsation, but also the articulation of the phrase; yet, he is not petit-maitre, or meticulous. His feeling for nuance rather than undue insistence on color was rather a relief. In this he follows the lead of Paul Verlaene, who celebrated the superiority of nuance over color in a line which might have been written by the pedantic Boileau. And the mere rhetoric of conducting makes little appeal to the new man. In a word a Frenchman, ruled by tact and a fine sense of tonal balance. But cerebral."

Mr. Huneker thought that Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, which Mr. Rabaud conducted in Boston, was "academic, not Napoleonic. The mighty paws of the lion were encased in the finest Parisian kid. Neither Beethoven nor the First Consul were among the mourners."

"The Saint-Saens tone-poem, 'Le Rouet d'Omphale,' not so popular as the other three poems, yet of deeper musical significance... gave us a better chance than the symphony to gauge the main qualities of the conductor. The weight and dramatic emphasis which were lacking before here were in high relief. More than a moiety of the old plangency of the strings was heard; and the elasticity of attack and release in massed episodes made me sure that the orchestra was ruled by a benign musical influence."

Boston Music Notes

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor
Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, sixth concert of thirty-eighth season, Symphony Hall, Boston, afternoon of Dec. 13, 1918, Joseph Bonnet, soloist. The program: Beethoven, Symphony No. 8, F major, Op. 93; Converse, "The Mystic Trumpeter," Orchestral Fantasy, Op. 19 (after the poem of Walt Whitman); Guilmant, Symphony No. 1, D-minor, for organ and orchestra, Op. 42.

BOSTON, Massachusetts—It is perhaps an illuminating commentary on the present stage of our musical development that a piece composed 14 years ago should not yet sound old-fashioned. Mr. F. S. Converse's cleverly wrought fantasy called "The Mystic Trumpeter," after the poem by Walt Whitman, played on the sixth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sounded as fresh, alluring, and, to some probably, as cacophonous as it did when it had its first public hearing, in Philadelphia, on March 3, 1905. Such faith have we, however, in the value of the music of the present day that we should like to hazard a guess that the number who found it discordant on Dec. 13, 1918, was far less than on Jan. 26, 1907, when it had its first Boston hearing. We have been freed from many supposedly inflexible conditions attending the writing of music since the beginning of this century, which is only another way of saying that we have allowed vast new fields of color to be opened up for us to enjoy. There is far more turbulence in the note of joy with which Mr. Converse's piece ends than in the more placid gladness at the ending of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, but who shall say that the joyousness of Mr. Converse's joy is any degree less than Beethoven's?

Joseph Bonnet took the solo part in the Guilmant Symphony for organ and orchestra, playing a cadenza of his own. This is noble music, and Mr. Bonnet's playing of this great work by his teacher added brilliance to a scintillant score. The smoothness and perfect rhythm of the organist's pedaling called forth a gasp of astonished admiration from the organists in the audience.

The Eighth Beethoven Symphony received what seemed to be a somewhat perfunctory reading, in which the desired clarity and crispness was lacking.

At its third concert in Cambridge on the evening of Thursday, Dec. 12, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Rabaud, played the César Franck D Minor Symphony in a manner that stirred the house into spontaneous and prolonged applause. Miss Rosita Renard was the soloist, playing the Liszt E flat major concerto. A third number on the program was Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony.

On the afternoon of Saturday, Dec. 7, Miss Aurore La Croix revived the pleasant custom, heretofore neglected this year in Boston, of Saturday afternoon recitals by visiting artists, in Jordan Hall. Miss La Croix is a most agreeable player, happily lacking in brute strength but possessing as compensation full measure of appreciation of the poetry of the composition in hand. The Chopin E Major Etude marked the high point of her afternoon's work, although from the

126
Opus 42 of Schubert was probably the most interesting. It was an admirable performance of a work which sets forth only mildly interesting ideas.

The Sunday afternoon concert of Dec. 8 was divided between Hipolito Lazaro, tenor, and Sasha Jacobsen, violinist. Mr. Lazaro, prodigal as we expect his race to be of florid, ringing tone, made a praiseworthy attempt to differentiate between the dramatic and the lyric styles. He was notably freer and more at home, however, in the excerpts from the operas of his repertory than in the songs wherein he will some day make an artistic mark. Mr. Jacobsen played with an agreeable tone and showed that he had a good idea of the value of a phrase. Heinrich Gebhard gave a piano recital on the afternoon of Tuesday.

Olin Downes Says Combination of French Organist and Symphony Conductor Rabaud Will Be Musical Treat of the Season.

Post Dec. 8/18
BY OLIN DOWNES

Ask almost any devout student of the organ to describe the French school, and he will say, "First there was Lemmens and Cesar Franck, then there was Guilmant; now there is Bonnet." He will probably go on to speak particularly if he has studied in Paris, of the present week's pair of Boston Symphony concerts, in which Mr. Rabaud, newly from Paris, will co-operate with Joseph Bonnet himself, also from Paris, and some more distinguished French musicians, round about them, to play the mountainous symphony in D minor for organ and orchestra by Guilmant, also from Paris, and beloved of them all.

This student will take particular delight upon this occasion, in the unchurchlike chance to watch Bonnet's swift fingers and phenomenal feet, likewise to applaud at will. Question him about Bonnet, and he will remind you that Bonnet is the first pupil of Guilmant, and his successor as organist of the Conservatoire—the most honored post in France. That Bonnet's staccato touch by which he turns out his clean-cut rhythms is known the world over (by organists, at least). That his Bach is incomparable, his erudition huge, and his memory unbelievable—he gave a historical series of 40 recitals at his church of St. Eustache, playing no piece twice, and using never a printed page! There stands also upon the Symphony programme the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven, and Frederick Converse's musical version of Walt Whitman's poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter."

Bonnet Carries on Tradition

Following are extracts apropos of Mr. Bonnet's appearance, from an article by Harvey B. Gaul in the Musical Quarterly for July, 1918:

"As every school is created or moulded by leaders, these schools (the French, Italian and German schools of organ music) may be epitomized in the three generic names, Bonnet, Bossi and Karg-Elert.

These men and their respective schools represent . . . freer writing . . . freer form . . . They have brought organ composition nearer to contemporary symphonic writing.

Thanks to them and the generation they overlap, a near future will see the democratized organ elevated to the kingship of the early English and Post-Reformation periods . . .

When Alexandre Guilmant was gathered to Abraham's bosom he left the art of organ playing in France on a higher level than it had ever known before. He also left a score of scholars to carry forward the concepts of organ playing as wrought by Lemmens and

6-6
Cesar Franck, and developed by Guilmant. Chief among his pupils is Joseph Bonnet. St. Eustache always enjoyed a reputation for fine organ music; Bonnet advanced it. Every American student in Paris spent his time between Widor at St. Sulpice and Bonnet at St. Eustache. The ability to memorize enables him to concentrate on his instrument and his execution. Considering our varied organs, with their different consoles and ununiform action, an organist is almost forced to memorize. There are some organists who spend their leisure time arguing as to the advisability of memorizing programmes. Futile conversation! It is not a matter of advisability, but of sheer ability. Bonnet carries in his mind's eye compositions that range from Clerambault to Cesar Franck, from Martini to Mendelssohn. In his flawless execution, that extends even to highly colored trifles, he ing and essentially French.

127
His interpretation of Bach has the clean-cut style that we have come to know as the French method. The French do not play Bach with the exaggerated tempo that Americans employ. They catch the mood of the fugue or toccata; all we catch is a metronome mark.

Bonnet knows the concert organ, and registers for it. Every shade of tonal effect is on his palette, and when he calls for sustained fortissimos, with an occasional sforzando, means specifically that. Furthermore he approves of the crescendo pedal, which some of his English confreres with antediluvian instincts spend so much time decrying.

As a teacher and player—performance over precept—he has been of great aid to his contemporaries of France and America. His style is that of the Lemmens-Guilmant school—cleanliness and

Mr. JOSEPH BONNET, organist and composer, was born at Bordeaux, on March 17, 1884. His father, organist of the church of Sainte Eulalie, gave him his first music lessons. When he was fourteen years old, Joseph was made organist of the church of Saint Nicolas at Bordeaux, later of the church of Saint Michel. He gave a recital that attracted attention. Entering the Paris Conservatory, he studied the organ with Guilmant. In 1906 (July 6) he was awarded a first prize for organ playing. First prizes were also awarded that year to Messrs. Barié and Vierne. The subject for a fugue was given by Gigout; the subject for free improvisation by Lavignac. Before Mr. Bonnet was awarded the prize, he was chosen in competition (March 23, 1906) organist of Saint Eustache in Paris. In order to pursue without interruption his studies in the Conservatory he did voluntary service in the army when he was eighteen and a half years old instead of awaiting the regular summons at twenty-one. He soon became known throughout Paris by playing at concerts of the Société des Compositeurs, the Schola Cantorum, the Société Nationale, the Société Bach, the Société Handel, and the concerts of Lamoureux and Colonne. Guilmant died, and Mr. Bonnet was named organist of the Société des Concerts du Conservatoire. In the season of 1910-11 he gave more than forty recitals at Saint Eustache. He has given recitals in France, England, Belgium, Switzerland, Austria-Hungary, and Germany. His compositions for the organ are many, and he is the editor of compositions played at his series of five historical recitals.

Mr. Bonnet played for the first time in this country in the Great Hall, College of the city of New York, January 30, 1917.

On April 16, 1917, Mr. Bonnet gave a recital at the new Old South Church. On January 23, 1918, he played in Symphony Hall, where a concert took place for the benefit of the Edith Wharton War Charities. His associates were Mme. Gabrielle Gills, soprano, and the Société des Instruments Anciens. He then played pieces by Bach, Clérambault, Grigny, and a concerto by Handel. He gave recitals at the Emmanuel Church March 17, 24, 1918.

standpoint of a pianist the Sonata Opus 42 of Schubert was probably the most interesting. It was an admirable performance of a work which sets forth only mildly interesting ideas.

The Sunday afternoon concert of Dec. 8 was divided between Hipolito Lazaro, tenor, and Sasha Jacobsen, violinist. Mr. Lazaro, prodigal as we expect his race to be of florid, ringing tone, made a praiseworthy attempt to differentiate between the dramatic and the lyric styles. He was notably freer and more at home, however, in the excerpts from the operas of his repertory than in the songs wherein he will some day make an artistic mark. Mr. Jacobsen played with an agreeable tone and showed that he had a good idea of the value of a phrase.

Heinrich Gebhard gave a piano recital on the afternoon of Tuesday.

Olin Downes Says Combination of French Organist and Symphony Conductor Rabaud Will Be Musical Treat of the Season.

Post Dec. 8/18
BY OLIN DOWNES

Ask almost any devout student of the organ to describe the French school, and he will say, "First there was Lemmens and Cesar Franck, then there was Guilmant; now there is Bonnet." He will probably go on to speak, particularly if he has studied in Paris, of the present week's pair of Boston Symphony concerts, in which Mr. Rabaud, newly from Paris, will cooperate with Joseph Bonnet himself, also from Paris, and some more distinguished French musicians, round about them, to play the mountainous symphony in D minor for organ and orchestra by Guilmant, also from Paris, and beloved of them all.

This student will take particular delight, upon this occasion, in the unchurchlike chance to watch Bonnet's swift fingers and phenomenal feet, likewise to applaud at will. Question him about Bonnet, and he will remind you that Bonnet is the first pupil of Guilmant, and his successor as organist of the Conservatoire—the most honored post in France. That Bonnet's staccato touch by which he turns out his clean-

Dec. 10, to an audience that filled Steinert Hall. Mr. Gebhard, in addition to being an excellent player, has taught his audience that they may expect something unusual and worth while at his recitals. Hence a widening reputation for the artist and a rapidly growing public for him. Two numbers by Charles T. Griffes, "The Lake at Evening" and a scherzo, Opus 5 No. 3, made a favorable impression on their first Boston audience, as did the second movement from Sonata Opus 63 by Vincent D'Indy. Possibly the most enjoyment of the afternoon, however, was afforded by Mr. Gebhard's spirited and appreciative playing of Fauré's Impromptu No. 2 in F minor. If more artists followed Mr. Gebhard's example, there would be much more interest in recitals.

cut rhythms is known the world over (by organists, at least). That his Bach is incomparable, his erudition huge, and his memory unbelievable—he gave a historical series of 40 recitals at his church of St. Eustache, playing no piece twice, and using never a printed page!

There stands also upon the Symphony programme the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven, and Frederick Converse's musical version of Walt Whitman's poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter."

Bonnet Carries on Tradition

Following are extracts apropos of Mr. Bonnet's appearance, from an article by Harvey B. Gaul in the Musical Quarterly for July, 1918:

"As every school is created or moulded by leaders, these schools (the French, Italian and German schools of organ music) may be epitomized in the three generic names, Bonnet, Bossi and Karg-Elert.

These men and their respective schools represent . . . freer writing . . . freer form . . . They have brought organ composition nearer to contemporary symphonic writing.

Thanks to them and the generation they overlap, a near future will see the democratized organ elevated to the kingship of the early English and Post-Reformation periods.

When Alexandre Guilmant was gathered to Abraham's bosom he left the art of organ playing in France on a higher level than it had ever known before. He also left a score of scholars to carry forward the concepts of organ playing as wrought by Lemmens and

Cesar Franck, and developed by Guilmant. Chief among his pupils is Joseph Bonnet. St. Eustache always enjoyed a reputation for fine organ music. Bonnet advanced it. Every American student in Paris spent his time between Widor at St. Sulpice and Bonnet at St. Eustache. The ability to memorize enables him to concentrate on his instrument and his execution. Considering our varied organs, with their different consoles and ununiform action, an organist is almost forced to memorize. There are some organists who spend their leisure time arguing as to the advisability of memorizing programmes. Futile conversation! It is not a matter of advisability, but of sheer ability. Bonnet carries in his mind's eye compositions that range from Clerambault to Cesar Franck, from Martini to Mendelssohn. In his flawless execution, that extends even to highly colored trifles, he

ing and essentially French.

His interpretation of Bach has the clean-cut style that we have come to know as the French method. The French do not play Bach with the exaggerated tempo that Americans employ. They catch the mood of the fugue or toccata; all we catch is a metronome mark.

Bonnet knows the concert organ, and registers for it. Every shade of tonal effect is on his palette, and when he calls for sustained fortissimos, with an occasional sforzando, means specifically that. Furthermore he approves of the crescendo pedal, which some of his English confreres with antediluvian instincts spend so much time decrying.

As a teacher and player—performance over precept—he has been of great aid to his contemporaries of France and America. His style is that of the Lemmens-Guilmant school—cleanliness and

Mr. JOSEPH BONNET, organist and composer, was born at Bordeaux, on March 17, 1884. His father, organist of the church of Sainte Eulalie, gave him his first music lessons. When he was fourteen years old, Joseph was made organist of the church of Saint Nicolas at Bordeaux, later of the church of Saint Michel. He gave a recital that attracted attention. Entering the Paris Conservatory, he studied the organ with Guilmant. In 1906 (July 6) he was awarded a first prize for organ playing. First prizes were also awarded that year to Messrs. Barié and Vierende. The subject for a fugue was given by Gigout; the subject for free improvisation by Lavignac. Before Mr. Bonnet was awarded the prize, he was chosen in competition (March 23, 1906) organist of Saint Eustache in Paris. In order to pursue without interruption his studies in the Conservatory he did voluntary service in the army when he was eighteen and a half years old instead of awaiting the regular summons at twenty-one. He soon became known throughout Paris by playing at concerts of the Société des Compositeurs, the Schola Cantorum, the Société Nationale, the Société Bach, the Société Handel, and the concerts of Lamoureux and Colonne. Guilmant died, and Mr. Bonnet was named organist of the Société des Concerts du Conservatoire. In the season of 1910-11 he gave more than forty recitals at Saint Eustache. He has given recitals in France, England, Belgium, Switzerland, Austria-Hungary, and Germany. His compositions for the organ are many, and he is the editor of compositions played at his series of five historical recitals.

Mr. Bonnet played for the first time in this country in the Great Hall, College of the city of New York, January 30, 1917.

On April 16, 1917, Mr. Bonnet gave a recital at the new Old South Church. On January 23, 1918, he played in Symphony Hall, where a concert took place for the benefit of the Edith Wharton War Charities. His associates were Mme. Gabrielle Gills, soprano, and the Société des Instruments Anciens. He then played pieces by Bach, Clérambault, Grigny, and a concerto by Handel. He gave recitals at the Emmanuel Church March 17, 24, 1918.

128

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1918--19.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

HENRI RABAUD, Conductor.

SEVENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 20, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 21, AT 8 P. M.

D'INDY,

"WALLENSTEIN," Trilogy after the Dramatic Poem of Schiller, op. 12

- I. Wallenstein's Camp
 - II. Max and Thekla. (The Piccolomini)
 - III. The death of Wallenstein
-

CHOPIN,

CONCERTO in E minor, op. 11, No. 1

- I. Allegro maestoso
 - II. Romance: Larghetto
 - III. Rondo: Vivace
-

BERLIOZ,

OVERTURE to "King Lear," in C major, op. 4

Soloist:

JOSEF HOFMANN

Steinway Pianoforte used

JOSEF HOFMANN

7TH SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN

Herald Dec. 21/18

D'Indy's Trilogy Played for the First Time
Here Since 1907

HOFMANN HEARD IN CHOPIN'S CONCERTO

By PHILIP HALE

The 7th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Rabaud, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: D'Indy, "Wallenstein" Trilogy (after Schiller); Chopin, Concerto in E minor for piano; Berlioz, Overture to "King Lear." Josef Hofmann was the pianist.

D'Indy's Trilogy has been played in Boston only at the concerts of Oct. 13, 19, 1907, when Dr. Muck introduced the work, performed in Paris and New York as long ago as 1888. For several years Dr. Muck favored the music of this French composer, but when he read one day some bitter statements of d'Indy about the Germanization of musical America his heart was hardened and even the name of Vincent d'Indy was obnoxious to his ear. Thus was the audience of the Symphony concerts wronged.

The Trilogy should have been heard again before yesterday. It was evidently composed when d'Indy was influenced by Wagner; for instance, the opening of the third section, "Wallenstein's Death," takes one back to the "Ring," but the influence did not destroy d'Indy's individuality, for the nobler and the more beautiful pages of the Trilogy are by him and by him alone. The first movement, "Wallenstein's Camp," is descriptive, brilliant and highly original. The sermon of the Capuchin, preached by the bassoons, is humorously conceived. The thematic material is used in masterly manner; the instrumentation is varied skilfully; the mass of instruments—the composer

Steinway Pianoforte used

calls for eight harps—there were four on the stage—is not employed merely to swell volume of sound; they are used alternately and in chorus for particular and expressive effects. The second movement, "Max and Thekla," is eloquent, love music that is not merely sensuous, with striking hints at the tragedy of their lives. Note the beautiful manner in which the typical theme of Thekla is turned into the famous lament over Max, "I've lived and loved." The third section does not rise in eloquence to the height of those preceding, but it is interesting, and not only by the employment of the introductory and final chords that are, unconsciously no doubt, more or less reminiscent.

This Trilogy occupied d'Indy for seven or eight years, yet we find it more spontaneous in certain ways than his latest works—works characterized by purity of thought and purpose, superb in workmanship, but of a peculiar austerity and aloofness that make them unsympathetic to the general public. If ever a composer wrote for musicians of highest aims, that man is the d'Indy of the latter years.

In the Trilogy there is a melodic warmth that is missed in the later works; there is an outpouring of musical thought unchecked by rigid adherence to the cyclic form on which the composer now insists.

Mr. Rabaud gave a dramatic reading of the Trilogy: a reading fine in feeling, eloquent in expression. The orchestra responded to his every wish. And in his interpretation of the "King Lear" overture Mr. Rabaud was in full sympathy with the wild and too often bombastic romanticism of Berlioz. In 1918 this overture seems old-fashioned, one of the least significant of the composer's overtures; but think how new, daring, revolutionary it must have sounded to the Parisians of the early Thirties! As Mr. Rabaud read the opening phrase of the lower strings, it was commanding, arousing anticipation. For once the main body of the overture was attacked as Berlioz wished it, "in an agitated and desperate manner."

Mr. Hofmann gave a remarkably clear, pearly, polished, unemotional performance of Chopin's concerto, for which he was loudly applauded.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Schumann, Symphony in D minor, No. 4; Rabaud, "The Nocturnal Procession" (after Lenau's "Faust"); Saint-Saens, Concerto in G minor for piano (Mischa Levitzki, pianist); Beethoven, Overture to "Leonora," No. 3.

JOSEF HOFMANN

7TH SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN

Herald Dec. 21/18

D'Indy's Trilogy Played
for the First Time
Here Since 1907

HOFMANN HEARD IN CHOPIN'S CONCERTO

By PHILIP HALE

The 7th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Rabaud, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: D'Indy, "Wallenstein" Trilogy (after Schiller); Chopin, Concerto in E minor for piano; Berlioz, Overture to "King Lear." Josef Hofmann was the pianist.

D'Indy's Trilogy has been played in Boston only at the concerts of Oct. 13, 19, 1907, when Dr. Muck introduced the work, performed in Paris and New York as long ago as 1888. For several years Dr. Muck favored the music of this French composer, but when he read one day some bitter statements of d'Indy about the Germanization of musical America his heart was hardened and even the name of Vincent d'Indy was obnoxious to his ear. Thus was the audience of the Symphony concerts wronged.

The Trilogy should have been heard again before yesterday. It was evidently composed when d'Indy was influenced by Wagner; for instance, the opening of the third section, "Wallenstein's Death," takes one back to the "Ring," but the influence did not destroy d'Indy's individuality, for the nobler and the more beautiful pages of the Trilogy are by him and by him alone. The first movement, "Wallenstein's Camp," is descriptive, brilliant and highly original. The sermon of the Capuchin, preached by the bassoons, is humorously conceived. The thematic material is used in masterly manner; the instrumentation is varied skillfully; the mass of instruments—the composer calls for eight harps—there were four on the stage—is not employed merely to swell volume of sound; they are used alternately and in chorus for particular and expressive effects. The second movement, "Max and Thekla," is eloquent, love music that is not merely sensuous, with striking hints at the tragedy of their lives. Note the beautiful manner in which the typical theme of Thekla is turned into the famous lament over Max, "I've lived and loved." The third section does not rise in eloquence to the height of those preceding, but it is interesting, and not only by the employment of the introductory and final chords that are, unconsciously no doubt, more or less reminiscent.

This Trilogy occupied d'Indy for seven or eight years, yet we find it more spontaneous in certain ways than his latest works—works characterized by purity of thought and purpose, superb in workmanship, but of a peculiar austerity and aloofness that make them unsympathetic to the general public. If ever a composer wrote for musicians of highest aims, that man is the d'Indy of the latter years.

In the Trilogy there is a melodic warmth that is missed in the later works; there is an outpouring of musical thought unchecked by rigid adherence to the cyclic form on which the composer now insists.

Mr. Rabaud gave a dramatic reading of the Trilogy: a reading fine in feeling, eloquent in expression. The orchestra responded to his every wish. And in his interpretation of the "King Lear" overture Mr. Rabaud was in full sympathy with the wild and too often bombastic romanticism of Berlioz. In 1918 this overture seems old-fashioned, one of the least significant of the composer's overtures; but think how new, daring, revolutionary it must have sounded to the Parisians of the early Thirties! As Mr. Rabaud read the opening phrase of the lower strings, it was commanding, arousing anticipation. For once the main body of the overture was attacked as Berlioz wished it, "in an agitated and desperate manner."

Mr. Hofmann gave a remarkably clear, pearly, polished, unemotional performance of Chopin's concerto, for which he was loudly applauded.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Schumann, Symphony in D minor, No. 4; Rabeau, "The Nocturnal Procession" (after Lenau's "Faust"); Saint-Saens, Concerto in G minor for piano (Mischa Levitzki, pianist); Beethoven, Overture to "Leonora," No. 3.

Steinway Pianoforte used

SYMPHONY DISPLAYS A D'INDY WORK

Post — Dec. 21/18
Hofmann as Soloist
Plays Chopin
Concerto

BY OLIN DOWNES

D'Indy's "Wallenstein" trilogy, after Schiller was the most significant item of the programme given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Josef Hofmann, pianist, was soloist, playing the E minor Chopin concerto. Berlioz' "King Lear" overture brought this concert to an end.

D'Indy's Work Interests

Seldom has Mr. Rabaud excelled himself as he did on this occasion. The "Wallenstein" trilogy was introduced here in 1907 by Dr. Muck. After 10 years the youthful work of the great French composer made an impression even greater than at the first Boston performance. D'Indy was an ardent student and admirer of Wagner when he wrote this vigorous and romantic score. There are Wagnerisms in abundance, but when all is said there is new and splendid spirit in the music, a profound earnestness and imaginative power, a sureness and brilliancy in the instrumentation which carries all before it.

On what may be called preliminary acquaintance the first movement—the lively scene in the camp of Wallenstein—makes the most immediate impression. Its spirit, its tumult of a crowd, and the rough, wild power of this music, once heard, are not to be forgotten. The humor of the fugetta played by the three bassoons is real humor, introducing a note ingeniously contrasted with the color of the instrumentation and the general character of other motives, while remaining of a piece with them. Technically the movement is a tour de force. No wonder that the man who wrote such music at the age of 29 has developed into one of the greatest composers of today, one who may well bide his time for the ultimate complete realization of the worth of his music.

Made Glowing by Rabaud

Nor is the first movement of the "Wallenstein" trilogy, with all its fascination, alone in its strokes of genius. The thought of the fate that hangs over the loves of Max and Thekla in the second part, the sensuousness which is comparatively absent in the music of the latter D'Indy, the setting of the love music in the midst of music of commotion and tragedy are also significant passages.

The chords of the last movement, supposed by some to have been inspired by the thought of the fate foretold in the stars, and the noble peroration, must surely rank among D'Indy's finest pages. Much of the deep appreciation of the music on the part of the audience must be laid to the splendid insight, authority, and enthusiasm with which Mr. Rabaud interpreted it.

Mr. Hofmann's Playing

Mr. Hofmann played the music of Chopin with exquisite clarity, finesse and beauty of tone. He triumphed particularly in the slow movement, the poetry of which was not marred by sentimentality, by unmusically dragging of tempo, by disproportionate accents, or exaggerations, to which a number of lesser musicians are prone. It must be admitted that with all his art the opening allegro sounded very old-fashioned indeed, that the sparkle of the finale seemed a little faded.

It is the custom to talk of certain musical compositions as "immortal." Immortal? How much music is immortal? Not the nine symphonies of Beethoven, half of which are gradually gathering their shrouds about them; not many a gigantic masterpiece, still hailed in music histories and textbooks as a thing of undying perfection and beauty. The print was hardly cold when the masterpiece began to pale. It was Romain Rolland, if memory serves, who said that music is the art which consumes itself quickest by its own heat. Even the music of the youthful Chopin must give way to the music of another composer of genius, and it is too early today to say what music, if any, will be regarded a centennial hence as "immortal."

The final distinction of this concert was Mr. Rabaud's fiery interpretation of Berlioz's extravagant and dramatic music. How the opening recitative for the strings spoke. How convincing, for the moment, were the things that one knew in cold blood to be the extravagances of a musical revolutionist—the boldest, perhaps, and most audacious, that the history of music as yet has known.

A memorable concert, and one applauded to the echo by a deeply engrossed audience.

Musical Events in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts — Between the sixth and seventh concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which interval is constituted of a single week, there has been one concert in Boston to which the public might be admitted on payment of the regular fee. Such other music as was to be heard consisted of private musicals, and the regular affairs of the New England Conservatory. Outside of this, church organs, motion picture organs and theater and hotel orchestras furnished the sole musical pabulum of this center of culture. The most optimistic will have to admit that some of this did not contain much nourishment. It is not the province of this chronicle to inquire into the reasons for this condition nor yet to offer remedies therefor. The chronicler feels impelled, however, to make note of it in passing.

The single concert of the week, and dignified, and contemplative in his one which did not need this splendid isolation to make it an event not easily forgotten, was the appearance of Mr. Sergei Rachmaninoff, in Symphony Hall, on the afternoon of Sunday, Dec. 15. The program was one such as a master would select and it was played as a master would play it. Opening with the Mozart theme and variations in A major, it traversed an early sonata of Beethoven's, Op. 10, No. 3, a short Chopin group, a group by Mr. Rachmaninoff, two preludes, those in G major and B flat major, and two transcriptions, "The Lilacs" and a polka, and closed with Liszt's Twelfth Rhapsodie. That is to say, it purported to close with this; as a matter of fact the audience swooped down to the front of the hall and clamored for much more. To his credit be it said that Mr. Rachmaninoff resisted as long as was feasible the demand for his C sharp minor prelude, but the lingerers apparently knew what they liked and he was forced to play it before they would quit bothering him.

We have come to expect from Mr. Rabaud an accompaniment that fulfills all requirements of good taste and helpfulness; his assistance to Mr. Hofmann was all that could be desired. The other numbers on the program were D'Indy's "Wallenstein" trilogy, Op. 12, after the tragedy of Schiller, and Berlioz's overture to "King Lear," Op. 4. It was good to see D'Indy's name on a program once more. He has been strangely neglected in this town of recent years.

The program had the remarkable merit of making one yearn for more of each group. Most of all, though, one regretted the modesty that limited the player to so few of his own compositions. Such is the power of the man that his public is perfectly willing to take his technical skill for granted, as he is himself, and it is concerned with his ability to interpret music.

The seventh program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought forward another pianist as soloist, Josef Hofmann, who played the Chopin E minor concerto, Op. 11, No. 1, a work which he had played with this orchestra on the occasion of his appearance in Cambridge earlier in the season. Inasmuch as two famous pianists were the only concert visitors to Boston in a week it is almost inevitable that comparisons should be made. Mr. Hofmann, playing this elaborately polished concerto, with tempo rubato, delicacy of nuance and suchlike refinements all nicely calculated, and all played according to calculation, typified the scholar, the miniaturist, the exquisite, wrapped up in the temporary and particular, polishing a phrase because of his interest in that phrase for its own sake,—in a word, an intellectual player. Mr. Rachmaninoff, on the other hand, grave, dignified, and contemplative in his approach to his audience, making no display of technique in his playing, but conveying always the impression of capability, far less concerned with phrases than with a composition as a whole, given to considering less the technical problems than the racial or universal aspects of a composition, stood forth as a player no less intellectual than Mr. Hofmann, but one whose intellectuality indicated a broader outlook and whose scholarship dug more deeply into fundamentals.

We have come to expect from Mr. Rabaud an accompaniment that fulfills all requirements of good taste and helpfulness; his assistance to Mr. Hofmann was all that could be desired. The other numbers on the program were D'Indy's "Wallenstein" trilogy, Op. 12, after the tragedy of Schiller, and Berlioz's overture to "King Lear," Op. 4. It was good to see D'Indy's name on a program once more. He has been strangely neglected in this town of recent years.

D'Indy Trilogy Is Given at Symphony

Adm. + Mm. — Dec. 22/18

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

PROGRAM.

"Wallenstein" Symphonic Trilogy.....D'Indy
Piano Concerto, E minor.....Chopin Soloist, Josef Hofmann.

Overture, "King Lear".....Berlioz

M. RABAUD, is to be complimented on the rational length of his programs. They are never prolix, and this time, for once, Beethoven was absent from the list, although it was still far removed from the extreme modern school. D'Indy's Trilogy, founded on Schiller's Tragedy, is conservative enough and is somewhat more dramatic than many of the later works of the composer. The first movement, "Wallenstein's Camp," is not exactly as orderly as Camp Devens. The composer makes the most effective scene out of the sermon of the Capuchin, with its grotesque Latin quotations, its attack on Wallenstein, the anger of the soldiers, and the rally of the Croats to the rescue of the monk. But even this is not exactly "program-music" for D'Indy does not picture a solo instrument heckled by the rest of the orchestra, but gives this as a strange fugue (or a fugal exposition) upon the bassoons, a very quaint and fitting touch, which is afterwards parodied (a la Berlioz) by trumpet and clarinet. The instruments were very clear in this learned portion of the work.

The love scene between Max and Thekla, the second movement, was in strong contrast with the camp movement, and the masculine and feminine themes were excellent foils to each other. This was the simplest and most easily comprehended movement, but the first movement was the most effective. The Finale, however, "Wallenstein's Death," is the proper climax of the work. Here one does not find the ascetic and over-learned D'Indy, but a composer who sometimes leans even toward the Tchaikowsky expression of sorrow, and the musical auditor can find an occasional Wagnerian touch, as, for example, when the "Flying Dutchman" comes into port towards the end, with Siegfried evidently on board. But it is all worthy and excellent music, and we like it better than D'Indy in his more bitter and more scholastic moods. We only wish that he had kept upon this path.

The performance was excellent. The ensemble was perfect and the first movement aroused very spontaneous enthusiasm. There are eight harps called for in this trilogy and in this performance we had four. But the effect which Wagner managed to obtain from massing these instruments was not achieved.

The renee of Josef Hofmann was undoubtedly the chief attraction of the concert for the public. He has not appeared in these concerts in several years. There were strained relations between him and the symphonic powers ever since he took the Finale of the Schumann concerto at a pace which was simply impossible for the orchestra. He is a great artist, all the same, and everyone was glad to welcome him back. But the piece that he chose was not so entirely welcome. Chopin's piano concertos have their faults. In the first place, they are not real concertos, but piano works almost entirely. A concerto should be first of all symphonic, and Chopin's two are not.

Secondly, the orchestration of Chopin was very weak, and even in the revision used this side of the picture is rather tame. There is also too much of sweetness in the work, too little of powerful contrast. But Mr. Hofmann by his virile playing was able to make the concerto more effective than it generally is, and the amount of tunefulness in it was grateful in these days of discord. Every part of the work was made clear as crystal and the avoidance of sentimentality was something to grow enthusiastic over, for some pianists must needs weep over the keyboard when they play Chopin. Therefore the public welcomed the Prodigious Son with great enthusiasm and killed the fatted calf at his return, in spite of the high price of veal. But even Mr. Hofmann could not make us enjoy the Larghetto, the second movement of this concerto.

Berlioz's "King Lear" overture is not one of his greatest works. It is curious to note that in "Les Francs Juges" overture he can tear a passion to tatters, while in the present case one could bear much more continuous frenzy in the part of the tortured king. But the oboe has some beautiful work (and it was finely played, too) in portraying the soft-voiced Cordelia, and the kettle-drum, with some emphatic strokes, intimated that Fate was giving the monarch some knockout blows.

We liked the reading very much. It was strongly contrasted in its chief points, and had much more abandon than we recall in some of its previous performances. The strings particularly gave a whirlwind of Passion at one part of the work, and the climaxes were made the most of.

All in all we like Mr. Rabaud more and more at each performance. The orchestra is in superb condition at present, which tells the story of his drill-mastership, while the elasticity, the abandon, the poetry of his readings make us felicitate ourselves on having M. Rabaud at the head of the organization.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

9:30 — Dec. 21/18

Josef Hofmann Reappears as Soloist

The seventh Symphony program yesterday was as follows: D'Indy's "Wallenstein" trilogy; Chopin's concerto in E minor No. 1 for piano, Josef Hofmann, soloist, and Berlioz' "King Lear" overture.

If d'Indy were in his 20's today, would he turn his face across the Rhine with equal zeal—barring, of course, the intervention of the past four years' upheaval of Nations? Would he find the same inspiration in Schiller, in his "Song of the Bell"—d'Indy's cantata was sung here by the Cecelia Society—or in his ponderous dramatic form of Count von Albrecht Wenzel Eusebius Wallenstein, the great General of the imperialists in the Thirty Years' War, who equipped 50,000 men at his own expense to repel the invasion of Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden, who saved the Empire again and again only to arouse the jealousy of his Emperor and be murdered at his command?

Reading of the rigor with which Wallenstein prosecuted war, he might be called the Hindenburg or Ludendorff of his day. No doubt to the young d'Indy, whose Germanic impulses were not daunted by the cool reception of Brahms after he had traveled some distance to see him, this intrepid, unconquerable soldier and leader of soldiers was a fine fellow, the more picturesque for his reputed faith in the oracles of the stars, of which the mystical, one might say, ecclesiastical, chords opening the last movement of the trilogy are suggestive.

Shows Strong Individuality

The first of the three movements, depicting the General's camp—the warlike alarms, the bristling militarism, the coarse and roystering merriment of the soldiers—shows the advent of a strong individuality, a fertile invention and a colorful imagination. There is both dry and sinister humor in the sententious preaching of the Capuchin monk in the chortling fugue of the bassoons, and there is world orgy in the waltz.

The second movement of the hopeless love of Thekla, the daughter of Wallenstein and Max Piccolomini, who in history was a favorite of the General, in the drama his accuser, contains some beautiful and tragic music. The manner of Schumann is noticeable and there is less maturity of expression than in the music of the "camp" which was composed later. The "death of Wallenstein," the last of the three, in general is least effective and might be shortened.

Mr Rabaud conducted with the fine hand and the perception which now it seems may be taken for granted from him. There are many pages which one with less taste and authority would make boisterous, obscure or merely negligible. A man of little pretension, discouraging rather than inviting personal acclaim or propaganda, Mr Rabaud has proven a most fortunate gift from our French ally. He is steadily revealing himself to be a great conductor, a man of broad scholarship, of culture, of exemplary catholicity of taste in other schools than his own, of sincerity and charm of manner. The orchestra and its patrons might well look forward with pleasure to an extended rather than a limited term of such conductorship.

Hofmann Warmly Greeted

Mr Hofmann was warmly and appropriately greeted upon his return as a soloist at these concerts. He gave a finely proportioned and brilliantly executed performance of the concerto, although he has been heard to play this and other music in a more poetic vein.

Conductor and orchestra gave sympathetic assistance to the soloist and played Berlioz' "Lear" overture superbly. One can hear now the rude yet majestic vigor of the opening theme in the deep strings. When has the agitated section begun in as wildly dramatic, as menacing and forboding a manner, as foretelling of the tragedy to come? The fear of some that Mr Rabaud would lack edge in some aspects of realism should have been thoroughly dispelled by now.

We admire further the dignity, the ardor, the absence of all that is or might become perfunctory in his conducting of our National Anthem, but need the tone of the first trumpet be as aggressively dominating in the first eight repeated bars?

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Trans. — Dec. 21 '18
MR. HOFMANN AFTER FIVE YEARS OF EXILE

A Warm Reception for the Pianist, and a Wellnigh Perfect Performance of Chopin's Concerto in F Minor—D'Indy, Likewise, Welcomed Back in His Graphic, Eloquent Music of "Wallenstein" — The Berlioz of "Lear" for Postlude

YESTERDAY afternoon, for the first time in five years, almost to a day, Mr. Hofmann, the pianist, sat beside the Symphony Orchestra in its own concert-room. Twice before this season he had played with it—once at Cambridge, once in Brooklyn; yet this coming to Symphony Hall may stand as the visible sign of the healing of the long breach between them. Into the causes of the estrangement, into the rights and wrongs of the high contending parties, it were unprofitable to inquire, since such inquisitive expeditions are usually less illuminating than amusing. Neutral at first, because of evidence to its own ears, the public of the Symphony Concerts has gradually inclined to the pianist, because with the mounting years of absence and his no less ascendant fame as pianist, it missed him more and more. Seemingly the audience of Friday sought to indicate this feeling by the heartiness of the applause it began to bestow upon the pianist as soon as he came into view and that, through two or three minutes, kept him standing by the piano. At each pause in his concerto, it renewed these plaudits, while at the end, it warmly and more than once recalled him. Mr. Hofmann, usually open in his moods toward an audience, did not hide his pleasure in this reception and these rewards. In fact, as, though to release it by proxy, he shook heartily the hand of Mr. Rabaud who, if the truth must be told, had returned him no more than a faithful, accurate but inflexible accompaniment. In all these proceedings, except the hand-shaking, the orchestra joined, as it has heretofore when singer or virtuoso has assisted it—a detail of etiquette in the concert-hall about which there are two opinions, either debatable.

Mr. Hofmann's concerto was Chopin's in F minor, music of which he has long been fond, upon which he has spent endless study and pains, and which he now brings to as perfect performance as is, probably possible to human hand, brain, and imagination. Like its fellow in E minor, this concerto is purely a pianistic music, which is to say that Chopin uses the orchestra merely as the complement of a design in which he worked none too easily, none too fruitfully. Perhaps, for that reason, neither concerto rises so high in poetizing imagination, passion of mood, eloquence of expression, as many of his solo pieces. From beginning to end—and the lengths are considerable unless a masterly and sympathetic pianist glamour them—this concerto in F minor primarily displays the beauties, the subtleties, under many an exaction, of the voice of the piano and similarly reveals the musician and the virtuoso sitting before it. To say these things is not to diminish a whit the bright charm, the light rhythms, the sparkling pace, the dance-like returns of the Rondo-Finale; or to lessen the sentimental grace of the songful Larghetto, the gradual intensifying of tender mood that deepens it; or to detract from the large plan, the warm speech, the zest of fanciful ornament in the long Maestoso of the first movement. The classical rather than the romantic Chopin fashioned the two concertos, fashioned them less—it is easy to suspect by the records—from imperative impulse to such expression than from utility to him as tools of trade, especially in a day when a pianist could play a single movement of such a piece unquestioned and applauded. In it or in the whole concerto, the audience expected a display of the pianist's skill not merely in the range and fluency of his technical means, as such things went ninety years ago, but of his graces of tone, his elegance in ornament, his play of sentiment and taste. It asked also from his hand like revelation of the finer attributes of the piano itself.

The more, then, does this concerto in F minor minister to many of Mr. Hofmann's distinctive abilities. With much of the music that he plays, it is altogether reasonable to debate his interpretive powers; to assert that he is cerebral rather than impassioned, to deny him ardor of imagination, to question his choice of pace, his distribution of light and shade; to hold or not to hold with his musical designing. On the other hand, there is no debating Mr. Hofmann's command of the voice of the piano. With it, seemingly, in this, his golden noon, he has gone as far, fully and finely as mortal musician and virtuoso may go. There is none to excel him in limpidity, in smoothness, in roundness of tone, in the graduation, in the coloring of it. Endless and endlessly divided, sub-divided, blended, parted, measured are the tints of his palette of the piano, as endless and apt is the range of touch that measures volume, orders force. It is hard to imagine a tone more luminous, transparent, iridescent, disembodied than his—a veritable erial music though the pianist sit earth-bound in a concert room. No pianist, likewise, excels him in felicity of ornament. His runs purl along their course like vaporous drops in sunshine, or are strung as evenly as matched pearls; his staccati glint without a trace of hardness; his chords are beautifully sonorous and rounded, his arpeggi woo the ear, and so forth through the whole range of the purely pianistic graces. Master is he, also, of the discerning mind, the delicate finger, the imaginative touch, that winds these ornaments in garlands about the main stem of the music or sets them spreading like fine tendrils from it. His taste in touch, tone, song, arabesque, is unerring unless it be when some seated idiosyncrasy or passing impulse bids him accent a phrase, a detail beyond the seeming implication of the music itself. As flawless is his elegance of handling, as just his sentiment, as sensitive his style as he pursues his way through the music. How an eighteenth-century of Burneys and like listening connoisseurs would applaud him in this concerto of Chopin!

In due place and with flowing ease all these signal and distinctive qualities shone with gentle radiance out of Mr. Hofmann's performance yesterday. Grace of line and point of rhythm went hand in hand through the mazurka-like Rondo. How spirited the progress of the music, yet with what adroit modulations of pace and emphasis, what exquisite moulding and fusing of the phrases! The lightness of it was like a tonal champagne when soft glows also traverse it. Before had come the Larghetto—all delicate loveliness of line, jewelled with ornament, flecked by fancy, touched with chaste sentiment, the distilled essence of music as beauty of sound animated, enriched by beauty of feeling. The sheer lustre of the pianist's tone was sensuous delight. There are passages in the long first movement in which Chopin seems a little pedantic, somewhat too expository, audibly inclined to music-making for his own particular satisfactions rather than for the general pleasure of the audience. The variety of Mr. Hofmann's touch, the glimmers of his tone, the purity and fineness of his articulation cloaked them. Again, in this Maestoso, there are measures in which Chopin would be sonorous, expansive, even grandiose in the fashion of his day and of Hummel's. In the year 1918 of musical grace when the thunders of Liszt are but distant rumblings beside, say, the earthquakes of Prokofiev, these passages may easily sound them, out-moded, futile. They must be saved by such adroit proportioning of tonal volume, of progressive emphasis as that with which Mr. Hofmann and adjusted them to the music out of which they rise, into which they descend. A finer stylistic perception, a more acute stylistic discretion, it would be hard to imagine. For the rest, the exacting "passage-work" fell like spun-silk from the pianist's fingers; while his and Chopin's song was as spell of fancy upon the ear, the magical music with which a dreaming Shakespeare filled Prospero's isle. An Ariel-Hofmann, negation of sprites as the pianist is in the flesh, sounded it.

Romantic music from French composers, as far removed in time and quality as d'Indy and Berlioz, filled the rest of Mr. Rabaud's programme. Long, indeed, has it been, unjustly and mistakenly long, since d'Indy's voice has been heard at a Symphony Concert; yet as the ironies of things would have it, the piece out of which it sounded had been brought to them by the very conductor who willed the war-time exclusion. Irony, too, was the fact that bitter in these days beyond other French composers, as d'Indy has been toward the Germans, he was in the seventies and eighties making this music of "Wallenstein" out of Schiller's plays and in the process remembering sundry measures written by one, Richard Wagner. The "trilogy," however, is none the worse for these imitative passages and if we may not have "The Niebelung's Ring," it is at least pleasant to glimpse it momentarily recalled. Moreover, this pictorial music of Wallenstein's camp, this shadowed and passioned music of the love of Max and Thekla in "Die Piccolomini" this grave, stern, yet glorifying music of Wallenstein's death is quite able to stand upon its own interest, illusion, worth.

The tumult of the camp, the licentious waltz, the monk's sermon mocked and travestied, the sudden interposition of the mighty tonal presence of Wallenstein rise graphically from d'Indy's pages, rose vividly from the strenuous performance of Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra. In those young days d'Indy had a zest for such music that subsequent austerities of mind, heart, creative theory and practice have dulled: yet even in these young years he is characteristically scrupulous, throughout the "trilogy," to write a close-knit music, and ready, no less, with appropriate means. There is more hint in the tonal passion of Max and Thekla of the grave and sombre beauty of mood, means, expression, of which the mature d'Indy has long been master. It is as though the lovers stood embraced in their motives for the blows of that other motive of fate to smite them—a fate that the motive of Wallenstein seems also to propel. Again, a d'Indy already imaginative with dramatic tonal design. In turn, the d'Indy of large, stately, noble utterance, upswelling from quelled tumult, speaks out of the music of Wallenstein's death, especially in the final measures that are as apotheosis to Schiller's chieftain. A young hand, but a ripening mind and a quickening imagination wrote this "trilogy" and wrote also a music easier of comprehension by an audience, more stirring to it, than at least one symphony and a tone-poem or two of d'Indy's later days. Corresponding was the response, the reward of yesterday.

138

Berlioz of the overture to Shakspeare's play, "King Lear," ended the concert and, again, Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra laid on and spared not in a fashion that might alarm for its future sundry connoisseurs of delicate, anxious ears. Yet is there any other way to play this romantically rampageous, this highly intensified music of a Berlioz excited by Shakspeare, by creative impulse, by his premonitions of effect upon his audience? D'Indy's "trilogy" is full voiced, warmly colored, imaginatively ardent; yet how exact in the degree to which music may attain exactness, is his picturing of the camp; how clear-spoken, and therefore the more poignant, the loves and fate of Max and Thekla; how graphically tragic the death and the glory of Wallenstein! In comparison—or rather in contrast—Berlioz is but "wrought up" in general over the tragedy of Lear, over Shakspearean eloquence, over the translation of both into tones. He writes a stormy music for a stormy tragedy, a music of vivid contrasts, of sharp transitions, as indeed goes Shakspeare's play. He embodies in tones a large impression, a generalized reaction, but the hearer listens almost in vain, unless he has uncommonly susceptible imagination, for the tread of Lear, for Cordelia's voice soft and low, for the ravings of the heath, for the pain and pity of blinded Gloucester. Romantic sound and fury, passionate, if the hearer will, wreaking itself through period after period, relieving itself by occasional contrast, fills this overture of Berlioz, as they fill many a poem, picture, novel of his wild day in the arts. Yet if he had entitled his piece, "Overture to Hugo's 'Hernani'" or "Prelude to Byron's 'Glaour,'" is there ought in the implication of the music to deny such designation? First, last and all the time, it is no more than romantical excitement, bursting into tones.

H. T. P.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Boston knows a good deal by this time about Mr. Rabaud as conductor. Next Friday and Saturday he will conduct his "Procession Nocturne," a symphonic poem after the text of Lenau on the Faust legend. Other cities have already had their taste of Mr. Rabaud's music this season. "La Procession Nocturne" (which has been heard here at an Orchestral Club Concert, and at the New England Conservatory of Music), was performed in November

by the San Francisco Orchestra. His Second Symphony was given in Chicago, and very well received. His Arabian Nights Opera, "Marouf," has been produced by the Metropolitan Opera Company in New York, Philadelphia and Brooklyn under Mr. Monteux's leadership. The Brooklyn performance coincided with the last New York trip of the Boston Symphony, and Mr. Rabaud, attending it, was called forth to bow. Another matter of interest will be the soloist, Mischa Levitzki, who has made a name for himself in his recitals of two seasons. He has chosen the G minor Concerto of Saint-Saens. The remaining numbers will be Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor, and Beethoven's Overture to Leonore, No. 3.

A special choral concert has been arranged for the last two days of the year (Monday afternoon, Dec. 30, and Tuesday evening, Dec. 31), "Celebrating the Close of the Year of Victory." It will be devoted to music of thanksgiving and music of patriotism. First will come the American, Belgian, English, Italian and French anthems, then Chadwick's patriotic hymn, "Land of Our Hearts," and Bizet's "Patrie." More notable music will be Franck's choral setting of the 150th psalm, Verdi's "Te Deum," and a "Suite of the 16th Century," arranged by Mr. Rabaud from pieces found in the Virginal Book of Queen Elizabeth. These concerts will replace the first pair, postponed from October (11th and 12th) on account of the influenza. Consequently the season tickets for those will be good for these concerts of Dec. 30 and 31. Single tickets also are on sale.

RABAUD NOCTURNE ON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Boston knows a good deal by this time about Rabaud the conductor. But Rabaud, the composer, will be a matter of hearsay until next Friday and Saturday, when he is to conduct his "Procession Nocturne," a symphonic poem after the text of Lenau on the Faust legend. Other cities have already had their taste of Mr. Rabaud's music this season. "La Procession Nocturne" (which has only been heard here under Mr. Longy at his Orchestral Club Concerts) was performed in November by the San Francisco Orchestra. His second symphony was given in Chicago, and very well received. And his Arabian Nights Opera, "Marouf," has been produced by the Metropolitan Opera Company in New York, Philadelphia and Brooklyn under Mr. Monteux's leadership.

Another matter of interest will be the soloist, Mischa Levitzki, who has chosen to play Saint-Saens' sparkling G minor concerto. The remaining numbers will be Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor, and Beethoven's Overture to Leonore, No. 3.

7-6
139
Mr. JOSEF CASIMIR HOFMANN was born at Cracow, January 20, 1876.* (The date January 20, 1877, is also given.) He was the son of Casimir Hofmann, conductor, a composer of operettas, and teacher of harmony and counterpoint at the Warsaw Conservatory.† Josef's mother was a singer. The boy received his first music lessons from his father, and he played in public when he was six years old at a charity concert in Warsaw. When he was nine years old, he gave concerts in Germany, Denmark, Norway, Sweden. After he had appeared in Vienna, Paris, and London, he came to the United States, and made his first appearance in New York,

*In Riemann's "Musik-Lexikon" (1909) the pianist's name is spelled "Joseph Hofmann."

†This statement is made by Grove's Dictionary. In Mme. Modjeska's Memoirs, Casimir Hofmann is referred to as "formerly the leader of the orchestra in Cracow." Riemann's "Musik-Lexikon" says merely that he was a conductor and composer of operettas. Mr. Hofmann died in 1911.

November 29, 1887, when he played with orchestra Beethoven's First Concerto and solo pieces, among which were his own Berceuse and Waltz. He gave ten concerts in Boston that season. His first appearance was at Music Hall, December 23, 1887. Helene Hastreiter, Nettie Carpenter, Mrs. Sacconi, Theo. Björkstén, and De Anna were associated with him. It is said that he gave fifty-two concerts in two months and a half. Young Hofmann was then withdrawn from public life, chiefly through the agency of the late Alfred Corning Clark, and went to Berlin, where he rested for a time and studied counterpoint with Heinrich Urban, the pianoforte with Moszkowski. He then studied with Rubinstein at Dresden for two years and a half, until the death of that master. He also took lessons of d'Albert. In 1894 he played in Dresden, London, and other cities, and in 1897 began a concert tour of Europe and America.

He revisited Boston with the Chicago Orchestra, led by Theodore Thomas, March 27, 1898, and played Rubinstein's concerto in D minor and a group of solo pieces. He gave recitals in Music Hall, March 28 and April 21, 1898. His next recital was on March 6, 1901, in Symphony Hall.

His first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston was on November 30, 1901, when he played Rubinstein's concerto and a group of solo pieces. He played at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston, December 17, 1910, Rubinstein's concerto in D minor; and at a concert in aid of the Pension Fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, April 9, 1911 (Beethoven's concerto in G major, No. 4). On January 6, 1912, he played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Chopin's concerto No. 2, F minor. On December 13, 1913, he played Schumann's concerto. He has given recitals here in various halls. In 1902 (March 29, April 5) he gave chamber concerts with Messrs. Kreisler and Gerardy, and in 1904 (December 6) he played with the Kneisel Quartet.

Mr. Hofmann has composed several piano concertos and smaller piano pieces. He played his concerto in A minor, No. 3, with the Philharmonic Society of New York, February 28, 29, 1908. He has contributed to various periodicals, and published a book about piano technic.

nation wrote this "trilogy" and wrote also a music easier of comprehension by an audience, more stirring to it, than at least one symphony and a tone-poem or two of d'Indy's later days. Corresponding was the response, the reward of yesterday.

Berlioz of the overture to Shakspeare's play, "King Lear," ended the concert and, again, Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra laid on and spared not in a fashion that might alarm for its future sundry connoisseurs of delicate, anxious ears. Yet is there any other way to play this romantically ram-pageous, this highly intensified music of a Berlioz excited by Shakspeare, by creative impulse, by his premonitions of effect upon his audience? D'Indy's "trilogy" is full voiced, warmly colored, imaginatively ardent; yet how exact in the degree to which music may attain exactness, is his picturing of the camp; how clear-spoken, and therefore the more poignant, the loves and fate of Max and Thekla; how graphically tragic the death and the glory of Wallenstein! In comparison—or rather in contrast—Berlioz is but "wrought up" in general over the tragedy of Lear, over Shakspearean eloquence, over the translation of both into tones. He writes a stormy music for a stormy tragedy, a music of vivid contrasts, of sharp transitions, as indeed goes Shakspeare's play. He embodies in tones a large impression, a generalized reaction, but the hearer listens almost in vain, unless he has uncommonly susceptible imagination, for the tread of Lear, for Cordelia's voice soft and low, for the ravings of the heath, for the pain and pity of blinded Gloucester. Romantic sound and fury, passionate, if the hearer will, wreaking itself through period after period, relieving itself by occasional contrast, fills this overture of Berlioz, as they fill many a poem, picture, novel of his wild day in the arts. Yet if he had entitled his piece, "Overture to Hugo's 'Hernani'" or "Prelude to Byron's 'Glaour,'" is there ought in the implication of the music to deny such designation? First, last and all the time, it is no more than romantical excitement, bursting into tones.

H. T. P.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Boston knows a good deal by this time about Mr. Rabaud as conductor. Next Friday and Saturday he will conduct his "Procession Nocturne," a symphonic poem after the text of Lenau on the Faust legend. Other cities have already had their taste of Mr. Rabaud's music this season. "La Procession Nocturne" (which has been heard here at an Orchestral Club Concert, and at the New England Conservatory of Music), was performed in November

by the San Francisco Orchestra. His Second Symphony was given in Chicago, and very well received. His Arabian Nights Opera, "Marouf," has been produced by the Metropolitan Opera Company in New York, Philadelphia and Brooklyn under Mr. Monteux's leadership. The Brooklyn performance coincided with the last New York trip of the Boston Symphony, and Mr. Rabaud, attending it, was called forth to bow. Another matter of interest will be the soloist, Mischa Levitzki, who has made a name for himself in his recitals of two seasons. He has chosen the G minor Concerto of Saint-Saens. The remaining numbers will be Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor, and Beethoven's Overture to Leonore, No. 3.

A special choral concert has been arranged for the last two days of the year (Monday afternoon, Dec. 30, and Tuesday evening, Dec. 31), "Celebrating the Close of the Year of Victory." It will be devoted to music of thanksgiving and music of patriotism. First will come the American, Belgian, English, Italian and French anthems, then Chadwick's patriotic hymn, "Land of Our Hearts," and Bizet's "Patrie." More notable music will be Franck's choral setting of the 150th psalm, Verdi's "Te Deum," and a "Suite of the 16th Century," arranged by Mr. Rabaud from pieces found in the Virginal Book of Queen Elizabeth. These concerts will replace the first pair, postponed from October (11th and 12th) on account of the influenza. Consequently the season tickets for those will be good for these concerts of Dec. 30 and 31. Single tickets also are on sale.

RABAUD NOCTURNE ON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Boston knows a good deal by this time about Rabaud the conductor. But Rabaud, the composer, will be a matter of hearsay until next Friday and Saturday, when he is to conduct his "Procession Nocturne," a symphonic poem after the text of Lenau on the Faust legend. Other cities have already had their taste of Mr. Rabaud's music this season. "La Procession Nocturne" (which has only been heard here under Mr. Longy at his Orchestral Club Concerts) was performed in November by the San Francisco Orchestra. His second symphony was given in Chicago, and very well received. And his Arabian Nights Opera, "Marouf," has been produced by the Metropolitan Opera Company in New York, Philadelphia and Brooklyn under Mr. Monteux's leadership.

Another matter of interest will be the soloist, Mischa Levitzki, who has chosen to play Saint-Saens' sparkling G minor concerto. The remaining numbers will be Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor, and Beethoven's Overture to Leonore, No. 3.

Mr. JOSEF CASIMIR HOFMANN was born at Cracow, January 20, 1876.* (The date January 20, 1877, is also given.) He was the son of Casimir Hofmann, conductor, a composer of operettas, and teacher of harmony and counterpoint at the Warsaw Conservatory.† Josef's mother was a singer. The boy received his first music lessons from his father, and he played in public when he was six years old at a charity concert in Warsaw. When he was nine years old, he gave concerts in Germany, Denmark, Norway, Sweden. After he had appeared in Vienna, Paris, and London, he came to the United States, and made his first appearance in New York,

*In Riemann's "Musik-Lexikon" (1909) the pianist's name is spelled "Joseph Hofmann."

†This statement is made by Grove's Dictionary. In Mme. Modjeska's Memoirs, Casimir Hofmann is referred to as "formerly the leader of the orchestra in Cracow." Riemann's "Musik-Lexikon" says merely that he was a conductor and composer of operettas. Mr. Hofmann died in 1911.

November 29, 1887, when he played with orchestra Beethoven's First Concerto and solo pieces, among which were his own Berceuse and Waltz. He gave ten concerts in Boston that season. His first appearance was at Music Hall, December 23, 1887. Helene Hastreiter, Nettie Carpenter, Mrs. Sacconi, Theo. Björkstén, and De Anna were associated with him. It is said that he gave fifty-two concerts in two months and a half. Young Hofmann was then withdrawn from public life, chiefly through the agency of the late Alfred Corning Clark, and went to Berlin, where he rested for a time and studied counterpoint with Heinrich Urban, the pianoforte with Moszkowski. He then studied with Rubinstein at Dresden for two years and a half, until the death of that master. He also took lessons of d'Albert. In 1894 he played in Dresden, London, and other cities, and in 1897 began a concert tour of Europe and America.

He revisited Boston with the Chicago Orchestra, led by Theodore Thomas, March 27, 1898, and played Rubinstein's concerto in D minor and a group of solo pieces. He gave recitals in Music Hall, March 28 and April 21, 1898. His next recital was on March 6, 1901, in Symphony Hall.

His first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston was on November 30, 1901, when he played Rubinstein's concerto and a group of solo pieces. He played at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston, December 17, 1910, Rubinstein's concerto in D minor; and at a concert in aid of the Pension Fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, April 9, 1911 (Beethoven's concerto in G major, No. 4). On January 6, 1912, he played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Chopin's concerto No. 2, F minor. On December 13, 1913, he played Schumann's concerto. He has given recitals here in various halls. In 1902 (March 29, April 5) he gave chamber concerts with Messrs. Kreisler and Gerardy, and in 1904 (December 6) he played with the Kneisel Quartet.

Mr. Hofmann has composed several piano concertos and smaller piano pieces. He played his concerto in A minor, No. 3, with the Philharmonic Society of New York, February 28, 29, 1908. He has contributed to various periodicals, and published a book about piano technic.

8-1
41

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1918-19.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

HENRI RABAUD, Conductor.

EIGHTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 27, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 28, AT 8 P. M.

SCHUMANN,

SYMPHONY in D minor, op. 120

I. Andante; Allegro

II. Romanza

III. Scherzo

IV. Largo: Finale

Played without pause

RABAUD,

SYMPHONIC POEM, "La Procession Nocturne"
(after Lenau)

First time at these Concerts

SAINT-SAËNS,

CONCERTO for Pianoforte in G minor, No. 2, op. 22

I. Andante sostenuto

II. Allegretto scherzando

III. Presto

BEETHOVEN,

OVERTURE to "Leonora" No. 3

Soloist:

MISCHA LEVITZKI

Baldwin Pianoforte used

MISCHA LEVITZKI

The Phenomenal
Pianist

RABAUD MAKES OLD MUSIC LIVE

Departs from Perfunctory
Reading of Schumann
at Symphony Concert

LEVITZKI HEARD WITH ORCHESTRA

By PHILIP HALE

The eighth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Rabaud, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Schumann, symphony No. 4, D minor; Rabaud, "La Procession Nocturne," symphonic poem (after Lenau's "Faust")—first time at these concerts; Saint-Saens, piano concerto No. 2, G minor; Beethoven, overture to "Leonore" No. 3.

Mr. Nikisch, a romantic conductor, gave a singularly romantic interpretation of Schumann's symphony in D minor. The music appealed to him strongly, as did Tchaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet." The performance of these two works was the crowning glory of his career in Boston. After his departure there were many performances of this symphony; some highly respectable and therefore ineffective, some curiously unintelligent and dull. His successors unfortunately regarded the symphony as "a classic," forgetting the fact that the romanticist of one generation, if he has a spark of genius or even conspicuous talent, is a classic in the eyes of the generation following; but the works of this "classic" composer should still be performed in the romantic spirit. Thus the occasional bombast, the extravagance of the Berlioz of the "Hernani" and "Antony" period should be defiantly expressed. So with Schumann. Yet too many conductors treat a symphony by him as though they were exhibiting a corpse and calling attention to the beauty of its features in death. They are afraid of disturbing the body. This symphony is not dead; its spirit did not die with Schumann.

Spirit of Music Prevails

Mr. Rabaud, fortunately for the audience, looks on the symphony as living music; as romantic in spite of the years. There was nothing perfunctory in the performance; there was no trace of the required respect of the professional mourner in the funeral chamber or at the grave. For once the spirit of the music prevailed over its material body. No conductor can change certain awkward passages in the symphony or re-orchestrate it in the performance; but Mr. Rabaud made the hearer forget Schumann's deficiencies, by bringing out fully the beauty of the musical thought. Take, for instance, the haunting Trio of the Scherzo. No conductor here has so comprehended its rhythmic character, the melancholy, so wistful, so contemplative, so peculiarly Schumannesque since Mr. Nikisch left us. The symphony gained greatly by being played without pauses between the movements as the composer directed.

"La Procession Nocturne" is illustrative of an episode in Lenau's "Faust." The symphonic poem was performed here 15 years ago by the Orchestral Club under Mr. Longy. There has also been a performance by the New England Conservatory Orchestra. The work was brought out in Paris in 1899. It shows the sensitive, impressionable nature of an accomplished musician, an imaginative composer whose technical skill allows him to create at once a mood, to maintain it without inducing monotony, to re-establish the mood after an ecclesiastically impressive middle section. The effects are gained by artfully simple means, a sober use of musical material; but the sobriety is not for a moment academic. The moods of Nature and of Faust are suggested without any attempts at bald realism. The despair of Faust is not frenzy. The religious procession seen by him, the solemn hymn as it swells and dies away—these furnish the contrast to the portrayal of the night, the stillness of the forest, the gloomy Faust as he envies the happiness of those singing the sacred hymn. The audience was quick to appreciate the charm of the music and the perfection of the performance. The composer was recalled several times.

Praise Levitzki's Playing

Young Mr. Levitzki has given three recitals in Boston. Yesterday he played here for the first time with the orchestra, and gave a delightful performance of Saint-Saens's almost too familiar concerto. He played the first movement of pseudo-Bach character in the appro-

Steinway Pianoforte used

MISCHA LEVITZKI

The Phenomenal
Pianist

RABAUD MAKES OLD MUSIC LIVE

Departs from Perfunctory
Reading of Schumann
at Symphony Concert

LEVITZKI HEARD WITH ORCHESTRA

By PHILIP HALE

The eighth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Rabaud, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Schumann, symphony No. 4, D minor; Rabaud, "La Procession Nocturne," symphonic poem (after Lenau's "Faust")—first time at these concerts; Saint-Saens, piano concerto No. 2, G minor; Beethoven, overture to "Leonore" No. 3.

Mr. Nikisch, a romantic conductor, gave a singularly romantic interpretation of Schumann's symphony in D minor. The music appealed to him strongly, as did Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet." The performance of these two works was the crowning glory of his career in Boston. After his departure there were many performances of this symphony; some highly respectable and therefore ineffective, some curiously unintelligent and dull. His successors unfortunately regarded the symphony as "a classic," forgetting the fact that the romanticist of one generation, if he has a spark of genius or even conspicuous talent, is a classic in the eyes of the generation following; but the works of this "classic" composer should still be performed in the romantic spirit. Thus the occasional bombast, the extravagance of the Berlioz of the "Hernani" and "Antony" period should be defiantly expressed. So with Schumann. Yet too many conductors treat a symphony by him as though they were exhibiting a corpse and calling attention to the beauty of its features in death. They are afraid of disturbing the body. This symphony is not dead; its spirit did not die with Schumann.

Spirit of Music Prevails

Mr. Rabaud, fortunately for the audience, looks on the symphony as living music; as romantic in spite of the years. There was nothing perfunctory in the performance; there was no trace of the required respect of the professional mourner in the funeral chamber or at the grave. For once the spirit of the music prevailed over its material body. No conductor can change certain awkward passages in the symphony or re-orchestrate it in the performance; but Mr. Rabaud made the hearer forget Schumann's deficiencies, by bringing out fully the beauty of the musical thought. Take, for instance, the haunting Trio of the Scherzo. No conductor here has so comprehended its rhythmic character, the melancholy, so wistful, to contemplative, so peculiarly Schumannesque since Mr. Nikisch left us. The symphony gained greatly by being played without pauses between the movements as the composer directed.

"La Procession Nocturne" is illustrative of an episode in Lenau's "Faust." The symphonic poem was performed here 15 years ago by the Orchestral Club under Mr. Longy. There has also been a performance by the New England Conservatory Orchestra. The work was brought out in Paris in 1899. It shows the sensitive, impressionable nature of an accomplished musician, an imaginative composer whose technical skill allows him to create at once a mood, to maintain it without inducing monotony, to re-establish the mood after an ecclesiastically impressive middle section. The effects are gained by artfully simple means, a sober use of musical material; but the sobriety is not for a moment academic. The moods of Nature and of Faust are suggested without any attempts at bald realism. The despair of Faust is not frenzy. The religious procession seen by him, the solemn hymn as it swells and dies away—these furnish the contrast to the portrayal of the night, the stillness of the forest, the gloomy Faust as he envies the happiness of those singing the sacred hymn. The audience was quick to appreciate the charm of the music and the perfection of the performance. The composer was recalled several times.

Praise Levitzki's Playing

Young Mr. Levitzki has given three recitals in Boston. Yesterday he played here for the first time with the orchestra, and gave a delightful performance of Saint-Saens's almost too familiar concerto. He played the first movement of pseudo-Bach character in the appropriately dignified manner, not endeavoring to infuse the emotional quality that is inherently lacking, but giving due importance to melodic figures, displaying strength and a clear and charming touch. In the other movements, the clarity, the grace and the fleetness were noteworthy. We have not heard for many years so well-balanced and so interesting a reading of this concerto, a performance wholly in keeping with the character of the music.

Steinway Pianoforte used

144

By this time, no experienced and unprejudiced hearer has any doubt about the ability of Mr. Rabaud as an interpreter of Beethoven. His interpretations, neither conventional nor extravagant, are vital and illuminating, as was Mr. Rachmaninoff's treatment of music by Mozart and Beethoven not long ago.

The concert will be repeated tonight.

The program of the concerts next Monday afternoon and Tuesday evening will include national airs of Belgium, England, France, Italy and the United States; these choral works—Verdi's "Te Deum," Chadwick's "Land of Our Hearts," Cesar Franck's Psalm CL., and these orchestral works: Bizet's overture "Patrie" and the third suite of music by composers represented in the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book (16th century) derived from the stage music arranged by Mr. Rabaud for a performance of "The Merchant of Venice" in Paris.

The program of the concerts for Jan. 3, 4, comprises the "Antar" symphony of Rimsky-Korsakoff; Beethoven's violin concerto (Mr. Helfitz, violinist and Ravel's "Raspedie Espagnole."

RABAUD "PROCESSION NOCTURNE" PLEASURES

"La Procession Nocturne," after Lenau's poem on the Faust legend, played here in 1903 by Mr Longy's Orchestral Club and six years later by Mr Chadwick and the Conservatory Orchestra, is the first of his own compositions Mr Rabaud has placed upon his programs here.

It is not music to startle or amaze by an aggressive modernity, or by the display of a virtuoso skill in juggling themes or putting the orchestra through extraordinary feats. It is rather music which bears the stamp of sincerity, of sensibility of mind and spirit in the perception of poetic ideas and of ardor and refinement of imagination in orchestral expression of them.

There is no apparent attempt at literal translation by lines of Lenau's poem which is printed on the fly leaf of the score. The divisions of the procession disclosed in the forest to Faust are not obviously marked as by banners—as though he should divide the children walking in pairs with torches from the host of virgins bearing crowns, or they from the soberly clad and aged saints with frosted beards and crosses. But the work as a whole is one blending the note of naive mysticism with what may be said to portray human aspiration or regret which at times is poignant.

There is marked economy of materials. Two strokes are not made when one will do. In the simple introductory phrase deep in the horn, repeated in the chalumeau tones of the clarinet, there is at once a mood, an atmosphere established. The naively rhythmical figure of the procession, the later theme suggesting the phrase in the love duet of "Tristan and Isolde," indeed, the poignant harmonic treatment in the song of the cellos, repeated by violas and later by full orchestra, which strangely recalls progressions and a mood of the prelude to the same opera—all with a well-defined individuality, yet the introspective character of the work is not destroyed through development.

Received With Enthusiasm

It is never as though the same creatures were seen moving along the village street or in a country highway. The procession passes as though one were in a dream. The hearer is led first into the solitude and shadows of the forest, where the soul may commune with the spirits of another world. As the procession is gone, the sound of the marchers dying away, there is a shuddering, abruptly intrusive chord in the orchestra, as though Faust roused himself to a sense of reality and of the present, but he remains the observer, not the chief subject of the picture.

While the treatment is objective it is not weak. While musical form, which in its demand for a reprisal of what has already been told, sometimes laughs to scorn dramatic or even congruous development, there was not loss of illusion in the repetition by full orchestra in the final pages.

The work was received with demonstrations of approval wholly unusual for these concerts. As Mr Rabaud was brought back to the platform, many in the audience stood to receive him at both recalls. It is plain that admiration for him is increasingly outspoken from week to week, which is all as it should be.

Levitvski a Brilliant Technician

Mischa Levitzki, appearing as soloist with the orchestra for the first time in Boston, no doubt wearies of references to his youth. When a young man of 20, retaining as modest a manner as he, gives a public performance of Saint-Saens' second or G minor concerto for piano with as many elements of brilliance as did Mr Levitzki yesterday, liance as by instinct mechanical overleaping as by many of his elders ride barriers which many of his elders ride at bravely but clumsily, one must pause with garlands before the glories of youth even before homage to the venerability of years.

Mr Levitzki is so abundantly supplied with technical skill that emotional content is now at times passed over upon wings which are enamored of their own flight. Only years can unfold the perspective of the temple of art. There was occasionally the sense yesterday that rhythmically, in this brilliantly decorative music which asks much of rhythm, the pianist was not always at ease or authoritative, nor were pianist and conductor always in agreement in ensemble, but Mr Levitzki commanded lively admiration. He did not make the mistake of playing an emotional depth beneath a surface which is characteristically polished, particularly in the scintillating brilliance of the scherzo and final movement. He was warmly applauded.

Spirit of Schumann

If all four of Schumann's symphonies were destroyed—including this last in D minor of yesterday: the third also, with its picture of life in the Rhine valley 80 years before the advent of one Gen Pershing, and of the bishop's coronation in the Cologne Cathedral which many would now trade for one in that of Rheims—the real spirit of the composer would live the keener, the more luminous in his songs, in his music for the piano, in the quartets.

A dreamer who worked in ivory with the born passion of the miniaturist, who heard the call of inner voices, he expressed with more dramatic force and tragic beauty when within a smaller frame. There is the spell in the sentiment of the song of the romance, but there are the measures of German padding, indifferent when given out, and wearisome by much repetition. The performance did not drag sentiment into sentimentality and disclosed euphony and precision. Mr Rabaud ended his program with the third overture to "Leonore." Scale Dec. 28, 1918

SYMPHONY GIVES WORK OF LEADER

Rabaud's Tone Poem on This Week's List

Post Dec 28/18

Seldom has Mr. Rabaud, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, devised a more entertaining and happily varied programme than that which he presented yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall: the fourth symphony of Schumann, Rabaud's "Procession Nocturne," Saint-Saens' G minor piano concerto, performed by Michael Levitzki, and Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture.

PLAYED AS ONE PIECE

The Schumann symphony was played as the composer desired—without breaks between the movements. Late comers stayed outside in the lobbies until the last note had sounded. The proceeding was not only in accord with the composer's purpose, the whole interpretation was one of exquisite poetry.

It is not hard to believe that Mr. Rabaud, whose breadth and eclecticism as a composer grows on one, finds himself in peculiar sympathy with the sensitive romanticist who could touch nothing, even the grand form of the classic symphony, and the potencies of the modern orchestra, without making them intimately and incorrigibly an echo of his lyrical, dreaming spirit.

Rabaud's Own Work

The poetic mood was sustained by the performance of what is perhaps Mr. Rabaud's most famous and popular orchestral composition—the "Procession Nocturne" after Lenau's "Faust." The work has been performed sympathetically, ere this, in Boston. It made the stronger an impression yesterday under the composer's baton. The mood is that of Faust, pondering on his destiny, wrapt in his musings, but half conscious of nature that broods about him, while her unhappy man-child struggles with his fate.

In melodic thought, in imaginative suggestion, in orchestral color the work is a congenial and highly artistic addition to the long list of compositions inspired by Lenau's poem. Mr. Rabaud, as composer-conductor, was recalled repeatedly after his performance.

Gifted Young Virtuoso

Mr. Levitzki, a highly gifted young virtuoso, played Saint-Saens with exemplary brilliancy and clarity. These are qualities inherent in the music, which they served well to illumine. Unusually young for a soloist at these concerts, Mr. Levitzki made an excellent impression on the audience, and was recalled with marked enthusiasm.

Sometimes it is written, "an effective performance of the Leonore overture brought the concert to an end." Mr. Rabaud's reading of the famous masterwork was more than that. The emotion of the music was profoundly felt. It smoldered in the introduction, burst into flame with the opening of the allegro, and at last thrilled every hearer with its hosannas of triumph, of deliverance from wrong, of freedom from the tyrant.

VARIETY OF CONCERTS IS GREAT NEED

Dec. 29, 1918
Schumann's Symphony,
Real Music as It Is, Now
a 'Thrice-Told Tale'

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

Program.
Schumann, Fourth Symphony, D minor.
Rabaud, "La Procession Nocturne," Symphonic Poem.
St. Saens, Piano Concerto, G minor.
Soloist, Mischa Levitzki.
Beethoven, Leonora No. 3, overture.

The above, the program at Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, with one exception, was not only a twice-told tale to the Boston concert-goer, but a fifty-times told one. We must beware of letting these concerts become a routine recital of "standard" pieces. We admit the necessity of giving the younger attendants some classical pabulum, but either the Schumann or the Beethoven work would have been enough for this duty, and to add the very familiar G minor concerto was becoming altogether too academical. Let M. Rabaud study the programs of Henschel, Fiedler or Nikisch, if he wishes to know what bills-of-fare we are accustomed to!
even those of Gericke and Muck might teach a lesson.

Having thus growled we may recant by saying that Schumann's works do not fade nearly as much as many others of his epoch. It is because they do not rely so much upon orchestration (in which we have made great strides), as upon really musical thought. It has been said, with truth, that Schumann's symphonies are about as effective as piano duets as in an orchestral version. How weak the composed was in scoring may be judged by the fact that he originally tried Guitarr accompaniment in the Romance of this work, although he changed this in the later revision. The only difficult part in the symphony, for such an orchestra as ours, was in the violin passages of the first movement and the finale, and for our artists in this division of our band there are no longer any difficulties of any kind.

A GRATEFUL CHANGE.

Yet after all we are glad that M.
Rabaud played the Schumann symphony, for when we remember how some modern Frenchmen revile this composer (Debussy and D'Indy, for example), it is a most grateful change to find another Frenchman giving such a splendid reading of his work, as was done on this occasion. We notice that M. Rabaud repeats the expositions of the first movements in his symphonic readings, a custom that has somewhat lapsed under Dr.
Muck.

In his Nocturnal Procession, M.
Rabaud proved to be the more conservative modern French school, like Pierne, for example. The number is rather too constantly pianissimo, and therefore lacks contrast, but it has some noble moments, as for example, the chorale-like work on brasses in the centre. There is dignity and romance in its measures. It follows a well-known plan in beginning and ending very softly, as many processions do, all the way from the Lohengrin Prelude, through Roff's Lenore symphony, to the Turkish Patrol. It has some very masterly treatment of the wind instruments. The audience used the occasion to pay homage to the great conductor and recalled him at the end of his work over and again, and many even rose from their seats as a testimonial of respect.

Of the most popular and most melodic of concertos we can say nothing new, but we may become enthusiastic over Mischa Levitzki. He leans more to the technical than to the temperamental side, but then his technique is remarkable. His wrist and forearm action in heavy chord playing or in double-octave work is phenomenal, his scales and passages are clear as crystal, and he gave the second movement (the gem of the work) with a crispness and daintiness that was delightful.

He is certainly one of the most promising of the younger set of pianists. He is not extravagant in gesture or over-sentimental, as some of the younger pianists are apt to be.
All in all, he made a very pronounced success and was recalled over and over again with a continuance of applause that is most unusual at these afternoon concerts.

A heroine named Leonora
From her well-beloved husband they tore her.
But, disguised as a boy named Fidelio,
She outwitted his jailer right gayly O,
Which caused her freed spouse to adore her.

That tells the story of the final overture in a nutshell, and Beethoven tells it in music so that the climax of joy after Florestan's deliverance becomes something frantic. When Beethoven pictures jubilation, as in this work or in the ninth symphony finale, he sometimes becomes frenzied, and the ecstasy, the delirium of triumph and happiness, was done full justice to by M. Rabaud and his men. The solo trumpet passage, the only important bit for this instrument that Beethoven ever wrote, was also clear and effective, so that the rather stereotyped program ended with much brilliance.

Judging by the Schumann and the Beethoven readings, M. Rabaud is a classical conductor of high rank. Among modern French conductors we can recall only Lamoureux as gifted with such sensible tendencies. Yet Andre Mes-sager shows indications of the same conservative spirit in the makeup of his American programs and the style of their interpretation.

MUSIC IN BOSTON

Dec. 28, 1918
Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, eighth concert of thirty-eighth season, Symphony Hall, Boston, afternoon of Dec. 27, 1918; Mischa Levitzki, soloist. The program: Schumann, symphony No. 4 in D minor, op. 120;
Rabaud, "La Procession Nocturne," symphonic poem, after Lenau (first time at these concerts); Saint-Saens, concerto for pianoforte in G minor, No. 2, op. 22;
Beethoven, overture to "Leonore," No. 3.

BOSTON, Massachusetts — Boston has the opportunity during the incumbency of Mr. Rabaud to study the gentle art of program making under a master. Never too long to tire the hearers, with contrast in plenty, with enough new things to keep interest eager, with a fresh viewpoint postulated on the old things, they offer musical entertainment ideally luxurious. Such a program was the eighth of the present season and in addition to its individual merit as a program it added interest both in that for the first time the conductor appeared as composer and the soloist stirred his hearers into gratified and noisy ac-knowledgegment of his success. If ever an audience sat back and seemed to say: "All right. Now show us what you can do," when a soloist appeared before it, it was the one of Friday afternoon. If ever a soloist coolly accepted a challenge and thoroughly succeeded in "showing" his audience, it was Mr. Levitzki. Of course, he had the help first of a most gracious piece of writing in the Saint-Saens second concerto, second of a facile and accommodating conductor, and third of an interested and wholly sympathetic band of players. Even so, the major part of the task was for Mr. Levitzki's fingers to accomplish. Nimble and obedient, they performed their task in satisfying fashion. True, the eagerness of the player caused their nimbleness at times to endanger the rhythm, and his intentness on the task in hand obscured the glance he should more often have lifted to the conductor. With experience, however, will come the poise, and meanwhile the beauty of tone is beyond cavil.

Mr. Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne" is probably as compact, unified, and scholarly a bit of writing in the modern idiom as has ever been heard at these concerts. It takes but a few bars to establish the mood and the
On its next "southern trip," the second week of January, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play:

In the Academy of Music, Philadelphia, on Monday evening, Jan. 6, Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D Minor, Mr. Rabaud's own "Procession Nocturne," Berlioz's overture to "King Lear," and Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto in E Minor, with Mr. Fredric Fradkin, the new concertmaster, as soloist.

In the New National Theater, Washington, on Tuesday afternoon, Jan. 7, D'Indy's Trilogy "Wallenstein," Converse's "Mystic Trumpeter," and Mendelssohn's Concerto with Mr. Fradkin.

In the Lyric Theater, Baltimore, on Wednesday evening, Jan. 8, Schumann's Fourth Symphony, Mendelssohn's Concerto with Mr. Fradkin, a suite of English Sixteenth Century music arranged by Mr. Rabaud, and Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole."

In Carnegie Hall, New York, on Thursday evening, Jan. 9, D'Indy's "Wallenstein," Converse's "Mystic Trumpeter," the old English suite, and Berlioz's "King Lear."

In the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, on Friday evening, Jan. 10, Rimsky-Korskoff's Symphony "Antar," Mendelssohn's Concerto with Mr. Fradkin, and Ravel's
"Rapsodie Espagnole."

In Carnegie Hall, New York, Saturday afternoon, Jan. 11, Schumann's Fourth Symphony, Rabaud's "Procession Nocturne," Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole," and Beethoven's "Leonora" Overture
No. 3.

148
MISCHA LEVITZKI was born at Kremenschug, Russia, in May, 1898. His father, an American citizen, was there with his family on business. The boy attended the public schools of New York. He had learned to play the piano a little in Russia. Friends in New York placed him at the Institute of Musical Art, where he studied for above five years with Sigismond Stojowski. He was then sent to Berlin, where Ernst von Dohnányi was his teacher. In March, 1914, Mr. Levitzki gave his first public recital in Berlin. In the spring of that year he gave recitals in Antwerp and Brussels. The war broke out; he returned to Berlin, and in the winter of 1914-15 gave recitals there. Afterwards he gave recitals in Leipsic, Vienna, Budapest, where he played with Dohnányi, smaller cities of Germany and Austria-Hungary, and in Christiania. Returning to New York in April, 1916, he gave his first recital there on October 17 of that year.

His first recital in Boston was on October 19, 1916. He gave recitals here on November 27 of that year and on November 10, 1917.

8-5
149
TO BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SUBSCRIBERS

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT

One of the two pairs of Symphony Concerts scheduled for October and postponed because of the closing of all Halls and Theatres will be given in Symphony Hall

MONDAY AFTERNOON, DECEMBER 30, at 2.30 o'clock

TUESDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 31, at 8 o'clock

PROGRAMME

Celebrating the Close of the Year of Victory

STAR SPANGLED BANNER
LA BRABANÇONNE
GOD SAVE THE KING
MARCIA REALE ITALIANA
LA MARSEILLAISE

G. W. CHADWICK (b. Lowell, Mass., 1854)

"LAND OF OUR HEARTS," Patriotic Hymn
(to words by John Hall Ingham)

CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA

G. BIZET (b. Paris, France, 1838) "PATRIE," Dramatic Overture

G. VERDI (b. Roncole, Italy, 1813) TE DEUM
DOUBLE CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA

GILES FARNABY (b. Truro, England, 1568 [?]) and anonymous
English composers . . . SUITE OF THE XVITH CENTURY
(Arranged by Henri Rabaud)

Maestoso Moderato Allegro Andante Maestoso

C. FRANCK (b. Liège, Belgium, 1822) PSALM CL CHORUS, ORCHESTRA AND ORGAN

AMERICA

CHORUS, ORCHESTRA AND ORGAN

Ticket Information — Please Read Carefully

Tickets dated Friday Afternoon, October 11, 1918, to be used

Monday Afternoon, December 30

Tickets dated Saturday Evening, October 12, 1918, to be used

Tuesday Evening, December 31

Extra single tickets for these concerts now on sale at Box Office

150

9-1

151

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1918--19.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

HENRI RABAUD, Conductor.

NINTH PROGRAMME

MONDAY, DECEMBER 30, AT 2.30 P. M.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 31, AT 8 P. M.

CELEBRATING THE CLOSE OF THE YEAR OF VICTORY!

JOHN STAFFORD SMITH, THE STAR SPANGLED BANNER

CAMPENHOUT,

LA BRABANCONNE

HENRY CAREY, (?)

GOD SAVE THE KING

G. GABETTI,

MARCIA REALE ITALIANA

ROUGET DE LISLE,

LA MARSEILLAISE

CHADWICK,

"LAND OF OUR HEARTS," Patriotic Hymn for Chorus and Orchestra
(First time in Boston)

BIZET,

"PATRIE," Dramatic Overture

VERDI,

"TE DEUM" for double Chorus and Orchestra
(First time at these Concerts)

GILES FARNABY and anonymous English Composers

SUITE of the XVI Century
(Arranged by Henri Rabaud)
Maestoso. Moderato. Allegro. Andante. Maestoso
(First time in Concert)

FRANCK,

PSALM CL. for Chorus, Orchestra and Organ
(First time at these Concerts)

HENRY CAREY, (?)

AMERICA
Chorus, Orchestra and Organ

CONCERT OF VICTORY BY SYMPHONY

Orchestra Assisted by the Townsend
Chorus

Post Dec. 3/18

The ninth symphony concert, which takes the place of the first concert postponed because of the influenza epidemic, was given yesterday afternoon. M. Rabaud and the orchestra were assisted by a mixed chorus trained under Stephen Townsend.

The programme of a cosmopolitan character and selected with the idea of celebrating the "close of the year of victory," was as follows: "The Star Spangled Banner," "La Brabanconne," "God Save the King," "Marcia Reale Italiana" and "La Marseillaise"; "Land of Our Hearts," a patriotic hymn for chorus and orchestra by Chadwick (first time in Boston); "Patrie," a dramatic overture by Bizet; "Te Deum," for double chorus and orchestra by Verdi (first time at these concerts); "Suite of the Sixteenth Century," by Giles Farnaby and anonymous English composers, arranged by M. Rabaud; "Psalm CL," for chorus, orchestra and organ by Franck (first time at these concerts), and "America."

CHADWICK'S HYMN

Mr. Chadwick's "Land of Our Hearts," a setting of a patriotic poem by John Hall Ingham of Philadelphia, was given its first performance at the meeting of the Litchfield County (Conn.) Association on June 5, 1918. The first, third and fourth stanzas of the work are beautiful and impressive in themselves, but are tainted with a "voluptuous religiosity" which ill suits the austere dignity and repose essential to the ideal patriotic composition (which, needless to add, has not yet been written).

The comparative weakness of the composition as a whole is evident in the conventional musical conception of the "Sunny South" and by the absence of cumulative intensity in the whole work. The last stanza, which should have been the most powerful, is the weakest. A bad diminished seventh chord on the keyword "nation" and conventional chromatic harmonies, as in the final two measures, betray a lack of the more profound creative power.

"Patrie" and "Te Deum"

Bizet's "Patrie" is also an "occasional piece," written for M. Pasdeloup and the Concerts Populaires in 1873. It is marred by the same slight tendency in the direction of bombast and sentimentality that hampers Mr. Chadwick. Yet it, too, is not without a certain impressiveness, and at its best conveys something of the tragic bewilderment of France after the "debacle of 1870." The modulations are often forced, the cadences too often conventional, and the delicate orchestration is impaired by excessive percussion and perfunctory trumpet calls.

In Verdi's "Te Deum" the shortcomings of the chorus were most evident. Their attacks lacked incisiveness, the vowel sounds were sometimes blatant, the final consonants indistinguishable and the male voices were often harsh and lacking in body. The soprano solo near the end was capably given, and the work of the chorus as a whole reflects credit on Mr. Townsend when the difficulties of assembling and training a chorus at the present time are considered. The performance of the impressive and often profound "Te Deum" was, on the whole, thoroughly satisfactory.

The "Suite of the Sixteenth Century" shared with Franck's "Psalm" the honors of the programme. M. Rabaud is to be congratulated on his delicate and unobtrusive orchestration in antique style of these old pieces from the "Fitzwilliam Virginal Book." They are full of the eloquent simplicity of the Elizabethans, best exemplified in the lyrics of Shakspeare and the madrigals of Dowland and Morley.

154
 Franck's setting of the 150th Psalm is one of the masterpieces of the last years of his life. The introduction is mystical and yet restrained. The "Hallelujahs" at the beginning are mysterious and menacing, rather than triumphant. Such awe is an essential part of religious emotion, yet most composers, Verdi, for example, tend to be "too much at ease in Zion." The whole composition works up gradually and inevitably to a powerful, sublime, but restrained climax.

The programme for next Friday and Saturday is as follows: Rimsky-Korsakoff—"Antar" Symphony, Beethoven—Concerto for violin in D major, and Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole." Jascha Heifetz will be the soloist.

9TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Herald Dec. 31 '18
 Chorus Assists in Celebrating Close of Year of Victory

NATIONAL AIRS OF ALLIES ON PROGRAM

By PHILIP HALE

The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Rabaud, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The orchestra was assisted by a chorus prepared by Stephen Townsend. The concert celebrated the close of the year of victory. The program was as follows: National airs of the United States, Belgium, England, Italy, France; Chadwick, "Land of Our Hearts," for chorus and orchestra (first time in Boston); Bizet, "Patrie," dramatic overture; Verdi, "Te Deum," for double chorus and orchestra (first time at these concerts); Barnaby and anonymous English composers of the 16th century, Suite No. 3, from the stage music arranged by Mr. Rabaud for the production of "Le Marchand de Venise" in Paris; Cesar Franck, Psalm CL., for chorus, orchestra and organ (first time at these concerts); "America."

There was a large audience, but the seats of many subscribers were filled by others, and, strange to say, there were many vacant seats in the second balcony.

The concert as a whole was tame and a disappointment. Even the patriotic hymns of the allied nations aroused little enthusiasm. There was a slight crescendo of applause during the playing. The heartiest manifestation of joy followed the Marseillaise, and yet, taken at a little slower pace than that chosen by Mr. Messager, the Marseillaise—"luckiest musical composition ever promulgated; the sound of which will make the blood tingle in men's veins," to quote Carlyle—was not so spirited and flaming as when it was played here con amore by the Paris Conservatory Orchestra two months ago.

Mr. Rabaud planned the program so that the United States, France, Italy, England and Belgium should be represented. As Russia's heroic soldiers in the early years of the war alarmed the Germans and gave the English time to form a second army, Russia, theoretically, should have been heard in music. Alas, what is Russia today? What has she been since the Revolution and the substitution of a weak tune by Gretchaninoff for the superb National Hymn associated with the Tsar?

For the United States, Mr. Chadwick's unpretentious and patriotic hymn, "Land of Our Hearts," was chosen; it was sung sonorously by the chorus and well received by the audience.

Verdi's noble and profoundly impressive "Te Deum" was a doubly appropriate selection. It is to be regretted that the choral performance was timid and generally ineffective. It too plainly showed the lack of confidence that results from insufficient preparation. A work like this "Te Deum" is not to be treated in Mr. Wemmick fashion "Hullo, here's a 'Te Deum'; let's sing it." There was not sufficient time for thorough rehearsal between the announcement of the concert and the day of performance. Nor is this "Te Deum" a work for many of the amateurs that were in the chorus, a work that demands picked singers, trained musicians with independent voices; not merely amiable singers following the more experienced in their neighborhood. Yet, pale as the choral performance was, it was a pleasure to hear Verdi's music again, an extraordinary work for the Verdi of 81 or 85 years. How the significance of the text inspired him with an imposing simplicity of expression! The grandeur of "The Father of an Infinite Majesty"; the ineffable beauty of "Also the Holy Ghost the Comforter," the monotone "Day by Day We Magnify Thee," the wonderful "O Lord Have Mercy," and the marvelous ending in which the hope of the world is voiced clamorously, with the following few orchestral chords, pianissimo, never to be forgotten—these are only a few of the glories in this dramatic-mystical composition.

Cesar Franck's Psalm, which gains in effect with the orchestral accompaniment, is straightforward jubilation. Here the task of the chorus was comparatively easy.

Bizet's "Patrie," written shortly after the Franco-Prussian war, was again an appropriate selection, expressing the martial spirit, the grief, the indomitable courage of the French; yet one wished that Bizet had invented music more worthy the composer of "Carmen" and "L'Arlesienne." The overture was written to order. Some of the pages are trivial, indeed; some are only bombast. Only here and there does one recognize the better Bizet, whose letters as a soldier in 1870 are more eloquent than this tonal expression of feeling.

Mr. Rabaud's Suite shows his taste in selection from the old English composers and his skill in editing and arranging the pieces, without the foolish reverence that respects the archaism that is synonymous with dullness in modern ears; without the impertinent modernization that takes away the delicate and delightful flavor of old songs and dance tunes. The opening Maestoso is distinctively English in its formality and ruggedness. The gems of the Suite are the Moderato by Farnaby and the Andante by an unknown composer of Elizabethan days. The Suite found immediate favor.

This concert which took the place of that announced for Oct. 11 and deferred on account of the influenza, will be repeated tonight.

The program of the concerts on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 3, 4, is as follows: Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Antar," symphony No. 2; Beethoven, violin concerto (Mr. Heifetz, violinist); Ravel, Rapsodie Espagnole.

BOSTON CONDUCTOR NOW AN "IMMORTAL"

Monitor Jan. 1, 1919.

BOSTON, Massachusetts—News has just arrived of the election of Mr. Henri Rabaud, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as a member of L'Institut de France. Under the Institut is the Académie des Beaux Arts, comprising five chambers for the various fine arts. Of the "forty immortals" there are always six musical composers, judges of the Prix de Rome; they are at present: Saint-Saëns, Dubois, Paladilhe, Fauré, Charpentier, and now Rabaud, replacing Widor, who in turn has become "Secrétaire Perpétuelle."

Mr. Rabaud's father was a celebrated cellist and teacher at the Conservatoire, his grandfather was also a musician, and his grand-aunt the famous singer, Mme. Dorus-Gros. He is a graduate of the Conservatoire, where he studied composition under Massenet, and in 1894 he won the Grand Prix de Rome. For the four years following he studied at the Villa Medici. Then, in Rome and Vienna he organized and conducted series of concerts for the purpose of acquainting those cities with contemporary French music. He has regularly been a leading conductor at the Opéra and the Opéra Comique, and has often conducted at the Concerts Lamoureux, Colonne, Monteux, and Conservatoire. As a composer, he is known to Europe by two operas besides the Arabian Nights opera "Marouf," which has been presented by the Metropolitan Opera Company. He has written an oratorio, "Job," three symphonies and numerous works in smaller forms.

THE STANDARDIZED "STAR-SPANGLED BANNER"

The Oliver Ditson Company has put on the market the service version of the "Star-Spangled Banner." This version embodies the work of a committee of 12, comprising the following: John Alden Carpenter, Wallace Goodrich, Walter E. Spaulding and F. W. Converse, representing the committee on training camp activities; Peter W. Dykema of the University of Wisconsin, Osbourne McConathy of Northwestern University and Hollis Dann of Cornell University, representing the national conference of music supervisors; and C. C. Birchard, Carl Engel, William Arms Fisher, E. W. Newton and Arthur E. Johnstone, representing the music publishers.

In their work of standardizing the anthem, the committee considered and studied it from the standpoints of melody, rhythm and harmonization. The result of their joint effort was to add dignity to the ordinary version and to offer the country a more musical form of its national anthem.

The new version of the hymn is being used in all its concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, to the delight and interest of its hearers. This version will undoubtedly also be the one exclusively used in the schools and in those printed in the army and navy song and band books.

PHONY CONCERT

RD OF A DISILLUSIONIZING AFTERNOON

Trans. Dec. 31, 1918
A "Celebration of the Close of the Year of Victory" That Proved but Perfunctory Occasion—A Singular Audience from Which Subscribers Were Conspicuously Absent—Little Interesting or Impressive Music and All in Routine Performance—A Chorus Too Hastily Assembled and Prepared

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT of yesterday afternoon—first of a pair, as the programme-book put it, "to celebrate the year of victory"—was better designed than accomplished. It replaced the concert announced for Oct. 11 last and postponed because of the prevalence of influenza, as the repetition, this evening, will replace the concert of Oct. 12. By so much the occasion fulfilled its purpose, since it lessened by a week the prolongation of the series to the middle of May in amends for omitted concerts. Otherwise, it fell far short of intent. To suit the plan, the programme began with the playing by the orchestra of the national hymns of the United States, Belgium, Britain, Italy and France; it proceeded with three pieces for chorus with orchestra—"Land of Our Hearts: A Patriotic Hymn" written by the American, Mr. Chadwick; a setting of the Te Deum in the offices of the church by the Italian, Verdi; and a setting of the last Psalm—music of triumphant rejoicing—by the Franco-Belgian Franck. Between these were interspersed two orchestral pieces—Bizet's concert overture, "Patrie" and a short Suite arranged by Mr. Rabaud from old English tunes of the sixteenth century and originally part of the incidental music to Monsieur Gémier's reproduction of Shakspeare's comedy, "The Merchant of Venice" at Paris in 1916. To conclude as the old playbills had it, orchestra, organ, chorus and audience sounded one stanza of the hymn, "America." So were the numbers of the day distributed among the United States and the co-belligerent nations against Germany; so were these numbers designed to stir appropriate emotions in the segment of the victors dwelling in and around Boston and assembling in Symphony Hall; so were the Symphony Concerts to be linked into what it is now fashionable to call "the communal life."

Whatever the outcome may be this evening—the more appropriate time for such "celebration"—the number and the quality of the audience, Monday afternoon, visibly defeated the last of these purposes. The upper balcony, open to "the community," at twenty-eight cents per head, held only a fringe of listeners, whereas at an ordinary Symphony Concert, it is filled, usually, to the last seat. In the lower balcony and in the parquet the subscribers to the afternoon concerts seemed few and far between, having evidently bestowed their tickets hither and yon until the auditorium resembled what in the palmy days of the Boston Opera used to be known as "a poor relations' night." The places disposable for each concert were occupied by a still more miscellaneous company, not too much at ease in its surroundings and plainly disappointed in the relative tameness of the proceedings as a "celebration." The whole audience, indeed, declined to be stirred even by the preliminary national hymns, joined only perfunctorily in the singing of "America," returned to the other numbers of the day only routine applause. Whatever the outcome this evening—to repeat a necessary proviso—substantial evidence was not lacking yesterday that the public of the afternoon concerts prefers the Symphony Orchestra as a cosmopolitan medium for the performance of symphonic music and not as instrument for "celebrating the close of the year of victory." Possibly that public, if it ever reflects upon the matter at all, may even believe that, playing such music from all lands week in and week out from October to May, the Symphony Orchestra sufficiently serves and enriches "the communal life."

In the second place, with the exception of Verdi's loftily imagined and eloquently written setting of the Te Deum—not to "celebrate" anything but because the beauty and the majesty of the hymn of praise deeply stirred him—the music of the afternoon as music seldom rose above commonplace. The national hymns evoke in themselves and by habit in the hearers the emotions they were designed to summon; the least sensitive thereto may hardly hear "La Marseillaise" played, especially in the presence of French troops, without answering thrill. But heard as they were Monday afternoon, one after another, "off the reel," on a purely arbitrary occasion, before an unexcited and unexcitable audience, they seemed hardly the sort of musical stuff upon which the Symphony Orchestra exercises its abilities or its audiences their ears. Mr. Chadwick's "hymn" sounded neither better nor worse than the "pot-boiler" of a practised composer. It clothes simple, straightforward elemental verses—"Land of the North, Land of the South, Land of the East, Land of the West, Land of Our Hearts" and so forth—in as simple, straightforward, elementary music, skilfully and "gratefully" written for the singing chorus, mechanically accompanied by the orchestra—a frank pièce d'occasion designed for general usage, with little imagination, with no distinction. Franck's setting of the one hundred and fiftieth Psalm is music of finer craftsmanship and warmer feeling; as direct, if not quite so elementary; of the tonal prose of the organist of Sainte-Clothilde and not of the tonal poetry, like Verdi's setting of the Te Deum, of an illustrious composer.

Until Bizet's overture, "Patrie," became haloed to many an ear by new association with a desolate but warlike France, it passed intrinsically for one of his routine pieces seldom to be resurrected in the concert-room when his masterly music to "L'Arlésienne," for example—to say nothing of orchestral fragments of "Carmen"—lay ready to hand. As for the Suite of Mr. Rabaud—honestest and openest of men—it is exactly what it purports to be. Monsieur Gémier, the actor-manager, eager to domicile "Shakspeare in France," contrived a reproduction of "The Merchant of Venice" on the Parisian stage in which the play was barely discoverable through thick swathings of scenery, costumes, lights, dances, music and other spectacular paraphernalia. He deputed the scholarly Rabaud to write this music. The composer-conductor opened the music-books of Shakspeare's time, when England was fertile in tunes of its own, and transcribed pieces appropriate to various incidents in the play, for a very small orchestra—a mere group of instruments in the pit of a theatre. More recently he has rescored the numbers heard yesterday as a Suite for the concert-hall and a sizable orchestra. The resulting piece runs in five short movements—the first and the last, being identical, of sonorous voice, free and ample rhythmic stride; the intervening three either songful with frank English melody, a little touched by melancholy, or sprightly with English high spirits. Mr. Rabaud has well preserved the directness, the heartiness, the honesty of this old English music. He rescues it with a sympathetic, resourceful, reticent hand. There he and the Suite stop. Of all the numbers of the day, only it and Verdi's Te Deum were worthy of the higher standards of the Symphony Concerts.

Finally, the performance of no one of these pieces, however it may go this evening, rose above dutiful routine. A cosmopolitan orchestra, as the Symphony Orchestra by auspicious fate has been, is now, and probably ever will be, cannot with the best will in the world, play an arbitrary assortment of national hymns with the fire of feeling and of utterance that Mr. Messager and his Frenchmen from the Conservatory lately infused in Symphony Hall into "La Marseillaise." Mr. Rabaud, besides, was too rigid with it; while he was literal to a fault with the overture, "Patrie," which needs all the extraneous heat and glamour a conductor may kindle around it. Only in his own Suite did leader and band seem their usual elves. As for the choral pieces the performance of all three obviously suffered from the fact that the choir, however able, diligent and finely voiced, has lacked time for adequate preparation, for the gaining of the elasticity, the sureness, the confidence, the zest that are half the battle with such music and that were chief glories, in another time, of the Boston Symphony Chorus. In Mr. Chadwick's hymn, made to measure, as it were, for the average choir, Mr. Townsend's singers regained not a little of their precision, rhythm, sense of quality of tone, of turn of phrase, mounting progression and expanding climax. They fared well enough with Franck's Psalm, within the limits of competence. But in Verdi's setting of the Te Deum—as exacting as it is beautiful and eloquent in the answers of choir to choir, in intervals and transitions that dim the eye and melt the heart, in glowing arcs of exultant, exalted or poignant tone—the choir and indeed Mr. Rabaud seemed only to grope their way along by no means without occasional missteps. Not always did they achieve even the letter of the music. This done, there was naught left in them to summon its spirit. Nor would it be the truth to say that Mr. Rabaud much distinguished himself as a conductor.

George W. Chadwick.

Angles and Authority

CLYAS
WILLIAMS

Henri Rabaud

Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1918--19.

BOSTON SYMPHONY. ORCHESTRA

HENRI RABAUD, Conductor.

TENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, JANUARY 3, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 4, AT 8 P. M.

RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF, SYMPHONY No. 2, "Antar," op. 15
I. Largo; Allegretto vivace
II. Allegro
III. Allegro risoluto alla marcia
IV. Allegretto vivace: Andante amoroso

BEETHOVEN, CONCERTO for Violin in D major, op. 61
I. Allegro ma non troppo
II. Larghetto
III. Rondo

RAVEL, RHAPSODIE ESPAGNOLE
I. Prelude à la nuit
II. Malagueña
III. Habanera
IV. Fera, (The Fair)

Soloist:

JASCHA HEIFETZ

There will be no Rehearsal and Concert next week

Jascha Heifetz THE SUPREME VIOLINIST

It is said that Mr. JASCHA HEIFETZ was born at Vilna, Russia, in 1900. He began his musical studies at the age of three with his father, a violinist. When he was five he entered the Royal School of Music in Vilna; when he was six he played Mendelssohn's concerto in public; and at the age of seven he was graduated. He then went to Petrograd, where he took lessons for two years of Leopold Auer. There he gave recitals. Soon afterwards he played with the Odessa Symphony Orchestra in seven concerts. In 1911 he made his first tour outside of Russia, playing in Berlin with orchestras led by Mr. Nikisch, in Vienna with an orchestra led by Mr. Safonoff. He appeared in other cities of Germany and Austria. Returning to Russia he gave concerts. The war broke out. He made a concert tour through Denmark, Norway, and Sweden. In the winter of 1916-17 he gave many recitals in Petrograd. In September, 1917, he arrived in New York, coming from Russia by way of Siberia, across the Pacific Ocean.

His first appearance in Boston was on January 6, 1918. He gave recitals here on March 17, 31, November 3, of that year.

HEIFETZ SYMPHONY CONCERT SOLOIST

Globe — Jan. 4, 1919
Famous Violinist Plays for First
Time With Boston Orchestra

Jascha Heifetz, the marvelous boy violinist, was the soloist at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon, and again revealed his remarkable gifts as interpreter of music written for his chosen instrument. The modest bearing of this young genius and the unassuming manner with which he conquers the tremendous difficulties of masterpieces composed for the violin have been mentioned before, and the encomiums given him for his recitals the past year are equally applicable to his captivating performance yesterday in the familiar D major concerto by Beethoven.

When Heifetz appeared the cordiality of his greeting indicated that his standard as an artist was well established here. He began his performance of the concerto with a freedom from pose and a quiet dignity which didn't desert him while playing, even when he had some difficulty with the strings of the violin by reason of weather conditions.

His exquisite tone, facile technique, double stops, clean-cut phrasing and impeccable finger work again claimed the admiration of his auditors, the variety of shading and delicacy of detail appearing to be spontaneous and free from mechanical control.

In the ethereal slow movement the breadth and resonance of the work was set forth with compelling effect, and the two cadenzas were made fairly scintillating by the phenomenal brilliancy of his work. A half dozen recalls were given him at the close of his performance.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar" Symphony and Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole" completed the program. The Oriental atmosphere of the former, with its sensuous and dreamy significance of the adventures of Antar and the transformed fairy, tends to awaken the imagination because of the skillful use of the orchestral forces by the composer.

The tone pictures are vivid and beautifully contrasted, love, triumph, frenzy, regret and passion being the principal emotions upon which the story is based. Under Mr. Rabaud's guidance the rich and barbaric splendor of the composition was given with fine effect.

Ravel's rhapsodic pictures of Spanish life went with the proper spirit and abandon, an easy task for the orchestra. There will be no concerts next week, the orchestra being away on the regular tour.

DESERT MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Herald — Jan. 4, 1919
Orchestra Plays "Antar" of Rimsky-Korsakoff at Tenth Concert

MR. HEIFETZ IS SOLO VIOLINIST

By PHILIP HALE

The 10th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Rabaud conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Antar," Symphony No. 2; Beethoven, Violin Concerto; Ravel, Rapsodie Espagnole. Mr. Heifetz was the solo violinist.

It would be an interesting experiment to put "Antar" and Scheherazade on a program in illustration of Rimsky-Korsakoff's orientalism. "Antar" was composed in 1868, "Scheherazade" in 1888, when the composer's technic was fully developed. Of the two, "Scheherazade" is undeniably the more popular, not only because it has been heard often and is associated with its incongruous use for a ballet; it appeals more intimately to the average hearer. Yet "Antar" is the more imaginative work. "Scheherazade," for the most part, suggests the harem. It is true, there is the storm music, with the shock and the fury of the billows; the composer had heard one of the Kalandars telling his wondrous tale; but the excursions from the harem are short and few. The greater number of pages are odorous with

Strange spice and flower, strange savor of crushed fruit,
And perfume the swart kings tread under foot.

For pleasure when their minds wax amorous,
Charred frankincense and grated sandal-root.

There is freer, purer air in "Antar"; there is the thought of the desert and its

There will be no Rehearsal and Concert next week

Jascha Heifetz THE SUPREME VIOLINIST

It is said that Mr. JASCHA HEIFETZ was born at Vilna, Russia, in 1900. He began his musical studies at the age of three with his father, a violinist. When he was five he entered the Royal School of Music in Vilna; when he was six he played Mendelssohn's concerto in public; and at the age of seven he was graduated. He then went to Petrograd, where he took lessons for two years of Leopold Auer. There he gave recitals. Soon afterwards he played with the Odessa Symphony Orchestra in seven concerts. In 1911 he made his first tour outside of Russia, playing in Berlin with orchestras led by Mr. Nikisch, in Vienna with an orchestra led by Mr. Safonoff. He appeared in other cities of Germany and Austria. Returning to Russia he gave concerts. The war broke out. He made a concert tour through Denmark, Norway, and Sweden. In the winter of 1916-17 he gave many recitals in Petrograd. In September, 1917, he arrived in New York, coming from Russia by way of Siberia, across the Pacific Ocean.

His first appearance in Boston was on January 6, 1918. He gave recitals here on March 17, 31, November 3, of that year.

HEIFETZ SYMPHONY CONCERT SOLOIST

Globe — Jan. 4, 1919
Famous Violinist Plays for First
Time With Boston Orchestra

Jascha Heifetz, the marvelous boy violinist, was the soloist at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon, and again revealed his remarkable gifts as interpreter of music written for his chosen instrument. The modest bearing of this young genius and the unassuming manner with which he conquers the tremendous difficulties of masterpieces composed for the violin have been mentioned before, and the encomiums given him for his recitals the past year are equally applicable to his captivating performance yesterday in the familiar D major concerto by Beethoven.

When Heifetz appeared the cordiality of his greeting indicated that his standard as an artist was well established here. He began his performance of the concerto with a freedom from pose and a quiet dignity which didn't desert him while playing, even when he had some difficulty with the strings of the violin by reason of weather conditions.

His exquisite tone, facile technique, double stops, clean-cut phrasing and impeccable finger work again claimed the admiration of his auditors, the variety of shading and delicacy of detail appearing to be spontaneous and free from mechanical control.

In the ethereal slow movement the breadth and resonance of the work was set forth with compelling effect, and the two cadenzas were made fairly scintillating by the phenomenal brilliancy of his work. A half dozen recalls were given him at the close of his performance.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar" Symphony and Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole" completed the program. The Oriental atmosphere of the former, with its sensuous and dreamy significance of the adventures of Antar and the transformed fairy, tends to awaken the imagination because of the skillful use of the orchestral forces by the composer.

The tone pictures are vivid and beautifully contrasted, love, triumph, frenzy, regret and passion being the principal emotions upon which the story is based. Under Mr. Rabaud's guidance the rich and barbaric splendor of the composition was given with fine effect.

Ravel's rhapsodic pictures of Spanish life went with the proper spirit and abandon, an easy task for the orchestra. There will be no concerts next week, the orchestra being away on the regular tour.

DESERT MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Herald — Jan. 4, 1919
Orchestra Plays "Antar" of Rimsky-Korsakoff at
Tenth Concert

MR. HEIFETZ IS SOLO VIOLINIST

By PHILIP HALE

The 10th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Rabaud conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Antar," Symphony No. 2; Beethoven, Violin Concerto; Ravel, Rapsodie Espagnole. Mr. Heifetz was the solo violinist.

It would be an interesting experiment to put "Antar" and Scheherazade on a program in illustration of Rimsky-Korsakoff's orientalism. "Antar" was composed in 1868, "Scheherazade" in 1888, when the composer's technic was fully developed. Of the two, "Scheherazade" is undeniably the more popular, not only because it has been heard often and is associated with its incongruous use for a ballet; it appeals more intimately to the average hearer. Yet "Antar" is the more imaginative work. "Scheherazade," for the most part, suggests the harem. It is true, there is the storm music, with the shock and the fury of the billows; the composer had heard one of the Kalandars telling his wondrous tale; but the excursions from the harem are short and few. The greater number of pages are odorous with

Strange spice and flower, strange savor of crushed fruit,
And perfume the swart kings tread under foot

For pleasure when their minds wax amorous,
Charred frankincense and grated sandalroot.

There is freer, purer air in "Antar";
there is the thought of the desert and its

There will be no Rehearsal and Concert next week

majestic loneliness. The mood of the hero, who might have stalked gloomily with Lara or any other Byronic hater of mankind, is at once established; it is powerfully maintained. The descriptive, or pictorial, episode of the pursued gazelle is graphic, not grotesque, although the composer here risked a disconcerting fall into the ludicrous. The two movements that follow, expressing in turn the delights of revenge and of power are splendidly barbaric, invoking scenes of ravaging and murderous hordes, exulting, furious, rushing onward to the wild sounds of strange instruments, ruthless, defiant, indomitable, while the love-music of the finale is sensuously languorous.

In this symphony we find the cruelty and the sensuality of the east, frank, unabashed, magnificent. And all is so largely expressed! There is here no miniature painting, as is found too frequently in "Scheherazade"; the colors in "Antar" are often bold and glaring; the palette knife takes the place of the brush. The thought of the composer is more than fanciful; it is imaginative.

Mr. Rabaud was so fortunate in his interpretation of this Symphony that it is to be hoped he will find it convenient during the season to let us hear Balakireff's Symphony, played here some years ago, and the same composer's "Thamar," which, as we believe, has not yet received full justice in Symphony Hall. Then there is the first Symphony of Borodin, which Mr. Nikisch brought out here 28 years ago for the first time in this country. These composers are more in favor with the French than is Tchaikowsky. Perhaps the frequent bursts of platitudes and coarseness, the vociferous outcries of despair that at times degenerate into a personal whine, disturb the Parisians, yet we should like to hear his fourth Symphony, to our mind the most characteristically Russian of Tchaikowsky's work in the symphonic field, played under Mr. Rabaud's direction.

He was equally fortunate in his interpretation of Ravel's tonal pictures of Spain, which yesterday were more glowing and spirited than ever before. The nocturnal prelude had fuller significance, a more poetic feeling. How brilliant the reading of the Malaguena, the Habanera and the finale with its delirious revel. The reading of the Rhapsody was distinguished by subtlety as well as dash. Those who thought that Mr. Rabaud might be an "academic" conductor have learned that neither Beethoven nor Ravel, Schumann nor Berlioz, Converse nor Saint-Saens is misunderstood or unappreciated by this musician of broad sympathies, kindly authority and a spirit that blazes when the music makes demand.

Mr. Heifetz, who played yesterday for the first time with this orchestra, gave an uncommonly fine performance of Beethoven's Concerto. His technical proficiency, which is almost incredible in a man of his years, his amazing facility, his poise—one might say—his imperturbability—already known to all, were again conspicuous, as were the beauty of his tone and the sureness of his intonation. But since he first played here, he has gained in warmth and depth of expression, so that his selection of the too familiar concerto was not ill-advised. The cadenzas, which, we are told, are by Leopold Auer, were long and musically uninteresting.

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concerts next week. The program for Jan. 17-18 is as follows: Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, No. 5; Mendelssohn, Violin Concerto (Mr. Fradkin, violinist); Saint-Saens, "Phaeton," symphonic poem; Lalo, Rhapsody.

SYMPHONY SETS YEAR FAST PACE

Post Jan. 4, 1919
Gorgeously Colored Music Played—
Heifetz Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

Jascha Heifetz, violinist, played Beethoven's concerto at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The orchestral compositions were Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar" and Ravel's "Caprice Espagnole"—two pieces of gorgeous tone-painting, although the musical pictures of Ravel are in many respects far from the oriental fantasy of Rimsky-Korsakoff.

SPLendor OF "ANTAR"

Partly because of the eloquent interpretation of Mr. Rabaud, but also because of the inherent originality and imaginative power of the music, this latter composition made a deep impression on the audience, and that is a greater tribute to the genius of the composer than may be realized at first by a concert-goer of the year 1919. "Antar" was heard for the first time in Petrograd in 1869. At that time the young men of the "Neo-Russian" school were just beginning to find themselves. The new idioms which they then struck out are part and parcel of every composer's equipment today, if he chooses to use them; but "Antar" must have been in every measure strange and terrifying to the conservatives in 1869. Today it need terrify no one. Too much water has flowed over the bridges since it first saw the light. In point of orchestration and harmony, etc., it is an old story. Yet it was the most gorgeous music on the programme yesterday.

The strange colors of Ravel's suite seemed deliberately manufactured by comparison. As soon as the music of "Antar" commenced, a miracle was wrought again. The doors of the enchanted esat swung open. Perfumes of the orient, the fate-haunted spaces of the desert, the deeds of oriental legends, sensuous dreams of the fruitions of life and the vanit of all things, echoed in this music and struck an answering echo in those who listened.

Has Vital Originality

This, despite the fact that "Antar" is by no means the most finished and brilliant work of Rimsky-Korsakoff. The composer himself confessed that his hand still lacked much of its cunning when he penned this music. It is easy to point out in it immaturities, passages where the explorer or a new tonal realm is feeling his way, or leaping boldly forward into the darkness, with the audacity and impatience of genius. But the spirit, the thing that does not die, is there, and no fair-minded student of the musical art can refuse enthusiastic tribute to the vital originality of this work. In it is the genesis of most of the Russian music that came later.

This score, and Balakireff's "Thamar," are certainly two of the principal foundations stones of the "Neo-Russian" school, which following Liszt and Berlioz, emancipated itself completely from the German harmonic scheme and the German principles of instrumentation, turning the orchestral into a dazzling kaleidoscope of color, following freely the bent of the Slavic imagination in the invention of tone-pictures of unparalleled vividness and splendor.

One thing may be admitted: This music of "Antar" implies a stage picture and stage action to fulfil its scope even more inevitably than Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," mounted so appropriately by the Russian ballet. Movement, color, pantomime, seem inevitable corollaries of it.

Hence there are those who will claim that this is not great music, or pure music, or whatever the shibboleth of those who prefer esthetic doctrines to art which is alive and inspiring and stimulating to the imagination may be. But this will not destroy the beauty and the genius of the music.

Mr. Heifetz played his concerto with the technical mastery expected of him, with uncommon purity and beauty of tone, and a true feeling for the classic qualities of the composition. He played with the utmost respect for the intention of the composer, and as one at home and master of music of grand proportions. The manner in which his solo was an integral and indivisible part of a great whole, emerging from the orchestral canvas at the appropriate time, or blending with it in a manner to secure ideal balance and proportion was an exhibition of the highest musicianship. Thrice admirable, too, was the vigorous straightforward quality of his performance, the firm, masculine rhythms, the elasticity in the singing of melodic passages or the weaving of musical ornamentations about the orchestral themes. The finale has seldom been played in a manner at once so simple and effective.

No doubt that Mr. Heifetz in the future will show richer and more poignant feeling in such passages as the slow movement, but sufficient unto the day were the musical and intellectual distinctions of the performance of a young man of genius. He was recalled repeatedly with the greatest enthusiasm.

The Beethoven concert found itself in strange company, following "Antar" and preceding the ultra-modern music of Ravel. Here is one of the most interesting of the French composers of today. He is an impressionist in technique, yet there are cerebral qualities in Ravel seldom indeed associated with impressionism. He uses bewildering effects of his own making, yet he has a strong sense of form. He knows where he is going. He may bewilder you, but you are very certain that he never bewilders himself. The strangest and most fascinating colors come from his orchestra-colors, which the composer examines with keen and clear-eyed interest, and "I told you so" as the effect which he invented comes out exactly as he intended it should. Yet the first movement of this Spanish caprice is very poetic and beautiful in a strange, tenebrous fashion. "Prelude to the Night," the sighing of winds, the ghost of a song, and strange gibberings of clarinets and bassoons—a country, one would say, of crude, huge shapes that startle one as they leer out of black shadows, a country which is the wraith of its romantic and tragic past. There is rough vigor and sardonic humor in the Malaguena. The Habanera is melancholy and black, like pictures of Goya.

There will be no Rehearsal and Concert next week

The crackling, calculated effects of the last movement, "The Fair," have an alternating passage which redeems the inherent commonness of this realistic photograph of a Spanish market-place. This is a melancholy, sensuous strain played by the cello, and soon submerged in the commotion of the concluding measures. A movement far beneath the last movement of Debussy's "Iberia" in true imagination and artistic distinction! Just the same, this caprice is a notable and exhilarating "stunt," if for the most part it is nothing else, and the "Prelude to the Night" is one of the most original pieces of tone-painting which have come from modern France.

"Antar" Given by Symphony Artists

Herald & American
Jan. 5, 1919.

By LOUIS. C. ELSON.

PROGRAM.

"Antar" Symphony Rimski-Korsakoff
Violin Concerto Beethoven
Soloist, Jascha Heifetz
Rhapsodie Espagnole Ravel

"ANTAR" is a symphony that tells an Oriental story. The first movement shows Antar, the great hunter, amid the ruins of Palmyra, the ruins being inhabited evidently by trombones, bassoons and clarinettes. A flute is now pursued by ferocious cellos and contrabasses, picturing the fairy Ghul-Nazar chased by the spirits of darkness. As Antar saves her she rewards him, as all good fairies do, by three gifts—Revenge, Power and Love. All this first part is splendidly graphic and original. In Revenge, the second movement, Antar evidently takes vengeance upon harmony teachers and gives many dissonances of the most modern school. A muscular kettle-drummer, a healthy cymbal player and an artist upon the gong emphasize this part with the fury of a Bolsheviki caucus meeting. Stopped horns and other disagreeable things join in this portion of the trouble.

The movement picturing Power, being Russian, of course made it military power, but here there was also a charming Eastern dance, a good contrast to the military effects.

This was the finest part of the work and it was splendidly interpreted. In the finale Love, the English horn and the clarinette are evidently enamored of each other. The dialogue between these two instruments, very well given, presented a good contrast between the masculine yearning of the former and the more delicate dreaminess of the latter instrument. Antar dies at the end of this (kissed to death by the fairy), but his Liebestod was by no means as striking as one that Wagner has written.

It is a strong, if rather barbaric picture, and the scoring as well as the harmonic progressions are effective and often novel, but one may object to such a free tone-poem masquerading under the title of "Symphony." The work was greatly applauded, but the chief enthusiasm followed the third movement.

Beethoven's one violin concerto distances all other works of this form, but it is only to be played by passion and technique. It is the visiting card (along with Bach's "Chaconne") of all the violinists who claim pre-eminence. We have heard it given as if it were an advanced exercise, and we have also heard it played in a ladylike manner. Not so on this occasion, for Jascha Heifetz at once proved his title to being "primus inter pares" in the lofty composition. The long cadenza of the first movement showed the young artist equipped in every technical direction, while the massive power of the great theme, with its four emphatic notes as its principal figure, was altogether commendable.

As with the Emperor Piano Concerto, this work has its chief glories in the first movement, while the Finale falls off somewhat in power, but the brilliancy of the playing of the rondo made it remarkably successful at this concert and the enthusiasm at the end was much more intense than anything at the "Peace Celebration" concerts of the earlier part of the week. Of course, Heifetz won the chief honors of this concert. One could not count the number of times that he was recalled, and, barring a little lack of breadth in the first movement, he deserved it all.

Ravel's Spanish Rhapsody was given an interesting reading. The French and the Russians have both invaded Spain, but we fancy if Granados had not been killed we might through him have had the truest Spanish music. But this work strikes us as more graphic and original than the Spanish Caprice by Rimski-Korsakoff, recently heard. It once more gave proof of the elasticity and abandon of M. Rabaud's readings, and it ended the concert in a spicy manner, a concert which for once was more than half modern. The Rhapsody is a fantasia of rhythms and dynamic contrasts. There were many modern experiments in scoring in it, and its many explosions were startling if not convincing.

This week there were four symphonic concerts instead of two, an aftermath of the gripe epidemic prohibitions, for one of the postponed concerts was made up by a species of symphonic Peace Festival on Monday afternoon and Tuesday evening. We need a Gilmore and a military band for this kind of thing and it must be confessed that the interpolated concerts were somewhat tepid. This was the program:

National Hymns of America, Belgium, England, Italy and France.

Chadwick, "Land of Our Hearts."

Patriotic Hymn.

Bizet, "Patrie" overture.

Verdi, "Te Deum." Double chorus and orchestra.

Rabaud, Suite of XVI. Century, Arr.

from Farnaby and others.

Franck, Psalm CL. Chorus, orchestra and organ.

And the whole concluded with the singing of "America."

It was somewhat of a stand-up affair, for no one ventured to remain seated while any of the six national anthems were sung or played. By the way there is a trumpet fanfare that generally is given in the Italian Royal March, which might have been added. But even with this it is a rather inferior piece of music. Italy, the Mother of Music, should have an infinitely greater national march.

Chadwick's "Land of Our Hearts" is the most ambitious piece of work that the war has brought forth in America. It celebrates the North, South, East and West, in turn, has an instrumental introduction and an interlude, contains considerable figure treatment and some counterpoint (canonic), and has a fine climax. It was done full justice to by chorus, orchestra and conductor. A more compact work would be better for national music.

Bizet's "Patrie" has been recently reviewed in these columns. It is not a masterpiece, but it certainly never has had such a fine reading as M. Rabaud gave it on this occasion. The severe ecclesiastical vein of Verdi's

"Te Deum" must have puzzled those who are not familiar with Catholic music. It was very difficult for the chorus, and there was some timidity, but Mr. Stephen Townsend had done hard work in the vocal training and the pitfalls were generally avoided.

M. Rabaud's suite arranged from the old virginal music of Farnaby and others was very discreetly treated. Never once was the antique flavor contradicted by any modern style of scoring. The first and last movements were the most successful.

Franck's setting of the 150th Psalm was the best music of the concert, but there had been such heavy vocal work before it that it did not win enthusiastic recognition. There was applause after each number, but not the enthusiasm that would have followed a rollicking, tuneful concert of military band music, such as a popular national war (or peace) celebration generally calls for.

Music in Boston Jan. 4, 1919

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The Boston Symphony Orchestra has presented two programs within a week, one of much interest, the other, which by all laws of precedent ought to have been an affair worthy of mark, distinctly tedious. This latter came first, replacing one of the concerts postponed by a late opening of the season. It was advertised to "celebrate the close of the year of victory," and was given on Monday afternoon, Dec. 30, and Tuesday evening, Dec. 31. The chorus, trained by Stephen Townsend, manifested

a lack of rehearsal not in evidence on former appearances. The program traversed the national airs of the allied nations, Chadwick's "Land of Our Hearts," Bizet's "Patrie" overture, Verdi's "Te Deum," old English composers' works in a suite of the Sixteenth Century arranged by Mr.

Rabaud, and Franck's Psalm CL. Of these numbers by far the most interesting was that comprising Mr. Rabaud's homage to England. In this suite he performed the difficult task of keeping archaic music without anachronisms, and this he did partly by orchestrating it with great skill, avoiding instruments of distinctly modern invention, but mostly through his unerring instinct for the fitness of things.

The regular tenth program of the season presented Jascha Heifetz as soloist. He played the Beethoven D major concerto, Op. 61, in a manner that revealed a musical understanding heretofore not in evidence in the programs with which he has been wont to amuse his recital audiences and with an astounding command of technique that brought hearty applause not only from the audience but from the men of the orchestra, and even the conductor himself. So overshadowing was the performance of the concerto that it obliterated the unhealthy, sensual atmosphere of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar" symphony which preceded it and took away the flavor of Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole" which followed it. The "Antar" symphony made little impression and even the third movement, which is supposed to represent the delights of power, and which is the most understandable of the four, seemed strangely lacking. Verdi has said this sort of thing so much better than other triumphal processions seem led by hobby-horses. The Ravel number is worth a rehearsing when it occupies a fortuitous position on a program.

Silhouetted Serenity

Mr. Heifetz Playing
From a New and Recent Photograph

(Photograph by Mishkin)

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1918-19.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Jascha Heifetz.

ETZ

ing

8/18

a viountry nomap-press rely, ined

most the her, was oyal and first old erto, ted me

of central Europe, where he achieved a tremendous success. On this tour he played with orchestras and under such conductors as Safonoff and Nikisch.

At the outbreak of the war Heifetz was not interned in Germany, as has sometimes been reported, but was living with his family in Petrograd. Before coming to America he toured Scandinavia and then gave 12 recitals in Petrograd before sold-out houses. As yet he has never played in Great Britain. Crossing Siberia, China and the Pacific en route for New York, Heifetz and his family journeyed two months before reaching San Francisco.

168
that revealed a musical understanding heretofore not in evidence in the programs with which he has been wont to amuse his recital audiences and with an astounding command of technique that brought hearty applause not only from the audience but from the men of the orchestra, and even the conductor himself. So overshadowing was the performance of the concerto that it obliterated the unhealthy, sensual atmosphere of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar" symphony which preceded it and took away the flavor of Ravel's "Hapsodie Espagnole" which followed it. The "Antar" symphony made little impression and even the third movement, which is supposed to represent the delights of power, and which is the most understandable of the four, seemed strangely lacking. Verdi has said this sort of thing so much better than other triumphal processions seem led by hobby-horses. The Ravel number is worth a rehearsing when it occupies a fortuitous position on a program.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1918-19.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

EARLY LIFE OF YOUNG HEIFETZ

Some Facts Concerning Famous Young Russian Violinist

Herald. Oct. 13/18

Jascha Heifetz, the young Russian violinist, who first reached this country on Sept. 5, 1917, and then had phenomenal artistic success wherever he appeared in concert, has figured in press notices almost beyond count, but rarely, strange to say, have they contained facts about his earlier life.

He was born in Vilna, Russia, almost 19 years ago. He began his study of the violin at the age of 3 with his father, who was a fine violinist. When he was 5 years old Heifetz entered the Royal School of Music in his native city, and during the same year he made his first public appearance. When 6 years old he played the Mendelssohn Concerto, and two years later he was graduated from the conservatory. A short time after this he was taken to Petrograd, where after repeated disappointments he secured a coveted hearing with Leopold Auer, and it is said that this great teacher after hearing him proclaimed him to be an astonishing genius.

Within the next two years young Heifetz made his formal debut in a recital at Petrograd, and thereby drew to himself the attention of musical Russia. In Odessa alone he played seven times with the Odessa Symphony orchestra. In 1911 he went on a tour through many cities of central Europe, where he achieved a tremendous success. On this tour he played with orchestras and under such conductors as Safonoff and Nikisch.

Jascha Heifetz.

At the outbreak of the war Heifetz was not interned in Germany, as has sometimes been reported, but was living with his family in Petrograd. Before coming to America he toured Scandinavia and then gave 12 recitals in Petrograd before sold-out houses. As yet he has never played in Great Britain. Crossing Siberia, China and the Pacific en route for New York, Heifetz and his family journeyed two months before reaching San Francisco.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

AN AFTERNOON OF EXCEPTIONAL PLEASURE

Happy Return of a "Halcyon Day" for Orchestra, Audience and Conductor—Mr. Heifetz Plays Beethoven's Concerto for Violin at the Acme of His Powers—Rimsky-Korsakov's "Antar" and Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody" Make Contrasts in Imaginative and Graphic Music

FOR the first time since the new régime took possession of the Symphony Concerts, they recalled yesterday the atmosphere and accomplishment, yielded the pleasant excitement of an earlier day. For once, thanks, no doubt, to the presence of Mr. Heifetz as "assisting artist," every place in Symphony Hall seemed taken by an audience of the familiar, distinctive quality of years past. By reason of his first coming to the concerts that agreeable air of anticipation, which is antidote to placid routine, pervaded the assembled company. Those who regretted his absence last winter, in the first flush of his fame in America, were now expectantly content; those who had waited to hear him—and in Beethoven's Concerto—at a Symphony Concert were becomingly eager. To the full, Mr. Heifetz fulfilled these lively anticipations, and, in the keenest of memories few of the eminent violinists preceding him upon the stage of Symphony Hall these many years, and sometimes in this Concerto, have surpassed his playing. For the time he was at the acme of his powers, so far as Bostonian audiences yet know them, and loud, long, altogether spontaneous and generous—since for once there was no hope of extra pieces—were the plaudits rewarding him. The whole hall rang with them and it was pleasanter than words can half say to hear this return to old enthusiasms. For still ampler measure, the forepiece to the Concerto, Rimsky-Korsakov's symphonic Suite, "Antar," and the after-piece, Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody," were interesting music of modern or ultra-modern voice, well read in his usual objective fashion by Mr. Rabaud, played by the orchestra with a nearer approximation to ancient mingling of technical perfection and of expressive warmth than it has often attained since the reorganization of last autumn. Once more, it was a band commanding both finesse and power, euphony and piancy, ardor and exactitude of characterizing and revealing voice. For an afternoon at least, the "halcyon days" of the Symphony Orchestra, as its good-willed public in New York is beginning to call them, were come again. They warrant rejoicing; they justify hope of continuance.

Mr. Heifetz, in whom the interest of the afternoon plainly centred, chose wisely in Beethoven's Concerto often as it has been played in recent years at Symphony Hall. It is not music of the pulssant Beethoven, storming the heavens in a passion of self-release in tones. It is, by record, no more than a piece written to oblige his friend, the violinist, Clement, and designed to display virtuoso, musician and instrument. The lines of the Concerto curve, expand, interweave agreeably upon the ear. The subject-matter charms in the sentimental grace of the slow movement or the rhythmic animation of the finale; interests in the long first Allegro by ingenious variety of progress, by felicitous and fanciful adornment. At every turn, even in the decorative "passage-work," the voice of the music is songful. Sentiment, elegance continuously touch it and invite like qualities in the playing violinist. How finely spun and piquant to the ear is many a transition in the first movement; how gently flowing in singing orchestra and in embroidering violin is the succeeding Romance; with what gay energy play the returns of the motives of the Rondo. The hand of Beethoven light is not less good to hear and to feel than the hand of Beethoven, puissant. The Beethoven of fancy and charm is rare beside the Beethoven of power and passion. Beethoven, if the listener will, displaying violin and violinist, but so doing with the discernment, the imagination, the felicity of a master. Hackneyed "repertory piece" though it is, the Concerto, played in any fashion above routine, still gladdens the ear, warms the heart.

Played by Mr. Heifetz at the zenith of his present powers, with the orchestra kindling to the occasion, with Mr. Rabaud steadily considerate of the quality of the music and the will of the violinist, the Concerto was clothed in transcendent beauty. From youth Mr. Heifetz is ripening fast into young manhood; even to the eye he is a far maturer figure than he was a year ago; while to ear and mind, he seems to gain finer insight into his music, keener sensibility in the communication of it, a yet more adroit command of the violin, of the subtleties and the glammers of the tone he draws from it. Intent solely upon his work yet instinctively or reflectively measuring every stroke and detail, he is rare figure of the concert-hall in this mingling of concentration and poise. But for his sedulous regard for euphony with the orchestra, for his fidelity in almost every measure to Beethoven's clear intent, he might have been summoning the Concerto from himself, from the surrounding air. The pedants of the violin and the music of the violin could find no flaw in the minute perfections of his performance; yet it flowed from period through period as in spontaneous re-creative impulse. Violinist and composer, the speech of the instrument, the speech of the music were as one, illuding a whole audience into as rapt impression.

Beauty and sensibility dwelt hand in hand in Mr. Heifetz's tone. Never dried nor over-refined, never coarsened nor thickened, luminous, edgeless, animate, exquisitely textured to the ear, it gains and maintains a sensuous loveliness that is as the voice of the violin, transfigured, the voice of ordered and songful sound idealized. Merely to hear it as such is to receive rare sensation, to know as rare and pure an emotion. As it was yesterday, it was the quintessence of the sensuous beauty that the violin may yield. The sensibility of Mr. Heifetz's tone falls not a whit below this beauty. It is ever in undulant motion, unless the music bid an exact evenness; light and shadow play as incessantly over it till it touches the rarest of iridescence; as many accents as there are in the music this tone commands; it knows the ply of twenty textures. Beethoven sets the violinist to the embroidery of the sentimental song of the slow movement, and Mr. Heifetz's playing wrote shimmering arabesques upon the air. Beethoven sets the violinist to artful "passage-work" of figure and ornament and Mr. Heifetz glorified it into pattern that fancy drew and warm creative impulse gladdened. More than once, as in transition to the finale, the music by the lightest of hints anticipates the rhythm that is to come and Mr. Heifetz's tone as lightly quickened with it. There are transitions in the Concerto that are as insinuating as creeping light. The violinist was radiant with them. Given songful measures and he shaped the curve in unflinching loveliness of line while the contents melted from phrase into phrase in limpid beauty. Bright was the sport of rhythm in the finale; yet Mr. Heifetz's bow never lost deft elegance. The smallest fancy, the lightest inflection of Beethoven upon the surface of the music seemed not once to elude him.

Behind both this beauty and this sensibility lay an instinctive sense of style; for Mr. Heifetz, prodigy though he was, is hardly of the age to evolve such faculty by mental process. He understood, he imparted the Concerto as an elegant and flowing music, skilfully adorned with tonal fancies, with displayful ornament, touched here and there with gentle sentiment or sportive zest, a music designed to charm, to give in-gratulating, yet exacting speech to violin and violinist. Source, likewise, of this beauty and sensibility was Mr. Heifetz's caressing command of his instrument. Seemingly he has passed the day in which "technical problems," as the teacher calls them, at all preoccupy him. Whatever he wills, fingers, wrist, bow-arm, readily accomplish. For him now, there remains to refine upon textures, to multiply shadings, to increase susceptibilities, to heighten expressive quality, to make the voice of the violin more penetrating, more beautiful, more significant of mood, as it sometimes seems in the sensations of the moment; than the voice of singing men or women.

In few violinists have the qualities of a master been so assembled and coördinated as they are in Mr. Heifetz—the technical skill that works its will upon the instrument; the instinct, the affection that divines and draws from it close-held secrets; the perceiving sense and the achieving hand that compass beauty of tone; the responsive and imaginative sensibility to music; the imparting faculty glorifying what it transmits; the mental oversight, so to say, that designs and measures, flowering equally in the poise and the concentration that mingle in him. As for personality, does not the sum of these qualities, as they stood yesterday, constitute as rare and signal a personality as the whole field of executive artistry—letters, music, painting—has of late revealed? Our time has disclosed no violinist that gains such ideal beauty of performance. According to the programme book, Mr. Heifetz has not yet turned his twentieth year; yet Fate has given him the highest and finest of human felicities—the ability to do one thing supremely well for his own pleasure, for the pleasure of all within reach of it. Not often is youth so crowned or is there reason so to wonder—perhaps to tremble—over maturity.

Happily, the "halcyon day" neither began nor ended with Beethoven's Concerto and Mr. Heifetz's playing of it. Rimsky-Korsakov's suite of "Antar" dates from 1868, but still remains an imaginative, eloquent, stimulating music. He stretches his tonal canvas broadly; he fills it amply; he lays on the color thickly, richly; he opens vistas to enkindled and answering imagination. Writing "Antar" when he was relatively a young man, he is not yet pre-occupied with subtleties of harmonic and instrumental coloring, with ingenuities of repetition, refinements of atmosphere and suggestion. Eagerly, warmly, he writes a forthright music, that expands succinctly from itself, proceeds with clear creative ardor, takes form and speech as by inevitable process, wears its own harmonic and instrumental dress. It were possible to hear "Antar"

with little thought of the figure of the Arab hero, the course of the Arab legend behind it and yet find it a warmly invented, resourcefully conducted music, graphic to the ear, enkindling to all the listening faculties. There is no more need to stress its oriental quality which is obvious enough than its occasional "obligation" to Liszt which indebtedness is transparent. Even when the third division was played as a mere intermezzo between Russian ballets, it clanged with tonal pomp, marched with large stride, flashed with candid color—music of the outspoken power of the composer, as well as of the dominion it would symbolize.

So, too, with the wild and rugged music, as it still sounds after fifty years, that in the scheme of the suite would speak of revenge—a virtue not often so frankly celebrated in these altruistic days, and needing, no doubt, the apologetic Oriental background. Yet it still seizes ears, that note no longer strange intervals and progressions, now become familiar, as music of savage force, image, impulse. If it is possible to write a cruel music, here Rimsky-Korsakov has written it. His pictorial imagination in tones speaks out of the Largo of the empty desert, vivid picturing, again after half a century of that process applied to tones, of a vast solitary, empty, ominous place. Strauss in some of his tone-poems does not more graphically set his tonal scene, evoke the figure of his imagination. Only in the amorous, the semi-sensual music of the final division does "Antar" seem faded. In those days Rimsky-Korsakov was less apt of hand, less disposed to dwell imaginatively upon the sensuous suggestion that fills no little of his later "Scheherazade" and "The Golden Cockerel." The amorous Arab melody, with which among the composer's decorations, Antar "dies upon a kiss" seems somewhat all in the day's work for Rimsky-Korsakov. After the music of revenge, the music of power, Antar might better have perished, as the legend pictures him, stark and rigid upon his horse in sombre, fearsome solitude. Russian imagination in the arts, moreover, often courts such suggestion.

As Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra were variously graphic and eloquent with

"Antar," so were they no less with the far-removed "Spanish Rhapsody" of Ravel. Indeed, it is the clear merit of this objective conducting that it describes and imparts each piece of a given concert in appropriate mood and image. Ravel's purpose in his Suite is seemingly as delineative as Rimsky-Korsakov's in his. The Parisian, no less than the Russian, would summon and sustain an atmosphere, yet imaginative suggestion upspringing from it. He bids hearers catch from the music the stillness, the softness and yet the expectant tremor of his fancied Spanish night. A little and he leads them into the nervous rhythmic sensations of his Malaguena—music of the glint and the smoke of Spanish dance. In contrast, he sets beside it the voluptuous and insinuating languors of his Habanera, yet tingling beneath the smooth surface of the music. Then, for the ending, the rhythmic, the harmonic whirl of "The Fair," beating high with hot color, receding as in surfeit, but only to glow again.

Yet how different are Ravel's means of 1908 from Rimsky-Korsakov's of 1868. The Russian is lavish; the Parisian is economical. When the ear has almost forgotten it a figure of Ravel's music fructifies into motive for expanding measures. The Frenchman is as subtle as he is economical. Here a little play with the timbres of his orchestra; there like exercise of harmonic ingenuity; an astute repetition at one moment; an incisive progression at the next. Stroke upon stroke, point laid beside point; a mosaic of sedulous jointure; yet always a music that says precisely, yet with imagination, what it is designed to say. Moreover, out of these economies, these subtleties, this "pointillage" and manipulation, rise the imagery, the illusion that Ravel seeks. Who may hear his preluding without sense of the sensuous glow and quiver of the Spanish night, his dances without nervous excitement, or listen unstirred to the riotous flood, ebbing and flowing, of his fair? So to accomplish his ends by a procedure altogether his own, so to make each orchestral piece, the tour de force in kind that the "Spanish Rhapsody" surely is, is the individuality, the genius, almost, of Ravel. H. T. P.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1918--19.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

HENRI RABAUD, Conductor.

ELEVENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, JANUARY 17, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 18, AT 8 P. M.

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY No. 5, in C minor. op. 67

- I. Allegro con brio
- II. Andante con moto
- III. Allegro: Trio
- IV. Allegro

MOZART,

RECITATIVE, "Mia Speranza Adorata," and RONDO, "Ah non sai qual pena sia."

SAINT-SAËNS,

SYMPHONIC POEM No. 2, op. 39, "Phaeton"

KELLEY,

"A CALIFORNIA IDYL."

LALO,

RHAPSODY for Orchestra in A

Soloist:

MABEL GARRISON

with little thought of the figure of the Arab hero, the course of the Arab legend behind it and yet find it a warmly invented, resourcefully conducted music, graphic to the ear, enkindling to all the listening faculties. There is no more need to stress its oriental quality which is obvious enough than its occasional "obligation" to Liszt which indebtedness is transparent. Even when the third division was played as a mere intermezzo between Russian ballets, it clanged with tonal pomp, marched with large stride, flashed with candid color—music of the outspoken power of the composer, as well as of the dominion it would symbolize.

So, too, with the wild and rugged music, as it still sounds after fifty years, that in the scheme of the suite would speak of revenge—a virtue not often so frankly celebrated in these altruistic days, and needing, no doubt, the apologetic Oriental background. Yet it still seizes ears, that note no longer strange intervals and progressions, now become familiar, as music of savage force, image, impulse. If it is possible to write a cruel music, here Rimsky-Korsakov has written it. His pictorial imagination in tones speaks out of the Largo of the empty desert, vivid picturing, again after half a century of that process applied to tones, of a vast solitary, empty, ominous place. Strauss in some of his tone-poems does not more graphically set his tonal scene, evoke the figure of his imagination. Only in the amorous, the semi-sensual music of the final division does "Antar" seem faded. In those days Rimsky-Korsakov was less apt of hand, less disposed to dwell imaginatively upon the sensuous suggestion that fills no little of his later "Scheherazade" and "The Golden Cockerel." The amorous Arab melody, with which among the composer's decorations, Antar "dies upon a kiss" seems somewhat all in the day's work for Rimsky-Korsakov. After the music of revenge, the music of power, Antar might better have perished, as the legend pictures him, stark and rigid upon his horse in sombre, fearsome solitude. Russian imagination in the arts, moreover, often courts such suggestion.

As Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra were variously graphic and eloquent with

"Antar," so were they no less with the far-removed "Spanish Rhapsody" of Ravel. Indeed, it is the clear merit of this objective conducting that it describes and imparts each piece of a given concert in appropriate mood and image. Ravel's purpose in his Suite is seemingly as delineative as Rimsky-Korsakov's in his. The Parisian, no less than the Russian, would summon and sustain an atmosphere, set imaginative suggestion upspringing from it. He bids hearers catch from the music the stillness, the softness and yet the expectant tremor of his fancied Spanish night. A little and he leads them into the nervous rhythmic sensations of his Malaguena—music of the glint and the smoke of Spanish dance. In contrast, he sets beside it the voluptuous and insinuating languors of his Habanera, yet tingling beneath the smooth surface of the music. Then, for the ending, the rhythmic, the harmonic whirl of "The Fair," beating high with hot color, receding as in surfeit, but only to glow again.

Yet how different are Ravel's means of 1908 from Rimsky-Korsakov's of 1868. The Russian is lavish; the Parisian is economical. When the ear has almost forgotten it a figure of Ravel's music fructifies into motive for expanding measures. The Frenchman is as subtle as he is economical. Here a little play with the timbres of his orchestra; there like exercise of harmonic ingenuity; an astute repetition at one moment; an incisive progression at the next. Stroke upon stroke, point laid beside point; a mosaic of sedulous jointures; yet always a music that says precisely, yet with imagination, what it is designed to say. Moreover, out of these economies, these subtleties, this "pointillage" and manipulation, rise the imagery, the illusion that Ravel seeks. Who may hear his preluding without sense of the sensuous glow and quiver of the Spanish night, his dances without nervous excitement, or listen unstirred to the riotous flood, ebbing and flowing, of his fair? So to accomplish his ends by a procedure altogether his own, so to make each orchestral piece, the tour de force in kind that the "Spanish Rhapsody" surely is, is the individuality, the genius, almost, of Ravel. H. T. P.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1918-19.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

HENRI RABAUD, Conductor.

ELEVENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, JANUARY 17, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 18, AT 8 P. M.

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY No. 5, in C minor. op. 67

- I. Allegro con brio
- II. Andante con moto
- III. Allegro: Trio
- IV. Allegro

MOZART,

RECITATIVE, "Mia Speranza Adorata," and RONDO, "Ah non sai qual pena sia."

SAINT-SAËNS,

SYMPHONIC POEM No. 2, op. 39, "Phaeton"

KELLEY,

"A CALIFORNIA IDYL."

LALO,

RHAPSODY for Orchestra in A

Soloist:

MABEL GARRISON

Mabel Garrison, Soprano, Who Appears with the Handel and Haydn Society in "The Messiah" This Afternoon in Symphony Hall.

SYMPHONY IN 11TH CONCERT

Herald Jan. 18, 1917

Impressive Interpretation of Beethoven Given by Mr. Rabaud

METROPOLITAN OPERA STAR IS SOLOIST

By PHILIP HALE

The 11th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Rabaud, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 5, C minor; Mozart, Recitative, "Mia Speranza Adorata" and Rondo, "Ah! non sal qual pena sal"; Saint-Saens, "Phaeton," symphonic poem No. 2; Kelley, "A California Idyl" for coloratura soprano and orchestra; Lalo, Rhapsody in A major for orchestra. Mabel Garrison of the Metropolitan Opera Company was the soprano.

Mr. Rabaud at the head of a responsive, euphonious and plastic orchestra—an orchestra that now need not fear a rival—gave a remarkably impressive interpretation of the Fifth Symphony. We do not remember one that has equalled it in dramatic intensity and in nobility. Some conductors, as Mr. Nikisch, gave a theatrical reading, giving portentous significance to the opening phrases, prolonging holds in a spectacular manner with quivering arm upraised until the hearers were tempted to cry out "Let go of it, and proceed with the music," hunting out inner voices and giving them undue importance. Others, deploring these extravagances, gave what are called "intellectual," "academic" interpretations, euphemistic terms for the word "dull." Mr. Rabaud, believing that this symphony is the "summit of music"—to quote his own words—did not have to depart from Beethoven's text or inject a foreign spirit into the symphony to gain magnificent effects. Again he revealed himself as a born and accomplished musician among conductors, as a skilful and imaginative conductor among musicians. His reverence for Beethoven was not obsequious. He did not turn the concert hall into a theatre. So-called absolute music may be more passionate and dramatic than an exciting opera, and suggests milder and higher thoughts in the breast of the hearer than any invoked by a composition that has a program or is a tonal translation of epic or lyric poem. It would not be easy to say which movement, as played yesterday, moved most the soul of the audience; yet the Scherzo had a new meaning; the wonderful transition to the tumultuous joy of the Finale was managed in masterly manner, and—O crowning triumph!—the interest in the Finale never flagged after the first glorious outburst.

"Phaeton" had not been performed at these concerts for twenty years. It did not deserve this long neglect. Here again Saint-Saens shows his sound sense, his lucid musical mind. He does not ride in the chariot by the side of the arrogant Phaeton; he sees him mount, watches him, almost with a smile, foreseeing his end. If Liszt had treated this sun myth he would have insisted on taking the reins himself. How skilfully the insolent ride is portrayed! Nor does Saint-Saens represent Jupiter as wrecking the world when he launched the bolt that saved it. What a pothor a modern German composer would have made with a formidable orchestra in hurling Phaeton from his car!

Lalo's Norwegian Rhapsody was also new to the majority of hearers. It is a brilliant composition, with entertaining thematic material, richly and ingeniously orchestrated. The modern French learned much from Lalo and Chabrier. They sometimes helped themselves with both hands from the scores of these predecessors, and without the grace of acknowledgment.

Mme. Garrison was pleasantly remembered here by her singing at a symphony concert last season and by her singing the extremely difficult music of the Princess in "Coq d'Or" at the Boston Opera House in April. The Rondo of Mozart, which she sang yesterday, was written for his sister-in-law, Aloysia, in a day. It is more or less perfunctory music in the manner of the period, as if Mozart, teased for a long time by Aloysia for a new aria, had tossed it off and said to her: "There you are; don't bother me again." Mr. Kelley wrote his Idyl when he was lecturing in California. He completed it at Oxford, Ohio, where he lives. Remenyi, inspired by far western scenery, wrote a "Hymn to Mount Shasta" for the fiddle. Mr. Kelley was less ambitious: he contented himself with a lively allegro, an invitation for someone's love to come forth, when hills are green and the sky is blue and hearts of love are beating true. When Artemus Ward heard young men beneath his window singing "Come, where my love lies dreaming," he did not go. "I did not think it would be proper." But Mr. Kelley's invitation is purely lyrical, not erotic, an idyl that might be assigned to Vermont of North Carolina as well as to California. The music is appropriately cheerful in rather commonplace fashion, with an orchestral accompaniment that is at times too thick for the advantage of the singer. Mme. Garrison sang accurately and easily, and in Mozart's Recitative with a pretty show of sentiment.

Just before the concert Mr. Rabaud received news by cable of the death of his brother Maurice as the result of an operation. He surely has the sympathy of all. The wonder is that he was able to conduct so brilliantly.

The orchestra is now materially strengthened by the coming of men from the orchestra of the Paris Conservatory. The names of Messrs. Laurent, first flute; L. Speyer, oboe and English horn; Adam, trombone, appear in the program book. It was a pleasure to note the return of Mr. Jaenicke, the horn player. There are now eight horns in the list of the personnel.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Hadley, Symphonic Fantasia (first time at these concerts); Bach, Suite in D major, No. 3; Franck, Symphonic Variations for piano and orchestra; d'Indy, Symphony "On a Mountain Air" for orchestra and pianoforte. Alfred Cortot will be the pianist.

Monitor Music in Boston Jan. 18/19
Specially for The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, Massachusetts — Mr. Rabaud made a more profound impression on a Friday afternoon audience at the eleventh program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on the afternoon of Jan. 17, than he has achieved at any previous afternoon concert this season. He did it in Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, which he read not alone with authority but with a freedom from convention, though always within the strict bounds of good taste, which has not always marked his Beethoven readings hitherto. The orchestra responded nobly to the conductor's mood. For the first time, Mr. Laurent, the new first flute, and Mr. Adam, the new first trombone, were in their places, to the noticeable improvement of the tone quality of their respective divisions. Both come from the Paris Conservatory Orchestra. Miss Mabel Garrison, who, aside from the quality of her voice, always sings so well that it is a pleasure to hear her, was the soloist, giving a Mozart recitative, "Mia Speranza Adorata," and rondo, "Ah! non sai qual pena sia" (K. 416) and "A California Idyl" by Edgar Stillman Kelley, which is a setting to verses by Charles Keeler. Mr. Kelley wrote this aria for Miss Garrison especially, but he quite evidently did not consult with the lady first, for the orchestration receives far more attention than the voice, and a singer must breathe sometimes. It is to be hoped that Mr. Kelley, who was in the audience, may realize the necessity of fitting music and words a little more closely together. The program also included Saint-Saëns' symphonic poem, "Phaëton" and Lalo's rhapsody in A major.

Fredric Fradkin, the new concert master of the Boston Orchestra, made his first local appearance as soloist in the fourth concert of the series which the orchestra gives in Cambridge each year, playing Mendelssohn's concerto in E minor, op. 64. The young man's tone is engaging though not large, but a certain restlessness in his posture communicates itself to his tempi so that his rhythm is somewhat uneven. His tremolo is a little inclined to stiffness and rapidity, but his technique has reached the point where it is sufficient for any demands that the violin repertory makes on a concert player. He hurls himself headlong into a tempestuous passage sure that he will come out all right but leaving conductor and orchestra to follow as best they can. It is to his credit that he played the sugary andante movement of the concerto without sentimentality. A second hearing of the Suite of Sixteenth Century English music, arranged by Mr. Rabaud, confirms the excellent impression the first hearing made. An admirable restraint in orchestration preserves the atmosphere of the early English music. Likewise a second hearing of F. S. Converse's "Mystic Trumpeter" fantasy strengthens the impression gained of the admirable qualities of this work.

BEETHOVEN EXALTED BY SYMPHONY

Post — Jan. 18/19

Remarkable Performance of the Great Fifth

BY OLIN DOWNES

The feature of yesterday afternoons concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud conductor, was the performance of Beethoven's Fifth symphony. There were other interesting performances; the Boston Symphony has, in the past, given many notable performances of Beethoven's work; but seldom has this work been so noble and so thrilling, at the hands of any conductor, whether visiting at the head of another orchestra or officiating at the regular series of concerts in Symphony Hall, as it was yesterday at the hands of Mr. Rabaud.

The Fifth Symphony is over 100 years old. It is probably the most popular symphony, even today, in the orchestral repertory. It is very hard to perform such a work, over familiar to conductor and men, without the suspicion of routine, of a task perfunctorily executed. A good conductor will of course rehearse such a work scrupulously, however often it has been played. He will give reverent attention to each detail and concentrate anew on the meaning of the music, yet he may well fail to produce the effect produced yesterday.

This symphony has been gospel to generations. How many musicians have sat with the score, at desk or piano, and listened with the inner ear to performances more ideal than any orchestra could give? Doubtless there have been thousands who never heard the work played by an orchestra, and were yet profoundly moved by the printed music. The conductors are not always the most zealous interpreters. Years ago we knew a Swiss musician, a man of brilliant accomplishments, condemned to the hard labor of piano teaching. We shall never forget the awful sounds and the profound feeling, the tears rolling down his cheeks, with which he played the Fifth Symphony to us one day on the piano. For he was as sincere and intelligent a lover of his art as he was a miserable failure as a virtuoso.

Fulfillment of Dreams

Mr. Rabaud's performance of yesterday had the dramatic fire, the exalted faith, the consuming ecstasy, of that piano performance we remember so well. It had also the tonal balance and beauty, the technical sufficiency, the overwhelming orchestral sonorities only to be attained when a great instrumental body and a conductor of artistic sensibility and noble character meet. On such an occasion, the conductor is doing more than he knows. He is the hero who accomplishes for the humble dreamers and those to whom the reward of accomplishment is not given, the fulfillment of their dreams.

The orchestra responded fully to Mr. Rabaud's wishes. The men, too, were inspired. The gesture of thanks which the conductor made after the performance was the acknowledgment of a kind of co-operation which cannot be commanded. The interpretation was a model of musicianship and taste, in addition to its more overpowering qualities. There was no extravagance. The great strength of it was the strength which is felt the more because of poise and control.

Do Understand Beethoven

Perhaps there were those in the audience, accustomed to an almost unbroken succession of conductors of the German school, who had thought that a French conductor would not understand the Beethoven "fermatas"—those long-sustained chords, vibrated by the instruments as though two planets had met headlong in space and were locked together in a grip that would never give way. The "fermatas" of the first movement, the rugged power of its rhythms, the volcanic passion of the music, were understood by Mr. Rabaud as by all the players in the orchestra, which now includes a much greater number of Frenchmen than before. Who should understand the music of a great spirit better? Beethoven has been reverently studied, understood, adored, for many years in France, and it may be said here that no orchestra has played the famous passage for the double-basses in the scherzo of the fifth symphony as the double-basses of the orchestra of the Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire played this symphony a few months ago in the same hall, under the direction of Andre Messager.

As a whole, however, Mr. Rabaud's performance was by far the more moving of the two. It was not distinguished by unheard-of subtleties, and it is possible to be too subtle and sophisticated, as many conductors of the day show, with this symphony. It simply told its story of the man who fights with fate and conquers his stars with the ruggedness and the irresistible expressive power of the titan of composers. Only in such a spirit and in such a manner could the wildly exultant finale have been made so uplifting.

Music Born Again

To the conductor who can lead this movement as Mr. Rabaud led it yesterday, words are hardly adequate tribute. The audience was deeply stirred. The music was born again. Under less gifted men one has suspected signs of approaching age in this monumental work, but yesterday the fifth symphony seemed no less adequate a greeting to the new spirit of the 20th century and humanity after the world war than it must have seemed to the young generation of the 19th century in the turmoil and the birth of new ideals which followed the French revolution. How many composers could be measured by such a scale?

A word for the new flutist, Mr. Laurent. His tone is uncommonly clear and brilliant. He is evidently an accomplished virtuoso and an authoritative musician.

Miss Garrison Singing

The concert aria of Mozart, "Ah non sai qual pena sia," sung by Miss Mabel Garrison, is not for us a very distinguished or dramatic piece of music. Nor did it find Miss Garrison at her vocal best, admirable musician as she is, and also a finished technician. That she has the vocal range and dexterity needed for such music, that she knows how to phrase and what the art of diction means, was apparent to everyone, but there is surely more interesting material for a singer. Nor can we commend on the score of composition Edgar-Stillman-Kelley's "California Idyl." The poem, which is full of rills and trills, could hardly inspire exalted treatment.

The music is prettily conventional, and the mention of bird songs and the like is made the moment for many vocal ornaments and extravaganzas of the soloist. Probably Mr. Kelley took the thing no more seriously. He has certainly written much more distinctive music. In this song Miss Garrison distinguished herself as a vocalist.

Saint-Saens' "Phaeton"

Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "Phaeton," has seldom been played in Boston. Perhaps for this reason, one wishes one could hear it a little oftner, and other of Saint-Saens' symphonic poems a little less. It is very dexterous, piquant Gallic. Saint-Saens is always spoken of as the one who inaugurated the symphonic poem of the Liszt type in France, and one of the first to understand its possibilities. Well, if he understood them, he did not exploit them. The Saint-Saens symphonic poems are less "symphonic poems" as Liszt conceived the form than they are sublimated piano etudes, arranged for orchestra. One persistent figure, designed to suggest a spinning wheel, or a grave yard dance, or, as yesterday, the chariot of "Phaeton," is made the basis for entertaining variations. The symphonic poems of Liszt and Strauss are far deeper, more dramatic, plastic in form, symphonic in character.

Lalo's rhapsody in A major brought the concert to a brilliant conclusion.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Jan. 18, 1919
MR. RABAUD PROVES UNSUSPECTED POWERS

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in a Performance of Signal Eloquence — Saint-Saens' "Phaeton" and a Rhapsody of Lalo for Contrasting Pieces—Miss Garrison Sings Ill-Chosen Numbers — The Orchestra, with Full Forces and Sundry Newcomers, on Its Mettle Again

BY signs from stage and programme-book yesterday, the Symphony Orchestra has at last been reconstituted, as it will continue through the present season and, substantially, for a season or more to come. Familiar figures, missing since last spring from familiar places, notably among the horns, have now resumed them; while two or three recent recruits have begun work with the band. The familiar figures were once Austrian or German subjects. When the orchestra was reorganized last summer to accord with the conditions of wartime, they were permitted to keep their posts because they were then on the way to American citizenship. They could not occupy them, however, until they had completed the necessary legal formalities, actually finished a week or more ago. There was happy evidence in the playing of the orchestra on Friday that change of nationality does not alter the abilities that originally brought them into the band and have made them valuable to it. The new recruits were gathered from the orchestra of the Parisian Conservatory now at the end of its American tour. One is a first flute, the body and the brightness of whose tone commend him no less than his fluent technical skill; another reinforces the trombones with material gain in smooth sonority; while a third will play at need, either the oboe or the English horn.

Thus, the orchestra now stands at full complement again; with eight horn-players, from which to draw four, none will be overworked; while the new flutist and the new trombonist promise well for the woodwind and the brass choirs. Similarly Mr. Rabaud's assiduous pains at rehearsal, as he and the orchestra become more and more accustomed and responsive each to each; the increasing familiarity of the men in work one with another and choir with choir, a perceptibly rising esprit de corps are bettering the general and the particular quality of performance. Yesterday, for example, there were richer sonorities, warmer flow and larger piancy of tone in the playing of Beethoven's symphony in C minor than the reorganized orchestra has often achieved. Finesse of detail and agreeable euphonies were not lacking in the instrumental voices to Saint-Saens' tone-poem of "Phaeton"; while in Lalo's rhapsody, remade for orchestra from his "Norwegian Fantasy" for violin, the band renewed its rhythmic verve, recovered its élan of colorful performance in showy music. As signs now run before the end of the season the Symphony Orchestra will be near to its old self and no subject for the condescensions of our neighbors in New York.

Beyond all anticipation among the merely neutral, to the surprise even of the conductor's warmest partisans, Mr. Rabaud succeeded with Beethoven's symphony in C minor. In the two months of his leadership he has not gained such eloquence with any classic piece and with only two or three modern numbers. For the first time, almost, he seemed to conduct with clear emotional as well as mental reaction to the music in hand, at moments even with a veritable passion of response to it. Once more he was lucid of exposition, at the golden mean of a disclosing and animating pace, never too fast and never too slow, just in his distribution of accent and color, less moulding phrase than helping it into large flow into Beethoven's ample design. Now, however, under the ardor that the music plainly kindled in him, these admirable qualities gained warmth, vitality. True, there were moments in which he was only vigorously straightforward with inclosures he might have modulated imaginatively and moments again in which he seemed to shorten Beethoven's intentionally dramatic pauses. On the other hand, he surpassed himself in fine energies of rhythm, in large ascents over long gradients of tone, in fervor of transition, in the vivid emphasis of significant phrase or progression.

Above all, Mr. Rabaud caught, and transmitted the power, the exaltation of this symphony—the note that Beethoven strikes at the very beginning; that he—and yesterday the conductor with him—sustains to the end. The contrasting tumults of the first movement rose and fell as in a tragic passion of tonal speech, yet with a puissant splendor of music as it addresses the ear alone. Large were the fervors, noble the accent, luminous the progress of Beethoven's instrumental song, as conductor and orchestra spoke it from the slow movement. The scherzo passed from the voice of vigor to the voice of mystery; the celebrated transition to the finale wrought the familiar thrill and, for once, deepened it; while the finale itself was Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra in magniloquent progress through Beethoven's nearly endless exultations. Again they renewed the tonal, the emotional power they had gained in the first movement but clothed it now in a glowing magnificence of sound and motion. For once, an audience heard Beethoven not only impassioned but epic, knew his depths of mood, his mighty exaltations of speech, knew also the white heats of creation whereby he makes the means, the matter, the procedure of music so speak from man to men. It was rare experience; it was, as yet, Mr. Rabaud's one half hour of glowing inspiration. An audience too impressed to be fully articulate, might have given him more applause. He had held it, as he had held the orchestra in the hollow of his fervid will.

The rest of the programme offered less stimulating matter, less transcended usual conditions of performance. Of Saint-Saens' symphonic poems, "The Youth of Hercules" is well devised matter for music, brought not merely to well-considered but often imaginative voice; the "Danse Macabre" does not lack occasional graphic and fantastic quality; even "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" has charm of fancy. But is "Phaeton," revived yesterday afternoon, much more than artificial contrivance, disclosing Saint-Saens' dexterity in a musical narrative, so to say, ill suited to music? Phaeton drives across the heavens the coursers of the sun, soon escaping from a hand unmeet to guide them. The fiery chariot, tossing through the upper air, threatens to consume the earth. With a thunderbolt, Jupiter stays it. There is lament for the youth, daring and dead, the lament of nymphs, perhaps, who earlier in the fonal tale, have watched forebodingly Phaëton's peril. Thereby Saint-Saëns gains opportunity for the songful, gentler measures that shall set contrast to the measures of the coursers and chariot. His tone-picturing of the ride with rhythm, now insistent, now broken, with suggestion of the youth's failing hand and the fitful flight of his horses, remains expert technical feat; but no more than narrative prose to the listening imagination. Pale, too, is the catastrophe, pale, prepared, meditated; while as for the mourning nymphs, they are decorous, tasteful. Not a little of Saint-Saëns's music well abides the years; but they have withered this "Phaëton" because, though it concerns the sun, there is little life or heat in the tone-poem. From first measure to last it is thought and facture, not the imagery or the poetry of tones.

Akin to the tone-poem, as curious coincidence of the day would have it, were the two pieces sung by Miss Garrison, the "assisting artist" of the day, though they were as far apart in matter and in manner as are Mozart of Vienna in 1783 from Edgar Stillmann Kelley of Oxford, Ohio, 1918. Mozart's recitative and rondo, "Mia Speranza Adorata," is routine mechanics for the display of an ornate soprano voice and no whit more, even his illustrious name does sign it. Mr. Kelley's "California Idyll" seems written for no other purpose and with like use of convenient commonplaces sometimes none too skilfully disposed; while Miss Garrison, as ill fortune would have it, sang neither with her usual brightness of tone and animation of mood. In Mozart's piece, she was the skilful singer taking careful thought of the contour of each phrase, of her method with each ornament, of the touches of sentiment the music here and there exacted. In Mr. Kelley's "Idyll" she was similarly captious with his plentiful florid passages, wary of the moments when her voice must pierce her clouding orchestra. In a sense she was expert with both pieces, but through neither played the charm, the glow usually animating her singing. It suggested fatigue and a reluctant spirit. The more welcome, then, was Lalo's version for orchestra alone of his Nouvegram Fantasia for violin and orchestra. Admittedly, it is a displayful piece, more manner than matter, but there is warmth of invention in the motives, clear play of vivifying mood, lively imagination and graphic effect in play of rhythm, harmonies, instrumental color. Again Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra struck fire, and after the pathos of Mozart, Kelley, Miss Garrison and Saint-Saëns, it was good to hear music "sound." But the symphony of the beginning and the performance of the symphony still haunted many an ear.

H. T. P.

Artistic Phonographs

The VICTROLA

suggests culture and refinement.
is an instrument you will be proud to have your friends see.
Victrola is made from the finest woods; is beautifully finished and enters the finest homes to delight and entertain.

EDISON

RABAUD GIVES NOBLE READING

Adv. + Am. Jun. 19, 1919

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony Performed Faultlessly at Concert

MISS MABEL GARRISON PLEASES WITH VOICE

Her California Song, However, Draws Deeper Applause Than Mozart's Aria

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

Beethoven, Fifth Symphony.

Mozart, Concert Aria, "Mia Speranza."

Soloist, Miss Mabel Garrison.

St. Saëns, "Phaeton" Symphonic Poem.

Kelley, "A California Idyll."

Miss Garrison.

Lalo, Rhapsody in A major.

The above was the program of the Friday and Saturday concerts. There may be a suspicion that we are getting a trifle too much of Beethoven and also St. Saëns, but without going as far as the frightened conservatory student who, when the professor thundered "How many symphonies did Beethoven write?" trembled back "two, the fifth and the ninth," we can always welcome the fifth as one of the best of the nine. And on this occasion it became its own best excuse, for it received a reading and a performance that may rank among the best that we have heard. Too often conductors try with might and main to read something original and new into Beethoven—and fail.

M. Rabaud gave a reading that was in the noblest Beethoven school, without exaggeration, save that he dwelt somewhat long upon the great opening figure, and the finale was read with a glory of heroic triumph that aroused the entire audience.

BEETHOVEN AND CONTRABASSES.

We are always disposed to give the chief laurels of this work to the contrabasses, of which Beethoven was the liberator. Before his time they generally gave merely fundamental bass notes. At the very end of the fourth symphony Beethoven wrote a most difficult set of violin figures for these instruments. Weber satirized the proceeding most keenly in the musical press.

Poor Beethoven could only swear (he was a master in this branch of oratory) in return, but his real answer to the rival composer was in the fifth symphony, where we have the same instruments again introduced and the contrabasses giving a variation in the slow movement, telling a mysterious ghost story at the beginning of the scherzo, and playing a furiously difficult set of phrases in the trio of this movement.

The manner in which they played spoke well for their artistry and for M. Rabaud's drillmastership. The whole orchestra played famously. We remembered that we had this same symphony very well given by Messager and the Paris Conservatory Orchestra a few weeks ago, but we must decidedly give the palm to the reading of M. Rabaud and the playing of his orchestra.

The other two selections, although not new to Boston, were less familiar. St. Saëns' "Phaeton" tells in music of what might befall a young man if he tries to run his father's aeroplane without having had any experience. One can watch the machine miss fire, dip, drive; we can hear the tank explode and the whole affair finally turn turtle. It is perfectly evident that Phaeton is driving without a license and ought never to have been allowed at the wheel.

MISS GARRISON PLEASES.

Seriously this is not a great work. It seemed the tamest portion of the concert, in spite of the fact that the interpretation left nothing to be desired. Coming after the exceptionally heroic and brilliant finale of the fifth symphony it seemed merely bombastic, and it is a comparatively easy matter to gallop horses in music with an anapaestic rhythm; it is one of the few things that program-music can unmistakably picture.

Miss Mabel Garrison won a success as soloist. She is a coloratura soprano of high register, sure intonation and great flexibility of voice. Mozart's concert aria, however, did not appeal greatly to the auditor. One does not thrill to the conventional "pena" and "pianto" and other agonies of the old-fashioned musical heroine. Edgar Stillman lament for the youth, daring and dead, the lament of nymphs, perhaps, who earlier in the fabled tale, have watched forebodingly Phaeton's peril. Thereby Saint-Saëns gains opportunity for the sonorous, gentler measures that shall set contrast to the measures of the coursers and chariot. His tone-picturing of the ride with rhythm, now insistent, now broken, with suggestion of the youth's failing hand and the fitful flight of his horses, remains expert technical feat; but no more than narrative prose to the listening imagination. Pale, too, is the catastrophe, pale, prepared, meditated;

MABEL GARRISON (Mrs. George Siemonn) was born at Baltimore, Md. Her first teacher was Lucien Odend'hal (1903-06). She continued her studies at the Peabody Institute in Baltimore, was graduated in 1912 with a diploma for proficiency in singing, and she also had honors as a student of the pianoforte and of composition. She went to New York where she studied with several teachers. Joining the Aborn Opera Company, she made her first appearance in Boston as Filina in "Mignon" in April, 1912. She sang for two seasons, taking the parts of Gilda, Lucia, Violetta, Olympia, and other rôles. In 1914 she became a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company. She was heard here as Oscar in "Un Ballo in Maschera," performed by the Metropolitan Opera Company in the Boston Opera House, April 18, 1916. She sang in concert at Symphony Hall, November 4, 1917: "Ah, fors' è lui" from "La Traviata"; songs by Massenet, Granados, and Scandinavian folk-songs.

On November 23, 1917, at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, she sang "L'amerò, sarò costante" from Mozart's "Il Rè Pastore" and the aria of Zerbinetta from Richard Strauss's "Ariadne on Naxos."

She sang the music of the Princess in Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Le Coq d'Or," performed by the Metropolitan Opera Company at the Boston Opera House, April 26, 1918, when the part was mimed by the dancer Rosina Galli.

In a sense she was expert with both pieces, but through neither played the charm, the glow usually animating her singing. It suggested fatigue and a reluctant spirit. The more welcome, then, was Lalo's version for orchestra alone of his Nouvegram Fantasia for violin and orchestra. Admittedly, it is a displayful piece, more manner than matter, but there is warmth of invention in the motives, clear play of vivifying mood, lively imagination and graphic effect in play of rhythm, harmonies, instrumental color. Again Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra struck fire, and after the pathos of Mozart, Kelley, Miss Garrison and Saint-Saëns, it was good to hear music "sound." But the symphony of the beginning and the performance of the symphony still haunted many an ear.

H. T. P.

RABAUD GIVES NOBLE READING

Adv. + Am. Jan. 19, 1919

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony Performed Faultlessly at Concert

MISS MABEL GARRISON PLEASES WITH VOICE

Her California Song, However, Draws Deeper Applause Than Mozart's Aria

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

Beethoven, Fifth Symphony.
Mozart, Concert Aria, "Mia Speranza."
Soloist, Miss Mabel Garrison.
St. Saëns, "Phaeton" Symphonic Poem.
Kelley, "A California Idyl."

Miss Garrison.

Lalo, Rhapsody in A major.

The above was the program of the Friday and Saturday concerts. There may be a suspicion that we are getting a trifle too much of Beethoven and also St. Saëns, but without going as far as the frightened conservatory student who, when the professor thundered "How many symphonies did Beethoven write?" trembled back "two, the fifth and the ninth," we can always welcome the fifth as one of the best of the nine. And on this occasion it became its own best excuse, for it received a reading and a performance that may rank among the best that we have heard. Too often conductors try with might and main to read something original and new into Beethoven—and fail.

M. Rabaud gave a reading that was in the noblest Beethoven school, without exaggeration, save that he dwelt somewhat long upon the great opening figure, and the finale was read with a glory of heroic triumph that aroused the entire audience.

BEETHOVEN AND CONTRABASSES.

We are always disposed to give the chief laurels of this work to the contrabasses, of which Beethoven was the liberator. Before his time they generally gave merely fundamental bass notes. At the very end of the fourth symphony Beethoven wrote a most difficult set of violin figures for these instruments. Weber satirized the proceeding most keenly in the musical press.

Poor Beethoven could only swear (he was a master in this branch of oratory) in return, but his real answer to the rival composer was in the fifth symphony, where we have the same instruments again introduced and the contrabasses giving a variation in the slow movement, telling a mysterious ghost story at the beginning of the scherzo, and playing a furiously difficult set of phrases in the trio of this movement.

The manner in which they played spoke well for their artistry and for M. Rabaud's drillmastership. The whole orchestra played famously. We remembered that we had this same symphony very well given by Messager and the Paris Conservatory Orchestra a few weeks ago, but we must decidedly give the palm to the reading of M. Rabaud and the playing of his orchestra.

The other two selections, although not new to Boston, were less familiar. St. Saëns' "Phaeton" tells in music of what might befall a young man if he tries to run his father's aeroplane without having had any experience. One can watch the machine miss fire, dip, drive; we can hear the tank explode and the whole affair finally turn turtle. It is perfectly evident that Phaeton is driving without a license and ought never to have been allowed at the wheel.

MISS GARRISON PLEASES.

Seriously, this is not a great work. It seemed the tamest portion of the concert, in spite of the fact that the interpretation left nothing to be desired. Coming after the exceptionally heroic and brilliant finale of the fifth symphony it seemed merely bombastic, and it is a comparatively easy matter to gallop horses in music with an anapaestic rhythm; it is one of the few things that program-music can unmistakably picture.

Miss Mabel Garrison won a success as soloist. She is a coloratura soprano of high register, sure intonation and great flexibility of voice. Mozart's concert aria, however, did not appeal greatly to the auditor. One does not thrill to the conventional "pena" and "pianto" and other agonies of the old-fashioned musical heroine. Edgar Stillman

182

Kelley's California song came much nearer the modern heart. Not only was there great display of vocal technique here, but the orchestral part was finely developed. The voice was balanced against the flute at times, as both Handel and Donizetti have done, and the new solo flute-player gave an excellent account of himself.

Mr. Kelley did not indulge in any modern ugliness, but united melodic beauty with vocal and orchestral display. The work ended on the heights, away up in alt, almost in altissimo, with a good climax. Miss Garrison was heartily applauded and recalled after both numbers, but one could note the spontaneity of the enthusiasm which followed the Kelley number.

LALO'S RHAPSODY.

Lalo's Rhapsody has not been heard here in a long time, so it was practically a novelty. It is derived from Norwegian inspiration and we like this Frenchman better in Norway than in Spain. The essence of the Springtanz and the Halling are both well caught up. The last movement is chiefly a Halling. We have been present at one of these dances north of Christiania, where, in a barn, the young men strove, to the wild scraping of fiddles and the yelling of excited maidens, to kick the overhanging rafters. The fiercely exuberant music brought back the scene, and it was played with a dash and heartiness that demands unstinted praise.

Therefore, M. Rabaud's triumphs were made at the beginning and end of the concert. Yet of course the very beginning was "The Star Spangled Banner," which we suppose will be reserved for especial occasions after the coming peace. Possibly they might begin the "Pop" concerts, at least in July, with the old tune, "How Dry I Am."

12-1

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1918-19.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

HENRI RABAUD, Conductor.

TWELFTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, JANUARY 24, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 25, AT 8 P. M.

HADLEY,

SYMPHONIC FANTASIA, op. 46.
(First time at these Concerts)

J. S. BACH,

SUITE in D major, No. 3, for Orchestra

- I. Overture
- II. Air
- III. Gavotte No. 1; Gavotte No. 2
- IV. Bourrée
- V. Gigue

FRANCK,

VARIATIONS SYMPHONIQUES for Pianoforte and Orchestra

D'INDY,

SYMPHONY No. 1. "On a Mountain Air," for Orchestra and Pianoforte, op. 25

Soloist:

ALFRED CORTOT

Kelley's California song came much nearer the modern heart. Not only was there great display of vocal technique here, but the orchestral part was finely developed. The voice was balanced against the flute at times, as both Handel and Donizetti have done, and the new solo flute-player gave an excellent account of himself.

Mr. Kelley did not indulge in any modern ugliness, but united melodic beauty with vocal and orchestral display. The work ended on the heights, away up in alt, almost in altissimo, with a good climax. Miss Garrison was heartily applauded and recalled after both numbers, but one could note the spontaneity of the enthusiasm which followed the Kelley number.

LALO'S RHAPSODY.

Lalo's Rhapsody has not been heard here in a long time, so it was practically a novelty. It is derived from Norwegian inspiration and we like this Frenchman better in Norway than in Spain. The essence of the Springtanz and the Halling are both well caught up. The last movement is chiefly a Halling. We have been present at one of these dances north of Christiania, where, in a barn, the young men strove, to the wild scraping of fiddles and the yelling of excited maidens, to kick the overhanging rafters. The fiercely exuberant music brought back the scene, and it was played with a dash and heartiness that demands unstinted praise.

Therefore, M. Rabaud's triumphs were made at the beginning and end of the concert. Yet of course the very beginning was "The Star Spangled Banner," which we suppose will be reserved for especial occasions after the coming peace. Possibly they might begin the "Pop" concerts, at least in July, with the old tune, "How Dry I Am."

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1918--19.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

HENRI RABAUD, Conductor.

TWELFTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, JANUARY 24, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 25, AT 8 P. M.

HADLEY,

SYMPHONIC FANTASIA, op. 46.
(First time at these Concerts)

J. S. BACH.

SUITE in D major, No. 3, for Orchestra

- I. Overture
- II. Air
- III. Gavotte No. 1: Gavotte No. 2
- IV. Bourrée
- V. Gigue

FRANCK.

VARIATIONS SYMPHONIQUES for Pianoforte and Orchestra

D'INDY.

SYMPHONY No. 1. "On a Mountain Air," for Orchestra and Pianoforte, op. 25

Soloist:

ALFRED CORTOT

ALFRED CORTOT, THE FIRST AMONG FRENCH PIANISTS, WHO CAME TO THIS COUNTRY WITH THE "CONSERVATOIRE" ORCHESTRA, AND PLAYED WITH THEM AND IN HIS OWN RECITALS. IN EUROPE, M. CORTOT IS KNOWN AS MUCH MORE THAN A PIANIST. HE HAS STAGED AND CONDUCTED WAGNER, ORGANIZED CHORAL CONCERTS ON A LARGE SCALE, POPULAR CONCERTS, CONCERTS FOR THE INTRODUCTION OF NEW MUSIC, AND CONDUCTED THEM ALL WITH GREAT SUCCESS.

12TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Herald—Jan. 25/19

Players Share Honors with Alfred Cortot, Who Is at the Piano

HADLEY'S FANTASIA SHOWS HIS FLUENCY

By PHILIP HALE

The 12th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Rabaud, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Hadley, Symphonic Fantasia, op. 46; Bach, Suite in D major, No. 3; Franck, Symphonic Variations for piano and orchestra; d'Indy, Symphony for orchestra and piano on a French Mountain Song. Alfred Cortot was the pianist. He played with this orchestra for the first time.

Mr. Hadley has such facility in composition and is so prolific that one imagines him seated at his desk, writing with both hands. Now it is a symphonic poem and now it is an opera; a cantata or a Symphony; some translation of a poem into orchestral music; chamber music, a song. Is it not possible that he thus does himself injustice? At present he reminds one of the man that fell into the deplorable habit of taking a drink between drinks. Mr. Hadley writes music between compositions. This symphonic fantasia, at least a dozen years old, played here yesterday for the first time, is a less ambitious work than his symphonic poems and symphonies that have been performed here. The orchestral music by him that we have heard was agreeable at the time. One recognized a certain technical skill, the ability to produce euphonious sounds by combinations and contrasts of instruments, but one failed to find individual invention. There was little or nothing that was remembered the next week. The music had not such decided flavor that one might have at once said: "This is by Hadley." Fluent music, but without marked characteristics. And so it is with this fantasia. Here and there the influence of Wagner is clearly shown, as in the fortissimo pages that open the main body of the composition; the Wagner of the earlier years. It is not surprising that Mr. Hadley, having studied, dwelt and conducted in Austria and Germany should have submitted to this influence. Few Americans, Germans, Frenchmen or Italians escaped it. There are some pleasant pages in this fantasia, but it is to be regretted that Mr. Hadley writes so easily and so much; that he seems to be contented with whatever comes into his head and rushes at once to his desk.

Bach's Suite gave pleasure, especially the famous Air, and the Gavottes; yet the Air, sung beautifully by the violins, was not so fully appreciated as on certain other occasions; or perhaps the pleasure of the audience was too deep for barbarous recognition by hand-clapping.

Mr. Cortot's eminence as a virtuoso-musician was at once appreciated here when he played Saint-Saens's fourth concerto with the orchestra of the Paris Conservatory three months ago. Yesterday instead of choosing some flamboyant piece to win plaudits easily by an individual tour de force, he selected two works in which the piano is one instrument of many; this is especially true of d'Indy's symphony. Nevertheless he excited not only the unbounded admiration of musicians, but engrossed the attention of the others in the audience and awakened the enthusiasm of even those whose first question in regard to a symphony concert is this: "Who is the soloist?" He displayed the finest musical intelligence served by a technical proficiency so pronounced that no one thought of it but took it as a matter of course. What an infinite variety of tonal beauty! One had hardly realized before this how musical an instrument the piano could be. The music itself was, indeed, worthy of his fingers, brain and soul. For in these compositions the mystical Franck and the "cerebral" Vincent d'Indy are romanticists in the modern significance of the word, without too great respect for formalism, worshippers, and at the same time priests, at the shrine of beauty. Performances like those of the Variations and the Symphony have been rare in the whole history of the orchestra. Mr. Cortot, whose unassuming modesty is ingratiating, was only just when he insisted that Mr. Rabaud should share with him in the applause; yet there were more than two artists on the stage; there was the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Bruneau, Entr'acte from "Messidor"; Rachmaninoff, Concerto No. 2, C minor; Brahms, Symphony No. 2. Mr. Rachmaninoff will be the pianist.

MASTER OF PIANO WITH SYMPHONY

Post ——— Jan. 15/19
Ideal Union of Great
Band, Conductor
and Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

The ideal union of a great orchestra, a great conductor and a great soloist, and, to complete the effect, a programme admirably arranged, is seldom a fact, even in the affairs of the best regulated artistic organizations.

The concert given yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, with Alfred Cortot, pianist, as soloist, was such an event, superlatively representative of the greatest traditions of these concerts.

MORE THAN A VIRTUOSO

Mr. Cortot took part in two performances, those of the Franck "Variations Symphonique" and D'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain Air." In both these works the pianist is far more than a haranguing virtuoso. The piano is an element of the orchestra, important but organic.

In the D'Indy, it might be said, the piano is another orchestra, with a host of effects all its own, and only slightly inferior in capacities of tone-color and sonority to the hundred instruments which surround it. The pianist becomes less a soloist than a second conductor, whose authority is exceeded only by the man with the baton. In such circumstances the pianist can be either an indifferent performer, accustomed to musical routine, an executant intent on displaying his own gifts, or a great artist who subordinates himself completely to the music and thinks with the conductor or as one man.

Two Masters of Art

Seldom in the history of these concerts has there been witnessed such union of spirit and intellect between two musicians of the first rank, and such superb mastery of every aspect of their art, as was shown by Mr. Rabaud and Mr. Cortot yesterday. Their performances were, indeed, historic. Mr. Rabaud we now know as a musician, and our admiration of him increases with every concert that he gives. An inspired student of his art, he inspires the orchestra, which not only obeys him and plays, but understands him and speaks.

Mr. Cortot is what a famous pianist should be, and seldom is—first of all a great musician, with a burning enthusiasm for his art, and, second, a virtuoso of extraordinary powers, for whom physical difficulties apparently do not exist. It may be said without exaggeration that although at least two performances of Franck's variations had been given in this city, the music was heard here yesterday for the first time.

New Beauties in Variations

It had not had its rightful aspect before. The poetic qualities of the composition, its development and finish of workmanship, had been realized, but we had not been permitted to perceive the strength and dramatic character of the music, as was revealed in the very first phrase of the strings, as interpreted by Mr. Rabaud. The revelation was overwhelming. We knew Franck as mystic, the secluded dreamer—these qualities are not wholly absent in the variations—but there were passages in which one thought of Michelangelo.

Most variations are separate fragments, loosely bound together into a whole. Franck's are not, and the continuity of the thought, the force and the generative power of the composer's imagination were unforgettably demonstrated. The second variation was the inevitable consequence of the first, and so on. The momentum of the music and the performance was irresistible and exciting to the last degree.

D'Indy's Symphony

D'Indy's symphony on a "Mountain Air" is for the writer one of the most beautiful and brilliant compositions of a modern master. Conductor, pianist and orchestra surpassed themselves in its performance. Mr. Cortot, though he sat at the piano among the other instrumentalists, played as one who was at the same time immersed in his task and sufficiently far from it to understand equally the great outlines and the finest details of the composition. When the occasion arose, he led authoritatively, stating a theme or some important phrase of its development with as much breadth and conviction as though he had composed the music himself; at other times he supplied only tone color as a background for solo instrument, or again was virtually the conductor in setting the pace of a movement and sustaining it for measures as the basis of the orchestral performance. Technically his performance can only be called by an abused and misappropriated term, "colossal," or, if you like, "overwhelming." The skill, imagination, musicianship of all who took part were placed at the service of the composer, who would himself have rejoiced if he could have heard this performance of his music.

Hadley's Fantasia

Henry Hadley's "Symphonic Fantasia" op. 46, was played for the first time at these concerts. This is not one of Mr. Hadley's late compositions. It was published in 1907, and there had been performances of it before that time. We prefer this music to other compositions of Mr. Hadley which have come since it was completed. It has mood and the music is full of enthusiasm. The idiom is strongly tinged with Wagnerianism. The orchestra is the big Wagnerian orchestra, which is used to the limit. The effect is full and brilliant. The composer liked to make his instruments sound, and did so with a youthful gusto which is contagious. It is sincere, direct writing, and as such gave much pleasure to the audience.

Not the least item of the concert was the suite of Bach in D major which contains the famous air known because of a violin transcription as the "Air for the G String." Again Mr. Rabaud showed his eclecticism and not only his understanding but his enthusiasm for music of all schools. Witness the two-fisted vigor and swing of the overture, the serenity and classic outline of the famous air. This, indeed, was a concert long to remember.

Boston Notes Jan. 15/19

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

More of d'Indy's music was presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its twelfth program, heard on the afternoon of Friday, Jan. 24, Mr. Alfred Cortot playing the piano part in the "Symphony on a French Mountain Song," Op. 25. Being closer akin to program music than is the string quartet, the moments of pure musical inspiration are fewer. Mr.

Cortot submerged himself in the ranks of the players, and made no attempt to turn the symphony into a concerto. Mr. Rabaud, as is the case with all that he does, showed perfect familiarity with the score and a great anxiety to do justice to its poetry and beauty. Mr. Cortot's ability to exert just the right amount of force through his fingers at just the right instant to bring about the elasticity in a phrase that marks the true artist was in evidence in the César Franck symphonic variations. These found much favor with the audience, which gave the soloist long and loud applause. No pianist has been heard in Symphony Hall this year who can put more poetry into his tone than can Mr. Cortot. The program began with a symphonic fantasia, Op. 46, by Henry Hadley, heard for the first time at these concerts. The work suggests Wagnerian influence, but with a striving along approved lines for modernity. On the program was the Bach suite in D major, No. 3, which plentifully satisfied any yearnings for structural and melodic music.

Sergei Rachmaninoff will be soloist at the coming concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in various cities instead of Mr. Arthur Rubinstein, who, unable to reach this country from South America, was forced to cancel his engagements. The schedule for the next two weeks runs as follows:

Worcester, Massachusetts, on Tuesday evening, Jan. 28. The soloist will be the American contralto, Mme. Merle Alcock. Boston, Jan. 31 and Feb. 1. The soloist will be Sergei Rachmaninoff.

Washington New National Theater, Monday afternoon, Feb. 3. Soloist, Sergei Rachmaninoff.

Baltimore, Lyric Theater, Tuesday evening, Feb. 4. Soloist, Rachmaninoff.

Philadelphia, Academy of Music, Wednesday evening, Feb. 5. Soloist, Rachmaninoff.

New York, Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, Feb. 6.

Brooklyn, Academy of Music, Friday evening, Feb. 7. Soloist, Rachmaninoff.

New York, Carnegie Hall, Saturday afternoon, Feb. 8.

ELECTRIC NEEDLE SPECIAL
MRS. LOIS AMADON
BENJAMIN K. GORHAM

Scientific treatment the complexion and hair also scalp. Special attention for falling hair.
Bulcous—North Annex
in season's most modern styles are exhibited, making comparatively easy to choose the one most becoming to individuality.
24-Inch Hair, Natural
Wavy Hair, Natural
28-Inch Hair, Natural
Wavy Hair, Natural
32-Inch Hair, Natural
Wavy Hair, Natural
All Around Transformations, Natural Wavy Hair
$6.
$7.
$8.
$9.

MASTER OF PIANO WITH SYMPHONY

Post ——— Jan. 25/19
Ideal Union of Great

Band, Conductor
and Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

The ideal union of a great orchestra, a great conductor and a great soloist, and, to complete the effect, a programme admirably arranged, is seldom a fact, even in the affairs of the best regulated artistic organizations.

The concert given yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, with Alfred Cortot, pianist, as soloist, was such an event, superlatively representative of the greatest traditions of these concerts.

MORE THAN A VIRTUOSO

Mr. Cortot took part in two performances, those of the Franck "Variations Symphonique" and D'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain Air." In both these works the pianist is far more than a haranguing virtuoso. The piano is an element of the orchestra, important but organic.

In the D'Indy, it might be said, the piano is another orchestra, with a host of effects all its own, and only slightly inferior in capacities of tone-color and sonority to the hundred instruments which surround it. The pianist becomes less a soloist than a second conductor, whose authority is exceeded only by the man with the baton. In such circumstances the pianist can be either an indifferent performer, accustomed to musical routine, an executant intent on displaying his own gifts, or a great artist who subordinates himself completely to the music and thinks with the conductor as one man.

Two Masters of Art

Seldom in the history of these concerts has there been witnessed such union of spirit and intellect between two musicians of the first rank, and such superb mastery of every aspect of their art, as was shown by Mr. Rabaud and Mr. Cortot yesterday. Their performances were, indeed, historic. Mr. Rabaud we now know as a musician, and our admiration of him increases with every concert that he gives. An inspired student of his art, he inspires the orchestra, which not only obeys him and plays, but understands him and speaks.

Mr. Cortot is what a famous pianist should be, and seldom is—first of all a great musician, with a burning enthusiasm for his art, and, second, a virtuoso of extraordinary powers, for whom physical difficulties apparently do not exist. It may be said without exaggeration that although at least two performances of Franck's variations had been given in this city, the music was heard here yesterday for the first time.

New Beauties in Variations

It had not had its rightful aspect before. The poetic qualities of the composition, its development and finish of workmanship, had been realized, but we had not been permitted to perceive the strength and dramatic character of the music, as was revealed in the very first phrase of the strings, as interpreted by Mr. Rabaud. The revelation was overwhelming. We knew Franck as mystic, the secluded dreamer—these qualities are not wholly absent in the variations—but there were passages in which one thought of Michelangelo.

Most variations are separate fragments, loosely bound together into a whole. Franck's are not, and the continuity of the thought, the force and the generative power of the composer's imagination were unforgettably demonstrated. The second variation was the inevitable consequence of the first, and so on. The momentum of the music and the performance was irresistible and exciting to the last degree.

D'Indy's Symphony

D'Indy's symphony on a "Mountain Air" is for the writer one of the most beautiful and brilliant compositions of a modern master. Conductor, pianist and orchestra surpassed themselves in its performance. Mr. Cortot, though he sat at the piano among the other instrumentalists, played as one who was at the same time immersed in his task and sufficiently far from it to understand equally the great outlines and the finest details of the composition. When the occasion arose, he led authoritatively, stating a theme or some important phrase of its development with as much breadth and conviction as though he had composed the music himself; at other times he supplied only tone color as a background for solo instrument, or again was virtually the conductor in setting the pace of a movement and sustaining it for measures as the basis of the orchestral performance. Technically his performance can only be called by an abused and misappropriated term, "colossal," or, if you like, "overwhelming." The skill, imagination, musicianship of all who took part were placed at the service of the composer, who would himself have rejoiced if he could have heard this performance of his music.

Hadley's Fantasia

Henry Hadley's "Symphonic Fantasia" op. 46, was played for the first time at these concerts. This is not one of Mr. Hadley's late compositions. It was published in 1907, and there had been performances of it before that time. We prefer this music to other compositions of Mr. Hadley which have come since it was completed. It has mood and the music is full of enthusiasm. The idiom is strongly tinged with Wagnerianism. The orchestra is the big Wagnerian orchestra, which is used to the limit. The effect is full and brilliant. The composer liked to make his instruments sound, and did so with a youthful gusto which is contagious. It is sincere, direct writing, and as such gave much pleasure to the audience.

Not the least item in the suite of Bach contains the famous cause of a violinist's "Air for the G String." Rebaud showed his only his understanding for music of all the two-listed vigor overture, the serene line of the famous was a concert long.

Boston

Specially for The Christ

More of d'Indy's sent by the Boston Orchestra on its twelfth on the afternoon of Mr. Alfred Cortot part in the "Symphony on a Mountain Song," Op. 46, akin to program music, string quartet, the musical inspiration

Cortot submerged himself in the ranks of the players, and made no attempt to turn the symphony into a concerto. Mr. Rabaud, as is the case with all that he does, showed perfect familiarity with the score and a great anxiety to do justice to its poetry and beauty. Mr. Cortot's ability to exert just the right amount of force through his fingers at just the right instant to bring about the elasticity in a phrase that marks the true artist was in evidence in the César Franck symphonic variations. These found much favor with the audience, which gave the soloist long and loud applause. No pianist has been heard in Symphony Hall this year who can put more poetry into his tone than can Mr. Cortot. The program began with a symphonic fantasia, Op. 46, by Henry Hadley, heard for the first time at these concerts. The work suggests Wagnerian influence, but with a striving along approved lines for modernity. On the program was the Bach suite in D major, No. 3, which plentifully satisfied any yearnings for structural and melodic music.

Sergei Rachmaninoff will be soloist concerts the Boston Orchestra in various cities. Arthur Rubinstein, who, in this country from was forced to cancel. The schedule for sachusetts, on Tuesday. The soloist will be the solo, Mme. Merle Alcock, and Feb. 1. The soloist, Rachmaninoff.

New National Theater, Feb. 3. Soloist, Sergei

Theater, Tuesday evening, Rachmaninoff.

Academy of Music, Wednesday, Feb. 5. Soloist, Rach-ernegie Hall, Thursday

Academy of Music, Friday. Soloist, Rachmaninoff.

ernegie Hall, Saturday

HENRY HADLEY.

CORTOT'S SKILL IS APPLAUDED

Adv. + Am. Jan. 26/14
French Violinist Arouses Great Enthusiasm at the Symphony

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

Program.
Hadley, Symphonic Fantasia.
Bach, Suite in D major.
Franck, Variations Symphoniques, with piano.
Soloist, M. Alfred Cortot.
D'Indy, Symphony, "On a Mountain Air."

The above was the symphonic list of Friday and Saturday. It was more out of the standard-classical rut than most of its predecessors. The new work by Hadley was worth hearing. It is for large modern score and the young composer handles the heavy forces well. It was given in London five years ago by the London Symphony Orchestra (which Richter once called the best orchestra in the world), at a concert made up of Hadley's own compositions and led by the composer.

It has some striking points of scoring. In the introduction the contrabasses tune their lowest string to E-flat, and the harp is used throughout the work in a very modulatory manner, involving much skilful use of pedals. There is a strongly rhythmic touch in the military episode in the centre of the work, in which the contrabasses are prominent and even the military (snare) drum is used and much triangle tinkling. Strong climaxes are well worked up and the work goes from a pianissimo beginning in three-part clarinet harmony, to a heavy ending of full orchestra, with the harp giving an extra glassando kick to the final cadence.

The work is brief and exciting, but there are more important numbers in the American repertoire. Because of its sharp contrasts, its mysterious beginning with a long organ point, its triumphant climax, it seems to be program music with the story left out, somewhat after Mahler's style. As a study in orchestration it has its points of interest.

Bach's Suite was, for once, a disappointment. We are used to a more sedate, a more reserved Bach. M. Rabaud modernized the old composer in an unnecessary fashion. We admire the French modernization of Bach in his organ works, but his orchestral numbers are another matter. They do not gain by being read in a brilliant and exciting fashion. The brass was constantly heavy.

Infinitely more effective were the Franck Symphonic Variations, with piano. M. Cortot more than repeated the triumph which he won here recently with the Conservatoire Orchestra under Messager. There are new possibilities in our Symphony pianists nowadays. There was recently a pianist in our Symphony concerts, named Paderewski, who is now appearing in the concert of European powers.

M. Cortot did not have as excellent a vehicle of expression as at the preceding concert. Then he played a Saint-Saëns concerto which was more pianistic than the Franck variations. But the variations are nevertheless effective music and M. Cortot may receive the acknowledgment of having been the first to make their full power evident to the public. The dialogues between the piano and orchestra (for there was much antiphonal work) were exquisitely balanced, and the end became a whirlwind of brilliancy. M. Cortot's power in double octave work is something phenomenal, and his steady attention to the ensemble proves him more than merely a great technician. He aroused a tremendous enthusiasm and it was thoroughly deserved.

The last work on the program again made use of the piano, but less independently, more in the vein of an added tone-color to the orchestra, as Glinka, Berlioz and Wolf-Ferrari have used it. The mountain air was sliced up in a manner so that the mountaineer himself would not have recognized it. But one must pay unstinted tribute to D'Indy's skill in this school of development. He is the chief master of the modern French school in this field.

This symphony is one of the most attractive of D'Indy's works. There is a carillon in the finale which is as effective as that of Bizet in his "L'Arlesienne," and this was most effectively interpreted both by pianist and orchestra. The mountain air comes first upon that instrument which all composers use for the shepherd's pipe—the English horn. The pianist, although in a lesser part here, was again recalled with enthusiasm.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

MR. CORTOT SHINES OUT OF TWO NOTABLE PIECES

The Pianist in a Vivid Performance of Franck's Symphonic Variations and in Signal Share in d'Indy's Symphony on a Mountain Air—Eloquent Music in Revealing and Stirring Voice—The Contrast of Other Numbers

AS often of late at the Symphony Concerts, the "assisting artist," yesterday afternoon, again stimulated orchestra and conductor, engrossed and stirred the audience, did much to make the numbers in which he joined the distinctive and pleasurable items of the programme. In a sense newcomer, he was not altogether unknown to his hearers since he had played here, though to a different company, three months ago. Yet the Alfred Cortot who was then heard with the orchestra of the Conservatoire in Paris in one of Saint-Saëns's concertos, was hardly the pianist who now bore signal part in Franck's Symphonic Variations and d'Indy's symphony "On a Mountain Song." With Mr. Cortot, as with many another, the better the medium, the better the deed. The polished surfaces, the brittle artifice of Saint-Saëns's concerto in C minor—the piece of last October—could only hint at the larger abilities, the finer powers evoked by Franck and d'Indy in music of warmer and deeper mettle. Beyond question, the Cortot of last autumn was an adroit technician, a pianist sensitive to color, alert to rhythm, with a keen ear for the interplay of the voice of his instrument with the voices of the orchestra—a personality without wearing what certain youths were pleased to call a "romantic mask," animating Saint-Saëns's music by his own ardor of spirit, here and there in pace, inflection or detail setting his individual stamp upon it.

The Cortot of yesterday and of mid-winter (as the calendar alleges) was again the masterful technician, keen to rhythm, multifold of color, but now less the virtuoso exhibiting these excellent capacities for their own sake than the musician employing them for the greater glory of the music in hand. Franck's Symphonic Variations are intrinsically a rhapsody for piano and orchestra in which only a pedantic hearer may take thought of the containing form. Once Franck has proposed his fecund motive, he begins to rhapsodize upon it in rich flow of imagination, in high ardor of creative spirit, as he was wont to extemporize in the organ loft of his church in Paris to the delight and the wonder of his hearers. He sets the piano to bright traceries upon the motive made melody and Mr. Cortot wrought them in shimmering lace-work of tone. He infuses into the piano his own zest of improvisation and Mr. Cortot then winged the music with an answering ardor of rhythm and progress. Or he bids the piano weave garlands of counterpoint about his motive—to fall from Mr. Cortot's fingers with fluid grace of line, with play of light and shade upon them as in glints of the composer's and the pianist's fancy. Once and again, Franck allots to the piano the songful voice, wrought by Mr. Cortot in rich contours, pellucid phrase and upspringing course. Toward the end come the measures in which, according to his wont, Franck seems to shower forth music in high exuberance and happy release of exultant spirit. Tossing motive back and forth between piano and orchestra, blending, parting, contrasting their voices, flinging modulation and ornament here, there and everywhere, he summons pianist, players and audience to share in his ecstasy as naive of spirit as it is often adept in means. Out of Mr. Cortot's playing flashed these fine fires, in the warmth of his own spirit he heated them, while a skill that never failed lay hid beneath the glow of the achievement. Throughout the piece, pianist and composer set sparks as well to conductor or orchestra. For once these Symphonic Variations sounded as the manifold, multi-colored, ardent rhapsody that they are. With intensive force Mr. Cortot's personality played upon music and performance. It was the personality of a penetrating and responsive musician, equally rich in romantic spirit, imparting skill, recreative imagination. Yet not a detail of performance seemed to evade his care; while nowhere did he thrust himself through the music. There was rhapsodic passion, as the music well warrants; there was also poise.

Romantic music, likewise, is d'Indy's symphonic fantasia upon the mountain air of the Cévennes—a song that even within the four walls of a concert-hall seems to sound from some distant height in an open country, calling with arresting voice to the dreamer of dreams, the seer of visions. Perhaps d'Indy heard it sung as Mr. Speyer, new and fortunate comer to the woodwind choir, played it yesterday; perhaps the composer's own prompting, like that of the virtuoso, added a little to the haunting quality. Upon it, as upon a generating motive, d'Indy writes a succession of orchestral variations, with the piano often as distinctive instrument of his band. If the hearer choose so to regard the piece, he may find in it much studious reflection, much expert workmanship in the transformations, manipulations, re-incarnations, that the mountain-song undergoes in the three divisions of the fantasia. He will be in the fashion and in accord with the conventional labels, if he so listens to the music. Yet often he will lose his way, unless he happens to be uncommonly acute in such listening, while at the end he will be as one who may not see the glories of the wood because he is so closely scrutinizing the trees.

No more than the rest of d'Indy's music do these variations justify such reduction to formal abstraction. Rather, each transformation of the song is prompted by clear mood, enriched with warm and various imagination. The like-minded listener may hear music in which the air is amplified, transfigured, glorified, gladdened. He may hear music again in which it becomes the voice of longing, calling afar and mysteriously as through mists. Or, yet again, it beats in the rhythms to which d'Indy sets it, shines in the colors in which he clothes it as though it sounded against bright expanse of mountain sky, as though it were borne upon mountain wind keen, fleet and strong. Or once more, the composer takes it as he might some cherished object and weaves harmonic and instrumental fancies upon it. More and more as the fantasia proceeds, the air seems to possess d'Indy, mind and heart, body and soul, until he must set himself free by some such demoniac exorcism as that of the finale. Into reiterated, obstinate, blazing dance, tarantilla-like, he transforms this many-voiced song. The music spins in it; the music shouts it; the music flares with it. Nor is there end until the song, thus whipped and maddened, rushes away down the world.

When the song is one of mystery, of longing, d'Indy writes a music of beauty; when it clangs or whirls out of other measures in other moods, he writes a music of power. Everywhere also he writes in these variations a fecund and ingenious music, weaving itself from itself manifold though it be, the warmth of his heart, quickening as it were his inventiveness of mind, his skill of hand. To crown this fecundity, this skill, he sets within the fantasia a piano part, seemingly designed to play in light and shade upon the song and then to be the lash that, darting in and out of the music, whips the air into the whirl of the end. Through the first and the second division of the fantasia, Mr. Cortot played this part with an unerring sense of the color it was to thread into the music, with as flawless touch in the gaining of it. In the third division he and the song at his hands became energizing force to the performance, even as did his playing in Franck's Symphonic Variations. So in Mr. Cortot finesse and power, poise and ardor are in complement upon the music. Hardly less, however, had conductor and orchestra answered to d'Indy through the whole fantasia. As with the fifth symphony of Beethoven a week ago, Mr. Rabaud no longer heard with impersonal ear, saw no longer with the purely objective eye.

In all this, perhaps, there was passing enlightenment to those who take their cue from the scorers in good Parisian fashion of what passes there as "official French music." D'Indy himself has spoken and written despitely of it as the means to advancement in a withered and self-centred hierarchy; Debussy shot upon it many a shaft of wit; Ravel has not been sparing of scornful word; nearly every "light" of the younger Parisian generation mocks at it. Our younger generation on this side of the sea warms to music that these composers write, accepts their point of view of cognate matters. Yet here is Mr. Cortot, who is of the official hierarchy, giving clear proof of signal and individual qualities, while, as the Symphonic Concerts of late have disclosed, not always does Mr. Rabaud conduct, as Ravel once put it, "with respect." And yet, and yet, there was cause for wonder why he should have included in his programme of yesterday, Mr. Hadley's Symphonic Fantasia, no more than a fluent, well-made, well-sounding piece according to the conventions of a post-Wagnerian day, and why he should have led through Bach's Suite in D major with so rigid a pace and rhythm, with so little shading and modulating of the interwoven voices. Mr. Hadley's fantasia is as routine music-making in kind as ever fell from any Parisian academic "hierarchy," while Bach played "with respect" is a Bach left lifeless and uncharacterized. H. T. P.

FRENCH MUSIC Globe Jan. 25/19 SUPERBLY PLAYED

Mr. Rabaud, conductor; Mr. Cortot, pianist, both of imagination and sensibility, the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its present state of virtuosity, unsurpassed, if equaled, lifted yesterday afternoon's concert above those of its series, although no one of them has passed without its own distinction.

Alfred Cortot had played earlier this season with the orchestra of the Paris Conservatory, conducted by M. Messager. He had revealed a marked talent but gave no such embodiment of his art as now. Frank's Symphonic Variations for piano and orchestra are not the type of show piece for the casual virtuoso. While there are high demands for pianistic skill, the chief essentials are the perception, understanding, and spiritual powers of re-creation by the artist, his sense of the piano as an exalted instrument of the orchestra, the ensemble, the humanity, the childlike joy in the very breath of life which mark these noble pages.

There are rare moments when it seems the privilege of musicians to have brought into the very concert room the presence of the composer whom they invoke. Pianist and conductor, both Frenchmen, both well endowed by nature to perceive as to translate this score, touched it yesterday with reverent hands. Their labor was as one of love, celebrating also the glory of their elder colleague. In an age when aspiration daily jogs elbows with materialism, he cannot and will not often find such exponents in pianist, conductor or orchestra.

Mr. Cortot was given such an ovation as few soloists receive from this audience. The manner of this young artist, far from that of the virtuoso, is rather of the man who would more happily honor the composer and his colleagues than himself.

D'Indy's Symphony for Orchestra and Piano on a French Mountain Song was a fitting sequel. The plaintive air, given out by the English horn—marking the newly arriving Mr. Speyer, an artist on his instrument—is one of the souvenirs taken by d'Indy from his Cevennes. Here is a folk melody, strange and haunting, as though escaping in purer mountain heights the baser alloy of earth, its people and their songs.

This is not music to be chosen by all. There is too much out of beaten paths. There are verbose, abstract passages to casual, perhaps even to studied hearing, but where are such pages as those of the last movement, when the spirit of this fugitive air, wild as the cry of an untamed bird, seems metamorphosed into incarnate rhythmic fury, catching in its clutches all who ever may have sung it, and whirling them in a demoniac spirit of the dance over precipice and abyss, peopled only by the echoes of its melody. In such superbly eloquent and realistic manner Mr. Rabaud, Mr. Cortot and the orchestra played it.

Henry Hadley's symphonic fantasia, composed in 1907, played in London and America, began the concert. It praises the composer in sustained vitality, musical significance and effective contrast of ideas over and beyond some of the music, which since has come from his pen.

Bach's suite in D major was played with the discrimination in its various movements, the beautiful air, the stately dances, which Mr. Rabaud has shown in all schools, classic or modern.

Mr. ALFRED DENIS CORTOT was born of French parents at Nyon, Switzerland, on September 26, 1877. Going at an early age with his family to Paris, he received his first pianoforte lessons from his sisters. He entered the Paris Conservatory, where he was in turn the pupil of Decombes * and Diémer. As a pupil of the latter he was awarded the first prize for pianoforte-playing in 1896. Taking part in the Lamoureux and Colonne concerts, he soon became known throughout Europe. He has played in England, Italy, The Netherlands, Russia, Spain, Switzerland. Having been a répétiteur at Bayreuth he staged in Paris "Götterdämmerung." In 1904 he founded the concert society that bears his name, and with it he has given performances of important choral works by Beethoven, Brahms, Liszt, etc., also a concert performance of "Parsifal." In 1904 he was chosen conductor of the Société Nationale; in 1907 he took charge of an advanced pianoforte class at the Paris Conservatory. Chief of the Service d'Études Artistiques du Ministère de l'Instruction Publique et des Beaux-Arts, he was named a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor in 1914.

Coming to the United States with the Société des Concerts du Conservatoire, André Messager conductor, in the fall of 1918, he played in Boston at a concert of that orchestra on October 30, 1918 (Saint-Saëns's Concerto in C minor, No. 4).

* Émile Decombes, born at Nîmes in 1829, was awarded the first prize for pianoforte-playing at the Paris Conservatory in 1846. It is said that he was one of the last pupils of Chopin. From 1875 to 1899, Decombes was an instructor of preparatory classes in pianoforte-playing at the Conservatory. He wrote a "Méthode," exercises and transcriptions for the pianoforte.

Steinway Pianoforte used

three divisions of the fantasia. He will be in the fashion and in accord with the conventional labels, if he so listens to the music. Yet often he will lose his way, unless he happens to be uncommonly acute in such listening, while at the end he will be as one who may not see the glories of the wood because he is so closely scrutinizing the trees.

No more than the rest of d'Indy's music do these variations justify such reduction to formal abstraction. Rather, each transformation of the song is prompted by clear mood, enriched with warm and various imagination. The like-minded listener may hear music in which the air is amplified, transfigured, glorified, gladdened. He may hear music again in which it becomes the voice of longing, calling afar and mysteriously as through mists. Or, yet again, it beats in the rhythms to which d'Indy sets it, shines in the colors in which he clothes it as though it sounded against bright expanse of mountain sky, as though it were borne upon mountain wind keen, fleet and strong. Or once more, the composer takes it as he might some cherished object and weaves harmonic and instrumental fancies upon it. More and more as the fantasia proceeds, the air seems to possess d'Indy, mind and heart, body and soul, until he must set himself free by some such demonic exorcism as that of the finale. Into reiterated, obstinate, blazing dance, tarantilla-like, he transforms this many-voiced song. The music spins in it; the music shouts it; the music flares with it. Nor is there end until the song, thus whipped and maddened, rushes away down the world.

When the song is one of mystery, of longing, d'Indy writes a music of beauty; when it clangs or whirls out of other measures in other moods, he writes a music of power. Everywhere also he writes in these variations a fecund and ingenious music, weaving itself from itself manifold though it be, the warmth of his heart, quickening as it were his inventiveness of mind, his skill of hand. To crown this fecundity, this skill, he sets within the fantasia a piano part, seemingly designed to play in light and shade upon the song and then to be the lash that, darting in and out of the music, whips the air into the whirl of the end. Through the first and the second division of the fantasia, Mr. Cortot played this part with an unerring sense of the color it was to thread into the music, with as flawless touch in the gaining of it. In the third division he and the song at his hands became energizing force to the performance, even as did his playing in Franck's Symphonic Variations. So in Mr. Cortot finesse and power, poise and ardor are in complement upon the music. Hardly less, however, had conductor and orchestra answered to d'Indy through the whole fantasia. As with the fifth symphony of Beethoven a week ago, Mr. Rabaud no longer heard with impersonal ear, saw no longer with the purely objective eye.

In all this, perhaps, there was passing enlightenment to those who take their cue from the scorers in good Parisian fashion of what passes there as "official French music." D'Indy himself has spoken and written despitely of it as the means to advancement in a withered and self-centred hierarchy; Debussy shot upon it many a shaft of wit; Ravel has not been sparing of scornful word; nearly every "light" of the younger Parisian generation mocks at it. Our younger generation on this side of the sea warms to music that these composers write, accepts their point of view of cognate matters. Yet here is Mr. Cortot, who is of the official hierarchy, giving clear proof of signal and individual qualities, while, as the Symphonic Concerts of late have disclosed, not always does Mr. Rabaud conduct, as Ravel once put it, "with respect." And yet, and yet, there was cause for wonder why he should have included in his programme of yesterday, Mr. Hadley's Symphonic Fantasia, no more than a fluent, well-made, well-sounding piece according to the conventions of a post-Wagnerian day, and why he should have led through Bach's Suite in D major with so rigid a pace and rhythm, with so little shading and modulating of the interwoven voices. Mr. Hadley's fantasia is as routine music-making in kind as ever fell from any Parisian academic "hierarchy," while Bach played "with respect" is a Bach left lifeless and uncharacterized. H. T. P.

FRENCH MUSIC Globe Jan. 25/19 SUPERBLY PLAYED

Mr. Rabaud, conductor; Mr. Cortot, pianist, both of imagination and sensibility, the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its present state of virtuosity, unsurpassed, if equaled, lifted yesterday afternoon's concert above those of its series, although no one of them has passed without its own distinction.

Alfred Cortot had played earlier this season with the orchestra of the Paris Conservatory, conducted by M. Messager. He had revealed a marked talent but gave no such embodiment of his art as now. Frank's Symphonic Variations for piano and orchestra are not the type of show piece for the casual virtuoso. While there are high demands for pianistic skill, the chief essentials are the perception, understanding and spiritual powers of re-creation by the artist, his sense of the piano as an exalted instrument of the orchestra, the ensemble a mouthpiece for the ecstatic mysticism, the humanity, the childlike joy in the very breath of life which mark these noble pages.

There are rare moments when it seems the privilege of musicians to have brought into the very concert room the presence of the composer whom they invoke. Pianist and conductor, both Frenchmen, both well endowed by nature to perceive as to translate this score, touched it yesterday with reverent hands. Their labor was as one of love, celebrating also the glory of their elder colleague. In an age when aspiration daily jogs elbows with materialism, he cannot and will not often find such exponents in pianist, conductor or orchestra.

Mr. Cortot was given such an ovation as few soloists receive from this audience. The manner of this young artist, far from that of the virtuoso, is rather of the man who would more happily honor the composer and his colleagues than himself.

D'Indy's Symphonic Fantasia for Orchestra and Pianoforte on a French Mountain Song was a fitting sequel. The plaintive air, given out by the English horn—marking the newly arriving Mr. Speyer, an artist on his instrument—is one of the souvenirs taken by d'Indy from his Cevennes. Here is a folk melody, strange and haunting, as though escaping in purer mountain heights the baser alloy of earth, its people and their songs.

This is not music to be chosen by all. There is too much out of beaten paths. There are verbose, abstract passages to casual, perhaps even to studied hearing, but where are such pages as those of the last movement, when the spirit of this fugitive air, wild as the cry of an untamed bird, seems metamorphosed into incarnate rhythmic fury, catching in its clutches all who ever may have sung it, and whirling them in a demonic spirit of the dance over precipice and abyss, peopled only by the echoes of its melody. In such superbly eloquent and realistic manner Mr. Rabaud, Mr. Cortot and the orchestra played it.

Henry Hadley's symphonic fantasia, composed in 1907, played in London and America, began the concert. It praises the composer in sustained vitality, musical significance and effective contrast of ideas over and beyond some of the music, which since has come from his pen.

Bach's suite in D major was played with the discrimination in its various movements, the beautiful air, the stately dances, which Mr. Rabaud has shown in all schools, classic or modern.

MR. ALFRED DENIS CORTOT was born of French parents at Nyon, Switzerland, on September 26, 1877. Going at an early age with his family to Paris, he received his first pianoforte lessons from his sisters. He entered the Paris Conservatory, where he was in turn the pupil of Decombes* and Diémer. As a pupil of the latter he was awarded the first prize for pianoforte-playing in 1896. Taking part in the Lamoureux and Colonne concerts, he soon became known throughout Europe. He has played in England, Italy, The Netherlands, Russia, Spain, Switzerland. Having been a répétiteur at Bayreuth he staged in Paris "Götterdämmerung." In 1904 he founded the concert society that bears his name, and with it he has given performances of important choral works by Beethoven, Brahms, Liszt, etc., also a concert performance of "Parsifal." In 1904 he was chosen conductor of the Société Nationale; in 1907 he took charge of an advanced pianoforte class at the Paris Conservatory. Chief of the Service d'Études Artistiques du Ministère de l'Instruction Publique et des Beaux-Arts, he was named a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor in 1914.

Coming to the United States with the Société des Concerts du Conservatoire, André Messager conductor, in the fall of 1918, he played in Boston at a concert of that orchestra on October 30, 1918 (Saint-Saëns's Concerto in C minor, No. 4).

*Émile Decombes, born at Nîmes in 1829, was awarded the first prize for pianoforte-playing at the Paris Conservatory in 1846. It is said that he was one of the last pupils of Chopin. From 1875 to 1899, Decombes was an instructor of preparatory classes in pianoforte-playing at the Conservatory. He wrote a "Méthode," exercises and transcriptions for the pianoforte.

Steinway Pianoforte used

Mr. Cortot in English Ears

No pianist of the winter left more vivid memory behind him in Boston than Mr. Cortot. No sooner had he returned to France from his concerts in America than he departed upon a visit to various cities of England. Among them was Manchester and there with the Hallé Orchestra he played Beethoven's "Emperor Concerto" to be heard here, ten days hence, from Mr. Bauer. The reviewer for The Guardian writes interestingly of Mr. Cortot and of the piece, saying: "The so-called 'Emperor' concerto of Beethoven—we do not know what it may be called now—was, for a French pianist, a choice both daring and wise in its challenge to intellectual sympathies, and Mr. Cortot's interpretation, we are sure, commanded the same universal sanction and admiration as the music itself. There was a little tendency in Mr. Landon Ronald's conduct of the orchestra towards the comfortable symphonic style, and we fancy Mr. Cortot's reading would have been enhanced by an orchestral accompaniment of more lightness, precision and brilliance."

"Mr. Cortot's own playing and interpretation were strongest of all in his imaginative approach to the pianissimo. That is the most marvellous strength which compels while it yields and draws us on as it recedes. It is the strength of Beethoven, too, for this composer transformed the expressive to the imaginative style, more by his unexpected withdrawals of tone than by any other means. Mr. Cortot charms most of all by the minute steps which to the listener are made consciously deliberate as the maze of star-like notes is withdrawn. We feel our ears enriched by the very vanishing of the notes. The great passage of octaves was unfortunate at first in a clear divergence of treatment between the orchestra and the solo instrument, but exercised its old fascination by the soloist's wizardry well before the close of its long diminuendo. One is often tempted to transcribe for the benefit of the orchestral player the doggerel of Wordsworth, and say:

A dash above the music's rim
A pert staccato is to him,
And it is nothing more.

"One famous passage of detached chords in the opening symphony suffered terribly from this unimaginative handling, from which, one would think, the composer's subsequent treatment of the passage would have roused the most unservant player. Is there anything in the whole range of pianoforte music that equals the imaginative power of these chords when they appear in the solo part? Mr. Cortot was not found lacking here, nor in the spirituality of the figuration as the melody of the slow movement is heard for the last time. There was another fascinating piece of execution in the working out of the last movement, and in the equable Spinato movement and the glittering Polonaise of Chopin (which he later played) the magic of Mr. Cortot's passage-work came again into play. The Gollywogg Dance of Debussy was a morsel of an encore—a joke that hardly more than flouted the listener's appetite."

Brilliant Future of Symphony

Post Jan. 25, 1919.
Problems of Those Who Assume Big Yearly Deficits——Surprise and Pleasure of Concerts Under French Conductor—The Reward of Study—A Pianistic Premier of Poland—Local Musical Activities

Elsewhere in the Post is a description of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of the present season. Not for many seasons has this celebrated organization been in so strong a position, musically, and as regards its right to public patronage, as today. New appointments have brought fresh blood into the orchestral body and added skilled instrumentalists to its ranks without impairing its distinctive tone-qualities or technical capacities. French conductors have replaced those of the German school with immediate and manifest advantage to the artistic character of the concerts. The Boston Symphony concerts were provincialized by conductors of a nation which has never ceased to hug its provincialism to its bosom. We are no longer dominated by German conceptions of music in Symphony Hall, and, war or no war, it was high time that this change had been made.

The public approval of the results of these arrangements has been immediate and unmistakable. There are other things, however, than artistic performances and public approval which intimately affect the existence and development of big artistic bodies. Money is as essential in music as in war. A great orchestra, even when managed as ably as the Boston Symphony, does not pile up packers' profits as the years roll by. Through 37 years, Major Higginson, generously, without protest or self-display, and with the one thought of the artistic future of the organization he founded, paid from his private funds the yearly deficits. He resigned all active connection with the Boston Symphony and financial support of that body at the close of the season of 1917-18. The trustees who undertook the responsibility of the task Major Higginson relinquished, with zeal and sincerity in the public interest, are now finding out what running a big orchestra means. It develops that the deficit for this season will be much larger than was calculated, and that this condition will doubtless continue through the years immediately following. The deficit is due partly to the tardiness of the trustees in securing the conductor for the present season, and the unfortunately amateurish manner in which the arrangements were announced, which had a strong effect on the public subscriptions; to various expenses of the orchestra itself; and to the increased cost of travelling, hall rent and other items of orchestral management which are always present. This large deficit has, however, been subscribed for this season and for seasons to come. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, thanks to such generous support, appears to be at the beginning of a new and brilliant epoch in its history.

The trustees and certain of the wealthier subscribers to the concerts have done their part. It is now the turn of the public. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is remade and at its best today, a conductor of singular and distinguished talent is giving a series of concerts of exceptional brilliancy. The programmes are excellently arranged. The list of soloists, as it turns out, offers many unusual attractions. Those who hesitated to subscribe to a season when they did not know what conductor they would hear, if they would hear any at all, are not to blame for their hesitation, especially in view of financial stresses of the time. But these may now feel more than reassured about the quality of the performances and should do everything in their power to pack Symphony Hall to its capacity for the balance of this season and the seasons to come. Major Higginson's gift to the city and the country will never be relinquished by those who inherit his task and his responsibilities, but the reward of their efforts and the reward of the man who founded the orchestra can only come through the deserved approval and co-operation of the community.

CONDUCTORS FOR THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Frank. Jan. 30
A Fact or Two Underlying Present Uncertainties — The Unwisdom of Change for the Sake of Change—The Advantages of a "Genius," If a "Genius" Can Be Found—The Orchestra, the Public and Mr. Rabaud—Miss Hempel to Be Heard in Boston — Mr. Gabrilowitsch Re-engaged in Detroit—Mr. Kneisel as Conductor—Items and Incidents

AS "pigs is pigs," so facts is facts, even in a matter of such stubborn and divergent opinion as the proper conductor for the Symphony Orchestra next year. One of those facts, moreover, standing high and clear, is the unwisdom of change for the sake of change. If the trustees of the band can secure a conductor of larger abilities, more impressive personality, more vivid reputation than Mr. Rabaud, then, by all means, the audiences at the Symphony Concerts here and elsewhere deserve to have him and for a term of years. If, on the other hand, none such is obtainable, there is sound reason for the continuance of Mr. Rabaud in his present post. Individual by individual, choir by choir, the quality of the orchestra is as high as it ever was, probably higher. By so much the trustees and the management have indeed wrought well. Being, however, a recently constituted band, it needs to be assimilated, unified, polished into a sure and sensitive instrument to the conductor's hand. The hundred men within it must come, likewise, to know and feel themselves in a common work. Not in weeks or in months are these desirable ends gained, but in season upon season of association, mutual understanding and ambition. Already the orchestra is more responsive to Mr. Rabaud because it is becoming familiar with him, while he better measures and adjusts its powers because he has become better acquainted with it. Were he to continue as conductor with as few changes in the band as there are likely to be for a season or two, the advantage on this score is plain; whereas a new conductor, say next autumn, must begin almost at the beginning. If he much excelled Mr. Rabaud, either in fact or in the faith of the public, the gain in prestige might offset the loss in continuity. Otherwise, change would be change for the sake of change and, in the present estate of the orchestra hardly advisable.

Similarly the public of the Symphony Concerts in Boston is becoming accustomed to Mr. Rabaud and so the more ready by habit to accept him without demur. True, the numbers of that public do not appreciably increase unless a Heifetz or a Rakhmaninov as "assisting artist" swells the audience; but in disposition, it clearly warms to the conductor when he and the orchestra acquit themselves notably well as in d'Indy's symphony "on a mountain air" of last week, as in Beethoven's fifth symphony of a fortnight ago. Always, moreover, whatever individual judgment of the conductor's abilities may be, it shows a kindly, a receptive mind toward him. Only the exceptional "genius," not easy to descry in the offing, is likely, for example, to better the relatively sparse audiences of Saturday evenings. Comparatively new habits of life as well as degree of musical curiosity and satisfaction have altered them, perhaps permanently. Indeed, the whole subscription to the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra both at home and abroad, was made last autumn under exceptional conditions that give little or no clue to the response of the public next year when war-time economies and preoccupations have receded into a dimmer distance, when the quality of the orchestra and the quality of the conductor—should Mr. Rabaud continue—are better and more widely understood. Such condition is difficult for trustees and guarantors who would discern the future, but there is no altering it or the risk of it. Perhaps, therefore, the keener the search for the "genius."

So, also, habit is making Mr. Rabaud's programmes seem the regular thing in the regular way—German classics and French pieces in nearly equal proportion, an occasional Russian, an occasional American number, a concerto of Grieg or of Chopin. If a pianist happens to impose it. So far, Mr. Rabaud has eschewed Italian music, shows no inclination toward Scandinavian or other composers of the North; while, whoever the conductor, hardly a piece by an English composer, except the cosmopolitan Delius, has been heard for many years at the Symphony Concerts. Some will say that Mr. Rabaud does not "overdo" the ultra-modern Parisians; others will regret that he does not oftener play their music. Some wonder that he chose, say, Mr. Hadley from American composers, when many another has quite as fair title to hearing. And so opinions go. As a matter of fact, it is too early to say what direction Mr. Rabaud's programmes would take in the long run. For the present they move in a Franco-German groove, comfortable to most in his audiences; while within that groove they tend to be "classical." An ardent modernist, like Mr. Montoux or Mr. Rhéné-Baton, would more please the youngsters—and distinctively overtax the elders. As for the "genius," sought in the offing, he could probably make his programmes what he chose and satisfy his hearers. For good or ill, he would count with them above both orchestra and music.

In a word, if an earnest, faithful, personable man of talent is to lead the Symphony Orchestra for another year or two, Mr. Rabaud, if he is disposed to remain in Boston, would probably yield as much satisfaction to the public, as well maintain the standard of the concerts, as well serve the treasury as any other; while change from him would largely be change for the sake of change and on the chance of betterment. On the other hand, if the trustees and the guarantors believe they can lay hand on a conductor of superlative ability, of outstanding personality, of acknowledged and widespread prestige, they might wisely act accordingly. The more eminent the conductor, the higher the reputation of their concerts, the larger the public, presumably, that will seek them. The discovery, however, of such a leader is not easy. He is not to be descried or even glimpsed in many a one whom friendly admiration or personal predilection has suggested for the post. The most diligent and catholic observers of concert-hall and opera house in Europe or in America may not easily lay finger on him. Still more do the resentments and the rebounds of wartime and the years immediately following, circumscribe the field of choice. It was the custom to say last spring, when all these matters were in earnest debate that three European conductors were "worthy" to lead the Boston Orchestra—Sir Henry Wood, Mr. Rakhmaninov, Mr. Toscanini. It is permissible to believe, after familiar experience with him in London, that Sir Henry, had he come hither, would have less pleased many elements in the public of the Symphony Concerts than has Mr. Rabaud. Mr. Rakhmaninov prefers to till other fields than that of conducting. There remains Mr. Toscanini—in many a sense "genius" if there ever was one, alike in ability and in infirmity. But who may say what his present mind may be (or how long it will hold) toward the conductorship of the Symphony Orchestra? It is useful, likewise, to remember that not a few contributing to its support, prefer also that it remain as clearly Francophile as it was once of German leanings.

SCHUMANN,

SYMPHONY I

- I. Sostenuto assai;
- II. Scherzo; Allegro
- III. Adagio espressivo
- IV. Allegro molto vivace

As the World Wags

By PHILIP HALE.

Henri Rabaud Jan. 29/19

The question has been raised: "Who will be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season?"

This question should be answered publicly as soon as possible by the trustees of the orchestra, if they wish the confidence and the financial support of those interested in music and those possessed with civic pride.

The answer is easy: that is, if Mr. Rabaud will accept a second term.

Mr. Rabaud has shown himself an accomplished musician. This was expected, for he was known here as a composer before he visited Boston. He is now recognized here, in other American cities, as in those of Europe, as an admirable conductor. His sensitive, refined, poetic nature has been revealed through his interpretation of orchestral compositions; furthermore, when the music made the demand, he has shown compelling virility—virility without the taint of coarseness—dash and amazing brilliance. Catholic in the selection of programs, he is the sympathetic interpreter of the various schools, ancient and modern. No conductor in the past years of this orchestra has equalled him in his reading of Beethoven and Bach; while the modern romanticists and the members of the ultra-modern French school have found in him an appreciative, imaginative soul. Respected, admired as conductor and man by the audiences, he is held in affectionate regard by the players, who gladly obey and second him.

To make a change would be folly; the change might be disastrous. Who is there to fill his place?

Surely no one wishes a conductor that has been under the suspicion of siding with Germany, of sneering at the United States, of snarling, biting the hand that had fed him and is still feeding him. No one wishes a conductor that would attempt the Germanization of orchestra, programs, public taste. Names of eminent foreign conductors have been mentioned, but their success as leaders of a hundred concerts would be a doubtful quantity, even if after long parleying, they should condescendingly accept. Delays are dangerous. Any one asked to subscribe wishes to know what he is to receive in return for the subscription.

Mr. Rabaud was not anxious to leave Paris. No Parisian leaves that city without a sigh. He came here as a representative of French musical art, also as a patriot grateful to this country, encouraged, if not urged, by his government; not as one lured by American dollars. France could not have sent a more worthy and ingratiating representative. Having received from her the highest honors she can award a musician, he is here, a celebrated composer, a conductor of the first rank, a man of pure artistic purposes, a gentleman in the old and most significant meaning of the word.

SYMPHONY MEN TO PLAY

Trans. — Feb. 5. '19.
Concert in Aid of Lafayette Fund to Be Given Tuesday at 255 Beacon Street

Twelve of the French members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, headed by M. Rabaud, leader of the Symphony band, have arranged a concert to take place next Tuesday evening in aid of the Lafayette Fund. The concert will be at the home of Mrs. Bryce Allan, 255 Beacon street, and the programme will be made up of chamber music by French composers. Tickets may be had at Herrick's.

The Boston committee of the Lafayette Fund, which sends kits to French soldiers, has received a letter from a member of the American Red Cross Commission in Paris, in which it is stated that despite the signing of the armistice the armies of occupation are still suffering, and until they are demobilized will require the same attention as heretofore.

Taxes on Tickets to the Symphony Concerts — Future Exemption but Present Payment—Mr. Bauer, Mme. Frijsh and Mr. Rakhmaninov in Prospect

Trans. — Jan. 23. 1919
INQUIRY at Washington elicits the fact that the proviso exempting tickets to symphony concerts from the tax on admissions to entertainments still stands in the pending Revenue Bill. Since the Conference Committee of Senate and House yesterday completed revision of these clauses, the proviso is likely to remain unaltered and to become law before the end of the present concert season. Under it, "organizations conducted for the sole purpose of maintaining symphony orchestras and receiving substantial support from voluntary contributions" escape the tax of ten per cent upon the prices of admission to these concerts. Virtually, "every organization maintaining a symphony orchestra" in the United States, from Boston to San Francisco, exists for no other purpose, while every one of them not only receives "substantial support from voluntary contributions," but is practically dependent upon them. Accordingly, from the day on which the pending bill takes effect as law, tickets to symphony concerts, bought either for a whole series or for a single occasion, will go untaxed.

That is to say when the subscribers to the Symphony Concerts here in Boston make their subscriptions next autumn to the series of 1919-1920, they will have no tax to pay. They may even escape taxation upon a few of the concerts in the coming spring, for which they have already subscribed, if the new law begins to function before those concerts befall. On the other hand, if available information from Washington is accurate, the pending bill is in no way retroactive and leaves no loophole for the refunding of the tax paid last autumn upon subscriptions to the Symphony Concerts of 1918-1919, except as a few concerts at the end of the season may be exempt. The law, as it has stood for a year and more, as it still stands, exacts a tax of ten per cent on admissions to symphony concerts as on entrance to other entertainments. Not until the pending bill supersedes it on a date yet to be fixed and dependent on the time of enactment, will exemptions begin.

M. HENRI RABAUD, ACADEMICIAN

Jan. 4. 1919.
Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

The election of M. Rabaud, now conductor of the Boston Symphony, to a seat in the Institute, is a high tribute to a musician of much learning. It may be also something more than that—a veiled compliment to the Bostonian public. So does a government lift up the special envoys whom it sends abroad, turning rear-admirals into admirals, and ministers into full-fledged ambassadors.

This does not mean that, had he not been made conductor of the great Boston orchestra, M. Rabaud would not have been chosen to be a member of the French Institute. It merely hints that what might have come fitly—later on—has happened sooner. Well—tant mieux pour M. Rabaud. There is no doubt that he has worked hard, and with honesty, to win the place which he now occupies, not with the "Immortals" (for that term belongs exclusively to the Forty of the Académie Française), but in the Académie des Beaux-Arts. In his favor he has a distinguished past as a composer of two operatic efforts, his "Fille de Roland" and "Marouf," besides many very interesting concert works, and as conductor for seven years or more at the Paris Opera House, or, to give it its absurd official name, the Académie Nationale de Musique. As a composer he is ingenious and erudite. Not possibly quite so original as some, but well worth studying. He had at least as good a right to be elected as M. Paladilhe or M. Dubois, who had preceded him. And if his name, by some strange chance, does not appear in Baltzell's "Dictionary of Musicians," the omission need not worry him.

It may be mentioned, just in passing, that the Académie des Beaux-Arts is one of the five academic bodies which make up the Institute. The others are the Académie Française (reserved, at least in theory, for writers); the Académie des Sciences; the Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres; and the Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, all sit beneath the roof of the domed building on the Seine, facing the Tuilleries, known as the Palais-Mazarin, in recognition of the part which that too crafty though most able statesman played, after Richelieu, in building up French art and letters. Besides musicians, the Académie des Beaux-Arts welcomes painters, sculptors, architects and engravers. At present it includes six composers, of unequal rank—M. Saint-Saëns, M. Dubois, M. Paladilhe, M. Fauré, M. Charpentier and now M. Rabaud.

Among Frenchmen, since the creation of "the" Académie by Richelieu, it has been the fashion to deride the Institute. But, notwithstanding all the jibes of Alphonse Daudet, Zola and the de Goncourts, it is the ambition of most writers, artists and scientific men in France to become Academicians. The sneers, which Voltaire spoke about and satirized, have been largely due to the regrettable narrowness which has at times led the Academicians to snub such celebrities as Molière, Pascal, Piron, Diderot and Balzac. The neglected have avenged themselves in many ways; some, like Piron, by epigrams, others by insults. The most scathing of all hits at the Académie was embodied in Piron's own epitaph:

"Ci-git Piron, que ne fût rien—Pas même académicien."
"Here lies Piron, who was naught—
Not even an academician."

The Immortals got even with that author by declining as one man to attend his funeral.

The de Goncourts, on the other hand, showed their dislike (or, as they no doubt would have preferred to say, contempt) for the Institute by founding an Académie of their own, and attaching their name to it. Daudet, Zola and their followers were members of this body. But, in the end, even Zola, despite all his truculence, became more than deferential to the Immortals.

Of the qualities most cherished by 11, 19198

the Institute in dealing with writers and artists in general, the first is style. And for that reason, to their shame, the Academicians preferred Mérimée to Balzac. It may be for his style, even more than for his unquestioned erudition, that the Académie des Beaux-Arts has elected M. Rabaud, rather than M. d'Indy, M. Ravel, or M. Florent Schmitt—to say nothing of M. Février, M. Pierné, M. Messager and M. Xavier Leroux. Tot homines, tot sententiæ.

In the United States not much is known as yet with regard to the value of M. Rabaud's more important concert works. It is by these, not by his operas, that he might best like to win reputation here. Why should he not give the Boston public opportunities, from time to time, of enjoying and discussing at least some of them? To most Americans he is the composer of one opera, "Marouf," which has been heard in various places, and more especially at the Metropolitan. If he were judged by that alone, he might not rank so high as some of his French rivals. M. Rabaud is too modest and sincere to think that "Marouf" is in the same class as the "Louise" of M. Charpentier, the "Samson et Dalila" or "Henri VIII" of M. Saint-Saëns, or even the less flawless, though delightful, "Monna Vanna" of M. Février. It has much charm and grace, much piquancy and scholarship to help it. But it lacks unity and it is not original. Bizet, Delibes and others, had they been up-to-date, might have written many passages and scenes in the first part of "Marouf." As for the last, it can be traced direct to Wagner to a very large extent, and more particularly to that composer's "Meistersinger." As to its style, it is romantic and fantastic. But the romantic feeling is not quite so poetic as it might have been, while the fantasy is—shall we say, theatric? New Yorkers are still wondering why the manager of the Metropolitan selected "Marouf" for production when he had works like "Le Jongleur de Notre Dame" and "Pelléas et Mélisande" and above all, "Louise," still waiting to be added to his repertory. Can he have known (such things are possible) that M. Rabaud was to succeed Dr. Muck in Boston? Or was he anxious (as some wicked persons say) to exclude the more nearly perfect art of France from the chief New York opera house?

To deny the merits of "Marouf" would be ungenerous. But to exaggerate them would be more than foolish. "Marouf" will have its fleeting day of favor. And after that—? The prophets may reply.

There are many who would rather have their "Kismet" as a play and their "Chu-Chin-Chow" as a mere extravaganza. There are others who prefer it in the pretentious form it takes as opera. De gustibus. However it may rank, "Marouf" does credit to the craftsmanship of the newly elected Academician. One of his smaller orchestral compositions, "La Procession Nocturne," a symphonic poem after Lenau's Faust poem, also does credit to a remarkable craftsmanship, for it combines successfully the two antithetical qualities of compactness and atmosphere. No one will grudge M. Rabaud his high good fortune. Whatever else he may or may not be, he is a musician of authority and taste.

199

the Institut and artists
And for th
the Acade
mée to Bal even more erudition,

Beaux-Arts
rather than
M. Florent
M. Février
and M. Xav
tot sentent

In the U known as y of M. Raba cert works
his operas, to win rep
he not give tunities, fr
ing and di them? To composer which has places, and Metropolita that alone, as some c Rabaud is think that class as th tier, the "S VIII" of M less flaw

"Monna Va much chari and schola lacks unit Bizet, Del been up-to many pass part of "A it can be a very lar ticularly t singer." A and fantas ing is not have been,
we say, th
still won the Metro for produc
like "Le and "Pellé all, "Louis to his repe
Rabaud w

NEW BOSTON SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR A MEMBER OF THE "INSTITUTE OF FRANCE"

Henri Rabaud.

Theodore Dubois.

Gustave Charpentier.

Gabriel Faure.

Herald Jan. 12, 1919
Some interesting new members have been placed among the "Immortals" in the venerable "Institute of France," fount of knowledge and authority: Gens. Joffre, Foch, Premier Clemenceau, and Henri Rabaud, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The discrepancy between the careers of Mr. Rabaud and the others is accounted for by the assortment of academies, submerged by the French Revolution and united in 1806 under a new head—the "Institut." The generals and the premier qualified for the Académie Française by their writings; Mr. Rabaud qualified for the Académie des Beaux Arts by his merits as a composer, being the only conductor to hold the honor. In this academy there are 40 chairs, representing the various arts, and among them six are held by composers, the august occupants keeping them for life and choosing their successors. They judge the Prix de Rome, appoint professors, and the like. The present six are Saint-Saëns, Dubois, Charpentier, Paladilhe, Gabriel Faure, and now Rabaud, who replaces Widor, who in turn has become Secrétaire Perpetuel. The musical correspondents are Glazounoff, Lacombe, Cui and Sgambati (until they died), Humperdinck and Bruch until (poor old souls) the war came and they were "dishonorably annulled." Taking his chair, Mr. Rabaud adds one to the following line of descent since the Revolution: Gossec, Auber, Masse, Delibes, Widor. The most distinguished of the other five chairs were Boieldieu, Gounod, Cherubini, Massenet, Gretry, Spontini, Thomas, Berlioz, Adam, David.

What Berlioz thought of the Academy is indicated in his Memoirs, when, as a pupil of Cherubini, he competed for a prize, solely for the much needed money it would bring, and the small gold medal which would admit him into theatres and concert halls.

Berlioz at least became the best of friends with the old doorkeeper, Pingard. When he learned that he had missed the first prize by two votes, and taken the second, he said:

"Come, Pingard, calm down a bit and tell me about today."

"Well, when M. Dupont had finished singing your cantata they began writing their verdicts, and I brought the urn. There was a musician close by whispering to the architect. 'Don't give him your vote, he's no good at all, and never will be. He is gone on that eccentric creature, Beethoven, and we shall never get him right again.' 'Really,' said the architect. 'Yet—well, ask Cherubini. You will take his word, won't you? He will tell you that Beethoven has turned the fellow's head.' 'I beg pardon,' said Pingard, 'but who is this M. Beethoven? He doesn't belong to the academy, and yet everyone seems to be talking of him.'

"No, no! He's a German—Go on."
"There isn't much more. When I passed the urn to the architect I saw that he gave his vote to No. 4 instead of to you. Suddenly, one of the musicians said, 'Gentlemen, I think you ought to know that, in the second part of the score we have just heard, there is an exceedingly clever and effective piece of orchestration to which the piano cannot do justice. This ought to be taken into consideration.' 'Don't tell us another cock-and-bull story like that,' cried another musician. 'Your pupil has broken the rules and written two quick arias instead of one, and he has put in an extra prayer. We cannot allow rules to be set at naught like this; it would be establishing a precedent.' 'Oh, this is too ridiculous! What says the secretary?' 'I think that we might pardon a certain amount of license, and that the jury should distinctly understand that passage that you say cannot be properly given by the piano.' 'No, no!' cried Cherubini, 'It's all nonsense. There is no such clever piece of work. It is a regular jumble, and would be abominable for the orchestra.' 'Then on all sides rose the architects, painters, sculptors, etc., saying 'Gentlemen, for pity's sake, agree somehow! We can only judge by what we hear, and if you will not agree—' And all began to talk at once, and it became distinctly a bore; so M. Regnault and two others marched out without voting. They counted the votes. You only got second prize."

Perhaps the old world thinks more of "Academicians" than we do. Their traditions are stronger, and they are more prone to recognize that there must be a stabilizing force to the kite as well as the tail which dashes it about and keeps it alive. Yet apprehension is felt lest Clemenceau rebels, when he is formally taken in, against the green uniform with golden oak leaves, the splendid scabbard, and the plumed hat—an outfit which costs the wearer far more than the yearly salary.

Since Richelieu and Louis XIV. fastened upon a small clique of litterateurs in 1635, and at once glorified and exasperated them by making them a public and imperial institution, the "Académie Française," which must of course adulate king and cardinal, there has always been a sentiment of discontent within, contempt mingled with jealousy without. The powers were at first restricted to "the embellishment, the ornamentation and the augmentation of the language," but the element of artistic discussion was always with it. "Wrote Voltaire: 'The 'Académie Française' is the secret love of all men of letters. She is a mistress at whom they hurl verses and epigrams until they have won her favor; they slight her only until they possess her.'

200

13-1

201

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1918--19.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

HENRI RABAUD, Conductor.

THIRTEENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, JANUARY 31, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 1, AT 8 P. M.

BRUNEAU,

ENTR'ACTE SYMPHONIQUE from "Messidor"

RACHMANINOFF,

CONCERTO No. 2, in C minor, for Pianoforte with Orchestra, op. 18

- I. Moderato
 - II. Adagio sostenuto
 - III. Allegro scherzando
-

BRAHMS,

SYMPHONY No. 2, in D major, op. 73

- I. Allegro non troppo
 - II. Adagio non troppo
 - III. Allegretto grazioso; quasi andantino
 - IV. Allegro con spirito
-

Soloist:

SERGEI RACHMANINOFF

Steinway Pianoforte used

There will be no Rehearsal and Concert next week

SYMPHONY HAS 13TH CONCERT

Herald — Feb. 1, 1919

Excellent Program Well Received by Many Lovers of Music

ORCHESTRA WILL LEAVE NEXT WEEK

By PHILIP HALE

The 13th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Rabaud, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Bruneau, Entr'acte Symphonique from "Messidor"; Rachmaninoff, Concerto No. 2 for piano; Brahms, Symphony No. 2, D major.

The opera "Messidor" was produced in Paris in 1897. Did Charpentier and Puccini ever study the score? During the first measures of the Entr'acte played yesterday we expected to see the mother bringing in the plates of onion soup, the father declaiming about parental rights and the wrongs of the working man; Louise, sulky, longing to be with her lover. Later we were reminded of "The Girl of the Golden West," the dashing and amorous Mr. Johnson; the sheriff with his elaborate chain and remarkable plug hat; the frenzied girl that cheated at cards. The moods in each instance, even tricks of instrumentation, were singularly alike. The ingenious Etienne Destranges is almost as fortunate in bagging typical themes as was that perfervid Wagnerite, Hans von Wolzogen. Destranges has identified 26 in "Messidor." No doubt he can tell them even in the dark. He finds five of them in the Entr'acte. When it is played in a concert hall, these themes are interesting only as musical sentences. The hearer, not knowing the plot of the opera, indifferent to it, listens to the music, nor does he label one theme "Toll," another "Water," a third "Spring." He likes the music, thinks it melodious and euphonious, with the pleasing thematic material not over-developed. He is stirred by the crescendo that leads to the imposing climax, and is gently let down to a normal state of nerves by the soothing final measures.

There will be no Rehears

Mr. Rachmaninoff played his second concerto with this orchestra when he visited Boston late in 1909. The concerto was played here a little over two years ago by Mr. Gabrilowitsch. No one but a Russian need apply. For although the concerto is not free from Germanisms, and the influence of Chopin is noticeable here and there, there are pages that are demonically Russian, certain themes that have Russian folk-song character. Perhaps the first movement is too carefully constructed. Surely in 1919 the Adagio and the Finale sound fresher and have a more decided physiognomy. There are touches of orchestration in the Finale that are delightfully exotic, verging on the fascinatingly barbaric. One welcomes these pages more than those that were purely scholastic. The concerto is an interesting work, especially when it is played by the composer with a freedom in phrasing and rhythm that tax the skill of the conductor and the orchestra. Mr. Rachmaninoff has played here with more technical brilliance, with a greater variety of tonal color, but there were moments yesterday when he carried all before him. He was enthusiastically applauded.

The name of Brahms appeared for the first time on the program this season. Mr. Rabaud chose the second symphony, the most lyrical of the four. The performance was conspicuous for its clearness, its fine balance, its vitality, yet even Mr. Rabaud could not make the second movement endurable, for the themes are commonplace and the development is complex and dry. We have never heard so beautiful a performance of the charming Scherzo as that of yesterday. This movement and the first repay one for the boredom induced by the second and the fourth. In this symphony, as in the other three, there are pages in which Brahms is seen as one treading water, sparring for wind, writing in orthodox fashion respectable and dull measures, filling an allotted space, until a fresh idea comes to him.

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concerts next week, for the orchestra will be away on its fourth trip.

The program for Feb. 14 and 15, is one of unusual interest: Franck, Orchestral Suite from the Symphonic poem "Psyche"; Mendelssohn, Concerto for violin (Mr. Fradkin, violinist); Chabrier, Prelude to Act II. of "Gwendoline"; G. Faure, Suite from the stage music to Haraucourt's "Shylock" (after Shakespeare), including two songs to be sung by Arthur Hackett, tenor; Berlioz, overture, "The Roman Carnival."

SYMPHONY HAS 13TH CONCERT

Herald — Feb. 1, 1919

Excellent Program Well Received by Many Lovers of Music

ORCHESTRA WILL LEAVE NEXT WEEK

By PHILIP HALE

The 13th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Rabaud, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Bruneau, Entr'acte Symphonique from "Messidor"; Rachmaninoff, Concerto No. 2 for piano; Brahms, Symphony No. 2, D major.

The opera "Messidor" was produced in Paris in 1897. Did Charpentier and Puccini ever study the score? During the first measures of the Entr'acte played yesterday we expected to see the mother bringing in the plates of onion soup, the father declaiming about parental rights and the wrongs of the working man; Louise, sulky, longing to be with her lover. Later we were reminded of "The Girl of the Golden West," the dashing and amorous Mr. Johnson; the sheriff with his elaborate chain and remarkable plug hat; the frenzied girl that cheated at cards. The moods in each instance, even tricks of instrumentation, were singularly alike. The ingenious Etienne Destranges is almost as fortunate in bagging typical themes as was that perfervid Wagnerite, Hans von Wolzogen. Destranges has identified 23 in "Messidor." No doubt he can tell them even in the dark. He finds five of them in the Entr'acte. When it is played in a concert hall, these themes are interesting only as musical sentences. The hearer, not knowing the plot of the opera, indifferent to it, listens to the music, nor does he label one theme "Toil," another "Water," a third "Spring." He likes the music, thinks it melodious and euphonious, with the pleasing thematic material not over-developed. He is stirred by the crescendo that leads to the imposing climax, and is gently let down to a normal state of nerves by the soothing final measures.

There will be no Rehears.

Mr. Rachmaninoff played his second concerto with this orchestra when he visited Boston late in 1909. The concerto was played here a little over two years ago by Mr. Gabrilowitsch. No one but a Russian need apply. For although the concerto is not free from Germanisms, and the influence of Chopin is noticeable here and there, there are pages that are demonically Russian, certain themes that have Russian folk-song character. Perhaps the first movement is too carefully constructed. Surely in 1919 the Adagio and the Finale sound fresher and have a more decided physiognomy. There are touches of orchestration in the Finale that are delightfully exotic, verging on the fascinatingly barbaric. One welcomes these pages more than those that were purely scholastic. The concerto is an interesting work, especially when it is played by the composer with a freedom in phrasing and rhythm that tax the skill of the conductor and the orchestra. Mr. Rachmaninoff has played here with more technical brilliance, with a greater variety of tonal color, but there were moments yesterday when he carried all before him. He was enthusiastically applauded.

The name of Brahms appeared for the first time on the program this season. Mr. Rabaud chose the second symphony, the most lyrical of the four. The performance was conspicuous for its clearness, its fine balance, its vitality, yet even Mr. Rabaud could not make the second movement endurable, for the themes are commonplace and the development is complex and dry. We have never heard so beautiful a performance of the charming Scherzo as that of yesterday. This movement and the first repay one for the boredom induced by the second and the fourth. In this symphony, as in the other three, there are pages in which Brahms is seen as one treading water, sparring for wind, writing in orthodox fashion respectable and dull measures, filling an allotted space, until a fresh idea comes to him.

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concerts next week, for the orchestra will be away on its fourth trip.

The program for Feb. 14 and 15, is one of unusual interest: Franck, Orchestral Suite from the Symphonic poem "Psyche"; Mendelssohn, Concerto for violin (Mr. Fradkin, violinist); Chabrier, Prelude to Act II. of "Gwendoline"; G. Faure, Suite from the stage music to Haraucourt's "Shylock" (after Shakespeare), including two songs to be sung by Arthur Hackett, tenor; Berlioz, overture, "The Roman Carnival."

MODERNITY AT THE SYMPHONY

Adv. + Am. — Feb. 2 / 19.
Rachmaninoff Plays His Own Concerto to Highly Enthusiastic Audience

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

Bruneau. Entr'acte from "Messidor."

Rachmaninoff. Piano concerto No. 2.

Soloist, Serge Rachmaninoff.

Brahms. Second Symphony.

This was the excellent list at the Symphony concert; modern, but not of the wrong, the strained kind of modernity, where the adventurers burn their harmony methods behind them. Bruneau's Entr'acte. Symphonique ("Symphonique" in French merely means orchestral) is a well-constructed work with much skilful figure treatment, which, however, is always clear and logical. Bruneau is far removed from that affectation which is the bane of many a composer of the present; one feels that his work (in literature as well as in music) is sincere and unforced; he never becomes ugly merely to be original. There are some noble climaxes well worked up, and the composition is brief and to the point, he does not go on after he has ceased to have anything to say.

It was not astonishing to find a Frenchman using guiding melodies in a symphonic composition, for Berlioz did this as strikingly as Wagner, even if not so voluminously. But Bruneau's work loses a little by a lack of familiarity with the opera to which it is attached.

THE GREAT ATTRACTION.

The great point of attraction at this concert was Rachmaninoff. He, too, is a sensible modern who has imbibed from Tschalkowsky an appreciation of melodic treatment and an avoidance of escetic harshness, and there are few men alive who could create such a beautiful Adagio as this concerto contains. Rachmaninoff is said to possess phenomenal hands and can stretch to unheard-of intervals, and there are some chords in this work which would tax the ordinary fingers. There is also the tendency, pardonable with composer-pianists, to keep the piano somewhat more in the foreground than is consistent with that symphonic-orchestral idea which the true concerto should follow.

The first movement began with a massive theme by orchestra (the piano had already entered alone in the introduction) which was followed by a finely contrasted subordinate theme upon piano. The development was not drawn altogether from these, but introduced some new subject matter which was intertwined with the chief theme. The presenting of the chief theme of the Adagio upon the orchestra with the piano as a counterpoise, and then giving it to the piano and allowing the orchestra to embroider it, is not a new idea but it is always effective, and here the themes were so beautiful that the effect was entrancing. The coda was full of expressive power and this movement was undoubtedly the gem of the work.

EXPRESSIVE MODERN WORK.

The Finale was in clear classical form. There was much arpeggio work upon the piano and the chief and intermediate themes were both given to the solo instrument. The development was drawn chiefly from the subordinate theme, which is unusual but was very effective, for it was nobly elaborated. Of course, being an advanced musician, the composer must needs add some contrapuntal sauce to his dish, and the fugal treatment of the chief theme between piano and orchestra must be recorded, but the development of the subordinate theme was more attractive. The themes came back at the end in the strict classical manner and it was good to hear a most expressive modern work which was yet built in the recognized forms.

How Rachmaninoff played this can scarcely be told unless we use gilded type and rose-colored ink. He is the most expressive, the most temperamental pianist that we have had since Paderewski deserted the pianostool for a throne. The audience became enthusiastic in the highest degree and recalled the composer-pianist over and over again.

BRAHMS ONCE MORE.

We were glad to hear a great Brahms work once more, but, in strict justice, if Wagner is excluded Brahms should also be, for he wrote a choral work celebrating Germany's victory over France in 1871. For ourselves we would welcome both composers for the sake of their genius. The second symphony is the most popular of modern classical works. Everyone, musician or not, comes under the spell of that glorious ending of the first movement, the pure melody of the adagio, the playful rhythmic changes of that rondo-scherzo, and the clear figure treatment of the first and last movements. It is a pregnant lesson that the classical-symphonic lemon is not squeezed dry yet, as some would have us believe.

The reading, however, did not have quite the spirit of simplicity and naivete which this work demands. The first movement was somewhat too rapid, and there was too much of the dramatic style in the interpretation for it to make its full effect. One could find a little fault also with some of the ensemble of the finale of the concerto, but it seems hypercritical to pick flaws where M. Rabaud is so generally excellent. He has brought the new orchestra (for its added elements have made it new) very near to the standard of the old one.

SIX HOURS A DAY IN MOVIES.

One could not help remembering, as one noted the great and deserved triumph of Rachmaninoff, that his great teacher, Siloti, is reported dead of privation in Russia, and spent the last months of his life in playing six hours a day in a movie show to obtain sustenance. The Bolshevik regime refused to allow him to leave the country. Last Sunday Josef Hofmann gave a piano recital in Symphony Hall, made up entirely of compositions by nine American composers. We wonder what Mr. Hofmann would think of a dinner made up entirely of nine soups, for, to carry out the gastronomic simile further, there was no roast beef on any part of the menu. We do not believe in thus nursing the American muse. Let good native works have their place on all of our programs and let concert-givers take some trouble to search them out, but do not neutralize their effect by bunching them all together in such a fashion as this. The audience was much smaller than is usual in these very popular Sunday afternoon concerts (they are generally crowded to the doors), and often the applause was scant.

We must add, however, that the composers chosen for performance ought to have been very happy in their interpreter and we should choose Clayton Johns' fugue, Edward Royce's "Joyance" and Mrs. Beach's "Fireflies" as worthy of especial mention, and also Horatio Parker's "Valse Gracie," the only work encored. Alexander McFadyen's sonata shows good promise in its first movement and runs quite true to form. If Daniel Gregory Mason's short pieces were played in the order printed upon the program we can only say that some of them seemed strange misnomers.

RUSSIAN DAY WITH SYMPHONY

Rachmaninoff Plays
His Own Second
Concerto

Post — Feb. 1, 1919
BY OLIN DOWNES

The lion, or let us rather say the Russian bear, of the Boston Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon was Sergei Rachmaninoff, the famous pianist and composer, who recently arrived on these shores fresh from stirring experiences in the territories of the late Czar.

He strode prehistorically—I say prehistorically, since his length of limb and the span of his shoulders reminds one irresistibly of skeletons of the stone age which they dig now and then from the rocks—this man emerged from a doorway which his head almost scraped, sat at the piano, over which he leaned like some huge anaconda about to devour its prey, and performed his own C minor concerto.

SOMBRE AND MELANCHOLY

The first movement of this concerto is true to form and Slavic tradition. It opens with a growl which grows to a roar, after which a gloomy and pulsant theme stalks out of the orchestra. And the whole movement, which is uncommonly well knit, is sombre, powerful, melancholy with that pervading Slavic melancholy that we know and love so well. The instrumentation, too, is dark and rather thick, all in the lower registers of strings, with now and then shrill or brilliant outcries of brass and wind.

There is some of Tchaikowsky, in sentiment if not in theme, in this music. It is moreover made, and very well made, for a pianist of broad conceptions and the powerful and expressive style of Mr. Rachmaninoff. Weaklings, or those incapable of the concentrated fury and the melting sentiment of this music, need not apply. Mr. Rachmaninoff loomed over the piano, and taking it and the orchestra, so to speak, in his teeth, overwhelmed the audience with the grip and virility of his performance.

Too Long Toward Close

It is unfortunate that the two last movements of the concerto are so inferior to the first. They are too long. One feels the composer saying something like this: "Let's see. My first movement is 34 pages. I must have at least 30 in the second movement and 35 or 38 in the last." There are good themes, such as the second theme of the last movement, first played, if memory serves, by the violas, and apotheosized at the end of the movement. There are pretty thoughts. There is also, in the slow movement, unblushing sentimentality of the most obvious kind, and the finale, barring the theme just mentioned, some instrumental effects and a passage of extended development of a fragment of a certain motive, is very scant in its material.

After four hearings of this concerto by the writer the first movement gains and the last two continue to lose substance or individuality. The wonder of it was that Mr. Rachmaninoff, who must doubtless know himself how unrepresentative this music is of the heights of his creative powers, should have believed in it again as he played and imposed irresistibly his belief on the audience. A big man must have so much heart that he will warm to what is sincere, whether it is sentimental or not, whether it is his own poor workmanship or another's. When Mr. Rachmaninoff wrote the concerto he was unquestionably sincere, as he was when he played it, and passages of the poorest twaddle were given renewed life and significance by him. A concerto which is one-third worth while was most convincingly and impressively played by a great creative musician.

Bruneau's entracte from "Messidor" opened the programme. It is richly colored and scored, and a simple theme is well handled. The music has little distinction, but it has this which German music, for instance, of an equal value and rank would not have, it has style, proportion and the good taste of a composer who knows what he wishes to say and when it is time to stop.

Mr. Rabaud was particularly fortunate in his interpretation of the slow movement of Brahms' 2d symphony.

The whole performance was sympathetic and brilliant, though we personally differ with Mr. Rabaud's treatment of certain details of the first and last movements. These differences concern matters of taste and individual conception, not of musical efficiency or the reverse. "A" feels a piece of music this way, "B" feels it a little differently. Provided both "A" and "B" are good musicians, the one conception is as legitimate and interesting as the other. Mr. Rabaud is never less than an admirable musician of the broadest appreciations and understanding. He gave an effective and highly artistic performance of a beautiful work.

RACHMANINOFF IN ^{Globe} Feb. 1. 1919 HIS OWN CONCERTO

Mr. Rachmaninoff played with the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon through the inability of the scheduled soloist to arrive from South America in time. The Russian pianist had played his second concerto in C minor when first heard in Boston with the orchestra, nine years ago last month. Mr. Gabrilowitsch has played it once since.

Yesterday Mr. Rabaud and the composer did much for it. There are superb passages which speak for themselves, passages which one other than a Russian hardly could have written, those which hardly could be considered indigenous to any other soil, for Mr. Rachmaninoff, as a composer, at times shows Germanic influences.

But the introduction to the first movement for piano alone, the expanding scheme of majestic chords with the descending bass dropping a plumb line into the cosmos, the sullen turbulence of the first theme following, as the piano supplements orchestra in a manner characteristic to itself, the poignant first theme of the second movement; the curious, rhythmic passage of detached chords with the suppressed but gorgeous color of brass and cymbals, a passage of smoldering, yet barbaric splendor; the sweeping dynamic energy liberated in the rhythmic introduction to the last movement, an idea which the hearer wishes were developed to greater length. These have unmistakably a Slavic character. Their rugged virility was sharply set off from the suave and urbane sonorities, for example, of the prelude to the fourth act of Bruneau's opera "Messidor," which preceded it, music in the ingratiating vein of Massenet, but with less character—music in which it apparently would be difficult to find more than sketches of the operatic personages.

Each of the three parts of Mr. Rachmaninoff's concerto begins with material which is commanding, distinctive. The impression is that other and greater thoughts are to follow. Is it because the composer grows fascinated by this, then that, derivative of his fundamental idea, or because he does not always sense the extent or vim of appropriate development, that the work as a whole is episodic, that it asks the listener to understand in abbreviation thoughts which the author has dreamed in an expanded form?

The overwhelming force of Mr. Rachmaninoff's individuality, as creator and recreator of his own music, made measures significant and moving which might have passed by for less under the hand of another.

The burning brilliance of the final pages was of something more than the piano or virtuoso piano playing. A super-interpreter, Rachmaninoff thinks in long lines which are first built upon architectural principles of proportion. That is why the great mass of people, many of whom look upon the piano dispassionately, even with aversion, will yet hear him with an ear which grows fresh rather than jaded.

Mr. Rabaud, of a race known always, now above all, for its gallantry, will not be assailed for bias or national partisanship. If there were reason for the exclusion temporarily of Brahms, the armistice has been signed nearly these three months. It is idle to inquire if Brahms had been alive whether his name would have appeared upon an infamous document with those of Strauss, Humperdinck, Max Bruch, Nikisch and Weingartner. His four symphonies live and for some are the choicest wine of the orchestral vintage.

Not all may agree again with Mr. Weingartner when he subordinates the first, a noble score, to this second in D, with its slow movement more gray than a cloudy Winter's morning.

Mr. Rabaud dissected the score with fine accuracy and taste. He did more. He found new dramatic possibilities in the first movement, and led the last to a brilliant conclusion, which brought an outburst of applause. The orchestra played gloriously. Its part in the concerto made it and conductor artists sharing alike with the soloist, for Mr. Rachmaninoff, a conductor who happens to prefer to play the piano, has committed beauty in equal shares to the orchestra as to his instrument. It was understood yesterday, as in bits to be recalled from Mr. Laurent's flute, Mr. Jaenicke's horn, Mr. Longy and the whole choir of first violins. The concert will be repeated tonight.

Boston Notes Feb. 1. 1919

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The thirteenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given on the afternoon of Friday, Jan. 31, was one of great significance in the musical affairs of this city, for it introduced Mr. Rabaud as an interpreter of Brahms. Now many conductors essay Brahms, some regarding him metro-nomically, some sentimentally, some enveloping him in a chill atmosphere of austerity, some striving for a luxuriance of exotic warmth. A few there be who recognize Brahms for the poet he was, and, appreciative themselves of noble sentiments and aspirations, grasp the grandeur of Brahms' poetry and sense the compelling beauty in which he expressed it. Such are the real conductors of Brahms, and among them is Mr. Rabaud. The importance to Boston in the discovery of Mr. Rabaud as a capable conductor of Brahms lies in the fact that it removes at once any lingering doubt as to whether or not he should be intrusted with the destinies of the orchestra after the year for which he was engaged is ended.

Accepted at first with a somewhat ungracious feeling of reserve by his public, unaccustomed possibly to real modesty in a leader of its orchestra, Mr. Rabaud has steadily grown in favor as respect for his musical attainments has succeeded doubt, and as the kindly self-effacing courtesy of the man has become recognized. Now, after the reading of the fifth Beethoven symphony of two weeks ago and the second Brahms symphony of yesterday, there can be no question of his ability to draw from the men under him the effects he seeks. This being so why should not an invitation be extended him to continue as Boston's conductor? Whether he would accept, is, of course, another matter. For him this is a year of exile; his none too pleasant reception in Boston and the apathy of his public toward him doubtless do not incline him to a markedly favorable opinion of the field of his labors. If, however, he should be willing and the announcement could be definitely made that he would remain for a term of years, there can be no doubt that with a feeling of permanence would come the fondness for the man that his abilities warrant. It is to be hoped that the trustees of the orchestra will give an inkling of their intentions soon.

The Brahms symphony was not the only achievement of Mr. Rabaud in this concert. The accompaniment he furnished Mr. Rachmaninoff, who played the piano part in his own second concerto in C minor, Op. 18, was an indication of a high order of leadership. The sudden and puzzling changes of tempo in the third movement were executed with exactness no matter how rapid the pace. Attention of the audience, of course, centered on Mr. Rachmaninoff, and both man and music justified the eager interest. The pianist subordinated himself, becoming one of the orchestra and keeping a watchful eye always on Mr. Rabaud's bâton. His amazing technical facility found opportunity for display, not for its own sake, but in the proper setting forth of arabesque and ornament. The orchestration was of particular interest because of the unusual, though not bizarre, effects obtained. The program also included the "Entr'acte Symphonique" from Bruneau's "Messidor."

208

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Braneau. — Feb. 1, 1919

BRAHMS AS A FRENCH CONDUCTOR

READS HIM

FOR the first time, yesterday afternoon, a Bostonian audience heard a symphony of Brahms led by a Parisian conductor while for the first time since antagonisms of warfare and discriminations between nationalities became a measure of orchestral programmes, music by Brahms was played in the Symphony Concerts. Since Brahms has been dead little more than twenty years, since he had many a German idiosyncrasy and point of view, he might easily have fallen into the numerous company of the "banned"; probably his established reputation as a "classic," his traditional place as continuator, after Beethoven, of the symphonic line, saved him. In any case, no one stalked from the hall, aggrieved and indignant when his symphony in D major was at hand; a cursory view of the audience, while the music was played, revealed it listening much as usual; yet, at the end, and after a performance both scrupulous and ingratiating, the applause seemed perceptibly less than it would have been in a near or a distant past. Possibly, the Brahmsian cult once flourishing hereabouts, declines with the years; possibly, for the time, not a few hear Brahms antipathetically and yesterday, perhaps, discovered that instinct or impulse—again for a first time. Yet, curiosity over Brahms à la Française in lieu of Brahms à l'Allemande may measurably have sustained the unalloyed devotees of symphonic music.

The truth, however, may be that in these days many of us are over-much occupied with nationalities, too prone to dandle on the laps of mind and tongue huge, vague entities like France, England, America, Germany. "You No Longer Count," as some one entitled his novel, is a pretty and fashionable blazonry of war time. Yet somehow—perhaps by the mere insistence of perverse and stubborn human nature—the individual goes on counting, especially in that perpetual fountain of individuality the arts. It is easy to label the Brahms of Friday afternoon, Brahms à la Française, but in fact it was Brahms à la Rabaud, promising to be and actually proving a truthful, illusory, pleasure-giving Brahms. In the first place, Mr. Rabaud is a loyal and conscientious workman, slighting no music that falls to his hand. In the second place, he is a thoroughly objective conductor, seeking to apprehend each piece in characteristic voice and quality and so open it to the ears of his hearers. In the third place, by instinct, habit of mind and environment, Mr. Rabaud warms mentally and temperamentally—as his Beethoven has more than once suggested—to the symphony of classical form, substance, manner. Finally, Brahms set no pitfalls for him as Schubert did with his intrinsic sentiment or sentimentality, or Schumann with his vague romantic moods, sensations, visioning. Brahms invites in performance clarity, sobriety, probity, a golden mean—virtues inherent in Mr. Rabaud. Outcome fulfilled anticipation—the more since the orchestra was on mettle with the music. The hard-shelled champions of Brahms à l'Allemande will probably remark, with a touch of superiority, that they have heard this symphony in D major played with larger sonorities of tone, with sharper rhythms, ampler stride and richer harmonic and instrumental vesture—in a word on a wider spread canvas, in more emphatic design, in more energetic progress. Yet if they open the authorities out of which they like to take and buttress their opinions, they will discover them characterizing this music as a relatively light, lyric, serene and transparent symphony. If they scrutinize the engraved page, they will find—outside the slow movement—confirming testimony from Brahms himself. With reason Mr. Rabaud chose so to hear the music by the clear evidence it yielded to his lucid mind. Accordingly, in first movement, scherzo and finale, his pace was relatively brisk and elastic; his touch light upon phrase, modulation, progression; his rhythms running rather than emphatic; his coloring bright and warm rather than thick and deep; his mood serene and songful. There is just warrant in the symphony for such view and voice, as there is warrant for others according to a conductor's reaction and idiosyncrasy, since music and the playing of music can be no literal, even no traditional thing. So conceiving and so achieving, Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra played the scherzo with exceeding grace of line, brightness of rhythm, lightness of movement, gentle flash of contrast and color, touching the interrupting prestos with gleam of tone and fancy. May not Brahms charm, if the conductor so beguiles him?

13-5

In turn, Mr. Rabaud was wary of too dusky a coloring, too billowy a motion for the first movement. He was content with it mellow, serene, unusually transparent, falling away into twilight close—a performance full of nice discriminations. The finale came lightly, clearly, unforcedly from his hands; for in this symphony he is not of those who, no matter how plainly the music denies them, will have Brahms turbid and tumultuous, or as they call it "dramatic." Again the conductor was all for mellowness, brightness, lightness. Through the dim recesses of the slow movement, Mr. Rabaud wandered dutifully like many a conductor before him, catching eagerly at any sign or stimulation, but not trying to hide by fuss and feathers the imaginative sterility of a labored music. Only a "genius" and he out of himself, may warm these neutral surfaces into glow. For the rest a Brahms light, lyric, lucid and fanciful was fresh and agreeable sensation. Taking the symphony so unaffectedly, without theory, tradition or parti pris, Mr. Rabaud persuaded his audience to hear with him.

The other purely orchestral number was of the music of the theatre that usually seems unsuited to a symphony concert, even when it is of more distinguished matter and method than this Introduction to the Fourth Act of Bruneau's opera, "Messidor." In the opera house, the hearer is presumably engrossed in the progress of the music-drama, illuded by personages, action, the emotions borne or germinated by the music. He hears this symphonic prelude against the illuminating background of three acts past, in animating anticipation of a final act to come. In the concert-hall, however, especially when such a piece begins the afternoon, as did this fragment of "Messidor," he comes coldly, detachedly to the music; the programme-book is often his only background and yesterday it was wrestling with one of those obscure, ill-shapen texts by Zola in which Bruneau, but none other, rejoices. So hampered, the hearer must be very imaginative if such prelude can work the desired illusion upon him. Try as he may, he can hear it as only a paragraph or two of "absolute" music—yesterday ascending in long and thickening curve, descending into silence, warmly colored, firmly knit, saying little to the imagination, nowhere touched with beauty or power of idea, sending the sophisticated ear back to Wagner or forward to Charpentier. From end to end, this fragment of "Messidor" was prose of the concert-hall, if not of the theatre—one more of the commonplaces, French, German, Italian, American, what you will, that by mistake, necessity or utility slip into orchestral repertoires. Mr. Gericke originally brought it to Symphony Hall, and he, unlike Mr. Rabaud, was under no obligation to be catholic with fellow Parisian composers.

209

Between Bruneau and Brahms, Mr. Rakhmaninov played the piano part in his concerto in C minor, with Mr. Rabaud keeping the orchestra more elastic to music and "soloist" than has sometimes been his way with such pieces. As usual, the towering bulk, the grave and weighty presence, the quiet concentration of the Russian impressed his audience. As usual, he played with the propulsive power that sends the music in driving flood upon his hearers, that more than once in the progress of the concerto seemed to bear the whole orchestra upon its tide. There were chords in which Mr. Rakhmaninov seemed to match the piano against the band and by weight and splendor of tone bear off the victory. There were rhythms that he winged and intensified until they seemed to cut the air. He animated long progressions; he marshalled sweeping climaxes. He wrote occasional periods in great traceries upon the ear. He etched out the intricacies of the first movement in a precision that was almost austere. So using his abilities, doubtless with meditated and predetermined purpose, he was sparing of his usual play of color and of those incidental, individual, and most adroit shadings with which in recital he has glamored his own and other music. Yesterday he seemed bent not upon finesse, but upon power. He gained it; he communicated it to orchestra and conductor; his audience felt it and rejoiced.

Since Mr. Rakhmaninov was composer as well as pianist, for such performance he designed his concerto, imagining and writing it as music of sombre, brooding or darting power. With power the frenetic motive in the finale leaps out of the tonal mass, flares through it, whips it forward, like a Russian peasant, half-frenzied, springing from the crowd, beginning to exorcise it. The whole movement is Russian in rhythmic furles, in jagged contrasts, in excitements flaming or sombre. Russian again in it is the domination of the piano (when a Rakhmaninov plays it) from first measure to last. Yesterday he and it whipped the orchestra about and about this finale as a boy whirling the lash in fierce whim upon fierce caprice, might whip a top. Alternately, the fine frenzy, the bold bare sweep of this music carry all before it. Akin, though in tempered voice and mood, is the first movement, in spite of technical intricacy and somewhat mechanical figuration that here and there stood yesterday somewhat naked. The orchestral background is insistently dark and restless. The piano launches a motive at it, drives it for a moment, falls back into the brooding that declines once and again into the passage-work aforesaid. Gathering courage, it flings itself again upon the orchestra, prevails over it, loses its force of will, recedes, less discomfited than irresolute, into Slavic depression. Whatever the intrinsic quality of the motives, there is sombre im-imaginative power in the tonal adventures into which Mr. Rakhmaninov flings them. Even in the slow movement, the music is not warmly lyrical. Still grave and brooding, it lingers in a middle grayness— austere, restless, moody, seeking outlet in power rather than beauty. Little in the concerto is superficially, obviously, nationalistically Russian. Ardent partisans of "music of Muscovite soil" have called it German. Yet with Mr. Rakhmaninov to play it every implication of the music seemed Russian to the core. And usually concertos imply nothing but themselves.

210

H. T. P.

13-6

Curves and the Concert-Master

GUYAS
WILKINS

Fredric Fradkin

First Violinist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

212

14-1

213

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1918-19.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

HENRI RABAUD, Conductor.

FOURTEENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 14, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 15, AT 8 P. M.

FRANCK,

ORCHESTRAL SUITE from the Symphonic Poem,
"Psyche"

I. Sommeil de Psyché: Lento (First time in Boston)
II. Psyché enlevée par les Zéphirs; Allegro vivo.
(First time in Boston)

III. Les Jardins d'Eros: Poco animato.
IV. Psyché et Eros. Allegretto modéré

MENDELSSOHN,

CONCERTO in E minor for Violin, op. 64.

I. Allegro molto appassionato.

II. Andante.

III. Allegretto non troppo; Allegro molto vivace.

CHABRIER,

PRELUDE to Act II. of the Opera "Gwendoline."

FAURÉ,

SUITE from the Stage Music to Haraucourt's Comedy, "Shylock."

I. Chanson: Allegro moderato.

II. Entr'acte: Andante moderato; Allegretto.

III. Madrigal; Allegretto.

IV. Epithalme; Adagio.

V. Nocturne, Andante molto moderato

VI. Final: Allegretto vivo.

(First time in Boston)

(Tenor Solo, ARTHUR HACKETT)

BERLIOZ,

OVERTURE, "Le Carnaval Romain," op. 9.

Soloist:

FREDRIC FRADKIN

(Photograph by Apeda of New York)

Fredric Fradkin

Of Russian Blood, American Birth, Parisian Training, Viennese Experience, and Proved Worth in the First Orchestra of the Russian Ballet in America

FRODKIN'S ART IS IN TECHNIQUE

Adv. & Ann. — Feb. 16, 1919
Symphony's New Concert Master the Soloist at the Concert

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

Symphony Program.

Franck, Psyche Suite.

Mendelssohn, Violin Concerto.

Soloist, Mr. Fredric Fradkin.

Chabrier, Prelude to Act II, "Gwendoline."

Faure, Suite from "Shylock."

Tenor soloist, Mr. Arthur Hackett.

Berlioz, Overture, "Carnaval Romaine."

The above program seemed tepid and at times even dull, although it was well played. The suite made from the symphonic poem for orchestra and chorus, entitled "Eros and Psyche," is not one of Franck's great works. He was about as fitted to describe this passionate love theme in music as to guide a balloon. Therefore he "idealizes and symbolizes" it, according to the French commentators. Fancy Wagner symbolizing and philosophizing in the prelude, or the love-death, in "Tristan and Isolde!" The first two movements were frankly dull, but in the last movement one found something of the great master and he made amends for preceding weakness.

Love à la Chabrier was much more intense and powerful and the prelude pictured something of the Viking's passion as well as the tender heroine who died with and for him.

MR. FRADKIN AS A SOLOIST.

Mr. Fradkin, although sterling in his quality of work cannot be ranked with his great predecessors, Kneisel or Wittek, nor is the Mendelssohn concerto anything to grow fiercely enthusiastic over. It displays technique in a gentlemanly manner and even in this display the composer was jealous enough of his interpreting artist to put the cadenza display in the middle of the first movement, instead of at the end, so that the player should not excite the audience at the expense of the creator of the work.

It was played rather as a carefully prepared lesson than as an artistic revelation. One demanded a broader tone, but in freedom of bowing, in rapidity of execution, in work in high positions and in double stopping, Mr. Fradkin proved himself an adept, especially in cadenza work. The Finale was taken at a rattling pace, yet was clear and correct. The audience applauded on Friday afternoon, as if it were Ysaye and Kreisler and Heifetz done up in a single package, and Mr. Fradkin was recalled four times with an abundance of enthusiasm, wherefore he should be content—and the reviewer also.

AN UNEQUAL WORK.

Faure's Suite was an unequal work. Mr. Hackett had a self-abnegating task to perform, for the voice seems used here almost as an obligato instrument and the chief points are to be sought for in the orchestral work. But the singer acquitted himself excellently in the difficult task and certainly deserved the applause which he won.

Of special points in the new work we would note the harp effects against the voice, in the first movement; the fine processional effects and rhythmic touches of the second movement, the entracte, and the interweaving of voice and orchestra in the Madrigal. By the way, one might complain of the French misuse of this word. A Madrigal was properly a contrapuntal composition for several voices, without accompaniment, in which the melody was dispersed through all the parts. But there are many disputes about the meaning of the word. Not so about the "Epi-thalame" which followed. One might define that by the very intellectual Boston conundrum—why is a misogynist like an Epithallum? Because he is a verse to marriage. But the Epithalame was by no means as bright as the conundrum.

Here, then, is another of the numerous musical works inspired by our great poet, who has caused more music than any one else in the world, composer or not. But the "Merchant of Venice" has not been so often set as his other plays, wherefore we welcome Faure's addition to the repertoire. "Romeo and Juliet" has been the favorite always, and has been tonalized all the way from Gounod's opera to "Rhum et Eau en Juliet," a parody.

BERLIOZ'S OVERTURE.

At the end of the program came Berlioz's overture and at once proved that the older Frenchman had very much more to say and was very much surer in saying it, than all his modern successors. Yet we were sorry that Franck, the great master, had for once strayed out of his true field.

14TH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Herald Feb. 15, 1919.
Franck, Mendelssohn, Berlioz, Faure, Chabrier
on the Program

WILL BE REPEATED IN HALL TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The 14th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Rabaud conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Franck, Orchestral Suite from "Psyche," a symphonic poem; Mendelssohn, Concerto for violin; Chabrier, Prelude to Act II of "Gwendoline;" G. Faure, Suite from the Stage Music to Haraucourt's comedy "Shylock"—Chanson, Entr'acte, Madrigal, Epithalme, Nocturne, Final; Berlioz, Overture, "The Roman Carnival." Mr. Fradkin, concertmaster of the orchestra, played the concerto. Arthur Hackett, tenor, sang the Chanson and Madrigal in the "Shylock" suite.

Cesar Franck's Suite was played in Boston as a Suite for the first time. "Psyche's Sleep" and "Psyche Borne away by the Zephyrs" were played for the first time at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Would the four movements gain in effect if they were heard in their proper place in the whole work, with the choral contrasts? Detached and arranged as movements of a symphony, they are beautiful, but there is hardly sufficient contrast between the first three to make each one of the movements stand out in bold relief. It is not necessary to follow closely the "explanation" of certain French commentators who insist that Franck's Psyche and Eros should not be regarded as the lovers in the old legend; that they were only symbols; that the whole work is "charged with the spirit of Christian mysticism." The music is sufficiently expressive, often enchanting, if the hearer has in mind only the familiar story told by Apuleius.

The Prelude to "Gwendoline" is also music that came from the heart. The love-music is more sensuous than that of Franck's, but not sensual after the manner of Massenet in his more pornographic operas, as "Esclarmonde," and "Thais." The death of Chabrier was a great loss to French art. Some of his successors have cunningly profited by his harmonic and orchestral audacity. What would they have done if Chabrier and Lalo had not blazed the way for them while they were thinking of following the beaten path? When this Prelude was played yesterday, the thought of the famous clarinet player that went down with the Bourgogne came to the mind. How eloquently he played the clarinet solo in this Prelude!

The stage music of Gabriel Faure is characteristic of that fastidious, ultra-refined composer. Especially noteworthy are the Entr'acte, Epithalme and Nocturne. The last suggests the moonlight scene in the fifth act of Shakespeare's comedy, but who knows what Haraucourt did to Shakespeare? "After Shakespeare," no doubt a long way after. And where are the songs, which are decidedly un-Shakespearian, inserted? In the scene of the caskets? or have they to do with Jessica? It is perhaps needless to say there is no music in the suite that can possibly be associated with Shylock. When Gabriel Faure wrote his Requiem, he omitted the Dies Irae, possibly from fear of shocking the sensibilities of the "petites dames" that frequent the Madeleine, probably because he knew that his musical strength did not lie in that direction. Mr. Hackett sang the two songs in a straightforward rather than subtle manner, and Faure's music demands subtlety, not merely honesty of purpose and frank expression; but the songs themselves are not among the best of the composer's melodies.

A brilliant performance of the "Roman Carnival" brought the curl of an unusually interesting concert, admirably interpreted by Mr. Rabaud and admirably played. Noteworthy in the overture was the playing of the English horn by Mr. Speyer.

Mr. Fradkin was loudly applauded for his performance of Mendelssohn's concerto. He took the first movement and the Finale at a very rapid pace, so rapid that some questioned it; but his performance was so clear and so musical that swiftness was welcome. Furthermore, the composer gave the indication Allegro molto vivace for the Finale. He marked the first "with great passion," but Mendelssohn in a passionate mood was an inherently amiable person—amiable except when other living composers were concerned churning himself deliberately into frenzy. Taken at a conventionally allegro pace, the first movement soon becomes tiresome. In the second movement Mr. Fradkin happily avoided "sweetness" and sentimentalism. The music was sung, not sobbed. The hearty appreciation of the audience was justly deserved.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday night is as follows: Lalo, Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" Gilbert, Symphonic Prologue to Synge's tragedy, "Riders to the Sea"; Gluck, "Diane Impitoyable," from "Iphigenie en Aulide"; Rameau, Ballet Airs from "Hippolyte and Aricie"; Massenet, "Promesse de mon Avenir," from "Le Roi de Lahore"; Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Scheherazade." Emilio de Gorza will be the singer.

NOVELTY MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Post Feb. 15, 1919.
Hackett, Tenor, and Fradkin, Violinist,
the Soloists

BY OLIN DOWNES

A programme of modern music of uncommon interest was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. We say "modern."

There was a single exception, the Mendelssohn violin concerto, played by Frederick Fradkin, concertmaster, who then made his first appearance as soloist in this series of concerts.

Admirers of no one but Stravinsky, Maurice Ravel, Scriabine, who listened to some charming music which Gabriel Faure composed to Haraucourt's drama after Shakspeare, "Shylock," might say that in this place also the term "modern" was a misnomer. Faure writes in the idiom of another period, furnishing, as it were, a musical frame to a dramatic picture.

WRITTEN TO TIME LIMIT

It is not easy to do this, particularly when the composer is given distinctly to understand that this piece must last exactly six minutes and 30 seconds, and be 84 measures long, and that one longer or shorter as the case may be. Such tasks have paralyzed many a composer of genius, but Faure, we think, has in this place been successful, as he was pre-eminently successful in the incidental music which he composed for Mrs. Patrick Campbell's performance of Maeterlinck's "Pelleas et Melisande."

The music for "Shylock" involves the services of a tenor in two numbers, the "Chanson" and the "Madrigal." These passages were sung by Arthur Hackett, tenor. Seldom has he displayed his beautiful voice and his admirable art to better advantage. Fortunately the conductor and the audience which can benefit by such talent. No wonder that Mr. Hackett was applauded.

Beauty of Nocturne

The other parts of the suite are the Entr'acte, Epithalme, Nocturne, Finale. The nocturne, for strings alone, has the peculiar and shadowy beauty, the beauty which seems equally a product of centuries of culture and an inherently poetic nature, which is so distinctive and pervasive a characteristic of Faure.

This movement, and the charming madrigal for tenor, were at first hearings the most salient features of the suite. Yet throughout there is the practiced hand of a master of his art, the fine perceptions of values, the inalienable instinct not to say too much by developing an idea academically or at unnecessary length. These pieces, heard on this occasion for the first time in Boston, are acceptable and atmospheric in the concert hall as well as the theatre.

Another composition of more substance and far too little known is the symphonic poem, "Psyche," of Franck, of which four orchestral movements, "Sommell de Psyche," "Psyche enlevée par les zephyrs," "Les Jardins d'Eros" and "Psyche et Eros," were played. When shall we hear the entire work with the complete vocal parts. It is music of exquisite tenderness, innocent, sensuous, sublimation of spirit and sense, a secret and intimate confession of the loveliest things in the heart of a man who probably never saw these things realized in his life.

The writer heard the last three movements of the symphonic poem. "Les Jardins d'Eros" seems at first not of such sustained beauty and interwoven musical thought as the preceding movement, but "Psyche et Eros," with its glowing color, its sustained and rapturous mood, is impressive and beautiful. Mr. Rabaud's interpretation was remarkable for its sensitiveness and imagination.

Mr. Fradkin's Playing

Mr. Fradkin's performance was not, perhaps, devoid of the nervous strain of his initial appearance as soloist at these concerts. He faced a considerable test of his youth and his skill, and met it, on the whole, in a way which bore testimony to his talent and musical perception. The warmth of his tone and his technical resource did not lead him into sentimentality or exaggeration. He played the opening movement in a virtuosic spirit and his performance developed brilliancy and freedom as he progressed.

The concerto was played as it should be, without a pause between the first and second movements and with modest devotion to the aims of the composer. The exceptional beauty of Mr. Fradkin's tone has been noted long since, and it was particularly in place, of course, in the slow movement. The soloist was warmly recalled.

Chabrier's prelude to the second act of Gwendoline, while it has mood and atmosphere, is nevertheless to us inferior to the prelude to the first act. It is, of course, in total contrast to the first prelude, but its Wagnerism is too prevalent for one to feel the free rush, the headlong flight of genius, which occur with the very first measures of the orchestral introduction to an opera which should be known in this country. Berlioz's overture to "The Roman Carnival," a spirited performance, brought this concert to an end.

Music in Boston Feb. 15, 1919
Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—From the majestic melodies of César Franck to the tunefulness of Mendelssohn is a long way, and the contrast, especially noticeable in these days of much modern music on our programs, makes very plain the fact that Mendelssohn undeniably sounds old-fashioned, and not only that, but empty and futile sometimes as well. Mr. Fradkin, the concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appears as the soloist at the fourteenth pair of concerts of Feb. 14-15, playing the Mendelssohn concerto in E minor op. 64, which he has played elsewhere and which has already been noticed in these columns. The ebullient Mr. Fradkin plunged less precipitately into his concerted passages than on the occasion of his first appearance with the orchestra, thereby achieving a much smoother and more interesting performance. It was an interesting program that Mr. Rabaud put together. Besides the Mendelssohn concerto it included the orchestral suite from César Franck's Symphonic Poem "Psyché," the Prelude to Act II of Chabrier's "Gwendoline," Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival," op. 9 and the suite from the stage music to Haraucourt's comedy, "Shylock," by Fauré. The program stated that Haraucourt's comedy was after Shakespeare, but the titles of the various divisions showed small correspondence with "The Merchant of Venice." Arthur Hackett sang the tenor solos in the Fauré work in full, free fashion.

On the evening of Thursday, Feb. 13, the orchestra gave its regular concert in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, in which respects were paid to the classics through Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, after which more romantic paths were followed. A second hearing of Mr. Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne" confirmed the impression produced on the presentation of the work in Boston that here is as fine, well knit, atmospheric, and effective a bit of program music as has appeared in recent years. Miss Ethel Frank, soprano, was the soloist. Her intonation was good, her voice fresh and pleasing but somewhat lacking in necessary volume.

ORCHESTRA PLAYS FRANCK'S "PSYCHE"

Until yesterday, Franck's suite from his symphonic poem, "Psyche," had not been played here in nearly 13 years. Mr. Rabaud does well to revive and to play it with the beauty, imagination and understanding which rewarded him and the orchestra.

The subject of Psyche and her mystic lover was a more inspirational subject for Franck than those of the materialistic "Le Chasseur Maudit," and "Les Djinns," which had preceded it. Neither the sardonic nor the malevolent spoke the same language with him. And it is possible to imagine the more erotic vein in which others would have treated the maid borne by the zephyrs for the wooing of Eros. Imagine the plangent colors of the young Richard Strauss, or the echoing tonalities of Debussy in his days of his "Pelleas and Melisande."

Franck's impersonal treatment, in which he does not portray a likeness as literally as Liszt, in his Faust symphony, characterized a Gretchen, but rather develops a mood, escapes the limiting boundaries of all program music and gives it the universality of sheer beauty. From the calm of Psyche's sleep, through her flight with the zephyrs to the gardens of Eros and the dawning passion there is increasing glow and feeling, but with the broadly humanizing sense of the Franck of the symphony, which was to follow this poem within a year, and which it foreshadows in thought, as it does at times almost in identity of expression. And there are quotations from his "Les Eolides."

One whose perception is less poetic than Mr. Rabaud's, one who becomes restive or embarrassed in the presence of tranquility or to whom the impassioned is turbulent or boisterous, would find little to reward in this music, for there is little here with which to exploit personality. It was received with marked appreciation.

Is it possible that an opera which interests by a detached excerpt as does the prelude to act 2 of Chabrier's "Gwendoline" is so lacking in dramatic verity, musical worth or other merit as to be passed by these 30 years. This prelude is one of bodeful, even ominous anticipation. The heroine passes before us and the hearer shares her dream, which was told to laughter and fulfilled in blood.

Mr. Fradkin, concert master of the orchestra, was soloist in various cities of last week's Southern trip. Yesterday he appeared as such for the first time at these concerts. His performance of Mendelssohn's concerto was followed by a reception of enthusiasm. He was recalled again and again. Mr. Fradkin plays with a tone fine spun and sweet in quality, and with an intonation which was commendable in such harrowing condition of the air for strings. He has facility, a youthful facility which later may permit him to appear less flurried in style and sense of rhythmic proportion than in that of yesterday.

It is chiefly some incidental reason that would bring to concert performance Faure's suite from his stage music to Haraucourt's comedy, "Shylock," a French adaptation of Shakespeare's "Merchant of Venice," which was produced in Paris 30 years ago. Accompanying or dividing their scenes in the comedy, these six numbers no doubt would well serve their purpose. Faure's gift was never more happily shown than in the charm, poetic beauty and wide emotional range of his songs. Arthur Hackett treated the incidental music for a tenor behind the scenes in 1. Chanson, and 3. Madrigal, with excellent taste, not making of it more than the fanciful sentiment of the texts warranted and giving voice with opulence where it was required, as in the one climax in the eighth line of the Chanson.

Followed a surpassingly brilliant performance of Berlioz' wildly fantastic "Roman Carnival" overture, built out of material from his opera "Benvenuto Cellini," a performance distinguished by Mr. Speyer's English horn in Benvenuto's song, by the verve and abandon of the ensemble, a performance which it is not easy to imagine any of the orchestras which have visited Boston doing in a manner to be compared with it.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Feb. 15, 1919.
A MANY-TONGUED MISCELLANY OF MUSIC

From the Passionate Franck of "Psyche" to the Smooth Faure of Theatre Pieces — A Misty Fragment of Chabrier's Opera and a Blazing Overture of Berlioz — Mr. Fradkin Plays Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto

COMING expectant to Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, the audience for the Symphony Concert departed well entertained. Miscellaneous pieces, all but one French, filled the programme: Franck's suite, "Psyche"; Mendelssohn's concerto for violin; a suite drawn by Fauré from his incidental music to a Parisian version of Shakespeare's comedy, "The Merchant of Venice"; and, as heard at Cambridge the previous evening, the introduction to the second act of Chabrier's opera, "Gwendoline," and Berlioz's overture, "Roman Carnival." Only the concerto and the overture were familiar numbers; but the two suites and the operatic fragment were all music quickly pleasuring the ear, easy to comprehend and to feel; while the whole list offered a diversity of voice and mood agreeable to all but the narrow few who dislike too many shiftings of their point of view in the brief space of an hour and fifty minutes. For, like predecessors, Mr. Rabaud seems little by little to be lengthening his programmes. Four months ago he began to make them full, as were his forerunners, of good resolution to be brief. Gradually, however, and no earlier and no later than they, he has discovered that an interestingly coördinated and contrasted programme cannot always be compressed into an arbitrary ninety minutes. Pieces rating well together will stretch into a hundred or even a hundred and ten. The conductor, being an intelligent musician, bows accordingly to artistic self-respect and necessity—the more since the number of the departing dowagers is a relatively fixed quantity.

2220

There was, moreover, plentiful applause to lengthen the concert of Friday—for Mr. Fradkin, leader of the strings, who played the solo part in the violin-concerto, and for Mr. Arthur Hackett, who provided the tenor voice, not off stage, as in the theatre, but visible and audible upon it, that carries two divisions of Fauré's suite. To both the audience was cordial; while, at the end of Franck's suite, its plaudits for both orchestra and conductor were uncommonly hearty. And with reason, since the band played it eloquently, emotionally; while more clearly and pervasively than hitherto Mr. Rabaud asserted his mettle as operatic conductor. The suavities of the orchestra with Fauré's music likewise deserved the plaudits received; while more than once, as at Cambridge, with Berlioz's overture, it struck running fire. Time and again, moreover, notably when Mr. Speyer played the air for English horn in this "Roman Carnival," individual distinctions flecked this supple and eager ensemble. No small betterment is he to the wood-wind choir, not only for his own tone, touch and taste, but also for his stimulating effect upon his fellows. Again the orchestra goes forward.

Mr. Rabaud seemed operatic conductor in Franck's "Psyche," because that music, as the suite of yesterday brings it occasionally back to the concert-hall, is really Franck's opera. His ostensible operas, "Hulda" and "Ghisèle," vanished long since from stage and memory. Le père Franck had scant sense of the theatre in the fashion in which Massenet exemplifies it. As one and another of his settings of The Beatitudes prove, there were limitations to his invention when he would deal dramatically in tones with evil-doers and their works; while even a mechanician of the Parisian opera houses, like the recently departed Monsieur Leroux, would have balked at the fable and texts of "Hulda" and "Ghisèle." In the orchestral parts of "Psyche," in which the original "symphonic poem" for instruments and orchestra now survives, Franck was hampered by no text and need take no thought of necessary or assumed requirement of the theatre. The Grecian fable of the loves of Eros and Psyche was matter to stir his imagination, to set free his half-erotic, half-mystical vein. Evil-doers and evil-doing nowhere intruded. At his ease, as well as enkindled, Franck might write his music of passion, the so-called love-duet of the end of the suite; sound the preparatory voices in the episode of "The Garden of Eros," set down his music of the scene in the division, "Psyche Borne Away by the Zephyrs"; and around "The Slumber of Psyche" inscribe his prologue—and in all four attain a dramatic force, a pictorial illusion sure to evade him in the theatre. Over his shoulder, he could also see and hear "Lohengrin" flourishing there, and it was not desirable that "Lohengrin" should contribute too much, though it does a little, to the mystical union of Eros and Psyche, to her desire to question the mysterious lover.

Yet with due deference to d'Indy to Derépas, to the other commentators who exalt the mystical, the spiritual side of this music of Franck, not to such voice does the ear, hearing in the ways and with the lusts of the flesh, first respond. Franck wastes few measures upon sensuous and colorful tone-picturing of the garden of Eros where Psyche reposes. Clearly it little interested him. Eager was he to "get on" with the love-music that fills the larger part of the third episode and the whole of the fourth. It is a thrilling music, sustaining itself out of itself, warm, rich, incisive, rising and falling, advancing and receding with clear accent of erotic passion. Mystical, if the hearer prefers, but if he has ever happened to peruse some of the memoirs of mystical, visioning and generally overwrought nuns and monks—memoirs that lie thick in many a monastery or convent—he will discover how near akin in voice, be it of word or music, are ecstasies of the flesh and ecstasies of the spirit. True, Franck perceptibly over-writes his erotic music as he does his preluding in "The Slumbers of Psyche." True also, he uses too often what is now the familiar and nerve-stimulating procedure of the Wagnerian climax; but nowhere else, outside the more eloquent Beatitudes and his symphony, has he written music of such power and passion as these final movements of "Psyche."

By conscious or unconscious will, Franck, unwilling Franck, there writes music-drama. Of music-drama, too, is the brief, beautiful, delicately imagined and subtly accomplished music of the zephyrs. It is as though he here achieved the lightness and the alriness of motion, the gossamer texture, the iridescent glint and glow sought but not always gained in the earlier tone-poem, "The Daughters of Aeolus." Little music from any pen is so tenuous of fabric, yet so luminous of impression. The prologue, "The Slumber of Psyche," is of Franck more familiarly voiced. For, in it after necessary measures of preluding and exposition of motives, he soon strikes his own particular note, sounding again and again in his music, of wistful longing, rising from restless eagerness into sustained aspiration (as in the symphony) but here gentler and more melancholy. It is a note easy to prolong unduly, a note that quickly irritates certain listening temperaments. Yet in this prelude, over-written as it is, it remains a note to awaken responsive mood. Mr. Rabaud did well to reassemble and revive this suite of "Psyche"; next to Franck's symphony and his symphonic variations, as the Franckian repertory for orchestra goes, it is characteristically eloquent of the composer. And as it seemed yesterday to quasi-operatic music, Mr. Rabaud opened eager, operatic arms.

14-5

Whatever the intrinsic merit of Fauré's incidental music to Haraucourt's "Shylock," it was good to hear, because nowhere does it recall the Wagner who has so infected French music of the generation Mr. Rabaud seems to love best. (For with Wagner "banned," Wagnerian imitation is provocative.) Not that the suite is of Fauré's, when, as in some of his chamber music and songs, he is most delicate of invention and fancy, most subtle, felicitous and individual of workmanship. Rather the six brief numbers are a well made, well fitting music for the purpose in hand, often agreeable, occasionally charming, to hear—work of the day undertaken on commission and becomingly done. If the verses that furnish forth the "chanson" and the "madrigal" for tenor voice—both sung by Mr. Hackett somewhat wirily and with undistinguished French diction—exemplify Haraucourt's poetry, it may little have stimulated Fauré to music-making. It is thirty years since this "Shylock" lived brief life on the stage of the Odéon: it is now as dead, gone and irrecoverable as the other contents of the crowded limbo of "failures" in the theatre; but there is reason to believe that the play was as pale, trite and generally mediocre in itself as it is in the reflected lustres of "The Merchant of Venice."

Therefore it is possible only to surmise where in the course of Haraucourt's or Shakespeare's play, this incidental music sounded. Possibly the "chanson" and the "madrigal," each of which has pleasant archaic flavor, beguiled two choices of the caskets; possibly, the "Epithalme" or marriage song, crowned the third, though its velvety measures are far enough from Portia's.

You see me, Lord Bassanio, where I stand,
Such as I am:

or his

Only my blood speaks to you in my veins.

Pretty and pulsing, too, is the soft glow of the Nocturne, presumably for Lorenzo and Jessica capping verses and kisses in the moonlit, tremulous garden. There is pomp of masque or, may be, "Magnificoes" in the entr'acte; while the final number is gay, high-spirited, at moments almost starry, music-making. There is no reason at all why a composer, even a Fauré, should not occasionally fill a chocolate-box and let his hearers savor his confectionery.

On the way from Franck, via Chabrier, to Fauré, Mr. Fradkin played the violin part in Mendelssohn's fluent, animated, elegant and often artful concerto, played as became the virtuoso and the musician whose incidental solos in the orchestra of the Russian Ballet recalled and commended him to Bostonian ears when he first came to Symphony Hall last autumn. A little ill at ease at the beginning of the concerto, he seemed to play the superabundant passage-work of this Allegro "Appassionato" precisely, dryly. Once embarked, however, upon the plastic, sparkling, manifold cadenza, upon the suavities and the sentiment of the Andante, upon the flicking and the flashing play of the Rondo, he gave his hearers the pleasure of sure and pliant fingers, sensitive bowing; a tone that mingled fineness, sensibility and propulsive power; animation of rhythm and progress, adept and flowing modulation, bright and changeable color and just perception of Mendelssohnian artifice, elegance and charm. Out of these abilities and this outcome spoke not only the virtuoso of the violin, but a perceiving and transmitting musician, an artist of fine fibre and keen discernment, seeker and attainer of the just, the persuading mean.

H. T. P.

WILL DEPORT DR. MUCK

Jan. 14. 1919.
Dr. Ernest Kunald Also To Be Sent from This Country, According to Statement Made by Member of Pershing's Staff

Dr. Karl Muck, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Dr. Ernest Kunald, who formerly conducted the Symphony Orchestra in Cincinnati, are to be deported, according to a statement made by Lieutenant C. M. L. Royalmattice, a member of General Pershing's staff, who is now in Cincinnati. He made the announcement at a dinner of the Rotary Club and added that the Government secured much valuable information during a quarrel between the two musicians, who spoke in German. Both are confined at Fort Oglethorpe, Ga.

Mr. FREDRIC FRADKIN was born of Russian parents in Troy, N.Y., on April 2, 1892. At the age of five he began the study of the violin with Henry Schradieck. His next teacher was Max Bendix. In 1905 Mr. Fradkin went to Paris, where his teachers at first were Guillaume Antoine Roemy, called Rémy, and José Silvestre de los Dolores White, commonly known as Joseph White. In 1907 he entered the Paris Conservatory as a pupil of Narcisse Augustin Lefort, and in 1909 he was awarded a first prize for violin-playing. First prizes were also awarded that year to Miss Roussel, Miss Fidide, Messrs. Astruc and Krettly. The jury in Mr. Fradkin's case was unanimous. His first engagement was as concert-master and soloist for the orchestra at Rovani led by J. Pennequin. In the following year he was engaged

Report Dr. Muck Will Be Deported

Traveler Feb. 14, 1919.
Dictagraph May Play
an Important Role

Dispatches from Cincinnati that Dr. Karl Muck, former conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be deported as an alien enemy recall to federal officials in Boston his resentful remarks concerning his treatment here at the time he left in the custody of a deputy United States marshal for the internment camp at Fort Oglethorpe, Ga., where he is confined.

On the eve of his departure from Boston, Muck said he was not much interested in whether he ever saw this city again. He intimated strongly that if he should ever be given his liberty he would probably not stay in this country any longer than he could help. From his talk the officials inferred he meant to return to Germany as speedily as possible.

Spirited Controversy

Muck was the centre of much spirited controversy before he relinquished the leadership of the Symphony. He was not without friends here and they supported his claim that he was a citizen of Switzerland, not of Germany.

Under a Presidential warrant, Muck was taken from his home in the Fenway by federal officers and held in the jail at East Cambridge for two weeks before his trip to the South began.

Mrs. Muck has made frequent visits to her husband since his internment and is understood to be now at Chattanooga, Tenn., the nearest place of any account to Fort Oglethorpe.

Kunwald May Also Go

The dispatches also say Dr. Ernst Kunwald, intimate friend of the former Kaiser, and former conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony orchestra, will also be ousted from the country.

Lt.-Col. Royal Mattice, who, yesterday addressed the Cincinnati Rotary a quarrel in German between Muck and musicians are to be deported. He said that federal authorities recently, during a quarrel in German between Muck and Kunwald, gained much valuable information. The information was secured by a dictagraph planted in the room occupied by the musicians.

"There are hundreds of Austrians and Germans who are going to be deported, but don't know it," said Col. Mattice. "America is to be purified."

"We already have legal authority to expel many from this country, but we are going to get authority to send out of this country every enemy alien interned in prison camps in the United States."

NO WAGNER AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Mr. Rabaud Decides Against Present Restoration of the Composer's Pieces—His Own Words About His Point of View—American Composers as He Sees Them—A Notable Programme for Semi-Private Performance by the Cecilia—Mr. Gilbert's "Riders to the Sea" to Be Heard Here

When the Symphony Orchestra visited Philadelphia last week, Mr. Rabaud, who is as honest as the day is long, confided to a reporter of The Public Ledger his view of the reestablishment of Wagner's music in the active repertory of symphony concerts in America. The Ledger quotes him:

When I arrived in the United States I could see that the general sentiment, as in France, had accepted the tacit decision not to play Wagnerian music during the war, in spite of the unanimous admiration for this music in the two countries. This decision, in itself, may be subject to discussion. But, in my opinion, we should not blame those, who, having accepted the same, await the end of the war to change their attitude. Let us not forget that this enemy only obtained an armistice. Peace is not signed—the claims of the Allies will find, perhaps, in Germany resistance which could only be reasoned with by force. For my part, I desire to conform myself here to the sentiment of many Americans who agree with the French opinion. And, of course, if some day I should think it right to act against the public opinion of my country, I should do so in France, and not abroad.

Like Mr. Higginson before them, the trustees of the Symphony Orchestra wisely leave the conductor a free hand in the making of programmes. According, then, to these sayings of Mr. Rabaud, none of Wagner's preludes or overtures and no fragments of his music-dramas will be heard at the Symphony Concerts until the Peace of Paris has been signed and sealed. In all probability, also, none will be played there so long as Mr. Rabaud remains the conductor. Evidently, he is disposed to follow Parisian opinion in the matter, to take his cue from the Ministry of the Fine Arts, from his fellow-conductors, Messrs. Chevillard, Pierné, and Messager, from the whole official hierarchy of French music. In for such "solidarity," Rabaud happens to orchestra heard in tering to an American by American funds, post—as credible re- e good offices of the arts. For the trustees their wisdom and om necessity, often s rather than individ- for a conductor last herefore, Mr. Rabaud e to the Bostonian cientiously and often that mission, and his rs and to public opin- o him credit.

here in America, tra is fast restoring he active repertory— Mr. Stransky's in owski's in Philadel- St. Louis and so on- manimity, audiences degrees are hearing ven in that city of ent" and turbulent is Baltimore. No- voice of protest been t or speech and no- be; while so far as few have stalked in-

By these signs, a the public for sym- nited States welcomes to the concert-room. th which Mr. Rabaud t and which natural- y represent "general y minded. To it, to l to his own prompt- is well within his n if he so deprives nces at home and t of old they heard

Mr. Rabaud, as it believe that the war s, again, his right to t, to many, it seems him and to the like- t war or armistice or ation to the beauty. n or the splendor of the pleasure it has ese fifty years. It f these differences of led "general senti- that helps to make ic and generally de- t is. Meanwhile in also, as letters say, to be heard upon the d in echo in the h or American. ans according to The ke feelingly" of mposers, of his idiences and the it. He said: must be en- ay to develop hool of music. son pieces by an-Kelly, Had- we are not other Ameri- ublic hearings closed. I find erican compos- d, otherwise I pieces. Very ll for the per- umbers. When cs—he brought other—smash oston at least so American pen as his hearers be- not slip, they praise for Mr. he Mystic Trum- restored it to hile they were flier's tone-poem. en Mr. Monteux oncerts last No- y again serves, traversed by the k. As for Mr. atasia" and Mr. singer, "A Call- ot well received, to suffer many such intrinsic s Mr. Krehbiel remarked last "The American ne, but we are coming by lying because it is latter because it at breeds com- Rabaud is clear- American com- cement" of pub- rchestrual music. ld the "instruc- the hearing of Hall and opera advance toward ney, the projec- musical speech omunicaten of manship.

Mr. FREDRIC FRADKIN was born of Russian parents in Troy, N.Y., on April 2, 1892. At the age of five he began the study of the violin with Henry Schradieck. His next teacher was Max Bendix. In 1905 Mr. Fradkin went to Paris, where his teachers at first were Guillaume Antoine Roemy, called Rémy, and José Silvestre de los Dolores White, commonly known as Joseph White. In 1907 he entered the Paris Conservatory as a pupil of Narcisse Augustin Lefort, and in 1909 he was awarded a first prize for violin-playing. First prizes were also awarded that year to Miss Roussel, Miss Fidide, Messrs. Astruc and Krettly. The jury in Mr. Fradkin's case was unanimous. His first engagement was as concert-master and soloist for the orchestra at Rovani led by J. Pennequin. In the following year he was engaged

Report Dr. Muck Will Be Deported

Traveler Feb. 14, 1919
Dictagraph May Play
an Important Role

Dispatches from Cincinnati that Dr. Karl Muck, former conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be deported as an alien enemy recall to federal officials in Boston his resentful remarks concerning his treatment here at the time he left in the custody of a deputy United States marshal for the internment camp at Fort Oglethorpe, Ga., where he is confined.

On the eve of his departure from Boston, Muck said he was not much interested in whether he ever saw this city again. He intimated strongly that if he should ever be given his liberty he would probably not stay in this country any longer than he could help. From his talk the officials inferred he meant to return to Germany as speedily as possible.

Spirited Controversy

Muck was the centre of much spirited controversy before he relinquished the leadership of the Symphony. He was not without friends here and they supported his claim that he was a citizen of Switzerland, not of Germany.

Under a Presidential warrant, Muck was taken from his home in the Fenway by federal officers and held in the jail at East Cambridge for two weeks before his trip to the South began.

Mrs. Muck has made frequent visits to her husband since his internment and is understood to be now at Chattanooga, Tenn., the nearest place of any account to Fort Oglethorpe.

Kunwald May Also Go

The dispatches also say Dr. Ernst Kunwald, intimate friend of the former Kaiser, and former conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony orchestra, will also be ousted from the country.

Lt.-Col. Royal Mattice, who, yesterday addressed the Cincinnati Rotary a quarrel in German between Muck and musicians are to be deported. He said that federal authorities recently, during a quarrel in German between Muck and Kunwald, gained much valuable information. The information was secured by a dictagraph planted in the room occupied by the musicians.

"There are hundreds of Austrians and Germans who are going to be deported, but don't know it," said Col. Mattice. "America is to be purified."

"We already have legal authority to expel many from this country, but we are going to get authority to send out of this country every enemy alien interned in prison camps in the United States."

NO WAGNER AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Mr. Rabaud Decides Against Present Restoration of the Composer's Pieces—His Own Words About His Point of View—American Composers as He Sees Them—A Notable Programme for Semi-Private Performance by the Cecilia—Mr. Gilbert's "Riders to the Sea" to Be Heard Here

When the Symphony Orchestra visited Philadelphia last week, Mr. Rabaud, who is as honest as the day is long, confided to a reporter of The Public Ledger his view of the reestablishment of Wagner's music in the active repertory of symphony concerts in America. The Ledger quotes him:

When I arrived in the United States I could see that the general sentiment, as in France, had accepted the tacit decision not to play Wagnerian music during the war, in spite of the unanimous admiration for this music in the two countries. This decision, in itself, may be subject to discussion. But, in my opinion, we should not blame those who, having accepted the same, await the end of the war to change their attitude. Let us not forget that this enemy only obtained an armistice. Peace is not signed—the claims of the Allies will find, perhaps, in Germany resistance which could only be reasoned with by force. For my part, I desire to conform myself here to the sentiment of many Americans who agree with the French opinion. And, of course, if some day I should think it right to act against the public opinion of my country, I should do so in France, and not abroad.

Like Mr. Higginson before them, the trustees of the Symphony Orchestra wisely leave the conductor a free hand in the making of programmes. According, then, to these sayings of Mr. Rabaud, none of Wagner's preludes or overtures and no fragments of his music-dramas will be heard at the Symphony Concerts until the Peace of Paris has been signed and sealed. In all probability, also, none will be played there so long as Mr. Rabaud remains the conductor. Evidently, he is disposed to follow Parisian opinion in the matter, to take his cue from the Ministry of the Fine Arts, and generally deprecate the influence of his fellow-conductors, Messrs. Chevillard, Pierné, and Messager, from the whole official hierarchy of French music. In for such "solidarity" in echo in the Rabaud happens to orchestra heard in tering to an American by American funds, according to The ke feelingly" of arts. For the trustees composers, of his their wisdom and audiences and the om necessity, often it. He said: s rather than individ- must be en- for a conductor last way to develop herefore, Mr. Rabaud school of music. e to the Bostonian ason pieces by an-Kelly, Had- we are not that mission, and his other Ameri- public hearings closed. I find o him credit. erican compos- a, otherwise I tra is fast restoring all for the per- he active repertory— numbers. When Mr. Stransky's in- umbers. When owski's in Philadel- other—smash

St. Louis and so on- manimity, audiences Boston at least so degrees are hearing American pen as ven in that city of his hearers be- cent" and turbulent not slip, they is Baltimore. No-praise for Mr. voice of protest been he Mystic Trum- ot or speech and no-1 restored it to be; while so far as' hile they were few have stalked in- filer's tone-poem, By these signs, a en Mr. Monteux the public for sym- concerts last No- nited States welcomes y again serves, to the concert-room, traversed by the th which Mr. Rabaud k. As for Mr. t and which natural- ntasia" and Mr. represent "general singer, "A Call- y minded. To it, to ot well received, to suffer many is well within his r such intrinsic- n if he so deprives s Mr. Krehbiel nces at home and remarked last t of old they heard "The American ne, but we are coming by lying because it is latter because it at breeds com- Rabaud is clear- t American com- ment" of pub- orchestral music. id the "instruc- the hearing of hall and opera advance toward ney, the projec- musical speech munication of manship.

Mr. FREDRIC FRADKIN was born of Russian parents in Troy, N. Y. on April 2, 1892. At the age of five he began the study of the violin with Henry Schradieck. His next teacher was Max Bendix. In 1907 Mr. Fradkin went to Paris, where his teachers at first were Guillaume Antoine Roemy, called Rémy, and José Silvestre de los Dolores, commonly known as Joseph White. In 1907 he entered the Conservatory as a pupil of Narcisse Augustin Lefort, and in 1911 was awarded a first prize for violin-playing. First prizes were awarded that year to Miss Roussel, Miss Fidide, Messrs. Astruc and Krettly. The jury in Mr. Fradkin's case was unanimous. His engagement was as concert-master and soloist for the orchestra of the Rovani led by J. Pennequin. In the following year he was engaged

Report Dr. Muck Will Be Deported

Traveler Feb. 14, 1919
Dictagraph May Play an Important Role

Dispatches from Cincinnati that Dr. Karl Muck, former conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be deported as an alien enemy recall to federal officials in Boston his resentful remarks concerning his treatment here at the time he left in the custody of a deputy United States marshal for the internment camp at Fort Oglethorpe, Ga., where he is confined.

On the eve of his departure from Boston, Muck said he was not much interested in whether he ever saw this city again. He intimated strongly that if he should ever be given his liberty he would probably not stay in this country any longer than he could help. From his talk the officials inferred he meant to return to Germany as speedily as possible.

Spirited Controversy

Muck was the centre of much spirited controversy before he relinquished the leadership of the Symphony. He was not without friends here and they supported his claim that he was a citizen of Switzerland, not of Germany. Under a Presidential warrant, he was taken from his home in the way by federal officers and held in jail at East Cambridge for two weeks before his trip to the South began. Mrs. Muck has made frequent visits to her husband since his internment and is understood to be now at Chattanooga, Tenn., the nearest place of account to Fort Oglethorpe.

Kunwald May Also Go

The dispatches also say Dr. Kunwald, intimate friend of the former Kaiser, and former conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony orchestra, also be ousted from the country.

Lt.-Col. Royal Mattice, who, yesterday addressed the Cincinnati Republican a quarrel in German between Muck and Kunwald, gained much valuable information. The information was secured by a dictagraph planted in the room occupied by the musicians.

"There are hundreds of Austrian Germans who are going to be deported but don't know it," said Col. Mattice. "America is to be purified."

"We already have legal authority to expel many from this country, but are going to get authority to send out of this country every enemy alien interned in prison camps in the United States."

OF MID

A Duo of Peace Poets
American Writers

By W. S. B.

OF the many poems, signing of the armistice, the victory won by the Allied safety and security of these two by Mr. Bynner and Mr. Bynner have attained the highest altitudes. Mr. Bynner's chant of the canticle of the full metrical surcharged emotional hymn in terms of loveliness and significance of what the great mankind. What makes achieving the same ends, contrast, is the diverse and each poet approached the great event. There is in Muck a bit more of joyousness, in natural expression, Alsatian villagers greeting with flower and song and Muck's hymn has more of giving in it, as of a cathartic voice and organ to the All-throwing the enemy. Yet Muck is rich in an under-current of the forces of evil in the enemy's might, and gives justice and honor, by which worthy in the sight of the ideal. Both men are too poets to obtrude these upon the surface of their

the spirit of the poetry. Take the passage in the Second Cantor asks thanks for the lads who gate," and the First Cantor. And what were they fighting for? They were fighting for the without end—Not for the monster, the de But for everybody's homeland, the gate, Their home and your home.

ON

FILE

BRIDA

TURE

ORSAK

measure there is reason for such "solidarity" with them. While Mr. Rabaud happens to be conductor of an orchestra heard in American cities, ministering to an American public and maintained by American funds, he came to his present post—as credible report runs—through the good offices of the Ministry of the Fine Arts. For the trustees of the orchestra, in their wisdom and doubtless in part from necessity, often dealt with governments rather than individuals in their search for a conductor last summer. In a sense, therefore, Mr. Rabaud is semi-official apostle to the Bostonian Gentiles. He is conscientiously and often interestingly fulfilling that mission, and his loyalties to his sponsors and to public opinion at home in Paris do him credit.

On the other hand, here in America, Wagner's music to the active repertory—Mr. Damrosch's and Mr. Strinsky's in New York, Mr. Stokowski's in Philadelphia, Mr. Zach's in St. Louis and so onward. With like unanimity, audiences everywhere and of all degrees are hearing it gladly, heartily, even in that city of "one hundred per cent" and turbulent "Americanism" which is Baltimore. No where as yet has the voice of protest been raised publicly in print or speech and no where is it likely to be; while so far as amusing records go, few have stalked in dignant from the hall. By these signs, a considerable part of the public for symphonic music in the United States welcomes the return of Wagner to the concert-room. Another part of it, with which Mr. Rabaud comes most in contact and which naturally seems to him to represent "general sentiment," is contrary minded. To it, to the Parisian view and to his own promptings he defers. He is well within his rights to do so, even if he so deprives many in his audiences at home and abroad, of music that of old they heard eagerly. If it pleases Mr. Rabaud, as it does many others, to believe that the war still continues, he has, again, his right to his point of view. Yet, to many, it seems as strange as would to him and to the like-minded the notion that war or armistice or peace bears any relation to the beauty, the power, the passion or the splendor of Wagner's music, or the pleasure it has given the world these fifty years. It is the contemplation of these differences of opinion, usually called "general sentiment" on both sides, that helps to make life the amusing, ironic and generally delightful thing that it is. Meanwhile in Boston, and in Paris also, as letters say, Wagner will continue to be heard upon the

and in echo in the h or American ans

according to The ke feelingly" of omposers, of his adiences and the
it. He said:

must be en-ray to develop
chool of music.
ason pieces by an-Kelly, Had-we are not other Ameri-
public hearings closed. I find erican compos-a, otherwise I pieces. Very ll for the per-umbers. When cs—he brought other—smash

Boston at least so American pen as his hearers be-not slip, they praise for Mr.
he Mystic Trumrestored it to while they were flier's tone-poem,
then Mr. Monteux concerts last No-
y again serves,
traversed by the
k. As for Mr.
ntasia" and Mr.
singer, "A Call-not well received, to suffer many such intrinsic-
s Mr. Krehbiel remarked last
"The American
ne, but we are coming by lying because it is latter because it at breeds com-Rabaud is clear-
t American comgement" of pub-orchestral music.
did the "instructhe hearing of hall and opera advance toward ncy, the projecmusical speech ommunication of manship.

Mr. FREDRIC FRADKIN was born of Russian parents in Troy, N. Y. on April 2, 1892. At the age of five he began the study of the piano with Henry Schradieck. His next teacher was Max Bendix. In 1907 Mr. Fradkin went to Paris, where his teachers at first were Guiseppe Antoine Roemy, called Rémy, and José Silvestre de los Dolores, commonly known as Joseph White. In 1907 he entered the Conservatory as a pupil of Narcisse Augustin Lefort, and in 1911 was awarded a first prize for violin-playing. First prizes were awarded that year to Miss Roussel, Miss Fidide, Messrs. Astruc and Krettly. The jury in Mr. Fradkin's case was unanimous. His engagement was as concert-master and soloist for the orchestra of the Rovani led by J. Pennequin. In the following year he was engaged

Report Dr. Muck Will Be Deported

Traveler Feb. 14, 1919
Dictagraph May Play
an Important Role

Dispatches from Cincinnati that Dr. Karl Muck, former conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be deported as an alien enemy recall to federal officials in Boston his resentful remarks concerning his treatment here at the time he left in the custody of a deputy United States marshal for the internment camp at Fort Oglethorpe, Ga., where he is confined.

On the eve of his departure from Boston, Muck said he was not much interested in whether he ever saw this city again. He intimated strongly that if he should ever be given his liberty he would probably not stay in this country any longer than he could help. From his talk the officials inferred he meant to return to Germany as speedily as possible.

Spirited Controversy

Muck was the centre of much spirited controversy before he relinquished the leadership of the Symphony. He was not without friends here and they supported his claim that he was a citizen of Switzerland, not of Germany. Under a Presidential warrant, he was taken from his home in the city by federal officers and held in jail at East Cambridge for two weeks before his trip to the South began. Mrs. Muck has made frequent trips to her husband since his internment and is understood to be now at Chattanooga, Tenn., the nearest place of account to Fort Oglethorpe.

Kunwald May Also Go

The dispatches also say Dr. Kunwald, intimate friend of the former Kaiser, and former conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony orchestra, also be ousted from the country.

Lt.-Col. Royal Mattice, who yesterday addressed the Cincinnati Rotary club, said that a quarrel in German between Muck and Kunwald, gained much valuable information. The information was secured by a dictagraph planted in the room by the musicians.

"There are hundreds of Austrian Germans who are going to be deported but don't know it," said Col. Mattice. "America is to be purified."

"We already have legal authority to expel many from this country, but we are going to get authority to send out of this country every enemy alien interned in prison camps in the United States."

OF MID

A Duo of Peace Poems American War

By W. S.

Of the many poems signing of the day brate the victory won by the Allies safety and security of these two by Mr. Bynne. dorn have attained the height of the canticle n dorn with the full metre surcharged emotional hymn us in terms of loveliness. If the great mankind. What makes achieving the same ends contrast, is the diverse t each poet approached the great event. There is in the canticle a bit more of joyous tive, in natural expression. Alsatian villagers greetly with flower and song and dorn's hymn has more giving in it, as of a calling its praise in pensive voice and organ to the throwing the enemy. The early rich in an under- been paid by humanity of the forces of evil the enemy's might, and justice and honor, by worthy in the sight of investment of the ideal. Both men are poets to obtrude the upon the surface of the to the substance that of the spirit of the poetry.

Take the passage in the Second Cantor askit thanks for the lady's gate," and the First Cantor And what were they defend? They were fighting for without end— Not for the monster, th But for everybody's home the gate, Their home and your h

And one can see the which makes the pra sweet. There is another the First Cantor ends famous river, at which was stopped and then t And what would have becom Where would they be, by t Over them all a tide wou An ocean of iron, if the But these men of France the flood, They raised human dykes and blood, Building, ever building, w way, Another and another, t stay . . . And O the holy river Whose calm name shall ev Be a name—by which to Stand! Uncover! Stand, every lover Of France and of Britain And name that river, that Once for the first battle, Both of those battles w reckoned, Let high heaven hear The Marnel.

The canticle closes with t O arouse, ye sons of a w Go greet the day your glo warmer still over Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem, "La Bonne Chanson," when Mr. Montoux included it in a pair of concerts last November. Nor, if memory again serves, was either piece unkindly traversed by the newspapers in New York. As for Mr. Hadley's "Symphonic Fantasia" and Mr. Kelley's show-piece for a singer, "A California Idyl," which were not well received, few reviewers are likely to suffer many qualms of conscience over such intrinsically mediocre music. As Mr. Krehbiel truthfully and pointedly remarked last Sunday in The Tribune: "The American genius in music will come, but we are not likely to speed his coming by lying about mediocrity simply because it is American"—or for that matter because it is of any other race that breeds composers. Per contra, Mr. Rabaud is clear-minded when he hints that American composers need the "encouragement" of public performance of their orchestral music. He might better have said the "instruction" of it. For only by the hearing of their music in concert hall and opera house can many of them advance toward the command of the saliency, the projection, the effectiveness of musical speech which are essential to communication of their ideas and their workmanship.

To arms, ye sons of light From morn to the s March on, on, on, on Till all the world be free!

Mr. Hagedorn with the of Biblical phrasing in the spirit through a agony of darkness, d through which the wor quer the German brute. able for the faith it presses in the power of the mighty from the up the lowly and meek. He sings when the darkest:

God, in disaster Thou ha We cried, "We will str and sea; In the narrow by the str Where the black heart bla Camps and breaks bre black enemy.

piano, the phonographs—and in echo in the music of many a French or American composer.

The Conductor and Americans

In the same interview, according to The Ledger, Mr. Rabaud "spoke feelingly" of the music of American composers, of his own mood, the mood of audiences and the mood of reviewers toward it. He said:

American composers must be encouraged; that is the way to develop a distinctive American school of music. We have played this season pieces by Loeffler, Converse, Stillman-Kelly, Hadley and Gilbert. More; we are not through. There will be other American compositions given public hearings before the season has closed. I find much talent among American composers. I must like them, otherwise I would not play their pieces. Very frequently comes the call for the performance of American numbers. When you play them the critics—he brought one slim fist down on the other—smash the works on the head.

Are the reviewers in Boston at least so unkind to music from American pen as Mr. Rabaud would have his hearers believe? If memory does not slip, they agreed in welcoming praise for Mr. Converse's tone-poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter," when Mr. Rabaud restored it to the active repertory; while they were warmer still over Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem, "La Bonne Chanson," when Mr. Montoux included it in a pair of concerts last November. Nor, if memory again serves, was either piece unkindly traversed by the newspapers in New York. As for Mr. Hadley's "Symphonic Fantasia" and Mr. Kelley's show-piece for a singer, "A California Idyl," which were not well received, few reviewers are likely to suffer many qualms of conscience over such intrinsically mediocre music. As Mr. Krehbiel truthfully and pointedly remarked last Sunday in The Tribune: "The American genius in music will come, but we are not likely to speed his coming by lying about mediocrity simply because it is American"—or for that matter because it is of any other race that breeds composers. Per contra, Mr. Rabaud is clear-minded when he hints that American composers need the "encouragement" of public performance of their orchestral music. He might better have said the "instruction" of it. For only by the hearing of their music in concert hall and opera house can many of them advance toward the command of the saliency, the projection, the effectiveness of musical speech which are essential to communication of their ideas and their workmanship.

224

15-1

225

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1918-19.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

HENRI RABAUD, Conductor.

FIFTEENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 21, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 22, AT 8 P. M.

LALO,

OVERTURE to "Le Roi d'Ys"

GILBERT,

SYMPHONIC PROLOGUE to J. M. Synge's Drama
"The Riders to the Sea"
(First time at these Concerts.)

GLUCK,

RECITATIVE and AIR, "Diane impitoyable," from
"Iphigénia in Aulis"

RAMEAU,

AIRS de BALLET from "Hippolyte et Aricie"
I. Air des matelots (1); Air des matelots (2)
II. Gavotte (1); Gavotte (2)
III. Air en Rondeau (pour les Amours)
IV. Rigaudon (1) en tambourin; Rigaudon (2)
(First time at these Concerts)

MASSENET,

RECITATIVE and AIR, "Promesse de mon avenir" from "Le Roi de Lahore"

RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF,

SYMPHONIC SUITE, "Scheherazade," (after the "Thousand Nights and a Night," op. 35
I. The Sea and Sinbad's Ship.
II. The Story of the Kalandar-Prince.
III. The Young Prince and the Young Princess.
IV. Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship goes to pieces on a Rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion

Soloist:

EMILIO De GOGORZA.

Mr. EMILIO DE GOGORZA, baritone, was born in Brooklyn, New York, of a Spanish family. He was educated in England and France. In England he sang as a boy and youth in church choirs. On his return to New York in the early nineties he studied singing with Moderati and Agramonte. Later he went to Paris for further study with Emile Bourgeois. After singing in European cities he returned to New York.

He sang in Boston for the first time on November 23, 1897, associated in a concert with Mme. Sembrich, William Lavin, tenor, and an orchestra conducted by Mr. Bevnigani. Since then he has sung here frequently—in oratorio, miscellaneous concerts, recitals. His last appearance here was in concert with Miss Rosita Renard, pianist, on November 10, 1918.

Symphony Hall.

De Gogorza Is Soloist at Symphony

Adv. & Am. Feb. 23, 1919.
By LOUIS C. ELSON.

The Symphony Program.

Lalo, Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys."

Gilbert, Symphonic Poem, "The Riders to the Sea."

Gluck, Aria, "Diane Impitoyable."

Soloist, Emilio De Gogorza.

Rameau, Airs de Ballet.

Massenet, "Promesse de mon Avenir."

Mr. De Gogorza.

Rimski-Korsakoff, Suite, "Scheherazade."

THIS was varied and of more interest than its predecessor of the week before. We confess that a vocal soloist always breaks the continuity of a symphonic program for us, but the public differ from that opinion and such a baritone as M. De Gogorza ought always to be welcome. He sang his two numbers with noble voice and artistic phrasing and evoked, of course, the chief applause of the concert. The Gluck number had very much of the old recitative in declamatory style; the Massenet work was the more popular.

But the orchestral numbers were almost all of a melodic type and there were no musical problems to solve or puzzles to worry over.

Lalo's "Roi d'Ys" overture is by no means light or trivial music, but it is clear and logical as if Lalo followed out the dramatic vein of a Weber and was picturesque without becoming ponderous or ascetic. The work was read in a dramatic manner which made it very effective, and it won fervent applause. Rameau was directly melodic. Rameau was the gentleman who exclaimed in 1722 that Music was dead, that all possible combinations had been used and that in a short time only repetitions would be possible. Yet there were a few prominent composers after that time. But his daintiness in this suite from "Hyppolite et Aricie" can scarcely be overestimated. It had tunes enough to set up a dozen modern composers. Yet there were some pretty touches of counterpoint as well. The piccolo had brilliant work to do in the finale (as well as in the subsequent "Scheherazade") and there was good opportunity to display the excellence of our wood-wind, which department of our orchestra was never in better condition than at present.

Of Rimski-Korsakoff's dazzling Oriental tone-picture there is nothing new to say. It has been heard often and is deservedly a favorite. Its scintillating tone-colors do not become stale with repetition. Mr. Fradkin was the Scheherazade of the occasion, for the figure which represents the heroine is almost always given to the solo violin, and he gave the theme clearly and expressively. It is a good and legitimate use of a guiding melody. The Turkish march in the third movement was especially effective. It is decidedly more Oriental than Beethoven's attempts in this direction. The wildly fantastic finale, a perfect Midway Plaisance of music, was most showily interpreted. Altogether the orchestra conquered great difficulties in this work in a manner which showed that they are not retrogressing, and M. Rabaud read it with a brilliancy that fully deserved the enthusiasm it created.

But the interest centred chiefly on a new American work upon an Irish subject, Gilbert's "Riders to the Sea." We do not consider this quite as successful as his Place Congo Ballet, but it has some fine suggestions of the mighty sea and some of the crooning lament of those bereft by it. We should like to hear the work again to understand it better. It is strongly orchestrated, and in spite of coming after the very brilliant performance of the Lalo work it won so much applause that the composer was obliged to bow from his place in the audience again and again. Mr. Gilbert is one of the American composers who generally has something to say, and he is never too prolix in saying it.

Mr. EMILIO DE GOGORZA, baritone, was born in Brooklyn, New York, of a Spanish family. He was educated in England and France. In England he sang as a boy and youth in church choirs. On his return to New York in the early nineties he studied singing with Moderati and Agramonte. Later he went to Paris for further study with Emile Bourgeois. After singing in European cities he returned to New York.

He sang in Boston for the first time on November 23, 1897, associated in a concert with Mme. Sembrich, William Lavin, tenor, and an orchestra conducted by Mr. Bevignani. Since then he has sung here frequently—in oratorio, miscellaneous concerts, recitals. His last appearance here was in concert with Miss Rosita Renard, pianist, on November 10, 1918.

SYMPHONY'S 18TH CONCERT

Diversified and Interesting Program—Brilliant
Performance

PROLOGUE TO "RIDERS OF THE SEA" GIVEN

By PHILIP HALE

The 15th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Rabaud conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Lalo, overture to "Le Roi d'Ys"; Gilbert, Symphonic Prologue to Synge's drama "Riders to the Sea"; Gluck, "Diane impenetrable" from "Iphigenie en Aulide"; Rameau, Airs de Ballet from "Hippolyte et Aricie"; Massenet, "Promesse de mon avenir" from "Le Roi de Lahore"; Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Scheherazade," Emilio de Gogorza was the singer.

Another diversified and interesting program; another brilliant concert with two compositions unknown to Boston and an excellent and favorite singer.

About 15 years ago Mr. Gilbert wrote a little prelude for a performance of Synge's tragedy by amateurs in this city. That prelude may be considered as a sketch or a study for the prologue that was first performed at a MacDowell Festival in Peterborough, N. H., in 1914 and later (1917) in New York at a concert of the Philharmonic Society. Mr. Gilbert has succeeded in translating the mood of Synge's play into tones. Without any attempt at photographic realism in the portraiture of the sea that robbed Maurya of husband and sons, there is a powerful suggestion of its cruel might, its unconscious remorselessness. In the section that follows, the lamentation for the dead, the Celtic feeling colors the song that occurs again and again as a keen, growing in the intensity of grief and at last dying away as in exhaustion, the expression of Maurya's resignation, now that nothing more can be demanded of her. And there was the remembrance of her final speech: "Michael has a clean burial in the far north, by the grace of the Almighty God. Bartly will have a fine coffin out of the white boards, and a deep grave surely. What more can we want than that? No man at all can be living forever, and we must be satisfied."

This Prologue is impressive music. It owes nothing to Munich or Paris. Whatever may be thought of Mr. Gilbert's other compositions—and we remember with pleasure his Comedy Overture on Negro Themes that was played at a Symphony concert eight years ago—no one can deny his native, individual strength. He thinks for himself; he belongs to no school; he does not worship abjectly in any musical chapel. Even his crudities, showing a certain ruggedness that is not wholly displeasing, are those of a virile thinker. Much so-called American music might bear the stamp "made in Germany." Some of our younger composers, imperfectly taught, superficial, try laboriously to rank themselves with leaders of the French impressionistic school, whose idiom is, however, natural to them, who underwent the severest pedagogic training before they blazed new paths.

It took courage to write a prologue for Synge's great tragedy. That Mr. Gilbert reproduced so well the mood and suggested the scene and the characters tersely shows that his ambition was not presumptuous.

The ballet music from Rameau's first opera that was produced was played here for the first time. The spirited "Airs de Matelots," the charming air in rondo form for flutes and strings, and the jolly Rigaudon in tambourin form with its saucy flageolet music played by a piccolo (the music an octave lower), delighted the audience. It is a good thing to hear music of the 18th century, for orchestra, chamber or clavecin. There were brave men before Agamemnon. There were musicians with fine ears and graceful fancy before Ravel and Debussy.

Lalo's brilliant overture was performed so effectively that Mr. Rabaud was thrice called on for acknowledgment of the applause. The overture has other conspicuous qualities than brilliance; haunting melody, harmonies that were not common at the time they were written, true sentiment—even in the measures that interrupt the beautiful theme for violoncello—richly colored instrumentation. And this overture and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Suite gave full opportunity for solo players, as Messrs. Fradkin, Malkin, Laurent, Longy, Sand, Laus, Jaenicke to show their technical skill and musical intelligence. "Scheherazade" was again an epitome of "The Thousand Nights and a Night."

Mr. de Gogorza, who sang here for the first time at a concert of the Symphony Orchestra, gave a noble reading of Gluck's noble aria. The sugary tune of Massenet was evidently more to the taste of the audience, this tune sung by the villain Scindia as a "ballad made to his mistress' eyebrow." It is a pleasure to hear Mr. de Gogorza, whatever his selection, but we like to think of him today as declaiming and singing in the pure and grand style the Sophoclean music of Gluck. That he sang Scindia's syrupy measures in the appropriately Massenetian manner, proved his versatility, if such evidence was needed at this late day.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program for next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will be as follows: Franck, symphonic piece from "The Redemption"; Saint-Saens, "Le rouet d'Omphale"; Berlioz, Royal Hunt and Storm, descriptive symphony from "Les Troyens"; Schumann, Symphony No. 2.

GILBERT'S PROLOGUE PERFORMED

Surpassingly Brilliant List Played by Symphony

BY OLIN DOWNES

Henry F. Gilbert's symphonic prologue to Synge's drama, "Riders to the Sea," was performed for the first time in Boston at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

The soloist of the occasion was Emilio de Gogorza, baritone, who sang airs by Gluck and Massenet. The concert opened with Lalo's overture to the opera, "Le roi d'Ys," and came to an end with a surpassingly brilliant performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade."

GILBERT'S PROLOGUE

Lalo's overture is an extremely brilliant piece of music, and all that was dramatic in it was revealed by Mr. Rabaud. The effect of the music was surprising, for it is clearly music of another period, and a combination of excellent orchestration and the romanticism, translated in terms of the French theatre of Carl Maria von Weber.

Mr. Rabaud also devoted his best gifts as a musician and conductor to the remarkable music of Mr. Gilbert. The prologue to "Riders to the Sea" is an amplification and an extended development of material found in a very brief prelude which Mr. Gilbert wrote for an amateur performance of the play years ago in this city. The prelude was intended only to establish atmosphere for the raising of the curtain. The prologue is in a sense an orchestral unfoldment of the principal motives of the drama. There is tumultuous music of the sea. Against the background, as it were, of the storm, the instruments make lament. At last there is a mood of melancholy and resignation—the thought of the old mother, in Synge's drama, whose lost son has perished, and from whom the sea can take no more.

Measures of Titanic Quality

Very few modern composers of whom we know have succeeded in speaking in such an elemental and impressive manner as has Mr. Gilbert in the earlier pages of this prologue. And the music is far more than a sea-scape. It is fatalistic. Passages of haunting beauty and melancholy are born of the Celtic imagination from which Synge's drama sprang. Mr. Gilbert's belief in the value and the logic of the employment of folk-song by the individual composer is ideally justified in this work, since the thematic fragment of Irish folk-song which is the germinal motive of the composition is in itself eloquent of the essence of the drama; and this oneness of mood and musical material is never lost as the composition progresses.

The instrumentation, perhaps over-heavy in places, is nevertheless full of originality and dramatic and almost scenic suggestion. It is as the instrumentation of a tempest, dark, sombre, wild and eerie in its echo of sounds of the storm. There are measures of titanic quality, as for example, those in which mighty progressions of the brass choir are heard over the rolling and pounding of drums. Like most of Mr. Gilbert's composition, this one says its say in an unpolished, direct manner, which is not invariably, perhaps the most transparent and advantageous expression of the thought; but it grips and thrills the hearer, because of the sincerity, the nature poetry, the rugged force and sweep of the music.

Mr. De Gogorzas Singing

This music was flanked on the one hand by Lalo's brilliant composition; on the other, by the excellent singing of Mr. De Gogorza. Mr. Gilbert's music stirred profoundly a minority and mystified a majority, more responsive to an amorous air of Massenet than to the work of a creative musician, comparatively little known and unsung in his own land. The minority applauded the prologue for many minutes, and heads were craned for the composer, who, however, kept himself in the background. Notwithstanding the technical brilliancy, color and high artistic value of other music on the programme; notwithstanding the novelty of Mr. Gilbert's musical speech and its disconcerting effect on many of the hearers, the prologue to "Riders to the Sea" stands out in retrospect as one of the most salient and impressive features of the concert.

Mr. De Gogorza is an exceptionally accomplished singer, who knows how to use his voice and how to treat a melodic line. He sang the recitative and air, "Diane impitoyable," from Gluck's "Iphigenie in Aulide," and the recitative and air, "Promesse de mon avenir," from Massenet's "Rol de Lahore." He was particularly fortunate in the music of Massenet, in which his admirable phrasing and vocal art and his feeling for this music fired the enthusiasm of his hearers.

"Scheherazade"

The culminating point of the concert was the memorable performance of the "Scheherazade" music. At last the Oriental extravagance, the scintillating colors, the barbaric fantasy of this work were fully revealed. Other conductors have given as effective a reading of the first movement, the most truly symphonic of the four, but none that we remember has given the other movement the splendor and excitement of yesterday's performance. Nor have they so successfully accentuated every fascinating detail of rhythm and instrumental effect, while holding consistently to the main ideas and outlines a composition bewildering in its constant and kaleidoscopic transformation.

Nor was there lacking the brutality and the unbridled sensuality of the East. From the preliminary exorcism of the brass to the last measure in which the sea heaves restlessly in the depths of the double basses, Mr. Rabaud held captive the attention and emotions of his hearers, slaves of the ring, enchanted by a masterpiece of Slavic art.

RABAUD'S REMARKABLE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mr Rabaud continues to find new distinction in his programs, his interpretations, in his office in general as conductor. Although there were significant novelties yesterday afternoon, the supreme memory of many no doubt will be the overwhelmingly brilliant performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's sensuous suite "Scheherazade." No such performance of it is to be recalled among many in Boston within a decade, which had their merits, none which approached it in appreciation of the Slavic intensity of this music of exotic subject, or of its scintillant, dazzling wealth of color.

Mr Gogorza, singing a classic air of Gluck and a modern one from Massenet, was a moving interpreter and warmly applauded. The four airs and dances from the ballet music of Rameau's "Hippolyte and Aricie," chosen by Mr Rabaud and d'Indy's suites, and played for the first time in Boston, were of exceeding charm, gracious and refreshing in their archaic quality, especially in the final "Rigaudon en Tambourin" with its obsolete military drum and the piccolo, a substitute for the flageolet.

Henry F. Gilbert's Symphonic Prologue to Synge's grim folk drama, "Riders to the Sea," was played for the first time in Boston. Heard in Peterboro, N.H., at its first performance August, 1914, at the MacDowell festival, even as performed with an orchestra of 40 and necessarily with brief rehearsal, this score at once excited interest and admiration for its vitality, character and tragic force.

The two dominant ideas of the play are reflected in the prologue—the sacrificial fury of the sea and the spiritual calm which it may leave even to those bereaved of its victims. A father and five sons, fisher folk of the Aran Islands, have gone as prey to the inexorable, pitiless hunger of the sea. To the aged mother a sixth boy remains. He, too, is taken.

From the opening bodeful theme in deep strings there is the omen of tragedy. It is as though the great deep already had sealed the doom of its hapless humans. That which follows is worthy to rank with the great music, catching the note of thunder, terror and treachery of the sea, its implacable greed and elemental force. The answering apotheosis of resignation is a lofty and noble expression of grief. It ascends to spiritual heights.

The score as a whole, while involving some repetition of material in its present expanded form over the earlier version, is a far more mature expression of Mr Gilbert's talent and denotes a clearer individuality than his better known Comedy Overture or the ballet, "Dance in Place Congo." Like the sea and the simple fishermen it betrays, this music is elemental, even racial in its folk consciousness. Mr Gilbert acknowledged a cordial reception.

The concert began with a remarkably brilliant and dramatic performance of Lalo's overture to "The King of Is."

The orchestra, in virtuosity, euphony, plasticity and in a wealth of emotional ardor, was a glorious instrument upon which Mr Rabaud played at will, making it an equally appropriate mouth-piece for Rameau's quaint archaisms as for Rimsky-Korsakow's gorgeous, erotic, Oriental pageantry.

While this latter may ostensibly have been written around the tales of Sinbad, the Kalendar, the Prince and Princess, and of the ship which shivered in pieces upon the rock yesterday with unprecedented eloquence, the composer was not unmindful of the charms of the teller of them, nor of "Scheherazade's" beguilement of her lord for a thousand and one nights nor of the voluptuous setting of the harem.

The program will be repeated tonight. The concerts next Friday and Saturday respectively will be given as the season's second pair of concerts scheduled for October, but postponed through the closing of halls and theatres.

Gilbert and Synge

On Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next at the Symphony Concerts, Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra will play for the first times in Boston, Mr. Henry Gilbert's "Symphonic Prologue to Synge's Tragedy, 'Riders to the Sea,'" thus bringing back to Symphony Hall a composer whose music has gone unheard in it far too long. Synge's play is familiar to many on the printed page and in performance by the Irish company of the Abbey Theatre in Dublin during its visits, a few years ago to Boston and other cities of the United States. A paragraph will suffice to recall it.

The impact of "Riders to the Sea" is not the impact of a tragedy in little or the impact of what it is the patronizing custom to call a tragedy of the humble. Rather it is the impact of tragedy concentrated and distilled to its final essence. The great doom of the sea upon those that go down into it or even dwell beside it fills the play as Fate fills the old tragedies. Men and women palter with this doom as gods and heroes paltered with Fate, in fond belief that they may withstand or trick it. The sea swallows Maurya's five sons, even as Fate smote the seven that warred against Thebes. Maurya's daughters wail and will not be comforted, and so they who saw and loved and endured wailed in the old tragedy. But Maurya herself bows in resignation; for she has learned that the sea, which to her and hers is Fate, is the stronger. And in the learning she has seen portents in the air and listened to vain counsels and words of false comfort and seen futile ruses that were of none effect. Here is the whole substance of the ancient tragedy of Fate wrought into this stark tragedy of the sea and these Irish islanders beside it. From Mycenae and Thebes, Fate has come down into Galway. Like the pillar of fire, the imagination and the power of Synge have led it there.

So runs the play. In the autumn of 1917, the Philharmonic Society in New York played Mr. Gilbert's music of prologue and the reviewer for The Times then wrote of it.

The piece presents, according to the composer's programme-note, "the two dominant moods of Synge's Irish tragedy, 'Riders to the Sea.' There is the elemental mood of the impersonal, the irrevocable sea; and then the human emotion, the lament or song of grief." The music itself is of strong and vigorous imaginative power. There is the touch of Irish idiom in it that befits its reference to Synge's play. The mood is gloomy throughout; the mood of crushed grief, of resignation. The lack of contrast is necessary to the subject; but it puts a burden upon the music. Mr. Gilbert's orchestration finely heightens the expression of his musical ideas; it throws a sure touch, a confident application of means to the desired end. The piece made no ordinary impression, and Mr. Gilbert was called several times to bow his acknowledgments.

The reviewer for The Tribune was hardly less well-disposed, saying:

The composition is a well-written, melodious presentation of the moods evoked by the dramatist, and especially in the opening portion ideas are worked out in an interesting fashion. Later on there were moments of monotony, though this was perhaps excusable because of the sombreness of the subject. The piece is far from revolutionary in ideas or manner, but it is simple, and, what is rare with American composers, it is vigorous in spirit. Mr. Gilbert's is certainly one of the few genuine native musical talents existent today.

Music in Boston

Specialty for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—A miscellaneous program, all of interesting compositions, together with a soloist who caught the popular approval, made the Friday afternoon concert of the fifteenth pair in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season one of great satisfaction. Musical amusement apparently was the chief aim of this program, and it fulfilled its mission. A first time in Boston performance of Henry Gilbert's "Symphonic Prologue to J. M. Synge's Play, 'Riders to the Sea,'" which was the third the work has received, indicated a praiseworthy attempt on the part of Mr. Rabaud to encourage American writers who are worth encouraging, and Mr. Gilbert is emphatically that. The part of the prologue descriptive of the sea is an uncommonly fine bit of writing, but that part which is meant to represent human grief strikes the present reviewer as less sincerely felt and less effectively scored. The program began with Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'Ys," and included also airs de ballet from Rameau's "Hippolyte et Aricie" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade." Emilio de Gogorza, the soloist, sang the recitative and air, "Diane Impitoyable," from Gluck's "Iphigénie en Aulide," and the recitative and air from Massenet's "Le Roi de Lahore," "Promesse de Mon Avenir." He was in good voice and was liberally applauded.

An interested visitor at the concert was Emil Oberhoffer, the excellent conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, who is on a visit to Eastern cities. Mr. Oberhoffer was emphatic in his approval of Mr. Rabaud as a conductor and the orchestra as a band.

On the evening of Thursday, Feb. 20, the Flonzaley Quartet gave the second of its Boston series of concerts, playing the new "Music for Four Stringed Instruments in E minor" by Charles Martin Loeffler, in particular, and incidentally Alberic Magnard's serenade from the string quartet op. 16 and the Schubert D minor quartet. Mention of the Loeffler music was made in these columns on Monday, Feb. 17, after its first presentation in New York, and the present reviewer feels constrained to agree with his New York colleague that Mr. Loeffler has written, especially in the second and third movements, music that is worthy its inspiration, and that represents the best the composer has yet done.

Symphony Exempt from Tax

One of President Wilson's first official duties after his landing will be to sign the new revenue law which contains a clause of special interest to patrons of Symphony concerts. The new law proposes to exempt symphony orchestras (which are considered neither luxuries nor financially profitable).

Last autumn, when the season tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts were placed on sale, the United States was straining every nerve to help win the war, and it was proposed at that time to tax all concerts at the rate of 20 per cent. These things, with the epidemic which postponed the opening of the Symphony season, resulted in many former patrons of the orchestra relinquishing their seats in the interest of economy. The management made a departure from earlier seasons by continuing to offer tickets for the remainder of the season at a pro rata basis. This offer has been taken advantage of by a great many. It is now especially attractive because of the prospect of no further taxes on admission to these concerts, though the date of the application of the new law is not yet fixed.

Boston's musical season has usually opened with Symphony concerts the middle of October, and closed with the last pair of Symphony concerts the first week in May. The proximity of the close of the present season can best be realized by noting the fact that only ten pairs of Symphony concerts remain. The opportunity to subscribe at this time is made the more tempting by the special nature of the ten pairs of concerts to come.

For two programmes in the concerts to follow two interesting choral works are under preparation, Debussy's "Nocturnes," with a woman's chorus of "Sirens," and Saint-Saens' cantata, "The Lyre and the Harp," the parts of which have just arrived from France. In this latter work, besides a chorus of 150 voices, there will be a distinguished quartet, including Olive Kline, soprano; Merle Alcock, contralto; Arthur Hackett, tenor, and Reinald Werrenrath, baritone.

Soloists at other concerts will be Joseph Malkin, the first 'cellist of the orchestra; Harold Bauer, always a favorite in Boston; Jacques Thibaud, the foremost French violinist; Raoul Laparra, Spanish composer-pianist, who is to play in a new suite of his own, "A Basque Sunday"; Miss Sophie Braslau, the rich-voiced young contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

Also, from the purely orchestral point of view, these concerts should be the finest of the season. The gradual moulding of the orchestra under the alert and exacting ear of their leader, has been a matter of general comment. Furthermore (as indicated by the consensus of critical opinion in the various cities visited) appreciation is now no less established of Mr. Rabaud's success in the making of programmes, which are both interesting and beautiful.

Those who take advantage of this opportunity to become subscribers will be granted every privilege, including that of retaining their seats for next fall.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1918--19.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

HENRI RABAUD, Conductor.

TO BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SUBSCRIBERS SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT

The second pair of Symphony Concerts scheduled for October and postponed because of the closing of all Halls and Theatres will be given in Symphony Hall

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, FEBRUARY 28, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, MARCH 1, at 8 o'clock

Ticket Information — Please Read Carefully

Tickets dated Friday Afternoon, October 18, 1918, to be used

Friday Afternoon, February 28

Tickets dated Saturday Evening, October 19, 1918, to be used

Saturday Evening, March 1

human grief strikes the present reviewer as less sincerely felt and less effectively scored. The program began with Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'Ys," and included also airs de ballet from Rameau's "Hippolyte et Aricie" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade." Emilio de Gozgorza, the soloist, sang the recitative and air, "Diane Impitoyable," from Gluck's "Iphigénie en Aulide," and the recitative and air from Massenet's "Le Roi de Lahore," "Promesse de Mon Avenir." He was in good voice and was liberally applauded.

An interested visitor at the concert was Emil Oberhoffer, the excellent conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, who is on a visit to Eastern cities. Mr. Oberhoffer was emphatic in his approval of Mr. Rabaud as a conductor and the orchestra as a band.

On the evening of Thursday, Feb. 20, the Flonzaley Quartet gave the second of its Boston series of concerts, playing the new "Music for Four Stringed Instruments in E minor" by Charles Martin Loeffler, in particular, and incidentally Alberic Magnard's serenade from the string quartet op. 16 and the Schubert D minor quartet. Mention of the Loeffler music was made in these columns on Monday, Feb. 17, after its first presentation in New York, and the present reviewer feels constrained to agree with his New York colleague that Mr. Loeffler has written, especially in the second and third movements, music that is worthy its inspiration, and that represents the best the composer has yet done.

Symphony Exempt from Tax

One of President Wilson's first official duties after his landing will be to sign the new revenue law which contains a clause of special interest to patrons of Symphony concerts. The new law proposes to exempt symphony orchestras (which are considered neither luxuries nor financially profitable).

Last autumn, when the season tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts were placed on sale, the United States was straining every nerve to help win the war, and it was proposed at that time to tax all concerts at the rate of 20 per cent. These things, with the epidemic which postponed the opening of the Symphony season, resulted in many former patrons of the orchestra relinquishing their seats in the interest of economy. The management made a departure from earlier seasons by continuing to offer tickets for the remainder of the season at a pro rata basis. This offer has been taken advantage of by a great many. It is now especially attractive because of the prospect of no further taxes on admission to these concerts, though the date of the application of the new law is not yet fixed.

Boston's musical season has usually opened with Symphony concerts the middle of October, and closed with the last pair of Symphony concerts the first week in May. The proximity of the close of the present season can best be realized by noting the fact that only ten pairs of Symphony concerts remain. The opportunity to subscribe at this time is made the more tempting by the special nature of the ten pairs of concerts to come.

For two programmes in the concerts to follow two interesting choral works are under preparation. Debussy's "Nocturnes," with a woman's chorus of "Sirens," and Saint-Saens' cantata, "The Lyre and the Harp," the parts of which have just arrived from France. In this latter work, besides a chorus of 150 voices, there will be a distinguished quartet, including Olive Kline, soprano; Merle Alcock, contralto; Arthur Hackett, tenor, and Reinald Werrenrath, baritone.

Soloists at other concerts will be Joseph Malkin, the first cellist of the orchestra; Harold Bauer, always a favorite in Boston; Jacques Thibaud, the foremost French violinist; Raoul Laparra, Spanish composer-pianist, who is to play in a new suite of his own, "A Basque Sunday"; Miss Sophie Braslau, the rich-voiced young contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

Also, from the purely orchestral point of view, these concerts should be the finest of the season. The gradual moulding of the orchestra under the alert and exacting ear of their leader, has been a matter of general comment. Furthermore (as indicated by the consensus of critical opinion in the various cities visited) appreciation is now no less established of Mr. Rabaud's success in the making of programmes, which are both interesting and beautiful.

Those who take advantage of this opportunity to become subscribers will be granted every privilege, including that of retaining their seats for next fall.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1918-19.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

HENRI RABAUD, Conductor.

TO BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SUBSCRIBERS SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT

The second pair of Symphony Concerts scheduled for October and postponed because of the closing of all Halls and Theatres will be given in Symphony Hall

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, FEBRUARY 28, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, MARCH 1, at 8 o'clock

Ticket Information — Please Read Carefully

Tickets dated Friday Afternoon, October 18, 1918, to be used

Friday Afternoon, February 28

Tickets dated Saturday Evening, October 19, 1918, to be used

Saturday Evening, March 1

BOSTONIAN WINS IN BIG MUSIC RACE

Gilbert's 'All Hail, America,' Takes 4th Prize
Among 20,000 Entries

CONTEST RUN BY HEARST PAPERS

Internationally Famous as Composer, First Fiddle Made of Cigar Box

Adv. & Am. Apr. 27, 1919
Greater Boston furnishes one of the prize-winners in the $5,000 Patriotic Song Contest conducted by the Hearst newspapers.

The beautiful song, "All Hail, America," composed by Henry F. Gilbert of Cambridge, wins fourth prize out of the enormous field of 20,000 compositions submitted.

It is particularly interesting to note that Mr. Gilbert, now a composer of international fame, first taught himself to play on an old fiddle which his grandfather whittled out of a cigar box.

Today his compositions move in the very aristocracy of music, such as

HENRY F. GILBERT, Cambridge composer, who won the fourth prize in the Patriotic song contest by the Hearst newspapers.

Boston Symphony Orchestra programs and at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York.

Mrs. Gilbert has an initial hand in the musical honor which Mr. Gilbert has just gained in the Patriotic Song Contest. She brought the prize competition to his attention by thrusting a newspaper with the announcement of it under the door of his musical workroom, where he could not escape seeing it.

20,000 WERE SUBMITTED

The 20,000 manuscripts submitted in the contest were passed upon by Josef Stransky, John McCormack, John Philip Sousa, John L. Golden and Irving Berlin. The fifteen which they selected as best were voted upon by the 4,000,000 readers of the Hearst newspapers from the Atlantic to the Pacific. When the awards were made, the sealed envelopes containing the names of the different composers were opened, and it was found that Mr. Gilbert was winner of the fourth prize. Mr. Gilbert said yesterday:

"In writing the verses of my 'All Hail, America,' I desired to call again to the minds of fellow Americans those noble ideals of Liberty, Justice and Brotherhood in which our country is founded; to stir them with deep patriotism and a love for these ideals which in these troublous times run the risk of being lost sight of;
and in the music I have striven to express the nobility and dignity which I believe should never be absent from the national hymn of a great people."

SIMPLE, NOBLE THEME.

Simple and noble in theme, and of a sturdy rhythm, Mr. Gilbert's song is sure to win instant favor. Compositions of his have recently been produced with great success in London, Paris and Rome, and two of his works will also soon be produced in Copenhagen. He is, in addition, probably the American composer best known in Russia.

His symphonic ballet, "The Dance in Place Congo," was produced at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, in March of last year, and was later produced in Boston, being hailed with wide acclaim.

M. Rabaud included Gilbert's Symphonic Prologue to J. M. Synge's drama, "Riders to the Sea," in the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of February 21 and 22, and the number scored a great success.
It was the first time it had been played at these concerts.

Mr. Gilbert's "Comedy Overture on Negro Themes" was successfully rendered at the Peace Festival held in Mechanics Hall this Spring. It had previously been played here as well as elsewhere in America and Europe, being always received with great favor. When this number was performed in Russia, at about the time the war began, Reinhold Gliere, head of the Russian-American Musical Society, and himself one of the foremost contemporaneous musicians, said of it: "It is melodious, pleasing and well orchestrated. America should be proud of a genius like Gilbert." The triumph Gilbert's music then won has been repeated on many occasions since, in Russia.

SELF-MADE MUSICIAN.

Picturesque and essentially American as his music is Gilbert himself.
He was born in Somerville in 1868.
After teaching himself to play on his grandfather's cigar-box fiddle he studied harmony with George Henry Howard of Boston, and later was the first American pupil of Edward Mac-Dowell, upon the latter's return after his European successes. Meantime, his insatiable thirst for new experiences led him to various places, and took him into many picturesque callings. He fiddled in theatres, jobbed in restaurants, was a pie-cutter at an eating place at the Chicago World's Fair, worked his way to Paris on a cattle boat, collected butterflies in Florida, with an Arab for companion.
This rich experience forms a splendid asset to the composer.

SOME OF HIS WORKS.

Among Gilbert's earlier compositions were "A Negro Episode,"
"Legend," the famous "Pirate Song," —"Fifteen Men on a Dead Man's Chest," from "Treasure Island," made popular by David Bispham;
"Croon of the Dew," "South American Gypsy Songs," some Celtic folksongs, including "Celtic Studies" and the "Fairy Song," "Fish Wharf Rha-pody." Then followed the more distinctly American compositions, including besides those already mentioned, the massive orchestral "Negro Rhapsody."

In addition to his many other notable compositions, including numbers based upon the Indian folk-songs, Mr. Gilbert has written a number of brilliant essays on subjects pertaining to music and musicians, contributed to leading musical journals and he has been a lecturer at Harvard and Columbia.

There will be no Rehearsal and Concert next week

16 - 1

237

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1918--19.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

HENRI RABAUD, Conductor.

SIXTEENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 28, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, MARCH 1, AT 8 P. M.

FRANCK,

SYMPHONIC PIECE from the Symphonic Poem,
"La Rédemption"

SAINT-SAËNS

SYMPHONIC POEM, No. 1, "Le Rouet d'Omphale" op. 31

BERLIOZ,

DESCRIPTIVE SYMPHONY, "Chasse et Orage," from "Les Troyens"
[First time at these Concerts]

SCHUMANN,

SYMPHONY No. 2, in C major, op. 61
I. Sostenuto assai; Allegro ma non troppo
II. Scherzo; Allegro vivace; Trio 1 Trio 2
III. Adagio espressivo
IV. Allegro molto vivace

SYMPHONY PLAYS WORK OF BERLIOZ

Post ———— Mch. 2/19
First Hearing of His Music From "The Trojans"

BY OLIN DOWNES

The symphonic piece from Franck's "Redemption," Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," the "descriptive symphony" from Berlioz's opera, "Les Troyens," played for the first time at these concerts, and Schumann's C major symphony made the programme of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

BERLIOZ AT HIS BEST

The music of Berlioz inevitably suggests the scenic pantomime—that of the hunt and the storm—which the composer intended the "symphony" to accompany when his opera, practically unknown in the United States, was performed. But Berlioz himself was by no means sure of its effect with the spectacle on the stage. He wondered whether the music would sound better in the concert room, without action and scenery, and many critics of his music support this view. There are scenes best imagined, just as a good musician may take up a score and, reading it, hear in his head a finer performance than ever mortal musicians gave. Papier-mache dramas are often disillusionizing. On the other hand, this composition heard yesterday combines imagination and realism in such a way that the music is superlatively stimulating to ear and fancy.

Those familiar with all the pages of Berlioz' operatic trilogy, one of the last and dearest children of his brain, say that nerve and brain fag is shown in the score of "The Trojans."

But the "descriptive symphony" of the hunt and the storm is the composer at his descriptive best—beautiful themes, such as the theme for solo horn heard as the orchestra subsides from the storm music, brilliant and distinguished instrumentation. When many instruments are used they make imposing effects. When all is said and done, there is a classic fineness in the thought. Berlioz knew Virgil from his early youth, knew him and loved him. Virgil taught him more when he composed "The Trojans" than his harmony textbooks ever taught him. The impress of the classical tale, the imprint of the dramatic and the noble antique is, we feel, in this music. It is a pity that it has waited so long for a hearing at the Symphony concerts.

Franck and Saint-Saens

The pieces by Franck and Saint-Saens are familiar. Perhaps the piece from "The Redemption," is not so representative of the greater Franck as "Le Rouet d'Omphale" is typical of Saint-Saens.

The Schumann symphony, too, is familiar, but it is familiarity which wears exceedingly well. Mr. Rabaud appeared to us to conduct this work with exceptional native sympathy for it. He made no attempt to touch up or soften down the short-comings of instrumentation easily to be observed. On the other hand, he made the most of every phrase and of each of the charming instrumental effects which are encountered in the introduction and the passage just preceding the reprise of the first movement—passages in which Schumann, free of the dictates of form, is most inimitably himself; of the second trio of the scherzo; the poetic and intrinsically Schumannish entrances of wind instruments in the slow movement. Above all, they had the youthful simplicity, the romantic tenderness and glow of the music at heart.

Faithful to Schumann

Schumann's thought did not change in fundamental character when he used many instruments instead of one. He is as naive, as confiding in the symphony as he is in the "Davidsbund-lertanze" for piano, though more stiffly so. It is not as a great symphony that this work should be played. Mr. Rabaud did not inflate the voice of the composer, to make it shout with the sound of many trumpets. Instead, he made the orchestra the instrument of the sly and intimate confessions of a romantic poet.

16TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Mr. Rabaud Gives Impressive Reading of Fine
Program

BERLIOZ PIECES ARE RARE TREAT

Herald — Mch. 2/19
By PHILIP HALE

The 16th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Rabaud, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Franck, Symphonic Piece from "The Redemption"; Saint-Saens, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel"; Berlioz, "Royal Hunt and Tempest" from the opera
"The Trojans" (first time in Boston);
Schumann, Symphony No. 2, C major.

Some of the French evidently think highly of the orchestral Intermezzo in Franck's "Redemption." The orchestra of the Paris Conservatory concerts gave it a prominent place on its programs when it visited this country. It is true that the long continued melody at the beginning is beautiful; there are passages also which have the spirituality that characterizes the music of Franck when he is in his loftiest mood, but the composition is not a sustained flight.
The trombone phrase, which to M. Destranges is "the affirmation of a Credo," might easily have been invented by a more earthly composer even by the late
M. Massenet—for so he liked to be known, abhorring for some reason his honest Christian name of Jules—or by some other writer for the opera house. Yet the intermezzo on the whole is a sonorous, pleasing composition. M. Rabaud certainly gave an impressive reading, one that almost persuaded the hearer that the music itself deserved the glowing praise bestowed on it by M. d'Indy and others.

On the other hand, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" is one of Saint-Saens's most delightful works. Not only is it conspicuous for exquisite fancy and delicate treatment; it is enchanting by its irony. No doubt Saint-Saens smiled when he wrote in the little note on the fly-leaf: "Persons who are interested in looking up details will see on page 19 (letter J) Hercules groaning in the bonds he cannot break, and on page 32 (letter L) Omphale mocking the vain efforts of the hero."

As we have said before, Saint-Saens, unlike Liszt, does not take his symphonic poems too seriously. He was musically serious for when he wrote them, he was fastidious as an artist;
but the program itself did not master him. If Anatole France had been a musician, he could have composed "Omphale's Spinning Wheel." The subject would have delighted him by its irony—the hero, the strong man, a victim of woman's wiles. Note Saint-Saens unerring sense of proportion:
There is not too much realism in the musical whirl of the wheel; nor does the wheel revolve until it frets the nerves of the hearer. Hercules groans lustily and one can see him straining to break the bonds; but to depict this the composer did not call upon a thunderous orchestra. Hercules here is not a Samson pulling down the temple.
How feminine the piping, mocking music of Omphale! Mr. Longy played these measures with delicious coquetry.
The whole performance was indeed, admirable.

The music of Berlioz, heard here, to the best of our knowledge, for the first time, was composed for a ballet-pantomime in his opera. This pantomime was cut out after the first performance in 1863, because the stage management at the Theatre Lyrique was wretched, so that the pantomime was a burlesque;
also because the shifting of scenery necessitated a wait of 40 minutes. It is not easy to say whether the music would be more effective if it were to be played as the expression of a theatrical scene, with the break of day, sporting Naiads, hunters, tempest (after the manner of Mr. Belasco), satyrs flourishing blazing branches and possibly the sight of Dido and the pious Aeneas making for the same cave. In the score there are measures for a chorus, now singing or shouting unmeaning syllables or the word "Italy!" Heard yesterday as absolute music, this descriptive symphony was curious and interesting.
Berlioz was a passionate lover of Virgil from his boyhood. He endeavored to write his opera in the classic Virgilian manner. This excerpt is not in the vein of the Berlioz who was tearing his hair and crying out "Milles tonnerres!" on the slightest occasion. The calm opening is effective by its simplicity; the horn calls of the hunter are not conventional; the tempest might even be called Virgilian in its sobriety. Mr.
Rabaud is to be thanked for acquainting the audience with this side of Berlioz's genius.

If Schumann had been more skilful in orchestration would his symphonies rank higher today? There have been attempts to re-orchestrate certain movements, it is said, but the revised scoring played havoc with the musical ideas. A conductor is often blamed for an "ineffective interpretation" of a symphony by Schumann, when the reproach should be made against Schumann himself, for his symphonic music is often lumbering and tired. Mr. Rabaud was more fortunate with the Symphony in C than many of his colleagues have been. The Scherzo was brilliantly played—and this Scherzo is a test of an orchestra's proficiency.

The Adagio is to be ranked among Schumann's most beautiful conceptions—and yet one wishes that after the long sustained song the composer had not introduced his cut-and-dried contrapuntal episode. Vincent d'Indy is too severe in his judgment of Schumann as a symphonist; but Schumann will live by his songs and piano pieces rather than by his works of more pretentious dimensions.

The concert will be repeated tonight.
The program of the concerts on March 7 and 8 will be as follows: Beethoven, overture to "Coriolanus"; Tchaikowsky, Variations on a Rocco theme for violonecello with orchestra (Joseph Mal-kin, violoncellist); Debussy, Nocturnes-Nuages; Fetes; Sirenes (with female chorus trained by Mr. Townsend); Mendelssohn, Symphony in A major ("Italian").

Symphonic Day on Symphony Program

Adin & Am. — Mch. 2/19
By LOUIS C. ELSON.

Symphony Program.

Franck, Symphonic Piece from Symphonic Poem, "The Redemption."
Saint-Saens, Symphonic Poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale."
Berlioz, Descriptive Symphony, "Chasse et Orage."
Schumann, Symphony in C major, No. 2.

THIS was the program of Friday and Saturday and to the unin-tiated reader it would seem to have been all symphonies. But the word "Symphony" has different meanings. Properly it is a sonata for orchestra and Schumann's work filled this description, although somewhat freely. Then it meant, in France, simply an orchestral work, and the two first numbers fitted this description. It also meant a prelude, interlude or postlude (instrumental) in some larger work, and Berlioz's work was representative of this meaning. The two concerts were entirely orchestral, and they took the place of the second ones in the regular series, postponed on account of our pulmonary troubles, in October.

Cesar Franck's "Redemption" is high as the heavens above Gounod's cheap operatic treatment of the same great subject. Yet Gounod looked upon the greater composer as the apotheosis of dulness. Unfortunatel-ly, however, in the Franck piece, piety and counterpoint go hand in hand, and counterpoint is not always comprehensible to the general public.

There is great skill displayed in the interweaving of many figures in this piece, and M. Rabaud brought them out as clearly as possible, thanks to his instinctive balance of tone, but Franck squeezes the very last drop out of the polyphonic lemon before he let's go of it, and the work is too prolix for any but the trained auditor. There is a grand climax at the end, when trombones are added to the tonal forces, and this made at least a mighty culmination of the work.

Saint-Saens' "Rouet d'Omphale," pictures Hercules entrapped by Omphale into spinning wool (probably assisting her in Red Cross work), which gives the composer a good chance to use a spinning-wheel figure, and everybody knows that Mendelssohn, Wagner, and many other composers are apt to win a popular success with this. It whirled itself into popular favor and was shaded exquisitely, down to the almost inaudible ending in harmonics on solo violin. M.
Rabaud is making up for the neglect of Saint-Saens by Dr. Muck. That director very seldom gave any orchestral work by this master, whom we consider a very agreeable half-way house between Cesar Franck and Gounod, but the "Rouet d'Omphale" is not the greatest of his symphonic poems.

The Schumann symphony was (among all these "symphonic" pieces), the only actual symphony of the concert, and it scarcely comes into the symphonic fold if we adopt the Beethoven measurements. Schumann's orchestration sounds very primitive and neutral-tinted in these lays of regal tone-coloring. It has been well said that one can get as much enjoyment out of a four-hand arrangement of a Schumann symphony as by hearing it in its orchestral setting; but when it comes to musical ideas that is quite another matter, and he is always a master of syncopation, in which the moderns dabble very much without equalling him.

We do not think that M. Rabaud quite senses the dual character of Schumann's work. No other composer was so strongly contrasted. It is not a Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde that we find here, but Florestan and Eusebius, the masculine and the feminine, and the triumphant and the tender ought not to be transformed into the vehement and the placid. But at least we must thank M. Rabaud for including Schumann in his programs, the composer whom D'Indy and Debussy belittle and sneer at.

In Berlioz' "descriptive symphony" Aeneas and Dido went hunting and were caught in a storm without an umbrella, wherefore they had to take refuge in a cave. The excerpt is from the opera of "The Trojans," which was crushed out by the interest in Wagner, which was just then increasing everywhere. Yet we cannot imagine Berlioz making a great success in the vocal parts of his operas. He was an instrumental composer "pur sang."

It is astonishing that this number has escaped Boston performance so long, for it is a remarkable work. There are many thunder storms in music. Berlioz himself has one in the Child Harold Symphony, and Wagner, Beethoven, Saint-Saens and many others have contributed to the musical bad weather, but this is as theatrical as any of them.

The picture of daybreak and the hunting scene made an excellent contrast to the heavier crashes, and the solo horn-playing in the hunting calls was commendable. The only fault in the picture is that it clears up rather suddenly. It was an exciting work and it was excitingly interpreted. M. Rabaud and the orchestra are to be complimented upon its success.

SIXTEENTH CONCERT GIVEN BY RABAUD

Majestic Performance of Franck's Music

Globe

After hearing Mr Rabaud and the orchestra in Berlioz' "Descriptive Symphony, Royal Hunt and Tempest," from his "The Trojans," it would be enlightening to hear it with the action, chorus, declamation, stage setting and mechanical effects which he designated, "acts which may have perplexed the stage director and mechanician of the early '60s, but which, from his account of the first performance, it would seem should have been done better.

Played yesterday for the first time in Boston, this score appears not without a certain incongruity characteristic of Berlioz. It may be that in the theatre this music, as a commentary on pantomime, would appear less incongruous in the scene of the hunt, less boisterous and less a thing of patches. Its precise relation to the dancing satyrs, to the thunderbolt which fired the oak, to the moaning of the rain and the cries of the nymphs would then be clear and, it may be, more significant.

This section of the tempest reminds less of Virgil than of Byron, in whom Berlioz found repeated inspiration. It might have been a paraphrase of the page out of "The Corsair" wherein the flashing saber of the Dervise lays many cleft turbans about the floor, with never an arm upraised to defend.

The music of the awakening forest, introducing the affrightened Naiads with that of the return to the calm of nature at the close, sounds more modern in thought and expression than does Saint-Saens' sophisticated and polished symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," which preceded it.

The performance of the latter was one of becoming elegance and finesse. Mr Rabaud started the spinning wheel with illusion of its gathering momentum, and the course of its journey, as a mere background for the chief figure of woman and her prey in the toils, was done with exquisite nicety. Grateful music, if a little faded, it was permitted its salon graces with a hint of tragedy and appropriately nothing more.

The feature of the concert was the majestic performance of the Symphonic Piece from Franck's "Redemption," heard not long ago by the Paris Conservatoire Orchestra. Again an excerpt from a work claiming the aid of choral voices and a text. The heavenly serenity of the passage for strings was of a sheer beauty yesterday.

The growing clarity and radiance with warmth of the tone of the string choir is noticeable from week to week under present direction. The pontifical motif of the brasses, a solemn declaration of religious faith, but of a faith unshackled by centuries of form, was nobly proclaimed, a motif curiously forecasting the theme which Massenet about 10 years later was to give to his Deo Grioux in "Manon Lescaut."

Schumann's second symphony in D for the most part is moving as an argument for the composer's genius as a romanticist, but in shorter and more intimate forms—the songs, the music for the piano and the chamber. Mr Rabaud was tender, sympathetic, and virile with the symphony, according to the demands either of Eusebius or of Florestan, and with the result that there was dramatic force in the first movement, characteristic humor in the second and the poetic fancy of the dreamer in the slow song.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

AN AFTERNOON OF WELL ORDERED ROUTINE

Trans. — Feb. 1, 1919

Unhackneyed Pieces Yet None of Stimulating Interest — Franck Again and a Resurrection from Saint-Saens—A Novel Number from Berlioz's Music-Drama, "The Trojans"—The Inarticulate Schumann of the Second Symphony

THE Symphony Orchestra has given more interesting concerts than that of yesterday afternoon and assembled larger audiences than then awaited it. No familiar, anticipated, "brilliant" piece graced the programme, as did Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade" a week ago, as will Debussy's "Nocturnes" a week hence. No highly reputed and warmly expected singer or pianist, like Mr. de Gorza or Mr. Rakhmaninov appeared as "assisting artist." Conductor and orchestra had the day to themselves in a programme following Mr. Rabaud's appreciably overworked formula—the classic German symphony, this time Schumann's in C-major; the miscellany of French pieces of the last quarter of the nineteenth century, comprising the "symphonic fragment" from Franck's "poem" for orchestra and chorus, "The Redemption," Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," and a "descriptive symphony"—The Hunt and the Storm—from the music-drama of Berlioz's old age, "The Trojans." The neat and fanciful parlor piece by Saint-Saens has not been played at the Symphony Concerts for many years; the fragment from "The Trojans in Carthage" was wholly new to them; even Schumann's symphony is not exactly of the active repertory. Yet not one or even all three of these numbers were likely to attract, or did attract, the curious over neglected music. Patches of vacant seats, usually tenanted, were plentiful; routine settled upon the concert from the first measures of Franck's long-drawn homily in tones and held firm to the last measures of Schumann's thick-voiced and muddy-hued symphony. Only after Saint-Saens' pretty pastiche was the applause the voice of pleasure and not of courteous reciprocation: while one cynic unkindly said that "The Star-Spangled Banner," played with an eloquence in which no conductor excels Mr. Rabaud, was the most stirring number of the day. Evidently, the "soloists" who have been exceptionally well chosen and exceptionally interesting the season through, have counted not a little in the assembling of the audiences of the winter; while such "popular classics" as "Scheherazade" aforesaid or Beethoven's Fifth Symphony have materially aided. Not yet, by the signs of yesterday, can the reorganized orchestra, excellent as it is, and the present conductor hold their own with the public in the ordinary course, so to say, of symphonic business. In a word, the Symphony Concerts lack a puissant personality and personality is the magnet of magnets with even the hearers of symphonic music.

French and German conductors seem alike in esteem of the "symphonic fragment" from Franck's "Redemption." It was Dr. Muck who brought it into the repertory of the Symphony Orchestra; it was Mr. Rabaud who now continues it there; it was Mr. Messager who included it, as recently as last October, in an occasional concert. Most of the Franckian priests and prophets lavish upon it a praise easier to understand when it is bestowed upon the manifold and magnificent symphony, the fanciful and fascinating Symphonic Variations, the ecstatic "Psyche." Yet, after four hearings, in all of which performance seemed to reveal the music, this intermezzo from "The Redemption" remains a tedious, a pedestrian piece. Up and up go the ascendant motives in larger and larger augmentation, in brighter and brighter harmonic and instrumental dress. There is imposing climax. There is exalted close—or clear purpose to such ending. Fulfilled is the joy of the world in the Christ who has called it out of darkness into light. Franck obviously intended an ecstatic, a luminous, a largely and sweepingly unfolding music. Yet how far he is from the passion of such emotion and such illumination as his symphony outpours it, or even from the erotic ardors of "Psyche." Usually to hear Franck is to hear Franck only; but there are moments in this fragment of "The Redemption" when the late Monsieur Massenet seems to be meditating, Thais-wise, upon holy mysteries, and when a knight of the Grail, Lohengrin by name, has wandered across the Rhine. Franck, being human, must compose at moments by formula, in routine. By not a few signs this intermezzo was written in one of them. The slow solemnities of the dutiful Rabaud enhanced the tedium of the piece; the rich sonorities of the orchestra did not mitigate it.

In turn, the "descriptive symphony" from Berlioz's music-drama yielded similar impression. It occurs in the second act of the second part of "The Trojans." The "Royal Hunt," as the programme called it, is the chase of Dido and Aeneas, of her Carthaginian, of his Trojan, train, what time the fugitives from Troy sojourned in her city. A storm sent by the gods, overtakes the hunters; Dido and Aeneas find refuge in a cave and there begin their fated loves. Vergil has written the lovers' tale and tragedy in the fourth book of the Æneid. Berlioz would clothe it with music as in the first part of his opera, he had clothed the fall of Troy, according to Vergilian record. In the "descriptive symphony," however, he is not concerned with the passion of the Trojan and the Queen. Rather, he is tone-picturing. The dawn stirs in the forest; the light touches the quivering leaves, the white flesh of nymphs flashes between them. The huntsmen disperse the solitude of the scene; the storm darkens the wood. There are cries of affrighted, fleeing sylvan creatures—cries bidding Aeneas to the Italy whence he is sworn to go, away from which he now dallies. The tempest passes. The forest brightens, calms. Again the nymphs play. The warnings and the will of the gods have thundered and stilled.

Now Berlioz writes this music, which is music of his old age, by the taking of thought, by the exercise of resolution and restraint. There are careful measures of the breaking dawn, the tremulous forest—measures that avoid the commonplaces of such tone-picturing and yet bring image, atmosphere. No ordinary horn-calls herald the hunt. They are thoughtful, almost recondite. The tempest repeats none of Berlioz's youthful thunders. It is a decorous, almost a meditative storm. In delicate glow of harmonic and instrumental color, quiet returns to the quivering woodland. Perhaps Berlioz sought to write in the restrained, the concentrated Vergilian manner, with continence of tone in lieu of the poet's continence of word, with each measure as reticent in suggestion, yet as beautiful in imagery, as the poet's line. Perhaps, too, the years, the unrewarding years, had touched him also with chilling fingers. Gone, in any case, are the splendor, the richness, the ardor, the eloquence, the excess of the earlier, the romantic Berlioz—the Berlioz who almost invented the modern orchestra as instrument of intensive tone-picturing. It is good to be informed of this later Berlioz; but a Berlioz producing a meditative, recondite, almost a finical music seems hardly a Berlioz at all. Better he when he makes commonplace flame than when he studiously, subtly avoids the hint of it.

It was possible also to find interest in the contrasts of Saint-Saëns's tone-poem and of Schumann's symphony. The Parisian recalled the queen of Greek legend who held Hercules, enchained, effeminate, in her woman's wiles. What a pretty rhythmic figure, repeated progressively, might be gotten out of the turning of this Omphale's spinning wheel! The "contrasting passage?" Of course Hercules grunting—politely—in his chains. The enchantress mocks him in the oboe—a happy touch of irony. The spinning-wheel whirrs fable and music away. Deftly, elegantly, fancifully, Saint-Saëns concocts his pretty, transparent, little parlor piece. The Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Rabaud polish the performance as prettily, dexterously. Chocolate-box music, if there ever was such a thing, nicely served with frilled paper and silvery tweezers; while an audience little accustomed to candy at a Symphony Concert sets its sweet tooth happily in the confection.

And over against this Saint-Saëns, confectioner of "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," the Schumann who would fain fill symphonies with his romantic visioning and romantic passioning in tones and who usually could not because the filling of a form constrained him, because the manipulation of a medium balked him. Out of a tiny little motive in a piano piece, Schumann could open long vistas; in a phrase, or at most a period, he could pierce others with his own emotions. The piano, with all its limitations, was to him a palette of many colors. Yet the formal prescriptions of the first movement and the finale of a symphony according to the rules of the forties and the fifties and the example of that perfect Mendelssohn over the way, left him dumb as in those two Allegros upon which Mr. Rabaud and his men labored so earnestly. The orchestra proffered him its inexhaustible palette and he could use it only thickly, monotonously, clumsily—until the opportunity comes to him to sing. He can, he does, in the Adagio of this symphony in C major, with the motive for the violins that wings upward and sunward, that the shadows catch and press to a melancholy earth again. Then, for once, the Schumann of another symphony than that of the spring (in which for longer he breaks the shackles) is Schumann. Haply, also, in the Trios of the Scherzo he can sing too and more brightly. But all Mr. Rabaud's pains and fidelities make not elsewhere the Schumann of the symphony in C major an interesting symphonist. Genius itself in a conductor would be baffled by a music in which for measure upon measure the listener sees the whole orchestra going, yet hears not one individual and characterizing voice.

H. T. P.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1918-19.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

HENRI RABAUD, Conductor.

SEVENTEENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, MARCH 7, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, MARCH 8, AT 8 P. M.

BEETHOVEN, OVERTURE to Collins' Tragedy, "Coriolanus, op. 62

TSCHAIKOWSKY, VARIATIONS on a ROCOCO THEME for Violoncello with Orchestral Accompaniment, op. 33

DEBUSSY, NOCTURNES
I. Nuages
II. Fêtes
III. Sirènes, (with chorus of women's voices trained by Stephen S. Townsend)

MENDELSSOHN, SYMPHONY in A major, "Italian," op. 90
I. Allegro vivace
II. Andante con moto
III. Con moto moderato
IV. Saltarello: Presto

Soloist:

JOSEPH MALKIN

Carthaginian, of his Trojan, train, what time the fugitives from Troy sojourned in her city. A storm sent by the gods, overtakes the hunters; Dido and Æneas find refuge in a cave and there begin their fated loves. Vergil has written the lovers' tale and tragedy in the fourth book of the Æneid. Berlioz would clothe it with music as in the first part of his opera, he had clothed the fall of Troy, according to Vergilian record. In the "descriptive symphony," however, he is not concerned with the passion of the Trojan and the Queen. Rather, he is tone-picturing. The dawn stirs in the forest; the light touches the quivering leaves, the white flesh of nymphs flashes between them. The huntsmen disperse the solitude of the scene; the storm darkens the wood. There are cries of affrighted, fleeing sylvan creatures—cries bidding Æneas to the Italy whence he is sworn to go, away from which he now dallies. The tempest passes. The forest brightens, calms. Again the nymphs play. The warnings and the will of the gods have thundered and stilled.

Now Berlioz writes this music, which is music of his old age, by the taking of thought, by the exercise of resolution and restraint. There are careful measures of the breaking dawn, the tremulous forest—measures that avoid the commonplace of such tone-picturing and yet bring image, atmosphere. No ordinary horn-calls herald the hunt. They are thoughtful, almost recondite. The tempest repeats none of Berlioz's youthful thunders. It is a decorous, almost a meditative storm. In delicate glow of harmonic and instrumental color, quiet returns to the quivering woodland. Perhaps Berlioz sought to write in the restrained, the concentrated Vergilian manner, with continence of tone in lieu of the poet's continence of word, with each measure as reticent in suggestion, yet as beautiful in imagery, as the poet's line. Perhaps, too, the years, the unrewarding years, had touched him also with chilling fingers. Gone, in any case, are the splendor, the richness, the ardor, the eloquence, the excess of the earlier, the romantic Berlioz—the Berlioz who almost invented the modern orchestra as instrument of intensive tone-picturing. It is good to be informed of this later Berlioz; but a Berlioz producing a meditative, recondite, almost a finical music seems hardly a Berlioz at all. Better he when he makes commonplace flame than when he studiously, subtly avoids the hint of it.

It was possible also to find interest in the contrasts of Saint-Saëns's tone-poem and of Schumann's symphony. The Parisian recalled the queen of Greek legend who held Hercules, enchained, effeminate, in her woman's wiles. What a pretty rhythmic figure, repeated progressively, might be gotten out of the turning of this. Omphale's spinning wheel! The "contrasting passage?" Of course Hercules grunting—politely—in his chains. The enchantress mocks him in the oboe—a happy touch of irony. The spinning-wheel whirrs fable and music away. Deftly, elegantly, fancifully, Saint-Saëns concocts his pretty, transparent, little parlor piece. The Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Rabaud polish the performance as prettily, dexterously. Chocolate-box music, if there ever was such a thing, nicely served with frilled paper and silvery tweezers; while an audience little accustomed to candy at a Symphony Concert sets its sweet tooth happily in the confection.

And over against this Saint-Saëns, confectioner of "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," the Schumann who would fain fill symphonies with his romantic visioning and romantic passioning in tones and who usually could not because the filling of a form constrained him, because the manipulation of a medium balked him. Out of a tiny little motive in a piano piece, Schumann could open long vistas; in a phrase, or at most a period, he could pierce others with his own emotions. The piano, with all its limitations, was to him a palette of many colors. Yet the formal prescriptions of the first movement and the finale of a symphony according to the rules of the forties and the fifties and the example of that perfect Mendelssohn over the way, left him dumb as in those two Allegros upon which Mr. Rabaud and his men labored so earnestly. The orchestra proffered him its inexhaustible palette and he could use it only thickly, monotonously, clumsily—until the opportunity comes to him to sing. He can, he does, in the Adagio of this symphony in C major, with the motive for the violins that wings upward and sunward, that the shadows catch and press to a melancholy earth again. Then, for once, the Schumann of another symphony than that of the spring (in which for longer he breaks the shackles) is Schumann. Haply, also, in the Trios of the Scherzo he can sing too and more brightly. But all Mr. Rabaud's pains and fidelities make not elsewhere the Schumann of the symphony in C major an interesting symphonist. Genius itself in a conductor would be baffled by a music in which for measure upon measure, the listener sees the whole orchestra going, yet hears not one individual and characterizing voice.

H. T. P.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1918-19.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

HENRI RABAUD, Conductor.

SEVENTEENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, MARCH 7, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, MARCH 8, AT 8 P. M.

- | | |
|---------------|--|
| BEETHOVEN, | OVERTURE to Collins' Tragedy, "Coriolanus, op. 62 |
| TSCHAIKOWSKY, | VARIATIONS on a ROCOCO THEME for Violoncello with Orchestral Accompaniment, op. 33 |
| DEBUSSY, | NOCTURNES |
| | I. Nuages |
| | II. Fêtes |
| | III. Sirènes, (with chorus of women's voices trained by Stephen S. Townsend) |
| MENDELSSOHN, | SYMPHONY in A major, "Italian," op. 90 |
| | I. Allegro vivace |
| | II. Andante con moto |
| | III. Con moto moderato |
| | IV. Saltarello: Presto |

Soloist:

JOSEPH MALKIN

JOSEPH MALKIN

Mr. JOSEPH MALKIN was born at Odessa, Russia, on September 25, 1881. He first took lessons of Ladislav Alois on the violoncello. In 1895 he entered the Paris Conservatory, and in 1898 he was unanimously awarded, as a pupil of Hippolyte Rabaud, the first prize. Only one first prize was awarded that year. In 1899 Mr. Malkin made his debut in Berlin. On December 15, 1899, he gave a concert in Berlin with Mme. Ingeborg Magnus, violinist, and on November 11, 1900, a concert with Max Ulanowsky, baritone. In 1902 Mr. Malkin was appointed first violoncellist of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Berlin. He remained in this position six years. During this time he was the violoncellist of the Witek Trio. Since 1908 he has devoted himself exclusively to concert work. He has made tours in Germany, Austria, England, Denmark, and Russia. His first appearance in the United States was on November 28, 1909, at a Popular Concert in the Manhattan Opera House, New York, when he played Haydn's concerto.

In the fall of 1914 he became a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As soloist he has played in Boston at concerts of this orchestra as follows:—

- 1914, December 12, Haydn's Concerto in D major.
- 1915, December 24, Saint-Saëns's Concerto in A minor.
- 1917, March 30, Dvořák's Concerto in B minor.
- 1918, March 9, Lalo's Concerto.

On January 9, 1916, he played at a Sunday concert in Symphony Hall, with Miss Emmy Destinn, soprano, and an orchestra. He took part in a concert of the Russian Music Society in aid of the Russian Relief Fund, March 29, 1916. On November 29, 1917, he played at a concert in Symphony Hall associated with Mme. Melba and Arthur Hackett, tenor. He took part in the concerts of the Witek-Malkin Trio, February 28 and December 6, 1916.

Recitals: November 22, 1915; November 15, 1916.

SYMPHONY GIVES 17TH CONCERT

Herald — March 8, 1919
Remarkable Interpretation of Beethoven Overture
by Rabaud

PROGRAM INCLUDES DEBUSSY NOCTURNES

By PHILIP HALE

The 17th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Rabaud conductor, took place yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Overture to "Coriolanus;" Tschalkowsky, Variations on a Rococo Theme for violoncello and orchestra; Joseph Malkin (violoncellist); Debussy, Three nocturnes; Mendelssohn, Symphony in A major, "Italian."

Mr. Rabaud gave a remarkable interpretation of Beethoven's overture. We do not recall a performance here or elsewhere that could be compared to it. It was dramatic, but not theatrical. Mr. Nikisch took liberties with the music in the hope of making it more impressive, but he sentimentalized the second and lyrical theme and dragged the final measures beyond endurance. Mr. Rabaud's interpretation was in the Plutarchian spirit. Some one said—was it A. W. Thayer?—of this overture, that he could not understand it—until he read Collin's tragedy; that he could not reconcile the music with Shakespeare's text. Pray, what would the gentleman have had? It is immaterial whether Beethoven had Collin or Shakespeare in mind. The name "Coriolanus" was enough, even if he knew it only from some schoolboy history of Rome; for in this music we hear the proud voice we see the haughty, inexorable bearing of the soldier-patrician. Nor does it matter whether the lyrical theme, as some believe, is the entreating voice of wife or mother. Possibly if one should read Collin's play he would wonder that Beethoven should have thought of writing an overture for it. There it is; one of Beethoven's greatest workers. From his own disdain of the mob from his own contempt for what the public thought of his music, he recognizes in Coriolanus a kindred spirit. Mr. Rabaud comprehended the overture; its aristocratic sternness, austerity. Not for a moment did he allow a perfunctory interpretation because Beethoven died, shaking his fist at a thunder storm, nearly 100 years ago, and now sits enthroned among the immortals in the temple of art. Some conductors are careless of his reputation.

It appears that Debussy before his death made an important revision of his Nocturnes. This revision was heard yesterday for the first time in Boston. Whether it was due to the changes or due to Mr. Rabaud's imaginative interpretation, this is certain: the Nocturnes were more beautiful and haunting than ever before. Never before had the second one been played in riotously festive spirit. At last the music of the third did not apparently belie its title. The chorus had been admirably trained by Mr. Townsend. The last time this Nocturne was performed under the bolsterously enthusiastic Mr. Fiedler the hearer thought that Debussy had intended it for a chorus with orchestral accompaniment, nor would those sirens have drawn mariners to their island; they would have warned them of danger ahead and anticipated bell or foghorn. Yesterday the voices were a part of the orchestra, now relieving, now sustaining, now supplementing. The whole Nocturne was a song, a subtle and an alluring song. Sir Thomas Browne, borrowing the question from the Emperor Tiberius, asked, "What song the Sirens sang?" He admitted that the question was puzzling, but it was not beyond all conjecture. There has been a dispute as to whether their music was vocal, instrumental or a concert of voices, flutes and lyres. The questions were undecided until Claude Debussy wrote music for the tempters of Jason and Ulysses.

With what sensitive, exquisite feeling the first Nocturne was played! For a motto, the prose poem of Baudelaire about the clouds might be on the title page. How enchanting the phrases of the English born as played in these Nocturnes by Mr. Speyer! But he should not be singled out; the whole orchestra yesterday was a band of poetic virtuosi. Mendelssohn's cheerful, but "refined," symphony brought agreeably the close.

JOSEPH MALKIN

Mr. JOSEPH MALKIN was born at Odessa, Russia, on September 25, 1881. He first took lessons of Ladislav Alois on the violoncello. In 1895 he entered the Paris Conservatory, and in 1898 he was unanimously awarded, as a pupil of Hippolyte Rabaud, the first prize. Only one first prize was awarded that year. In 1899 Mr. Malkin made his debut in Berlin. On December 15, 1899, he gave a concert in Berlin with Mme. Ingeborg Magnus, violinist, and on November 11, 1900, a concert with Max Ulanowsky, baritone. In 1902 Mr. Malkin was appointed first violoncellist of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Berlin. He remained in this position six years. During this time he was the violoncellist of the Witek Trio. Since 1908 he has devoted himself exclusively to concert work. He has made tours in Germany, Austria, England, Denmark, and Russia. His first appearance in the United States was on November 28, 1909, at a Popular Concert in the Manhattan Opera House, New York, when he played Haydn's concerto.

In the fall of 1914 he became a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As soloist he has played in Boston at concerts of this orchestra as follows:—

- 1914, December 12, Haydn's Concerto in D major.
- 1915, December 24, Saint-Saëns's Concerto in A minor.
- 1917, March 30, Dvořák's Concerto in B minor.
- 1918, March 9, Lalo's Concerto.

On January 9, 1916, he played at a Sunday concert in Symphony Hall, with Miss Emmy Destinn, soprano, and an orchestra. He took part in a concert of the Russian Music Society in aid of the Russian Relief Fund, March 29, 1916. On November 29, 1917, he played at a concert in Symphony Hall associated with Mme. Melba and Arthur Hackett, tenor. He took part in the concerts of the Witek-Malkin Trio, February 28 and December 6, 1916.

Recitals: November 22, 1915; November 15, 1916.

SYMPHONY GIVES 17TH CONCERT

Herald — Feb. 8, 1919
Remarkable Interpretation
of Beethoven Overture by Rabaud

PROGRAM INCLUDES DEBUSSY NOCTURNES

By PHILIP HALE

The 17th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Rabaud conductor, took place yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Overture to "Coriolanus;" Tschalkowsky, Variations on a Rococo Theme for violoncello and orchestra Joseph Malkin (violoncellist); Debussy, Three nocturnes; Mendelssohn, Symphony in A major, "Italian."

Mr. Rabaud gave a remarkable interpretation of Beethoven's overture. We do not recall a performance here or elsewhere that could be compared to it. It was dramatic, but not theatrical. Mr. Nikisch took liberties with the music in the hope of making it more impressive, but he sentimentalized the second and lyrical theme and dragged the final measures beyond endurance. Mr. Rabaud's interpretation was in the Plutarchian spirit. Some one said—was it A. W. Thayer?—of this overture, that he could not understand it—until he read Collin's tragedy; that he could not reconcile the music with Shakespeare's text. Pray, what would the gentleman have had? It is immaterial whether Beethoven had Collin or Shakespeare in mind. The name "Coriolanus" was enough, even if he knew it only from some schoolboy history of Rome; for in this music we hear the proud voice we see the haughty, inexorable bearing of the soldier-patrician. Nor does it matter whether the lyrical theme, as some believe, is the entreating voice of wife or mother. Possibly if one should read Collin's play he would wonder that Beethoven should have thought of writing an overture for it. There it is; one of Beethoven's greatest workers. From his own disdain of the mob from his own contempt for what the public thought of his music, he recognizes in Coriolanus a kindred spirit. Mr. Rabaud comprehended the overture; its aristocratic sternness, austerity. Not for a moment did he allow a perfunctory interpretation because Beethoven died, shaking his fist at a thunder storm, nearly 100 years ago, and now sits enthroned among the immortals in the temple of art. Some conductors are careless of his reputation.

It appears that Debussy before his death made an important revision of his Nocturnes. This revision was heard yesterday for the first time in Boston. Whether it was due to the changes or due to Mr. Rabaud's imaginative interpretation, this is certain: the Nocturnes were more beautiful and haunting than ever before. Never before had the second one been played in riotously festive spirit. At last the music of the third did not apparently belie its title. The chorus had been admirably trained by Mr. Townsend. The last time this Nocturne was performed under the boisterously enthusiastic Mr. Fiedler the hearer thought that Debussy had intended it for a chorus with orchestral accompaniment, nor would those sirens have drawn mariners to their island; they would have warned them of danger ahead and anticipated bell or foghorn. Yesterday the voices were a part of the orchestra, now relieving, now sustaining, now supplementing. The whole Nocturne was a song, a subtle and an alluring song. Sir Thomas Browne, borrowing the question from the Emperor Tiberius, asked, "What song the Sirens sang?" He admitted that the question was puzzling, but it was not beyond all conjecture. There has been a dispute as to whether their music was vocal, instrumental or a concert of voices, flutes and lyres. The questions were undecided until Claude Debussy wrote music for the tempters of Jason and Ulysses.

With what sensitive, exquisite feeling the first Nocturne was played! For a motto, the prose poem of Baudelaire about the clouds might be on the title page. How enchanting the phrases of the English born as played in these Nocturnes by Mr. Speyer! But he should not be singled out; the whole orchestra yesterday was a band of poetic virtuosi. Mendelssohn's cheerful, but "refined," symphony brought agreeably the close.

It may always be said of Mendelssohn, as of Haydn, that his music is well made. The "i's" are all dotted, the "t's" are all crossed, the handwriting is neat and legible; pleasant thoughts are pleasantly worded; we see the composer sitting with unruffled hair, no ink spots on his wristbands, no sweat upon his brow. He wears the large pin in his shirt front as in the favorite picture. And so the shock is the more severe when hearing the Finale of the symphony, the Saltarello inspired by the Carnival at Rome. We are informed that Mendelssohn, being pelted by "Miss T—, a delicate young Englishwoman"—so Mendelssohn described her, but she must have been a forward person, a bold, shameless hussy—"became quite desperate" and flung confetti back. Yes, the symphony is amiable music, good to hear once in a while as a contrast to much that is merely restlessly "symbolical" today, especially when the symphony is played so finely as it was yesterday.

Mr. Malkin was loudly applauded for his playing of Tchaikowsky's variations, but we have heard him when his performance was of more constant excellence. With these Variations he was not always up to his high standard, yet he often gave pleasure by his tone and his brilliance. As for the Variations, however grateful they may be to a violoncellist, they cannot be ranked among Tchaikowsky's better compositions.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Rimsky-Korsakoff, Sadko; Saint-Saens, Symphony in A minor, No. 2; Bach, Concerto, No. 2, F major, for trumpet, flute, oboe, violin and accompaniment of strings and harpsichord; Florent Schmitt, Musiques de Plein Air; Chabrier, Espana.

Music in Boston Mch. 8/19

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—To ask an audience to turn from the delicate and evanescent beauty of Debussy's nocturnes, even with an intermission intervening, to the conventional, limited and solid tunefulness of Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony is to require more than an adjustment of national and racial interest, it calls for rearrangement of artistic and social standards, to say nothing of stepping into another era of civilization. Debussy's clouds, wandering idly, though clearly defined, through the sky, disappear below the horizon when the orderly Mendelssohnian chords sweep across the orchestra. And this must necessarily be so, for between the Nipponese economy of line of Debussy and the Dutch opulence of description of Mendelssohn a great gulf is fixed and foolish and reactionary is he who would attempt to span it.

So Mr. Rabaud in the seventeenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season set an unsolvable problem before his hearers, especially since the Debussy nocturnes were backed up by the rich harmonies of Tchaikowsky's variations on a "Rococo" theme for violoncello, and all this reenforced by the Beethoven "Coriolanus" overture.

The nocturnes were given for the first time in the United States in the revised version completed by Debussy. As memory serves from a former hearing, the orchestration has been tightened greatly, the outlines made clear and the women's voices in "Sirènes" treated more as a component part of the orchestra. The choir trained by Stephen S. Townsend, which has been used on former occasions, did excellent work, the effacement of the individuals in merely a choir of the orchestra being noticeable. Joseph Malkin, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, was the soloist.

DEBUSSY'S NOCTURNES PERFORMED

Mch. 8. 1909
Post Symphony Assisted By Chorus—Malkin, Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

The programme of the 17th concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, consisted of Beethoven's overture to Collin's tragedy, "Coriolanus," Tchaikowsky's variations on a rococo theme for solo violoncello, with orchestral accompaniment, Debussy's Nocturnes for orchestra, Mendelssohn's Italian symphony.

The soloist was Josef Malkin, first 'cellist of the orchestra. A chorus of female voices trained by Stephen Townsend, assisted the orchestra in the performance of the last of the three "Nocturnes."

DEBUSSY AT HIS ZENITH

These three pieces are as modern today as when they were first heard in Boston in 1904—and the art of music is developing so rapidly that a composition which retains its pristine modernity for the length of 15 years gives reasonable assurance of being a work of genius. There are those who rank these nocturnes as the very high water mark of Debussy's achievement. If all of his other orchestral works were destroyed, these pieces alone would give him the rank he now holds. The first one, "Nuages"—"the unchangeable appearance of the sky, with the slow and solemn march of clouds dissolving in a gray agony tinted with white"—this piece is indeed as a miraculous manifestation of creative power.

It matters little whether, as Mr. Calvocoressi claims, with considerable show of justice, Debussy obtained the suggestion of the harmonic scheme of "Nuages" from Moussorgsky of the later songs or not—Debussy uses the idea after a manner completely his own. He polishes the precious jewel and gives it an incomparable setting. It is the spirit and not the letter which counts in art. Moussorgsky's song—it is one of the cycle "Without Sunlight"—profoundly impressive in itself, is an inspiration native and authentic with the great Russian. Suppose Debussy did help himself to this treasure, as he may well have done? It will be found that his conception, coloring, technic are wholly at variance with like processes in the composition of Moussorgsky.

Not Astonishing in Harmony

The Second Nocturne is not so astonishing in harmony as it is pagan and antique in spirit. Think of anything you like of notes dancing in the sunbeams, of the joy of the forest on a marvellous, windy autumn day, or the wanton play of spirits of the air—it is music sprung from the elements, born of the earth from which the creative artist sprang. And the middle portion of this piece of nature music is of a barbaric pomp and gorgeousness almost, as it seems today—this moment—without parallel. Perhaps the composer was thinking of the sunrise, the sun that rises like trumpets and thunder out of the East, prouder and greater than any ancient king.

There is that in the thrumming and plunking of strings and the splendid summons of the trumpets which causes the heart almost to stop beating in wonder at a phenomenon ever new, and older than humanity itself. How simply it is done, how much every note says, how surely the thought develops to its inevitable fulfilment.

As the 'Song of the Sea

The third Nocturne is as impressionistic, in another vein, as the first—the moonlit sea, the voices of sirens that float over the waters. The song should seem to come from nowhere and from everywhere. It is heard through the sighing of night winds, the grave, calm under-tone of great depths, the swish of spray. It is as the very song of the sea, and the harmonies of the music are as precious and as rare as the colors of mother-of-pearl. It seemed to us—it is a matter of individual impression and opinion, that at times the voices of the singers were too strong, too present, as one might say, not always mysterious and remote enough and not sufficiently homogenous with the orchestral tone. Be it as it may, the music wove its spell—music not heard before Debussy put pen to paper, music which will not be written again, by any composer to come. After the performance Mr. Rabaud brought Mr. Townsend on the stage to acknowledge the applause with him.

Mr. Malkin's Solo

Mr. Malkin, for reasons best known to himself, chose the somewhat lugubrious variations of Tchaikowsky for his display piece. That he played the music like a thorough musician, an experienced and accomplished virtuoso, is and was a foregone conclusion. But why this music? Admitted that good pieces for 'cello are rare, that the 'cello is not an ideal concert instrument—are there not more interesting 'cello suites, concertos, variations for a symphony concert? There is a certain charm in the "rococo" air, but the variations are slight, pretty rather than imaginative, ornamental in a superficial way. The one in dance rhythm, toward the end, is interesting and enlivening. In the cadenza the 'cellist may pluck, and trum, and buzz busily up and down his keyboard as he listeth. What avails it all?

The 'cellist was applauded and recalled. He could have chosen a more worthy vehicle of his skill.

'Coriolanus' a Feature at Symphony

Adm. + Inc. — Mel. 9. 1919.
By LOUIS C. ELSON.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

Beethoven—Coriolanus Overture.
Tchaikowsky—Variations for Cello and Orchestra.

Soloist, Mr. Joseph Malkin.

Debussy—Three Nocturnes.

Mendelssohn—Italian Symphony. A major.

THERE is no question but that Mr. Rabaud knows his Beethoven. His reading of the "Coriolanus" overture was a worthy successor to his great interpretation of that master's fifth symphony, recently given. Although it is not Shakespeare's "Coriolanus" that is here portrayed, one can, nevertheless, easily recognize the mighty general, his pleading family, his assassination and death. The three mighty chords which begin the work and come again in the development and coda were given with great majesty and the sweetly contrasted second theme (the feminine element) was most expressive. Altogether, it was one of Mr. Rabaud's marked successes.

Debussy's Nocturnes are somewhat unequal. The "Nuages" ("Clouds"), which begin the short suite, are not of a nature to suggest a waterproof or an umbrella, but they give the idea of fanciful Summer clouds with some success. Yet we think that this composer could have pictured such a subject better upon the piano than with orchestral forces. The second movement was entitled "Fetes." It did not give the hurly-burly of a festival such as Wagner portrayed in his "Mastersingers," but was none the less in a military mood, and it was read better and with more spirit than we have ever heard it in these concerts.

But the final movement—"Sirens"—was the gem of the work. Here Debussy uses a female chorus with his orchestral forces; not with words (possibly his feeling were too deep for words) but vocalizing on notes, as if the voices were an orchestral tone-color. Debussy was always a master in his employment of female chorus, as witness his setting of the "Blessed Damosel," and as the chorus had been excellently trained by Mr. Stephen Townsend, the ensemble here was very effective. There is in this movement a delicacy and charm which makes it one of Debussy's great successes, and we do not always find him successful in marine pictures, being quite unable to reconcile ourselves to his "La Mer." We're glad to see Mr. Townsend associated with Mr. Rabaud in receiving the applause at the end of the work.

There are a few musicians who hold the A major symphony to be Mendelssohn's best. We cannot rank it with the "Scotch" symphony. There are, however, some excellent touches in the work. The slow movement is one of the good pieces for violas, and Mendelssohn manages to bring out just the brooding melancholy which is the distinguishing characteristic of the instrument. The suavity of the counterpoint all through this delicious movement, which we hold to be the gem of the symphony, is remarkably attractive. Mendelssohn was able to be learned without becoming ascetic or abstruse, and this movement wins musician and laity alike, as it did on this occasion. It was finely read and played.

Spite of the excitement and dash of the Salterello which ends the work, we believe that many Kapellmeisters could have written a movement of this type. It has by no means the originality which is displayed in the A minor symphony finale, and we can add that Mendelssohn seems to have been the only German composer who attained the real Scottish flavor. The soloist of the concert was the excellent young violoncellist, Mr. Malkin. He has abundant technique and has poetry and temperament besides. Tchaikowsky's theme is a quaint, old-fashioned thing, in the formal "Two-period" shape with return of the first phrase at the close. Such a theme is easily followed through the various embroideries and changes, particularly when it has strong rhythmic effects and modulations as this melody has. It is true violoncello music besides, displaying many points of technique. There was some broad work on the C string, in which Mr. Malkin was especially effective; there were high positions and harmonics (always difficult on thick strings) which were pure and clear; there was double-stopping and pizzicato work, all of which was brilliantly executed. But such display takes a composition out of the really classical and places it in the virtuoso school, and we fear that we must class these variations with the musical fireworks repertoire. But such a work wins the public all the more because of its pyrotechnical display, and the audience were most emphatic in response to Mr. Malkin's excellent work, recalling him twice most heartily.

On the whole, however, the program seemed somewhat tame, for, apart from the great Beethoven overture, there was nothing dramatic in its numbers. We cannot but recall such great occasions of recent seasons as the Liszt "Faust" symphony, "Till Eulenspiegel" or "Death and Transfiguration," and our present diet seems tepid in comparison. Sometimes it happens at a concert that there is electricity in the air, that conductor, soloists, chorus and orchestra are inspired to go beyond themselves with an abandon of enthusiasm that fires them all. Such was the case last Sunday, when the Handel and Haydn Society gave Verdi's Requiem. The auditors (and there was a tremendous house) may live many years and never hear such a glorious performance again. From the cries of despair and terror in "Dies Irae" to the broad soprano solo—"Libera Me"—everything was superb. The Handel and Haydn Society proved itself at once our greatest chorus, and may think of this performance at high-water mark.

The soloists were well-balanced and were as follows: Soprano, Marie Rappold; alto, Louise Homer; tenor, Morgan Kingston, and bass, Clarence Whitehill. It would be invidious to try to grade where all was so finely done, but we always welcome the great alto, Mme. Homer with especial enthusiasm, and it was pleasant to see that she is not passing the zenith of her powers. Mr. Mollenhauer may take pride in his direction of a performance which excited even the veteran critic.

Novel Pieces in Prospect Mch. 8. 1919

Mr. Rabaud's programme for the Symphony Concerts of next week, on Friday afternoon, March 14, and Saturday evening, March 15, is plentiful in novel and promising music—a suite, "Musiques de Plein Air," by Florent Schmitt, to be played for the first times in Boston; Saint-Saens's symphony in A minor, rarely heard in concerts in America; Rimsky-Korsakov's "Sadko," the earlier tone-picture whence sprang the later opera; and a concerto (No. 2 in F major) of Bach, for violin, oboe, flute and trumpet, with accompanying harpsichord. In this piece of eighteenth century chamber music, Mr. Fradkin, Mr. Longy, Mr. Laurent and Mr. Heim will play the solo instruments and Mr. C. W. Adams, the harpsichord. All five, moreover, will follow the original score of Bach without later retouchings, since Mr. Adams is expert and inventive enough to supply the accompaniment when the engraved page only hints at it. Since the distant day in which Dr. Muck and the orchestra played the tone-poem, "The Tragedy of Salome," no music by Schmitt has been heard at the Symphony Concerts. To most hearers, likewise, Saint-Saens's symphony and Rimsky-Korsakov's tone-picture will be novel and interesting matter. Only Chabrier's "Espagne"—the final number on the programme, is a familiar repertory piece.

This concerto by Bach will be played also at the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in New York, on Saturday afternoon, March 22. For it also, Mr. Rabaud proposes Saint-Saens "organ symphony," played here in Boston early in the season and with no little eloquence. New York is also to hear Mr. Rabaud's and the orchestra version of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade" and of Debussy's two Nocturnes—"Clouds" and "Fetes."

BEETHOVEN OVERTURE FEATURE OF CONCERT

Mr Rabaud's performance yesterday afternoon of Beethoven's overture to Collin's play, "Coriolanus," was one of significant dramatic force. Some may be more familiar with the noble Roman of Shakespeare than with that of Collin. Nor need this overture seem the less opposite in the towering individuality it pictures. George Mel. 8. 1919
Hearing Mr Rabaud and the orchestra one sensed the solitary grandeur of the character, the fearlessness, the nobility of heart and speech, a nobility not unused to tenderness, and in that resembling Beethoven himself.

The performance of Debussy's "Nocturnes," consisting of the three numbers, "Clouds," "Festivals" and "Sirens," was the first in the United States with the revisions in the score made by the composer before his death. The chorus of women's voices used in the last movement, sat upon the stage in a semicircle below the conductor's desk. They had been trained by Mr Townsend.

These three exquisite numbers, characteristic of the genius later to be dulled by ill health, received sympathetic treatment at Mr Rabaud's hands as his first programmed music here of Debussy. There was much of beauty in the first. The hearer stood in the presence of nature, untroubled by the touch of humans. The second is Debussy with his incomparable fantasy, a tapestry of gorgeous colors, bizarre in the spirit of exquisite play. A very beautiful and delicately imaginative performance.

Literally and figuratively the sirens occupied stage center in the number bearing their name. Sirens are persons most illusive when seen and heard at a distance—at least at first, calling from an opposite shore, from some inviting grotto or from behind the organ. If memory serves rightly, their song had such illusion at other performances.

The first movement of Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony is typically sunny, blithesome, gay in themes and their expansion. The second interests by its hymn, whatever its origin, and the steady march of the double basses. The remainder is the smug Mendelssohn, who for the mad folly of the carnival in the last has only a well-greased facility to exploit fiddlers. The strings in particular played the whole symphony with great precision, unanimity and brilliance.

Mr Malkin was the soloist of the day in Tschaikowsky's variations on a Rococo theme in which the cello is made to ride bareback, jump through hoops and the like. Mr Malkin appears to find pleasure in the jugglery.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Trans. — Mch. 8, 1919.

BEETHOVEN, DEBUSSY, CHAIKOVSKY, MENDELSSOHN

The Faded "Italian Symphony" and an Audience That Knew It—New Eloquence for the "Coriolanus" Overture—The Nocturnes of Clouds, Sirens and Fetes in Renewed Beauty — The Russian for a 'Cellist's Skill

THERE was a sign of the times at the end of the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon. The final piece was Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony," presumably played anew because conservative conductors, French or German, believe themselves under such obligation to his music and his memory. The applause was not hearty at any of the pauses, while after the final measures it was mere perfunctory courtesy to leader and band. Apparently the audience thrust off Mendelssohn as it drew on its coats; in fact cursory inspections of the hall during the playing of the symphony disclosed it less as an auditorium than as a reading-room for the ever-entertaining programme-book. Now, the performance of the symphony had neither signal merit nor signal demerit. Mr. Rabaud was literal and lucid, discreet and dutiful with the music; the orchestra played it precisely, euphoniously. It was possible to imagine the symphony in more elastic voice, with apter flow of light and shade, with more heed for Mendelssohn's little strokes of instrumental dexterity than for his polished filling of orthodox patterns. Yet, it is doubtful whether the most animating and adroit performance conceivable would have stirred more interest, drawn more applause. The truth seems to be that the public of orchestral concerts in these days has plainly outgrown the symphonies of Mendelssohn—Italian, Scotch, Reformation, what not—and that conductors discharge only a "traditional" obligation, long since hollowed to emptiness by time and change, when they play them.

With reason audiences still hear gladly Mendelssohn's more fanciful, more light-handed symphonic music—the overture and the incidental pieces to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" compact of fantasy, humor, poetized artifice and pictorial illusion; the overtures of the "Prosperous Voyage" and "The Hebrides" for this dweller by choice in the inland cities of Berlin, London, Rome, was imaginative in his tone-picturing of the sea. In all four are measures inviting conductors and orchestras to little feats of rhythmic and colorful dexterity, to enhancing touches, to the play of discerning and embroidering fancies. The moribund symphonies are music of another sort—prosaic of motive, monotonous of progress, glossy of surface, but no more in substance or in whole impression than the faithful filling of prescribed moulds. Rarely in them does the Mendelssohn of fancy release himself for even a few measures; scant relatively is his play with happy dexterities. Beyond reanimation, the Mendelssohnian symphony has become withered and sapless. Only "the tradition" now brings it back at long intervals into the concert halls of the twentieth century—and then audiences are the perfunctory hearers of yesterday.

To write these things of Mendelssohn's sterile symphonies is not to write despitefully of the enduring classics that bloom above the years and through the fashions. One such stood on the programme of Friday—Beethoven's overture, "Coriolanus," music of the figure of Roman chronicle, of Plutarch, of Shakspeare and not of the stilted lifeless tragedy (by all accounts) that gave it birth. Eloquently, Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra played it, with the grave, stately, lofty speech in tones that French actors of the spoken word and "the classic tradition" bring to the high austerities of Corneille in his Roman tragedies of "Les Horaces" and of "Polyeucte." Time and change do not dull the imagery or lessen the power of the motive that less suggests than incarnates the unbending Roman. No more do they dim or thin the beauty of the contrasting motive of petition and of pity. Again, as in the "Leonora" overtures, Beethoven epitomizes, conducts a whole drama and in yet briefer, tenser measures. The audience hears, perceives, is stirred. If from the theatre we may no longer receive tragedy, the opera house on occasion still yields it; while now and then the concert hall concentrates and distills it. To hear the overture, "Coriolanus," as it was played yesterday, is to hear in tones the exalted speech of ancient tragedy, to look upon its high-placed, far-falling figures, to know the voice, the tread of pride and pity and fate. The measures of the end are like the echo of this tragedy down the ages. Perhaps from the Parisian theatre where such plays still survive, Mr. Rabaud learned the eloquence with which he clothed Beethoven's music.

Incidentally, by right and title as the first violoncellist of the orchestra, Mr. Malkin played his annual solo piece. Where-soever the concerto abounds, as it has abounded these many days in the symphony concerts of America, the first violinist, the first violoncellist yearly plays the piece of his choice. The occasion, his occasion, is the regular thing in the regular way, "the tradition" too well established for anyone to question it. Yet, upon second thought, the concerto, except for the signally illustrious violinist or pianist—and not too often even for him—has been banished in recent years from the concert-halls of Paris. There are formulas, customs that we in America may not wisely copy; there are others, say concertos from the ranks of the orchestra, that—but who dare speak of such a thing? Moreover, Mr. Malkin did not play a concerto but the briefer and often more fanciful variations "upon a rococo theme," Chalkovsky's one piece for violoncello and orchestra. It is pleasant enough pastime to hear it—to note the graceful lines, the easy flow, the pretty caprice, the festooning ornament of the music, to listen to a Chalkovsky, playful, artificial and light-fingered at his sport. Light, too, were the fingers and the bow of Mr. Malkin and flowing and gracious in its turn was his tone. He is not of the violoncellists who over-stress the voice of their instrument till it smears and blurs. Rather he summons it in undulating fineness, in subdued lustres, in linked progress of phrase into phrase and measure into measure. Nor is he heavy-handed when Chalkovsky sets the violoncello to dancing paces and teases it into cadenzas that are very rococo indeed. Perhaps he smiled within as he wrote them; perhaps even the absorbed Mr. Malkin smiles at them in his moments of relaxation, but he was sufficiently serious yesterday to brighten and soften them with a becoming elegance. Those eighteenth-century connoisseurs of salon music would have admired Josef Malkin, violoncellist.

To say nothing of violoncellos and violon-cellists, even the power of Beethoven's overture aforesaid barely withstood the beauty of Debussy's Nocturnes, strangely overlooked, except for a single playing of "Clouds," these seven years at the Symphony Concerts. Like the "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," like the opera of Pelléas and Mélisande, they are music of the young prime of Debussy, when he spoke his mind and heart in tones without thought, as in later years, of his own formulas; when invention ran free and imagination beat high; when he was struggling composer, with a speech, a fantasy, courage and contempt that were all his own; when he was not rich, fat, a connoisseur in costly wines, if not in bourgeois wives, an established reputation, a convention, almost, of contemporary French music. To exalt those days is not to forget the days that he enriched with "The Sea-Sketches," with the ghostly music of "Gigues"; with the flash and fragrance of "Iberia," but those young years were the years of Debussy most Debussy and as such incomparable. Not afterwards did he match the fecundity and plasticity of invention that make motive spring from motive, that twine and part them endlessly through the three Nocturnes and yet sustain among them the recurring, binding, haunting measures of the English Horn. Only in "Pelléas" and in the prelude to Mallarmé's verses do his harmonies seem such flower of rare, spontaneous, instant imagery; do his sudden chords, his darting or lingering rhythms so play upon mind and fancy; do the voices of his instruments shimmer with such range of hue and suggestion. In these Nocturnes, as in the opera and the prelude, is music that bids the inner eye to changeful vision, that immerses the ear in a new, strange beauty, the like of which there was not and still is not; that tingles and glows upon well nigh every sensation in the hearer. A unique music, a music of individual genius, a music that is not as circles in the water.

The hearer may listen as he elects. If he choose to hear the Nocturnes as "absolute music," then will the motive of the English horn haunt him and other motives flash and flicker, caress, tease, entice. Then will he marvel at the delicacy or the force, the freedom and the plasticity of Debussy's rhythms, find phrase after phrase engrossing and stimulating his ear, follow long lines of tone till they coalesce and part anew, hear harmonies, see colors that are revelation. Such a hearer cannot miss the still beauty of the Nocturne of "Clouds," the sustained background against which the music moves in ever-changing shape and progress. No more can he escape the myriad tonal glints, the gleaming thms, the endless luminosity, the sheer flame and light in tireless motion of the Nocturne of "Fetes." As clearly he will feel the vague and fitful beauty of the song of the sirens—the beauty that suggests and then in fascination lingers. (Was Mr. Townsend's choir yesterday with all its loveliness of tone and felicity of phrase and rhythm a shade too numerous for the floating measures?) He will hear this song as though it penetrated and haunted a music that already beats with the restlessness of the sea, that curls in the wave-like contours, that throws off the harmonic spray of the ocean pieces to come. (Did Mr. Rabaud quite interweave song and sea-music in the mingled illusion that Debussy sought?)

In better case, however, than this listener to the Nocturnes in the abstract, will be he who in Debussy's tones sees the cloud-shapes rise and traverse the still expanse of the outspread heaven, glow and fade in tones, vanish as softly as they have come. And in this concrete listener's fancy, the whirling sparks, the pulsing fires, the advances and recessions, the rising and the falling flames of the Nocturne of "Fetes" will be dream-pageant of all the colors and all the motions. Perhaps he will need to stretch his imagination a little to hear in the song of Debussy's sirens the magic and irresistible music for which Ulysses voyaging stopped his ears and lashed his seamen to their oars. Yet even in this song, he will hear wondrous echo of the voices of fantasy as in spray or wave the sea conjures them upon the attuned ear.

H. T. P.

Mrs. Joseph Malkin, rescued at the Huntington avenue fire, and the $20,000 'cello, which was saved.

Waiting for the Coveted "Rush Seats" at Symphony

Herald Jan. 26, 1919.

Here are the Real Music Lovers of Boston! Their love of music is so deep and sincere that they are willing to stand in line for hours in any kind of weather in order to obtain the coveted "rush" seats at the Friday afternoon Boston Symphony concerts.

This is a musical club which has neither president or treasurer, with a membership strictly limited to 505 seats which, from time immemorial in the history of the Boston Symphony orchestra, have been reserved for them. When this number is sold no more are admitted from the waiting line. After that you could not buy your way into this select company at any price. The membership for the afternoon is complete.

There are all sorts and conditions of people to be found among the Real Music Lovers of Boston, who assemble on Symphony Hall steps. In age they range all the way from the young Conservatory student to the gray-haired man who remembers the orchestra before Symphony Hall was built. You will find men and women from almost every walk in life and even boys and girls waiting patiently in rain or sunshine—all animated by one desire—to hear good music. Nowadays every Friday sees quite a number of returned soldiers and sailors among the company.

The line begins to form as early as 11:30. Many bring their lunch, often their knitting; almost always something to read to while away the time. By 1 o'clock the steps of Symphony Hall are filled with the long line doubling back and forth. When all this space is taken the line extends along Huntington avenue to Gainsboro street. When it is long enough to reach around the corner into Gainsboro street experienced music lovers know that the number has been reached and that all possibility of securing a "rush seat" is over for that day.

It's an exceedingly interesting, as well as interested crowd, these Real Music Lovers of Boston. Every one is good natured, everyone waits patiently, everyone knows the "rules of the club" and the line forms and moves with quiet orderliness. Promptly at 1:30 the great doors are open and in 10 minutes more the long line has disappeared, filing slowly past a table where each one places his 28 cents (25 cents plus the war tax) and receives a card of admission. Every seat is filled and the Real Music Lovers of Boston settle down contentedly to another hour's wait before the concert begins.

17-7
Symphony Hall.

Waiting for the Coveted

"Ru.

Herald
Here are the Boston! Their
and sincere th stand in line f weather in orde
"rush" seats a Boston Sympho
This is a m neither presiden membership str which, from ti history of the E tra, have been r this number is mitted from t that you could this select com membership for plete.

There are all people to be Music Lovers o on Symphony l range all the w servatory stud man who rer before Symphon will find men every walk in girls waiting p shine—all anim hear good musi day sees quite soldiers and s
pany.

The line begi
11:30. Many b their knitting;
to read to wh
1 o'clock the s are filled with back and forth taken the line ton avenue to it is long enough to reach around the corner into Gainsboro street experienced music lovers know that the number has been reached and that all pos-

REAL MUSIC LOVERS—RAIN OR SHINE

Symphony Hall.

IV. Allegro molto vivace

18-1

259

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1918--19.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

HENRI RABAUD, Conductor.

EIGHTEENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, MARCH 14, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, MARCH 15, AT 8 P. M.

RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF, A TONE PICTURE, "Sadko," op. 5

SAINT-SAËNS

SYMPHONY in A minor, No. 2, op. 55

I. Allegro marcato: Allegro appassionato

II. Adagio

III. Scherzo, Presto; Un poco meno mosso

IV. Prestissimo

BACH,

CONCERTO No. 2, in F major, for Trumpet, Flute, Oboe and Violin

I. Allegro moderato

II. Andante;

III. Allegro

(Messrs: HEIM, LAURENT, LONGY, FRADKIN)

(Harpsichord accompaniment by CHARLES W. ADAMS)

SCHMITT,

SUITE for ORCHESTRA. "Musiques de plein air"
op. 44

I. La Procession dans la montagne

II. Dans désuète

III. Accalmie

(First time in Boston)

CHABRIER,

RHAPSODY for Orchestra, "España"

There will be no Rehearsal and Concert next week

GEORGE LONGY OF BOSTON.

18TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Herald — March 15/19
Performance of Chabrier's
"España" Is Extraordinarily Brilliant

"MOMENTARY CALM" HEARD FIRST TIME

By PHILIP HALE

The eighteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Rabaud conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Sadko"; Saint-Saens, Symphony No. 2, A minor; Bach, Concerto No. 2, F major, for trumpet, flute, oboe, violin (Messrs. Heim, Larrent, Longy, Fradkin) with accompaniment of strings and harpsichord (Charles W. Adams); Florent Schmitt; Out-Door Music: 1—The Mountain Procession. 2—A Dance out of Fashion. 3—Momentary Calm (first time in Boston); Chabrier, España.

The legend of Sadko appealed to Rimsky-Korsakoff, who wrote an opera with him for the hero. The symphonic poem heard yesterday for the first time at a Symphony concert since 1905 was used by the Ballet Russe for the ballet "Sadko," seen at the Boston Opera House. The story—or this particular legend, for there are several—was thus made familiar, although we did not see there the becalmed ship and Sadko, like Jonah, thrown overboard. Having sailed the seas, Rimsky-Korsakoff pictured in tones. The raging billows in "Scheherazade" and a calm; two widely different tonal seascapes, both eminently successful, far more so than Rubinstein's "Ocean" Symphony with all its movements now forgotten. The larger portion of "Sadko" is concerned with the wild dancing at the wedding of the sea-king's daughter. Sadko, an uninvited guest of sudden and surprising arrival, plays on his gusli for the dancers until the virtuoso breaks the strings and puts an end to the frenzy of the dancers and of the sympathetic ocean. The music fascinates by its changes of mood, the wildness of the dance, the oriental spirit, the brilliance of the instrumentation.

Saint-Saens' Symphony in A minor—it might be called a sinfonietta—was played in Paris nearly 60 years ago. It has not been heard here at a Symphony concert since 1892 when Mr. Nikisch waved his exquisitely manicured hand and turned the interesting pallor of his romantic face towards the enthralled audience. Saint-Saens has always been an expert assimilator. In this little work we hear at times the voices of Bach, Mozart and the early Beethoven, but with a Parisian accent. The first movement in spite of its fugal character is entertaining, exciting admiration for the workmanship. The second is charmingly simple. It has a Mozartian flavor. The trio of the Scherzo is peculiarly graceful and piquant, while in the rushing Finale there is towards the end a foretaste of 1919 modernism, an unexpected little episode, that might be compared to the mysterious measures in Weber's "Eury-anthe" overture. The Symphony contains many effects gained by the utmost economy of means. The music reminds one of Athenaeus's proposition. "Music should excite affability and a gentlemanly joy." Mr. Rabaud is to be thanked heartily for reviving the long-neglected work.

The concerto of Bach was first heard here Dec. 28, 1901. Mr. Gericke then used Felix Mottl's arrangement. Mottl transposed the trumpet part, written extremely high, and divided it between two trumpets. He added wood wind instruments and horns. Other arrangements, or disarrangements, of this concerto have been made.

Mr. Rabaud was anxious that the suite should be played as Bach wrote it. He therefore did away with Mottl's additional instruments, but retained his arrangement of the trumpet part. He also restored the harpsichord.

This reverence paid to Bach is praiseworthy. It is therefore the more surprising that Mr. Rabaud changed the title of the concerto in the program book. Bach wrote the title in Italian on the autograph score. In English it reads: "Second concerto for one trumpet, one flute, one hautbois, one violin."

This concerto has always been known as the trumpet concerto. The chief interest in it has been concerned with the ability of the trumpeter to play the music of his part as written. Neither Mottl, nor Kretzschmar, nor Wolfrum, nor Richard Strauss in their tinkering of the score thought of giving the violin, flute, or oboe priority over the trumpet in the title.

The performance was a spirited one, reflecting credit on all that took part. Boston may well be proud of Messrs. Heim, Laurent, Longy, Fradkin and other virtuosi in the orchestra. It is hardly necessary to speak of the music itself. The Andante is beautiful. The spirited other movements might have been lengthened by Bach, or shortened without essentially changing the character of the music or grieving the hearer.

There will be no Rehearsal and Concert next week

Florent Schmitt's Suite was played here for the first time. He was born in Lorraine. The mountains of his childhood were the Vosges. Had he come from the south of France, one might think that "the mountain procession" was Biscayan, for the Basques are much given to pilgrimages to hill places, as Richard Ford noted over 70 years ago, but the character of the music forbids this thought, for at these pilgrimages "the chacoli (a poor wine) and shillelah are devoutly used." Schmitt's music suggests a religious procession to a mountain, or one winding its way through a forest at the base of one. This and the succeeding movements show little individuality and a paucity of ideas. The effects are chiefly those gained by instrumentation. The composer is seen groping after something definite. There is, especially at the beginning of the first movement and in certain pages of the third, "atmosphere," to borrow a word from current aesthetic jargon. The music as a whole is pleasantly futile.

The performance of "Espana" was extraordinarily brilliant. The conductors of this orchestra heretofore failed to catch the spirit, the swing of this gorgeously colored, irresistibly rhythmed entrancingly romantic Rhapsody. Beside it the quasi-Spanish music of Rimsky-Korsakoff, and even Ravel's and Debussy's seems northern and pale.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will make its final southern trip next week. The program of March 28, 29 is as follows: Gabriel Faure, Prelude to "Penelope;" Beethoven, Concerto No. 5 E flat major, for piano (Harold Bauer, pianist); Hill, "Stevensoniana," four pieces for orchestra after poems from Stevenson's "Child's Garden of Verse" (first time at these concerts); Berlioz, Grand Fete at Capulet's House from "Romeo and Juliet."

FROM J. S. BACH TO SCHMITT

Great Variety of Music at Symphony Orchestra Concert

ST. SAENS' SYMPHONY
A VERY TAME AFFAIR

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

THE SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Sadko," Musical Picture.

St. Saens, Symphony No. 2, A minor.

Saint-Saens, Symphony No. 2, A minor.

Schmitt, Musiques de Plein air. Orchestral Suite.

Chabrier, Espana, Rhapsody.

Even the name of the first composer is debatable, for, while all the dictionaries accent it on the first syllable, a pupil of the master once told the present writer that he himself always accented the second, as "Kor-SA-koff."

Sadko is a Russian Jonah who is thrown overboard by his shipmates and, instead of sitting heavy on a whale's stomach, is made welcome by a Muscovite Neptune. His playing upon his lyre (the newspapers have been full of Russian lyres recently) causes more ships to sink than a German submarine. We do not think the composer as successful in his picture of a calm sea as Mendelssohn, but he is much more powerful in depicting turmoil and tempest. The great score was excitedly played and the good figure development and its melodic points made it a decided success.

Saint-Saens' second symphony is not comparable to his third, and we have been having a little overdose of Saint-Saens recently, although we reverence him as one of the best French composers. Yet there seemed to be no earthly reason for resuscitating this particular work, which is about as near mere routine as any modern symphony that we can remember; it is ingenious, but not inspired. It was played in a somewhat perfunctory manner, as if the men themselves held the above opinion of it. Even its final Saltarello shriveled up, compared with Mendelssohn's which we heard at these concerts only a short time ago. But at least the work has the real symphonic shape, and its final touch of kettledrum is as brusque as if the composer himself was anxious to give the tedious symphony a parting kick.

BACH MOST WELCOME.

The Bach concerto was most welcome. We must remember that Bach did not write symphonic concertos with a thread of solo running through them, but united several instruments in this form, each with almost equal prominence. Therefore, this program was not without a soloist, but had five—Fradkiin, violin; Longy, oboe; Laurent, flute; Helm, trumpet, and Charles W. Adams at the harpsichord. One can imagine what such a combination meant. We all know what an artist M. Longy is upon the oboe—there is not his equal in the United States—but M. Laurent, the new flute player, showed himself as great a master upon his instrument on this occasion. The florid trumpet work of the finale also calls for enthusiastic praise. We must remember, however, that Bach's high trumpets had a shallower mouthpiece and a narrower tube than our modern instruments, and, therefore, a more incisive tone. We have heard such trumpets played in Brussels and in Paris, and the effect is notable. Mr. Fradkiin made a good impression in the violin work, especially in the beautiful second movement.

The harpsichord was deftly intertwined and played with skill by Mr. Adams. But such an instrument is rather faint-toned for the great auditorium. The whole concerto, in spite of its delightful counterpoint and its melodic appeal, was the right picture in the wrong frame. It should have been heard in Jordan or in Steinert Hall if all its beauties were to be revealed. Its antiphonal character, its dialogues between the string orchestra and the solo instruments were very well brought out, and the concerto was very heartily applauded.

After such clear and logical treatment the work of Schmitt (a Frenchman with a German name) was rather turgid. He calls it "music in the open air," but it might better be called

"music without any air," for Schmitt cares much more for tone-coloring and rhythmic ingenuity.

Its first movement had at least one fine climax, but might have been much more processional in character. Its second, "a dance that is no longer danced" (according to the program-book), had some quaint and effective rhythmic touches, but it seemed to end like a Ward 8 ball, in a free flight, wherefore we suppose that "it is no longer danced."

The third movement had some gentle touches of wood-wind harmony, and some of its modulations were attractive because of their unusual character, but this movement was too long for what it had to say.

ORCHESTRA A MIGHTY GUITAR.

Chabrier's "Espana" is good and interesting Spanish music. He handles the orchestra as if it were a mighty guitar, and combines harps and string pizzicato effects in a way that make the Jota and Fandango very realistic. The bassoons deserve mention for some difficult work, and the trombones and tuba were also prominent. And so this banquet which began with Russian Bortsch ended with Spanish Garlic. M. Rabaud's abandon in the first and last numbers was especially brilliant.

Last Sunday another was added to the young violinists Jaschas, Saschas and Mischas, in the shape of Toscha Seidel. The manner in which these young Russian violinists succeed each other leads one to suspect a violinist factory in that troubled country. We can say emphatically that Seidel is as great as his predecessors. He has a broad tone (a young Wieniawski), sure intonation, temperament and expression. His playing of Vitali's Chaconne and of Wieniawski's D minor concerto at once stamped his high rank. He belongs with the elect.

A bit of welcome news to earnest music students. The Boston Public Library has extended the influence of the Allen Brown Music Room by adding to that great collection a grand piano, which is placed in the lecture hall of the Library. The matter is tentative, but we do not doubt but that it will become permanent, for the books of the Allen Brown collection are not allowed to be taken from the building, and many are not able to understand music merely by examining the printed pages. To these the added piano will be a great help, for the noble music library has hitherto been a well without a bucket to some.

There will be no Rehearsal and Concert next week

SYMPHONY USES OWN SOLOISTS

Virtuoso Quartet
Heard in Bach—Rimsky's "Antar"

Post ———— Mich. 15/19
BY OLIN DOWNES

Various instrumentalists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra — Messrs. Fradkin, concertmaster; Laurent, first flute; Longy, first oboe, and Heim, first trumpet—and not a highly advertised visiting virtuoso, were soloists at the concert given by that organization, conducted by Henri Rabaud, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

The compositions performed were Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar," Saint-Saens' symphony in A minor, Bach's concerto No. 2 in F major for violin, flute, oboe and trumpet, with accompaniment of strings and harpsichord, Florent Schmitt's "Musiques de plein-air" ("Outdoor Music"), and Chabrier's "Espana."

A TONAL PANORAMA

The performance of Rimsky's beautiful music was highly imaginative, and how imaginative is this composition itself! The ship of Sadko is sunk by the angry waves at the bidding of the sea-king. The minstrel sinks to the palace of the monster. There, a Russian Orpheus, he defends himself by playing on his ancient harp, or gusli, a wild strain, which causes the king and all his court to dance madly. Thanks to his magic, Sadko escapes, with the daughter of the sea-king for his bride. All this is broadly and poetically pictured in the orchestra. A tonal panorama of rolling billows is as simple as it is suggestive; fantastical transformation passages, preluding on a harp, and then the exultant song of the minstrel are heard. There is a return of the sea music.

Rimsky-Korsakoff, the magician of the old legends, conjures for us in various works the desert and the fruition of all the desires of man; strange caverns of the sea, the incredible tales of Arabian lore. "Antar" is a comparatively early work, not as substantial in musical material, or at least as advanced and individual in the musical ideas, as more mature compositions by this Russian genius, yet it is music of unique richness of color and of an enchantment which the most sober-minded will hardly resist.

Used by Balakireff

Incidentally, "Sadko" contains measures to which Balakireff, apparently, helped himself bodily for his "Thamar," a work which presumably followed "Sadko," even in the compilation of the early sketches. There is a passage in the latter composition which is almost identical in figuration and harmony with Balakireff's masterpiece. It must be noticed too, that this symphonic poem of "Sadko" is the complete essence of the modern Russian style of orchestration, in which pulsatile instruments give not only rhythm but all sorts of tone-color, in which the old German formula of groups of instruments which hold chords with little significance in themselves for the sake of sheer body of tone is forsaken for an instrumental scheme a hundred times more picturesque, iridescent, pictorial in character.

The material in the tone poem of "Sadko" is identical with the principal thematic material of Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera on the same theme.

Saint-Saens' Symphony

Saint-Saens' early symphony, it was composed in 1859, though numbered the fourth in the composer's published works, thus coming next to the fifth symphony, composed in 1886, is remarkable not only for its clearness and economy of means, but for the modesty with which the composer writes, and the spirit and enthusiasm of the writing. Today it appears in large part a French Mendelssohn and Schumann affair, but even in this youthful composition the Gallic wit, sobriety, and love of clear outlines are convincingly shown. Nor does Saint-Saens content himself with filling a preordained symphonic mould. His slow movement is of as modest proportions and pretensions as he chose it to be. His scherzo has a virility in the first part and a folk-like character in the second which set each other off in a finished and original manner.

Nor is the abrupt conclusion of this movement without individuality, while the finale is entertaining in a way of which Saint-Saens is peculiarly the master. Mr. Rabaud's revival of this symphony had thus much more than historical interest.

Bach's Concerto

Another revival of a sort, and thrilling in the extreme, was the Bach concerto, given as consistently with modern scoring as the mechanism of instruments manufactured today permits. The joy and vitality of this music, the ever-fruitful manner in which small rhythmic motives expand and develop themselves; the tender exfoliations of the song of the slow movement, supported by a substantial and unfailing bass, and the heel-tingling vivacity of the finale are the things of which we can remind ourselves in words. But these do not suffice to communicate the marvellous sensations that this music, perennially young, reborn, as it were, from instant to instant, excites in the hearer. Phrase expands into another phrase, and this into two more, just as the most cells of living organism grow out, one from the other, before the eyes of an observer. Nor does there seem any end to the process. When the final chord sounds one feels that it has merely punctuated a pause in this eternally recreative music, which is continuing its life as inevitably as the round of the seasons in sonorities, which have merely passed for a while from the ken of human ears.

The performance of the soloists was admirable in the extreme. Each member of the quartet was distinguishing himself and distracting the attention of the listener from one instrument to another of the group as the performance went on. The musicianly and finished playing of Charles Adams at the harpsichord, loaned for this occasion by Ernest B. Dane, added materially to the justness of the effect.

Suggests Midnight Oil

At a first hearing we can only honestly commend one movement of Schmitt's suite of "open-air music." "Open-air" it is precisely not, to our thinking. The simplicity is studied, calculated—a matter, it certainly appears, of midnight oil. The first and second movements are outrageously long—an unjustifiable stringing out of poor material. This was an early composition of Schmitt, one of the works he sent back to Paris while enjoying the privileges of his Prix de Rome. It is outrageously unyouthful. The primitive and grotesque in "A Dance Out of Fashion" is strongly accented, but no primitives could have made the awful noises Mr. Schmitt achieved with his immense and skilfully handled modern orchestra. Little boys or young men who produce this sort of thing should be deprived of a pen while there is hope, and turned out to pasture.

A relief was the crackling music of Chabrier, music of indescribable wit and bonheur, of flashing genius, of the broadest and most absurd sallies, all couched in the electrical rhythms of the dancers of Spain.

SADKO AND ESPANA ^{Mel. 15/19} BRILLIANTLY PLAYED

In the scenario for his undersea ballet in the Russian legend of "Sadko," performed to Rimsky-Korsakoff's music at the Boston Opera House four years ago, Mr. Bolm, who impersonated the hero, caused him to cast such a spell over the undersea wedding festivities by his playing upon his gusli that he was able to carry off the King's daughter in a submarine of his own magic invention resembling a great sea shell.

Mr. Rabaud gave a glowing performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's gorgeous tone picture yesterday, one opulent in imagination and riot with color. The unlegendary but fantastic ending of Mr. Bolm's pantomime would have seemed an expected one, could the orgy induced by the less, then most fortunate musician's playing have been interpreted with such taste and ardor.

To make the concert truly symphonic, Mr. Rabaud returned to the chief theme of brilliance at the close and conducted Chabrier's "Espana" with an abandon, a sense of its characteristic verve and inspiring rhythm which made this performance, like so many others of his "first times," the superior of all which have preceded it.

Saint-Saens' second symphony, unheard at these concerts since the days of Nikisch, has at least a curious, if not an inherent interest in revival. A score now 63 years old, it shows the early Saint-Saens, by nature a cosmopolitan, a well-graced man of the world, yet steeped in classic models of form. It is often Haydnish in a mid-19th century guise, as its conservative instrumentation is almost that of the early Beethoven, with no trombone, but a pair of horns, two trumpets, a pair each of flutes, oboes, clarinets and bassoons. If the Conservatoire was shocked by Cesar Franck's English horn in his symphony in the year 1879, what of Saint-Saens' brief use of it here in 1856 in the quaint slow movement, beautifully played yesterday by conductor and men?

Bach's second concerto in F-major for violin, flute, oboe, trumpet with harpsichord (yesterday played by Charles W. Adams) and an orchestra—smaller far than that of yesterday—was another mark of passing time. Bach's parts for trumpet are well-nigh impossible today of their original effect. That in this concerto is for F-trumpet, written very high, even to D above. The modern B in timbre, is out of character here, even in timber, is out of character here, even in the higher transposition necessary.

Mr Rabaud discarded Mottl's arrangement and gave some of Bach's trumpet part to a second player, Mr Mann. Mr Heim undertook the tremendously difficult solo part commendably. Unfortunately its severe demands induced him to use a cornet, more facile in execution than the trumpet, but out of place with its shallow tone. Could a capable player be found, it might be interesting to hear this music done with the now almost obsolete E flat cornet of the wind bands of a generation ago. Its voice might supply the clarion brilliance of Bach's smaller and higher trumpets.

The calm, lyrical spirit of the andante, in which the other three instruments weave garlands, is as modern as though written in this present year. Messrs Fradkin, Laurent, Longy and Heim were applauded.

Florent Schmitt's "Outdoor Music," op. 44, suite for orchestra, was played for the first time in Boston. It does not add any distinctive honor to the reputation of the admirable French composer of the Psalm of barbaric splendor, of the engaging quartets for four voices and eight hands piano, or of the fantastic and very stimulating "Salome." "The Mountain Procession," evidently to a Wagnerian shrine, would seem to contain Tristans and Parsifals. "The Obsolete Dance" is out of proportion dynamically. The "Momentary Calm" has tranquil moments when it permits the hearer to forget the sol-la-si-la-sol theme which is overdone.

Music in Boston Feb. 15, 1919.

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—Nationally speaking, the eighteenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's thirty-eighth season is made up of three French composers, one Russian, and one German. Musically speaking it will be found that it can be boiled down, as the newspaper phrase goes, to one Russian and one German, and two-thirds of the German's work can be eliminated. Starting with Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture "Sadko," Mr. Rabaud passed to Saint-Saëns second symphony in A minor, Op. 55, thence to Bach's concerto No. 2 in F major for violin, flute, oboe and trumpet, thence to Florent Schmitt's "Outdoor Music," a suite for orchestra Op. 44, which was heard for the first time in Boston, and concluded with Chabrier's rhapsody "España."

Interest naturally attached to the Schmitt music, which this reviewer found distinctly disappointing. The first part, though labeled "The Mountain Procession," seemed in its succession of peculiar harmonies and frank dissonances to picture neither procession nor mountains—in fact, it got nowhere. The second part was called "A Dance Out of Fashion," and nobody would shed tears of grief that it had been out-moded, nor could he be at all concerned if it never came "in" again. The third part, bearing the title "Momentary Calm," was like Mendelssohn's overture "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage" rewritten in modern harmonies, but retaining its Victorian dullness and conventionality of sentiment. It is unfair to judge the Schmitt of the "Forty-Seventh Psalm" by this music.

Poor propaganda for French music is Saint-Saëns' second symphony. The gallic grace of the adagio fails to compensate for the emptiness of the other movements and the slimness of the ideas therein developed. Far better in this respect is the flashy but popular "España" rhapsody of Chabrier. The audience as a matter of course rose to it with much applause.

Remain now the Russian and the German. Some day we may hear this Bach concerto with an orchestra which does not smother the solo instruments and the harpsichord. Until that day comes, judgment on the first and third movements must be suspended. The andante, with its lovely harmonies and quiet beauty allows Mr. Fradkin, the violinist; Mr. Laurent, the flutist; Mr. Longy, the oboist, and Mr. Heim, the trumpeter, to shine in their stellar parts, individually and collectively. No number this season has been better played on this stage than the "Sadko" tone picture of Rimsky-Korsakoff. Conductor and orchestra gave an exhibition of musical tone painting and musical description both stimulating and satisfying. It is fortunate for modern music that Rimsky-Korsakoff happens to be one of the Russians whose influence is potent in these days of flux.

SYMPHONY CONCERT Trans. — Feb. 15, 1919 ANOTHER PLEASING MISCELLANY FOR PROGRAMME

A Fable in Tones from Rimsky-Korsakov and Chabrier's "España" Both Vividly Played—A Neat Little Symphony from Saint-Saëns's Youth — Schmitt's Stale Music and the "Trumpet Concerto" of Bach—Details of an Amusing Afternoon

WHATEVER the merits and demerits of Mr. Rabaud as conductor, of late he has made the Symphony Concerts capital entertainment. Nearly all his recent programmes have been agreeable miscellanies, divided between French, Russian, classic German and American numbers. Scarcely a piece has been over-long or over-intricate in kind; none has exacted too much of the casual hearer; nearly all have yielded general, immediate and easy pleasure. Out of many the new mettle of the orchestra has shone; not a few have asked and received the conductor's better powers. The programme of yesterday afternoon was excellent example of these pleasing lists, with a fantastic tone-picture, "Sadko," from Rimsky-Korsakov; a pretty little symphony from Saint-Saëns, youthful; a concerto from Bach, with four virtuosos of the orchestra displayed therein; novel, if none too interesting, pieces from the relatively little known Florent Schmitt; and for ending Chabrier's fiery and familiar rhapsody, "España." Not one of these items was so long as to irritate those who might dislike it; while the diversity of them brought in due turn satisfaction to many differing tastes.

Nearly all these pieces, moreover, lay within Mr. Rabaud's clear and tested abilities. The only music of pure line and stripped pattern, with which he is prone to be rigid and monotonous, was Bach's concerto, and for his shortcomings therewith, the prowess of Mr. Heim in the difficult and showy trumpet part, the skill and taste of Messrs. Fradkin, Laurent and Longy at violin, flute and oboe, were sufficient compensation. Once and again, as in the first movement Saint-Saëns's little workmanship and little else; but the finale leaps with the bright rhythms that Mr. Rabaud accents well, while the slow song and the half airy, half mellifluous scherzo are the pretty pastiches that the conductor polishes no less lightly and adroitly than the composer. Rhythm and color, both at Mr. Rabaud's command, are the essentials to inspiring and graphic performance of Rimsky-Korsakov's tone-picture and of Chabrier's rhapsody. In "España," indeed, leader and orchestra excelled themselves in the bite of the rhythms, the free motion of the music, the glow of harmonic and instrumental color, the warmth of their phrases, the fire of their modulations. It is hard to remember when the music of Chabrier has so flamed upon the ear, so run exuberant yet sure-footed race.

It was the composer who defeated conductor and orchestra with Schmitt's "Musiques de Plein Air," as, in his fantastic fashion with titles, he names these "out-of-door" pieces. All performance might lend to them, they seemed to receive in distribution of color, play of rhythm, roundness of phrase and songful progress. Even so, they seemed a medlocre, a pointless music written with pains but written also without imagination. It is hard to descry Schmitt's purpose; it is harder still to be interested in his accomplishment of it. Presumably the first "Musique" is designed to image a solemn procession of the country-folk winding, as in pilgrimage, through the woods, at the foot of a mountain, gradually ascending the slopes. The second would seemingly recall and animate an ancient dance, forgotten, ignored, elsewhere than in the hill-country, known or imagined by Schmitt. The third apparently would summon the luminous calm upon a clear summer day in these lonely heights. Yet almost nowhere does the music bear graphic suggestion; while almost everywhere it lacks either light or heat. Faithfully, it plods along the course until the composer is ready to halt.

Schmitt's motives neither quicken the ear nor stir the fancy. They are mere matters of sterile tonal fact. They kindle him as little as they kindle his hearers, and he can only dress and re-dress them in various harmonic and instrumental vesture. Being a practised composer, he knows the routine of these things; being somewhat more, he occasionally brightens and animates the process with happily imagined or wrought detail. Quite as often he is merely mechanical. Once and again, tonal coloring weaves thin atmosphere about the third "Musique" but never come the spacious and luminous measures that the composer seemingly purposed. The dance lags, sags in dull rhythms, in lifeless modulation, sounding neither as melancholy and ancient rite nor as village play and pastime. The illusion of procession in grave and wending march scarcely rises from the "Musique" presumed to image it. In the music of Schmitt, hitherto heard in Boston—in the savage and reverberant Psalm, in the mordant and sinister "Tragedy of Salome," in minor pieces of many moods—he was invariably interesting, individual. Yet in these "Musiques de Plein-Air," he is merely and steadily commonplace and footless.

At the least, Saint-Saëns is not dull in his pleasing exercise with artifice and fancy in the little symphony in A minor of his twenty-fifth year. The motives out of which he weaves it are as one listener called them—need the sex be specified?—"dear little themes." From them flowers first an allegro of skilful workmanship which is "appassionato" only in the studious pains obviously spent upon it. Saint-Saëns remembers Mozart, the youthful Beethoven, the methodical and polishing Mendelssohn—not to quote from them, but to hint, so to say, how well grounded he is in ancient and contemporary masters. He is resourceful, too, and economical; he has the wit and the courage to little strokes of his own; the allegro is well and fugally made. The ensuing "Romanza" drops from the tips of his adept fingers, is as prettily invented as it is fashioned. A touch of distinction in the handling saves it from place in the "Parlor Pianist." The scherzo flows gracefully until Saint-Saëns snaps it off at the very moment in which it should repeat itself—dauntless youth, ready to make the bourgeoisie of the sixties, if not "sit up," at least stir uneasily in their arm chairs. Last a genteel riot of rhythms, in the manner of Mendelssohn excited, and toward the end timely thought of Beethoven and a few measures, songful and mysterious, after the occasional custom in such place, of the master. Whether Saint-Saëns's saltarello betters that of Mendelssohn in the Italian symphony of last week, only the connoisseurs of Victorian musical gew-gaws may decide. In what for some are the bold and brazen twenties, Saint-Saëns was plainly mastering the theory and practice of "chocolate-box" music.

And it was a courtly Bach, as he could sometimes be, who wrote the "trumpet concerto" for His Royal Highness of Brandenburg. Possibly the Margrave possessed a trumpeter, who was as capable of high running passages, of long held quavers and semi-quavers as was Mr. Heim, yesterday. In and out of the first allegro flashes the trumpet in measures more grateful to the voice of the accompanying strings which it sometimes imitates; athwart the finale it is yet more flaring and florid. Possibly the eighteenth-century ear enjoyed these pastimes, these high and jerky tones, more than does the ear of the twentieth. At least it did not hear an accompanying music made stiff and sluggish, as it was on Friday, by the sheer weight of Mr. Rabaud's full string choir, nor a harpsichord that in so big a hall could barely purr its gentle way through the intermediate slow division. It was all very well for the conductor to return, except incidentally, in the trumpet part, to Bach's original score. But if Bach is not Bach when Mottl discreetly "arranges him," no more is he Bach when Mr. Rabaud clogs his figures and thickens his lines with a mass of string tone. His Highness of Brandenburg did not count his violins in sixteens.

So ran the pieces that filled the hour between the end of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Sadko" and the beginning of Chabrier's "España." Yet through all the concert, the memory of the Russian "tone-picture" withstood the impression of the rest. Rimsky was no older than the Saint-Saëns of the little symphony, when he wrote this music of fantasy, imagery, humor and graphic illusion. He spreads his sea-picture of calm or storm, and the ear perceives it. Down goes Sadko the minstrel, to the chambers of the sea-king and touches the strings of his magic guzli. Measure by measure, the dance infects prince and people. The whole court of the sea-king dances and will not be stayed, the sea riots with it and will not be calmed—till Sadko breaks the strings and his music stills. Once upon a time, the Russian Ballet mimed this fable to this very music, in sight of Bostonian eyes, in sound of Bostonian ears. The music itself was yesterday as vivid with it, while it wove also a mist of romantic fantasy about the tale that dancers and mimes may not compass. What matter Rimsky's means? In the sixties, the purists may have questioned his dependence for suggestion upon rhythm, modulation, color. Perhaps the pedants still doubt today, though such means are the commonplace of music now written. It is the misfortune, however, of much of it that the composers do not mix the colors, deploy the rhythms, jewel the modulations with Rimsky's and with Russians' imagination. His fantasy, not his procedure, evades them. H. T. P.

THE UNFAMILIAR SCHMITT

AN OVERLOOKED COMPOSER TO BE HEARD

His "Open-Air Music" at the Next Symphony Concerts — His Place in France and in America — The Psalm and the Quintet That Established Him — His Range, Variety and Individuality

TOMORROW afternoon and Saturday evening, for the first times in five years, music by Florent Schmitt will be heard at the Symphony Concerts—his suite for orchestra, "Musiques de Plein Air" ("Open-Air Music") running in three divisions, "La Procession dans la Montagne" ("Mountain Procession"); "Danse Désuète" ("Obsolete Dance"), and "Accalmie" ("Lull"). One other piece by Schmitt, "The Tragedy of Salome," music of mimodrama drawn for Mr. Diaghilev's Russian Ballet from a like-named poem of Robert d'Humières, has been played at a single pair of Symphony Concerts in the autumn of 1913 under Dr. Muck. Here in Boston, The Cecilia has sung his setting for chorus and orchestra of a savage Psalm of the victorious Jews and, more recently, his "Songs for Four Voices." His Viennese and Polish Rhapsodies and a few of his chamber-pieces have also been played here publicly. Possibly songs of Schmitt have been sung in Boston: while the Hoffmann Quartet once meditated a performance of his noted quintet for piano and strings. Perhaps indeed they played it privately. Yet in comparison with other composers of the middle Parisian generation, with Ravel, for example, Schmitt is in America a relatively unknown figure. It is Schmitt's misfortune to adhere to none of the factions into which the little world of Parisian music is divided. Worse still, from a Gallic standpoint, even impartial observers fail to classify him. When he chooses, he can write "impressionistic" music, as fine and suggestive as any priest or acolyte of the "new school" could desire. When he chooses also, he can write in the orthodox forms, directly, vigorously, masterfully, as though he were willing heir to the classical tradition. Sometimes his music sounds more German than French. Sometimes it is remarkable; and sometimes it is commonplace. At its best it is always the music of a composer who has elected to go his individual way, following his own imagination and writing in the idiom that his purpose prompts. He has shunned notoriety, controversy, intrigue—and pays the penalty. Nobody propagates his music ardently; nobody attacks it virulently or defends it hotly. It has been oftener heard than described.

Florent Schmitt is no longer a young man and he has written much music of many kinds. He is now in his forty-ninth year and the list of his "works" in a current handbook fills three closely printed pages. He has written many piano pieces and scored some of them for orchestra. His songs are many. He has tried interesting experiments with choral music. He has made his ventures into music for string quartets or for combinations of wind instruments. He has composed directly for orchestra as well as re-scored for it. He has accomplished one ballet-pantomime and designed another. Unlike most French composers, he has not otherwise written for the theatre, and, so far as the world knows, he does not yet purpose an opera. He began to compose when he was still a student at the Conservatory in Paris in the nineties, and he then wrote piano pieces and songs so originally and interestingly that he soon gained a considerable reputation as a promising man. Already he was accounted "different." He was not French by birth. His family was Alsatian; he himself was born in Lorraine. He spent his boyhood in Strasburg and in the valleys of the Vosges. He displayed no precocious proclivities for music. He and his family were neither rich nor poor. He drifted into the Conservatory and dawdled there, going desultorily from the class of Dubois to the class of Lavignac, from the class of Massenet to the class of Fauré. Various "salons," where music was cultivated socially and playfully, various coteries where it was earnestly debated and occasionally written, knew him better and oftener than his teachers and his fellow students at the Conservatory. In all three he kept his reputation for singularity. He flung out what he believed, regardless of whom it might offend. His manner was aggressive; as some report, even formidable. He liked big things done in a big way. As the French say, he was a temperament.

Yet somehow Schmitt took prizes and finally the Prix de Rome itself. He went into residence at the Villa Medici and pursued the ordained studies. He sent the required compositions back to Paris and one of them, his setting of the Forty-seventh Psalm, was the piece that first gained him a place in concert-rooms. When he had completed his term at Rome, he defied custom once more. He did not return to Paris and a career, but made a long and lingering journey into Germany, Austria, the Balkans, Turkey and Africa. He wrote music meanwhile and he wrote still more when he settled finally in Paris—to live much by himself and to work diligently. By the sheer merit of his music he found publishers and gained performances for it. Thus encouraged, he wrote sincerely and devotedly, and set his face resolutely against disputatious propaganda, selfish intrigue, factional affiliation and advertising zealotry.

Two pieces in particular have won Schmitt a distinctive place among the younger French composers—his setting of the Psalm aforesaid and a quintet for pianoforte and strings. This forty-seventh Psalm is the Psalm that in the Vulgate begins "Plaudite, Gentes." In it the voices of the nations sing the praise of Jehovah, their master and their lord. With shouts and frenzies they exalt his might and majesty. They see him choosing "the heritage of the beauty of Jacob for his possession." He ascends into high heaven, and they redouble their praises. The King James version of the Psalm is tamer than the Vulgate or the peculiar translation into French that Schmitt actually used. He set it for a soprano voice, a huge chorus, orchestra and organ, and he conceived it wholly in his own fashion. His Israelites are an oriental horde, returning from victorious warfare, clashing their swords upon their shields, shouting and shrieking their exultations and adorations. The music rings with wild cries or sways to delirious rhythms. Schmitt piles sonority upon sonority. From every corner of his frenzied host sounds the praises of the might of Jehovah. Sopranos, altos, tenors and basses shout them. Trumpets, trombones, drums, cymbals, every instrument that can be blown or smitten, swell the fierce acclaim. The music clamors and strides; mounts in great tonal masses; blazes with great flashes of color. Then suddenly it is stayed. "He hath chosen the heritage of the beauty of Jacob, whom He hath loved." A single soprano voice sings the words sensuously, a single violin accompanies it voluptuously. The impression is as oriental as that of the orgies of sonority. The shouts of praise swell and mount again, and the Psalm is done. The power of the music springs from its vehemence.

The quintet for pianoforte, two violins, viola and violoncello is music of another sort. In it Schmitt discloses no small mastery of form, no little ingenuity of workmanship, no scanty or halting invention. He fertilizes a pervading motive and gives to each development of it clear individuality. He is imaginative with harmonies and timbres, in the whole distribution of his five voices. The quintet is long, reflective, at moments abstruse, but everywhere it "sounds," and with a speech of its own. Throughout the rhythms beat high; the harmony is rich; the melodic ideas are intensively and introspectively developed; and the whole piece bespeaks the serious artist who makes no concessions but imperiously demands that the hearer follow him into remote chambers of thought.

There is a lighter Schmitt as well who wrote in piano duets the eight little "reflections" of his journeyings in Germany and filled each of them with the spirit of place—Coblenz, Heidelberg, Dresden, Nuremberg—translated into graceful and fanciful tones. There is a whimsical Schmitt, who flings off little piano sketches of the puppets of pantomime, of clowns and elephants and the sideshows at a fair. There is an impressionistic Schmitt, who can write music of mood and suggestion as though it were acquired, if not exactly second nature to him. There is the Schmitt of the orchestral pieces, eclectic of means and procedure, fond of pictorial suggestion, gaining it by play of rhythm, harmony, color. There is also a Schmitt of much commonplace, routine and outgrown music. And there is, finally, a Schmitt who luxuriates in the Oriental rhythms and colors and in the vividness of direct imagination that he lavishes upon his ballet of "Salome." The songs and the chamber music that we have heard here in Boston attest so far as they go, the vigor of Schmitt's voice, the range of his imagination and the freedom of his hand.

Even on the edge of his fifties and with a pack so full of substantial and diversified music, Schmitt is not yet easy to classify or soundly to judge. As some say, he derives from Chabrier in the exuberance of his invention and expression, his passion for glowing instrumental colors, leaping rhythms, tonal sonorities and direct and vehement musical speech. As others agree, he can catch, when he chooses, the impressionistic manner and make it also a whimsical and evasive manner of his own. Those that dislike his music call it German and reproach it unjustly with length, breadth and thickness, because in the quintet, for example, it happens to be stout, earnest, ample and profound. The innovators call him a classicist because he uses orthodox forms and can be direct and insistent when his purpose demands such qualities. The apostles of continence reproach him with grandiloquence, superabundance and rhetoric for rhetoric's sake. Yet there is no doubting the range and the variety of his music, the energy that occasionally lifts it to power, the reflection that once and again enriches it, the fancy that now and then wings it. Schmitt's austere independence, his clear individuality, his sincerity in all things persuade even those who began in mistrust and continue in dislike.

Florent Schmitt

Rabaud Is Muck's Superior

Popularity of New Conductor Does Not Rest on Patriotic Prejudices Against German, Says Mr. Olin Downes—Opinion Based on Rabaud's Leadership

Post

Me. 16/19

It has been repeatedly stated in these columns and in other places, by the music reviewer of the Post, that Henri Rabaud, the present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is proving himself in important respects the superior of the formerly lauded Dr. Karl Muck as an interpreter. Some readers, including both pro-German sympathizers and those who are as hot against Germany as any, but apparently unwilling or unable to listen and think for themselves independently of precedent and tradition, have ascribed these statements to anti-German "prejudice" unworthily brought into play in the domain of musical art, and a personal desire to wound a man now in a place where he cannot take up the cudgels in his own defence. This is quite not true. We have our opinions about Dr. Muck, both as man and musician. We have no hesitation in stating them when the occasion arises. But when we discuss Dr. Muck as a musician we discuss him as that and nothing else, and in remembering his performances many of them of great merit and brilliancy, we do so without artistic ingratitude for all that we learned from him, or a personal desire to forget what kind of a debt.

The surprise and pleasure we have had in the musical performances of Mr. Rabaud have been those which, we conceive, every student of music feels when he has been assisted in perceiving new beauties of his art, and surprise that it should have taken so many years and such an upheaval as the great war to make us aware of the existence of so talented a conductor. We now realize the provincialism, imposed from outside, which had persuaded Americans to act very honestly on the assumption that conductors were made only in Germany, and thus to deprive ourselves of great and lasting artistic profit of a kind which, apparently, conductors of Germany could not provide.

We find Mr. Rabaud to be a broader and a deeper musician than Dr. Muck. That is, Mr. Rabaud's conception of a composition, whether of the classic of the modern school, seems to lie deeper. Dr. Muck was an amazing score-reader and an industrious student, though too frequently an officious one, as his ceaseless revisions of and additions to the scores of composers living and dead proved. But he was after all cerebral. He came to the music from the outside. Compared, for example, to Mr. Rabaud's fifth symphony of Beethoven, Dr. Muck's reading was admirable in its formal strength, its balance, its virility in the opening movement in which this conductor's feeling for rhythm was strikingly displayed, and its dramatic transition from the third movement to the finale. In the slow movement, requiring simple and lofty sentiment, and in the last movement, a finale of triumph and delirious joy, Dr. Muck undeniably fell short. It was a place where heart and inherent nobility of conception could not be replaced by the mere thinking or planning of effects.

Dr. Muck, we have long felt, was most often at his best in music in which the theatrical element was particularly strong—witness the performance of the "Faust" symphony of Liszt, a type of music in which this conductor excelled, and, as it happened, a work which bore for him certain profound associations which resulted in a state of mind almost of religious ceremonial when he directed its performance. The argument could be continued with many another illustration, as for example, the emotional poverty of Muck's Schumann, and his theatrical and showy conceptions of works like the "Tannhauser" overture or the "Meistersinger" prelude, which became in his later years in Boston show pieces of a brilliant conductor.

Mr. Rabaud's understanding of music of many different composers is more of the heart than Dr. Muck's, and not less of the head. Neither Dr. Muck nor any conductor who has appeared in Symphony Hall in the past 20 years had a profounder comprehension of the great classic spirit and classic grandeur and nobility of form than Mr. Rabaud. In addition to this, however, his Beethoven is greater because of its emotional stress and its spiritual exaltation than the Beethoven of any conductor who has appeared at the head of the Boston Symphony during the period we mention. Nor is this tendency confined to classics, either in or out of France. Mr. Rabaud has given performances of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar" and "Schererazade"; of works by Saint-Saens, Franck, Ravel, D'Indy and Debussy far more potent in atmosphere, impressionism and poetic quality than those of his predecessor of previous seasons.

The great qualities of Mr. Rabaud as a conductor are illustrated finally in the character of the orchestra's response to his wishes. Dr. Muck commanded that such and such be done, and obtained what he commanded to the breadth of a hair, for he was an admirable, if sometimes brutal, disciplinarian. Mr. Rabaud does not command the orchestra so evidently as he breathes with it, and this understanding on the part of a conductor of the respiration of an orchestra is one of the subtlest and most essential attributes of a really gifted leader. For an orchestra respire, like a singer. This is obviously particularly true of the different wind choirs, but the whole body obeys physical and rhythmical laws, on which musical interpretation is closely dependent. It is this instinct for the respiration of the instruments, as one may well call it, which, as it has always seemed to us, makes Arthur Nikisch so successful a conductor.

He feels the nerves and heartbeats of his men when he conducts, he knows how the music is affecting them, and has the mysterious faculty of marshaling the sub-conscious as well as the conscious forces of interpretation to do his bidding. His tempi are elastic and are partly influenced by the emotional state of his own players. He said once that he took the slow movement of the Tchaikowsky fifth symphony at a different pace on different occasions, this depending partly on the mood of his horn player. Some evenings the player was evidently feeling like a little faster tempo. On other evenings he was fatigued or nervous, and it was natural for him to play the beautiful melody more slowly. Within reasonable limits conformance to his mood meant a better and more eloquent performance of the symphony. We think that Mr. Rabaud has much of this sensitive quality in him, and that he thus acts, by persuasion and emotional telepathy more than by absolute command, on his men. It results in a warmer and more eloquent performance, a performance with broader sweep, with a warmer glow in the tone, with a deeper and more powerful pulse in the music. That Mr. Rabaud exerts authority as a man who knows why and how he wishes a piece of music to be presented is, of course, the companion fact, since without this quality in the leader an orchestra would fall to pieces instead of working together. As it is, the men appear to play more voluntarily than of old, with more personal and musical impulse. And this is reflected in the atmosphere of the concerts. There is a more reciprocal attitude on the part of the audiences, more of what Robert Havens Schauflier once called "creative listening." In all respects the concerts are less formal, perfunctory and more contagiously musical in effect than they were, especially during Dr. Muck's last vexed seasons. In the course of those seasons he gave some very fine performances to which we can look back with much pleasure and profit. In the light of some of Mr. Rabaud's accomplishments, we now feel that we over-praised certain of Dr. Muck's interpretations, but others would doubtless stand as highly today as they did when he gave them. All in all, however, the present effect of Mr. Rabaud's ascendancy in Symphony Hall is that of a much needed musical reform, a much more vital and artistic presentation of the musical gospel. We are hearing music from another point of view than that entertained by Symphony conductors and audiences for 30 seasons and more, and a great majority of the listeners are finding the experience is enormously profitable.

The performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadko" revives the old question of whether nationalism in music is a desirable thing. Ernest Newman, the great English critic, argues against it, saying, as most of the opponents of this principal, that what is in the heart of a composer does not rely for expression on nationally conventional formulas of musical speech; that a composer who relies on folk music, as Grieg did, for example, limits the range of his genius, instead of extending it; that music which is universal is for all peoples of the world, and is recognizable as having universal, instead of local characteristics. It seems to us that those who harbor this theory are about as logical as those who fear that a League of Nations will impair the validity of American citizenship. If America belongs to a league, how can she be a free nation, and preserve her own individuality? One could go still farther and say that a republican form of government makes individualism impossible. Whereas it actually promotes the development and the exercise of individualism, by setting individual potencies free and giving them such opportunities and play for development as is impossible under an autocratic form of government. Mutual obligations do not destroy individual initiative. They make individual initiative in all directions, which are constructive stronger than ever before by removing all sorts of arbitrary boundaries and limits to the exercise of that quality. By a similar paradox, we believe, the national element in music gives the composer whose talent is founded in his soil, and who is consciously and convincingly a spokesman of his people, a stronger and cleaner cut individuality than he would otherwise have.

"Sadko" is a case in point. It is the work of Rimsky-Korsakoff, a leader of the Russian nationalistic school, a school which based all of its tenets on the fundamental conception of the genius of the Russian race and the Russian way for the individual composer to express that genius in his works. The result was memorable and an everlasting refutation against those who are afraid that if a composer quotes a folk-tune or writes in the folk-vein he loses his soul. The Russian composers found themselves through an exhaustive study of the song and legend of their land. As M. Calvocoressi notes in his work on Moussorgsky, the Russian composers who became great and world-figures in music were the composers who wrote in a manner based on the characteristics of Russian national art, and those Russian composers who failed to become great and impress their individuality on the world were the composers who remained content to copy the musical formulas of Europe instead of putting their ears to the ground and speaking for their own people. Democracy in music, as in politics, appears in the end to be a fundamental principle of art. The big statesmen, the big artists, are the ones who speak for their race, and in so doing voice the thoughts and feelings which make the world akin.

The expression of these thoughts and feelings in a manner natural and characteristic of the people does not minimize the individuality of the composer, but exalts it as no other force could do.

MR. RABAUD ON WAR AND COMPOSITION

March 15, 1919.

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts — Because he is a typical representative of the generation of writers of music who delight not only our own day, but whose works, according to our best judgment, will endure for the delight of other days to come, Mr. Henri Rabaud, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was asked by a representative of The Christian Science Monitor to express his opinions on what effect the war would have on modern composition.

Mr. Rabaud was perfectly willing to admit that the war would have an influence on the music to be written, but he intimated that his interviewer was probably several years too early in asking his question. It would take a long time for the reactions to the turmoil of the last four years to be set forth in musical terms, he felt, and meanwhile the composers had been grievously interrupted.

Deprecatingly citing his own case as an example—for Mr. Rabaud is an extremely modest man and hesitated about bringing himself into the discussion at all—he admitted that living in a country which had been fighting for its life and the ideals of the rest of the world, had totally interrupted his labors of composition. War work philanthropies, the overturning of the daily routine, all combined to throw a composer off the track. Then, too, the emotions that found expression formerly in composition now found outlet in patriotic ardor or in sympathy with the war sufferers. Thus the first and foremost effect of the war was almost to stop the writing of music.

Composition Delayed

Mr. Rabaud was careful to point out, however, that on the other hand the war of course had stimulated a certain type of patriotic music which was palpably ephemeral in character. So taking it all in all, the first effect of the war on music had been rather a negative one. It had set composition back for some years, he thought. It was impossible to conceive, however, he felt, that the struggle through which the world had passed, including the dethronement of false gods and the setting up of practicable ideals, should not give rise to a form of musical expression which might put forth new forms and harmonies.

Indirectly, of course, Mr. Rabaud felt that the war had been responsible for changing the source of influence on composers. He feels very strongly that the classics, Bach, Beethoven, Mozart, Rameau, Palestrina—the foundation-builders, so to speak—would continue in the future as in the past to exert an influence, and for good, on the new music.

however, has removed any domination of the modern German school.

"Including Strauss?" asked the interviewer.

Here, however, Mr. Rabaud was careful to be just. He would pay proper tribute to the skill of the composer, but he drew the distinction that any influence Strauss might have as the mouthpiece or leading light in a modern German school was gone. In fact, when it came to influence, he thought that the modern Russians, including of the present-day writers, there would be the indirect one brought about by the change in values placed on the writers of Russia and France.

American Composition

The subject of contemporary writers naturally brought out a query as to what opinion the conductor had formed on the American music he had read and heard. Was there any indication of a typical American school that he had observed? Were there cer-

ere hat iman-ym-t, a adnry ich ohn oef-ese,
ood,
fluther ally
sic, sult critany
the

Drawn for The Christian Science Monitor

Henri Rabaud

Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1918-19.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

HENRI RABAUD, Conductor.

NINETEENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, MARCH 28, AT 2.30 P.M.

SATURDAY, MARCH 29, AT 8 P.M.

FAURÉ,

PRELUDE to the Lyric Poem, "Pénélope"
(First time in Boston)

BEETHOVEN,

CONCERTO for Pianoforte, No. 5, in E flat major
op. 73
I. Allegro
II. Adagio un poco moto
III. Rondo; Allegro ma non troppo

HILL,

FOUR PIECES for ORCHESTRA, "Stephensonia"
(after Poems from R. L. Stephenson's "A Child's Garden of Verse")
I. March
II. Lullaby, "The Land of Nod"
III. Scherzo
IV. "The Unseen Playmate"
[First time at these Concerts]

BERLIOZ,

"GRAND FÊTE at Capulet's House," from the Dramatic Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet," op. 17
Romeo seul—tristesse—bruits lointains de concert et de bal—grande fête chez Capulet

Soloist:

HAROLD BAUER

Mason & Hamlin Pianoforte

that is written. The war specifically, however, has removed any domination of the modern German school.

"Including Strauss?" asked the interviewer.

Here, however, Mr. Rabaud was careful to be just. He would pay proper tribute to the skill of the composer, but he drew the distinction that any influence Strauss might have as the mouthpiece or leading light in a modern German school was gone. In fact, when it came to influence, he thought that the modern Russians, including the war could be apparent in the music of the present-day writers, there would be the indirect one brought about by the change in values placed on the writers of Russia and France.

American Composition

The subject of contemporary writers naturally brought out a query as to what opinion the conductor had formed on the American music he had read and heard. Was there any indication of a typical American school that he had observed? Were there cer-

ere hat
iman-ym-t, a adnry ich ohn
oef-
ese,
ood,
fluther ally
sic, sult vrit-any
the

Drawn for The Christian Science Monitor

Henri Rabaud

Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1918-19.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

HENRI RABAUD, Conductor.

NINETEENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, MARCH 28, AT 2.30 P.M.

SATURDAY, MARCH 29, AT 8 P.M.

FAURÉ,

PRELUDE to the Lyric Poem, "Pénélope"
(First time in Boston)

BEETHOVEN,

CONCERTO for Pianoforte, No. 5, in E flat major
op. 73

I. Allegro
II. Adagio un poco moto
III. Rondo: Allegro ma non troppo

HILL,

FOUR PIECES for ORCHESTRA, "Stephensonia"
(after Poems from R. L. Stephenson's "A Child's Garden of Verse")

I. March
II. Lullaby, "The Land of Nod"
III. Scherzo
IV. "The Unseen Playmate"
[First time at these Concerts]

BERLIOZ,

"GRAND FÊTE at Capulet's House," from the Dramatic Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet," op. 17
Romeo seul—tristesse—bruits lointains de concert et de
bal—grande fête chez Capulet

Soloist:

HAROLD BAUER

Mason & Hamlin Pianoforte

that is written. The war specifically, however, has removed any domination of the modern German school.

"Including Strauss?" asked the interviewer.

Here, however, Mr. Rabaud was careful to be just. He would pay proper tribute to the skill of the composer, but he drew the distinction that any influence Strauss might have as the mouthpiece or leading light in a modern German school was gone. In fact, when it came to influence, he thought that the modern Russians, including Moussorgsky, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Stravinsky—but not Tchaikowsky—were exerting more than any other group of writers. Mr. Rabaud does not seem to care over much for the work of Tchaikowsky. Possibly he feels, as do others, that this composer deliberately sacrificed his national feeling to obtain a veneer of German style.

The conductor could not deny, of course, and patriotically he did not try, that the modern Frenchmen have come to have much influence, and he paid heartfelt tribute to the work of César Franck. Now César Franck was more or less a pioneer, whose achievement is just beginning to obtain the recognition outside his own country that it deserves. César Franck never wrote a piece of cheap or uninteresting music, which makes him well worth the study that might before the war have gone in the direction of Munich or Berlin. Thus Mr. Rabaud brought out that before any direct result of the war could be apparent in the music of the present-day writers, there would be the indirect one brought about by the change in values placed on the writers of Russia and France.

American Composition

The subject of contemporary writers naturally brought out a query as to what opinion the conductor had formed on the American music he had read and heard. Was there any indication of a typical American school that he had observed? Were there certain characteristics that he could call strictly American?

No, he could not say that there were. He mentioned the works that he had performed during his incumbency in Boston—an orchestral fantasy by Frederic S. Converse, a symphonic prologue by Henry Gilbert, a patriotic hymn by George W. Chadwick, a symphonic fantasy by Henry Hadley, and told of other works which he had read, by Arthur Foote, John Alden Carpenter, Charles Martin Loeffler, MacDowell, E. B. Hill. These, he said, he had found very good, but there was a diversity of influence observable, and taken together they could not be called typically American. The real American music, like that which would show the result of the war, he believed would be written, but when—he disclaimed any faculty or intention of playing the prophet.

HAMILTON'S
1048 SIXTH STREET
Grocers — Sixth and C
Ingersoll Candy Co.
PINE CANDIES
1015 Fifth Street
LENOX CAFE
1058 Fifth Street
Mark D. Orr
Pictures, Frames, Gift Cards
Artists' Supplies, Kodak Finish
1157 Fourth Street
LOREY
PARISIAN CLEANING AND DYEING CO.
3841 Seventh Home 4420

HEIMANN & COMPANY
A-5737, Main 1175
INSURANCE
Van Noy's Building F 6554, Main 3506
Real Estate—Loans—Insurance
15128
T. G. HAZENBUSH Investment Building
BACKUS MARKET
STALLS A 5-A 6
Star Delicatessen
STALL C 6
GRAND CENTRAL PUBLIC MARKET
F 5145
South Broadway
Ralphs Grocery Company
"SELLS FOR LESS"
Four stores, 635 and 317 So. Spring St.
35th Pl. and Vermont, Pico and Normandie.
NORRIS' CASH GROCERY QUALITY AND SERVICE
3-5-7 So. Hoover St. West 18, Home 24191

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1918-19.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

HENRI RABAUD, Conductor.

NINETEENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, MARCH 28, AT 2.30 P.M.

SATURDAY, MARCH 29, AT 8 P.M.

FAURÉ.

PRELUDE to the Lyric Poem, "Pénélope"
(First time in Boston)

BEETHOVEN.

CONCERTO for Pianoforte, No. 5, in E flat major
op. 73
I. Allegro
II. Adagio un poco moto
III. Rondo; Allegro ma non troppo

HILL.

FOUR PIECES for ORCHESTRA, "Stephensonia"
(after Poems from R. L. Stephenson's "A Child's Garden of Verse")
I. March
II. Lullaby, "The Land of Nod"
III. Scherzo
IV. "The Unseen Playmate"
[First time at these Concerts]

BERLIOZ.

"GRAND FÊTE at Capulet's House," from the Dramatic Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet," op. 17
Romeo seul—tristesse—bruits lointains de concert et de
bal—grande fête chez Capulet

Soloist:

HAROLD BAUER

Mason & Hamlin Pianoforte

BAUER

19TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Herald

March 29, 1917.

Harold Bauer, Pianist, as Soloist, Played with Great Power

By PHILIP HALE

The 19th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Rabaud, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Gabriel Faure, Prelude to "Penelope" (first time in Boston); Beethoven, Piano Concerto, No. 5, E flat major (Harold Bauer, pianist); Hill, "Stevensoniana," four pieces after poems from R. L. Stevenson's "Child's Garden of Verses" (first time at these concerts); Berlioz, Grand Fete at Capulet's House from "Romeo and Juliet."

It is not easy to find the Gabriel Faure of the songs, the chamber music, the "Requiem" and the stage music for "Pelleas and Melisande" in this prelude. Does it foretell the prevailing mood of the opera? But Ulysses and Penelope are united at the end, after 20 years. Is it expressive of Ulysses's wanderings? But Circe and Calypso were more than kind to him, according to tradition he had sons by the two, and Nausicaa, one of the loveliest maidens in all literature, would gladly have wedded him. Does the prelude tell in tones of Penelope's anxious years, vexed by the suitors? Tradition has not spared her, she has not 'scaped calumny. Is the theme first given to the trumpet the theme of Ulysses? Or is the prelude simply a prelude without definite purpose or plan, only music before the curtain rises? However these questions may be answered, this one thing is certain: That the chief musical ideas are not emotional, the chief interest is in the workmanship, although the horn figure at the end, the phrase that apparently has much to say and yet for some reason is half reticent, may haunt the memory for a time. It seems that in this prelude fastidiousness has nearly run into dryness, but Faure was nearly seventy years old when the opera was produced and there has been only one astonishing composer of gray years, the Italian named Verdi, the Verdi of "Otello," "Falstaff" and the four sacred pieces.

Mr. Hill's suite is based on verses for children by Stevenson: Marching Song, The Land of Nod, Where go the Boats? and The Unseen Playmate. The question rises: Do children like this "Garden of Verse," or are the poems better appreciated by older persons? The Alice of the Wonderland, the Alice that went through the looking glass is undoubtedly dearer to men and women than to their children. Not long ago we heard a little girl declare as a matter of course that Lewis Carroll's books were "silly." Possibly she preferred the later novels of Henry James. In like manner music for children is relished only by thoughtful elders: witness some of Schumann's pages. Would a child, one that is not afraid of music, find much pleasure in Mr. Carpenter's Suite, "The Adventures of a Perambulator"? We doubt it; but she might prick up her ears when she heard the xylophones at work. Of course the answer is that Mr. Carpenter's Suite was not written for children. Mr. Hill, too, wrote for mature hearers, but we think that a normal child would like the March, and at the end shout: "Play it again."

This Suite shows fancy, delicate humor, true invention and no mean skill in the instrumentation. A full modern orchestra is employed, but not to stun and dismay. As is the case with Ravel, the modern orchestra is here used to obtain light, tricky, even gently emotional effects. The March is delightful throughout. In the Lullaby Mr. Hill shuns without too much effort the obvious; it is not an easy task to invent a new form of cradle songs. The Scherzo, without being too realistic suggests the spirit of "Where go the Boats?" and the rippling river; only in the finale do we find a little hesitation, a little vagueness, awakening the wish that this movement were more closely knit together, of more continuous flow. The audience was greatly pleased by the Suite and called on the composer more than once. Mr. Hill was fortunate in his interpreter and the players.

The performance of Beethoven's concerto was a remarkable one, one that may be justly described as noble. Unless there is nobility in the reading of this music the concerto is merely a vain thing. Mr. Bauer, who this season is in the height of his power, played with the finest understanding, with a bravura that was not merely pyrotechnical, with impressive authority and with the classic sentiment that is the poetry of romanticism. Nor can too much be said in praise of the orchestra performance inspired by Mr. Rabaud, a performance wonderful by reason of rhythmic intensity, which was never feverish, an infinite variety of tonal force and color, and a wholly apathetic, supporting, and relieving. In his relationship with the pianist, Mr. Rabaud, with his admirable band and Mr. Bauer here vied, one with the other, in the glorification of the composer. Thus played, this concerto is justly called "The Emperor."

The music for Romeo, alone, sorrowing in the garden, is still beautiful. Mr. Lengy still plays the lament poetically. One wishes, however, that Berlioz had written more intoxicating or more sensuous music for Capulet's ball. So one lightly says; but stop; this music was first heard 80 years ago; marvellous music for that period.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Mozart, Symphony in D major (K. 504); Malipiero, "The Pauses of Silence"; Seven Symphonic Expressions (first time in the United States); Saint-Saens, Violin concerto, B minor, No. 3 (Jacques Thibaud, violinist); Liszt, Mazeppa, Symphonic poem No. 6 (after Victor Hugo's poem).

NOVELTIES PLAYED BY SYMPHONY

Post ———— Mon. 29. 1919.
Harold Bauer, Soloist, Gives Beethoven's
5th Concerto

BY OLIN DOWNES

Two compositions were heard for the first time in Boston at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall: the orchestral prelude to Faure's opera, "Penelope," and Edward Burlingame Hill's "Stevensoniana," consisting of four pieces for orchestra after Robert Louis Stevenson's "A Child's Garden of Verses."

Harold Bauer, pianist, played Beethoven's fifth concerto for piano and orchestra, and the movement known as "Grand Fete at Capulet's House" from Berlioz's dramatic symphony, "Romeo and Juliet," brought the concert to an end.

BAUER IN BEETHOVEN

The performances of Beethoven's music and the music of Berlioz were of memorable brilliancy and impressiveness. We find it hard to think so highly of Beethoven's fifth concerto as we do of his fourth, despite the evident grandeur of the thought and the heroic and beautiful quality of the music of the former work, heard yesterday. But Mr. Bauer brought home the essential character of the fifth concerto as very few pianists have who appeared at the Symphony concerts in recent years. In this he was admirably assisted by Mr. Rabaud. The romantic spirit in which the pianist interpreted the noble introduction would not have been felt as it was, had the orchestral rejoinders been less significant.

The towering structure of the opening movement has seemed overlong and overcrowded with detail in the hands of other conductors. Nor has there been, within memory, such a beautiful balance of piano and orchestra and so intimate an appreciation on the part of the pianist of the subtle colors with which Beethoven often enhances his music in this concerto. The concerto of Beethoven, which some had feared was aging, had again its mysterious potency, its Promethean fire. So, too, with the slow movement.

The finale is undoubtedly the weak movement of the work, as is also the case with the violin concerto. But it was superbly played and Mr. Bauer was recalled with great enthusiasm. He is indeed a consummate artist, one of the most individual and distinguished of pianistic interpreters.

Berlioz's Music

Still more astonishing, because the secrets of the music were known to fewer people, was the thrilling performance of the music of Berlioz. The love-music, for once, had all the sensuous and the poetic beauty which the composer intended—the longing of Romeo in the silence of the garden. The distant echo of the ball, the feverish brilliancy of the dance music as the desperate lover is supposed to enter the hall of his enemies, and the tragic instrumental commentary heard through the sounds of festival thrilled one as Ber-lioz alone, among all the romanticists, seems capable of thrilling an audience today—provided you have so sympathetic and masterly an interpreter as Mr. Rabaud. If Berlioz had had no such exquisite ideas as the love-theme played at first by solo wind instruments, if his music had all and more than the defects attributed to it by the composer's detractors, he would live and grip his hearers as a Temperament—a temperament of such volcanic power and vitality that it would have made itself felt in any period, in any medium of expression. As author, artist, sculptor, dramatist, he would have become the torchlight of an epoch, a commanding figure among the bravest and strongest spirits of the human race. He impressed his image distinctly, gigantically, unforgettably on his art. And yesterday, thanks to the wonderful conducting of Mr. Rabaud, we heard Berlioz, his own compelling voice, and not a sandpapered echo of him.

Faure's prelude to Penelope, has, perhaps, classic feeling. In it the hearer might fancy the winds that took Ulysses on his way, and the longing of the faithful spouse for the return of her hero. For us the music is polished, but lifeless.

Mr. Hill's Pieces

Mr. Hill's music was received with great and evident enthusiasm. It is ingeniously scored, fanciful, and always in good taste, so far as harmony, tonal combination and workmanship are concerned. Regarding this music we are on the fence. At a first hearing we liked best the Scherzo and the final number, "The Unseen Playmate." The lullaby seems sophisticated. The march has humor, but it has this quality in common with other of the four pieces; it seems a very big affair for so modest a subject. In this age of gigantic occurrences the sounds of an enormous modern orchestra may be a composer's natural manner of speech, even when he is thinking of child fantasies, but it is hard to reconcile this with pre-conceived formulas for such a theme.

The music sounds so well from an orchestral standpoint, Mr. Hill has become so skillful a musician and his product is so beguiling to the ear that one is not always certain of the underlying value of the ideas. How would the same ideas sound with a clumsier author? This may be said: If other American composers had studied as broadly and as seriously, and attained the mastery of their medium shown by Mr. Hill, an American school of composition might not be as far off as it is today.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Trane. ———— Mon. 29. 1919.
LIVELY INTEREST AND PLENTIFUL PLEASURE

Faure's Dumb Prelude to His Opera, "Penelope"—Mr. Hill's Fanciful, Dexteros and Playful Suite of Childhood Music—Again the Thrilling Berlioz of "Romeo and Juliet," and the More Thrilling Beethoven of the "Emperor Concerto," with Mr. Bauer for Pianist

FAVORING circumstance swelled the audience, the applause and the interest of the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon. The "assisting artist" was Mr. Bauer, the pianist, by common consent and by common report, since his recent recital here, in the rich maturity of remarkable powers. The music of his and Mr. Rabaud's choice was the fifth concerto of Beethoven, "The Emperor," acknowledged masterpiece in kind, unheard here these many years in vitalizing and exalting performance. As when Mr. Heifetz came to the orchestra a few months ago, an eminent "soloist" in a concerto by Beethoven filled many a seat that might otherwise have stood empty. A few more, not always filled, were occupied by the friends of Mr. Edward Burlingame Hill, the Bostonian composer, whose suite, "Stevensoniana" was played "for the first time at these concerts," preceded, like Mr. Bauer, by warm and widespread report. To whet curiosity further a French piece probably played for the first time in the United States—Faure's prelude to his opera, "Penelope"—began the programme; while to end it and to promise high pleasure stood Berlioz's music for the fete at Capulet's house from his symphony, "Romeo and Juliet." At every turn, once orchestra and audience were clear of Faure's prelude, the concert fulfilled anticipation. Mr. Bauer and the band played Beethoven's concerto to a rapt audience that in applause found relaxation as well as gave reward. In turn, the plaudits for Mr. Hill's suite and for the composer himself, when at Mr. Rabaud's call, he rose in his place, were the clappings of general and genuine pleasure. Berlioz—in the Elysian Fields—was not overlooked, even if it were for Beethoven—and not, as often for him—to crown the afternoon. The year at Symphony Hall has brought few more interesting concerts.

For the one cloud upon the bright interest of the afternoon, it is probable that Fauré never contemplated performance of his prelude apart from the opera into which in the theatre it leads. By testimony of the programme-book, Mr. Rabaud added instruments to Fauré's choirs to make the music sound more richly—that "reprehensible" custom (as it has been called) of German conductors, never, never, never to be practised by a good Parisian. By gossip of the lobby, he also rounded the final measures, before the introduction merges into a scene of spinning women, into a closing period. No tinkering, however, much avails the music. It sounded dutiful and dull in the theatre in Paris, six years ago; it sounded no less perfunctory and mechanical yesterday in the concert-hall of Boston. Seemingly, there is a motive to personify the valorous Ulysses, heroic wanderer, to return in the final scene and slay the wasters of his substance, the suitors to his spouse. Seemingly, a second motive personifies the longing, the much-enduring Penelope unravelling by night the web that she wove by day in Ulysses's great hall, scanning the sea from the cliff at sunset (as in the second act) for glimpse of his returning sail. The hearer perceives these motives by exercise of the mind, not by stirring of the imagination. Like Penelope, Fauré weaves the motives into a polyphonic web and by a process as spiritless as hers. Again the mind perceives the music; but only the few strands that the horns color touch the fancy. There is sober progress, grave emphases, discreet climax. Even in the prelude, as through the whole opera, Fauré laboriously declaims. Soon the music wastes and wanes into the measures of Penelope's spinning maidens. Seemingly opera is to Fauré as the bow of Ulysses to the suitors—a weapon too stout to swing and bend. Hardly a suggestion, outside the measures for the horns, of the fine-fingered, fine-eared, finely fanciful composer colors the prelude. It is mere speechifying in tones, after the manner of French composers from Rameau onward when invention, imagination, passion will not stir for them in the theatre.

On the score of dramatizing and picturing eloquence, the Berlioz of 1839 shone beside the Fauré of 1913 and in a symphony ostensibly of the concert-room, but actually far more of the stage than Fauré's scant and static music-drama. Agreed that the purists and the pedants reproach Berlioz's melodies and still more his procedure with them. Yet in this fragment of his symphony to "Romeo and Juliet," one of these melodies evokes the Montague to the ear, summons and sustains his passion for the daughter of the Capulets, opens his tortured heart, serves every dramatic need when his music intrudes into that of the fête, woes there, is thrust away lamenting.

What melody so devised and conducted, could do more? The academic shortcomings rise up to bless, to heighten it. Nor have the modern artists in tone-picturing much excelled Berlioz in the illusion of the distant fête, of Romeo musing against its echoes and flares, of Romeo cast out and woful while to him it rings Juliet. Possibly, the music of the fête itself has worn a little thin after eighty years but there are still measures in it where the rhythm beats high, the color glows and pulses and the ear hears as the eye sees one of Veronese's canvases of Venetian feasting and revel. By sheer heat of will and imagination Berlioz living burned away a hundred handicaps. The like heat now keeps his music molten after nearly a hundred years. Writing a symphony, he is more truly musical dramatist than Fauré writing a whole opera. And it is in such high rhythmed, high colored, graphic music that Mr. Rabaud does well.

To these musics of attempted or accomplished eloquence, Mr. Hill's suite—all charm, fancy and light dexterity—was agreeable foil. Searching the rhymes of Stevenson in "A Child's Garden of Verses" for suggestion, the "Marching Song" of Jane and Peter, to the comb, with napkin for banner, but with the double-quick of "each a grenadier," gave him hint for a first division. In "The Land of Nod"

Try as I like to find the way,
I never can get back by day.
Nor can remember plain and clear
The curious music that I hear.

afforded text for a second division of vaporous, drowsily wandering music-making. Down the flowing river, brown and golden, go "boats of mine a-boating" to visioned landings, and Mr. Hill may write the undulating back-ground, the musing measures of contrast for his scherzo. And, when in "The Unseen Playmate" Stevenson rhymes:

'Tis he when at night you go off to your bed
Bids you go to your sleep and not trouble your head.

the composer receives his recalling and glamouring finale written in verse if not in tones. The song-writers have not turned to Stevenson, poet, in vain. Now a composer of symphonic music has sought him with equal profit.

In spite of the orthodox belief to the contrary, a well schooled "modernist" like Mr. Hill is loyal and logical with form. True, like his brethren, he lets his matter condition his manner, but once having chosen means and method, he is clear-minded and clean-handed with them. The march, with its trio, has unity and contrast; the slow movement of "The Land of Nod" is a close woven web of aerial voices fancifully summoned in harmonies and timbres, figure and modulation, from seemingly slend-scholarship, coloring that at his will is bright or shadowy. The music to "The Land of Nod" is a misty web of finespun harmonies, of the lightest of modulations. The music of the finale wanders through as delicate and dreamy shadows. By these tokens and others as clear in the playful march and the flowing scherzo, Mr. Hill has composed his suite with the enkindled mood and fancy that stir his hearers to like feeling and imagining. He may or he may not have written a music of childhood play and notion as children know them. He has written a music, as Stevenson has written a verse, that poetizes the hint of them that elders sometimes receive or that their own lingering memories treasure out of younger days. Unlike many a piece by an American composer, Mr. Hill's suite foresees the end from the beginning and as clearly accomplishes it. Scarcely a note is wasted; scarcely a note could be spared, brief as is the suite. At every turn, the music is transparent, illusory, ingratiating, amusing. It deserves a place beside Mr. Carpenter's "Adventures in a Perambulator" in a pigeon-hole that conductors do not too often finger.

Yet when Hill had charmed and Berlioz thrilled, the glory of the afternoon remained firmly set about Beethoven's concerto. At every turn, Mr. Bauer was master of himself, the piano, the piece. He knew exactly what he would do with each measure of his part; he was as fully master of the means whereby he would work his will. The light precision of his rhythms were as silken whips upon the music; his runs sparkled upon the ear; the motives. The undulant scherzo mates sustained musical progress with sustained imagery of river and boats. The happy artifice of the finale, with the earlier motives recurring in the vague outline of dream, binds the whole suite together and then, as with a light wave of poet's and composer's wand, whisks fancies and music into empty air. Stevenson's child, Mr. Hill's child, sleeps fancy-fed as he has played fancy-free.

As adroit and imaginative is the workmanship. Mr. Hill knows the current idioms of Paris and of other seats of the new musical learning, but he writes in the suite in an idiom of his own—light, keen rhythms, delicate play of harmonies, modulations that are the fingers of fancy upon contours of his ornament curved in beauty; as with the flash of a final phrase, he bade the orchestra speed the course of the music; rich was his declamation in the first movement, just and warm his sentiment in the second; bright his play of hand and fancy in the finale. And over every measure he played was the exceeding beauty of his tone—limpid, edgeless, plastic, colorful, never forcing or distorting the voice of the piano, responsive to every inflection of the music, adding thereto the shadings, the accent that Beethoven was kindling out of the pianist's imagination.

There are pianists who may or do excel Mr. Bauer in particular distinctions, but there is hardly one "now before this public" as the old reviewers used to say, who can so mingle in performance the penetrating, fusing, shaping mind, the mastery of expressive means, the glow of emotion, the illusion of poetry, the warm control of every intensifying and imparting faculty. If he erred at all yesterday, it was in zeal for a precision of accomplishment that for a passing moment hardened the contours, stayed the motion of the music. Time and again, the orchestra, especially in the wind choir, seemed to catch and echo his voice; while not since the day of Mr. Cortot has an "assisting artist" so stirred Mr. Rabaud out of dutiful and considerate into eloquent and vitalizing share in a concerto. Heard so, Beethoven's music strode with propulsive power, sang with the splendors of united or parted voices, ascended to exalted speech, melted into tenderness, danced light-footed upon the earth; possessed the minds and stirred the hearts of those that heard, manifold and masterful upon them. After a hundred years, "The Emperor" remains the one epical concerto.

H. T. P.

Music in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, Massachusetts — Interest in the nineteenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was divided between a well-tried and well-liked artist of the occasion and an unheard and unknown new composition. The artist was Harold Bauer, a pianist admired both by casual and professional hearers, who played the Beethoven "Emperor" concerto. The new work, by Edward Burlingame Hill, of Boston, was entitled "Stevensoniana," a set of four pieces after poems in Stevenson's "A Child's Garden of Verses"—march, lullaby "The Land of Nod," scherzo "Where Go the Boats," and "The Unseen Playmate."

Mr. Bauer, as is his wont, blended the piano part into the orchestra, becoming another member of the band. The customary fluidity and precision of his technique were in evidence; the usual impeccable and authoritative mastery of the music fulfilled expectation. Perhaps with all these things making for a satisfactory performance, it were captious to long for more verve and fire. Such a longing, however, persisted in sneaking in.

Mr. Rabaud made Mr. Hill's music race and flow, soar and float, for like all else that he does he had given it thorough study, consequently the four pieces were pleasant to listen to. They are compactly written, touched with humor, and well suggest the child's point of view. Only a few incorrigibly adult touches jarred, such as the sentimentalism of "The Unseen Playmate," a bit of which also crept into the scherzo. A child is many things, but he is not sentimental. The lullaby is full of admirable childish fancies with no bogey of adult nightmare. The march also was pure childhood, although a suspicion persists that Mr. Hill owes a slight debt to Gabriel Pierné. All children are not gentle, but all Stevenson's are, and likewise so are Mr. Hill's. Good music this, worthy a place on any program.

Fauré's prelude to "Pénélope," large and serene in conception, was heard for the first time in Boston, and was apparently liked. The selection from Berlioz's dramatic symphony "Romeo and Juliet," opus 17, gave the impression of being far more theatrical than dramatic.

Bauer Soloist on Symphony Program

adv. 7 Am. — Mich. 20, 1919.

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

Fauré—Prelude to "Penelope."

Beethoven—Piano Concerto No. 5.

Soloist, Mr. Harold Bauer.

Hill—"Stevensoniana." Four orchestra pieces

Berlioz—"The Fete at the Capulets," from Romeo and Juliet Symphony.

CERTAINLY a well contrasted and rather exciting program. Of course, Mr. Bauer was the chief attraction, a great soloist, always is. Sometimes this is out of place, but not when a true symphonic work, such as the "Emperor Concerto" is given with a splendid interpreter.

There is only praise to be spoken of the performance, praise of the piano and of the orchestral work. The brilliant ending of the first movement, really a Cadenza with piano and orchestra combined, made a superb climax, while the slow movement had expression without sentimentality. Both of Beethoven's greatest concertos (this and the violin concerto) fall off somewhat in the final rondo, but even this had so much of spirit that the work ended in a blaze of enthusiasm, the audience recalling Mr. Bauer many times, and M. Rabaud should have been associated with him in this triumph. Mr. Bauer played the noble, masculine work in a fitting, straightforward, masculine manner. It was, of course, the star point of the concert.

The second movement of Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony is not as great as the third, which contains the "Scene d'Amour" (the balcony scene), but it has some eloquent phrases nevertheless. There are some expressive passages for woodwind in the first portion, and flute, oboe and clarinet each deserve praise for delicate playing. The union of the themes of the Allegro and the Larghetto, in counterpoint, is an ingenious touch, and M. Rabaud balanced the two melodies excellently. The 'cello part also was important, for it must be remembered that Romeo is a melancholy violoncello, while Juliet is a violin through the greater part of this symphony. The fortississimo ending proved that they had rather a noisy time at that social function at the Capulets.

Fauré's prelude to "Penelope" was good music, if not extremely dramatic. Of course there were a pair of contrasted themes in it, as with Egmont and Claerchen, Florestan and Leonora, Tristan and Isolde, "et id genus omne." "Fauré is, thank Heaven, not a modern musical cubist, yet there is a sufficiency of excitement when Ulysses returns home and finds a lot of young gentlemen in white ties and lavender kids, each trying to outsit and outstay the other. Then there is something of rough house which is powerfully portrayed. The end of the prelude is most peculiar, a constant repetition of the tonic and mediant note and the final imperfect end is on the mediant.

Mr. Edward Burlingame Hill has no cause to complain of the manner in which his little Suite on Stevensonian themes was given. The opening march seemed too strongly modulatory and too intensely modern in heavy scoring to be fitting to an infantile picture, but perhaps it was intended for the children of giants. It was, however, quite interesting and in this movement and in the finale Mr. Hill showed that he could ably handle the modern orchestra. There were some striking effects of tone-coloring.

The gentle Lullaby was rather too abstruse for any but the typical Boston intellectual child. The Scherzo had an interesting oboe melody and the string effects picturing the flowing river were poetic.

The finale gave reminiscences of the preceding movements and was worked up to effective climaxes. The work was logical and coherent, although we wished for more directness and simplicity of melody in such pictures, and Mr. Hill's composition was not crushed by being placed between Beethoven and Berlioz. At the close there was much applause and the composer was obliged to acknowledge this from his seat in the audience several times.

HILL'S MUSIC GRASPS SPIRIT OF CHILDHOOD

Mich. 29/19

Bauer Plays Brilliantly at Symphony Concert

Edward Burlingame Hill's "Stevensoniana," four pieces for orchestra after poems from Robert Louis Stevenson's "A Child's Garden of Verses," played yesterday afternoon for the first time at the Symphony concerts, at last has something grateful to say as music inspired by childhood.

Mr Hill has been more fortunate than some of his fellows, for between certain adult minds and the child consciousness there is a great gulf, and the pretty prattle of babes falls ponderously out of a cobwebbed psychology which ought to know better.

Hearing this music of pure fancy and true charm, one is persuaded that the spirit of play which peoples the imaginative world of the child, which makes its sweet illusions more real than the sordid every day of its elders, need not be mocked by those who, striving to interpret the dreams of little brains, forget their spell if indeed they ever knew it.

Mr Hill has caught the spirit of Stevenson's verses with the skill of an admirable orchestral craftsman, serving gracefully an imagination which is unwearying, fresh and consistently akin to the realm of play.

There are some who apparently have believed that to record humor, to caper nimbly, is to reflect a mood of childhood. Mr Hill's score, admirable and engrossing as the work of a serious musician, is the more one of remarkable merit since.

This sophisticated equipment, speaking through a modern harmonic and orchestral idiom, overtakes and does not lose a spontaneity as grateful for its unconscious, artless simplicity, as for its happy surprises. The "Lullaby," a poem of wearing strands of far calling stringed instruments is an exquisite piece of writing. The composer, modestly acknowledged warm applause.

Harold Bauer gave a finely considered, and well executed performance of Beethoven's fifth concerto, one of dignity, poetic beauty, and in the last movement of brilliance. He was many times recalled.

Fauré's prelude to his lyric poem, "Penelope," played yesterday by Mr Rabaud for the first time in Boston, again shows a composer less happy in orchestral treatment of his subject than in the exquisite miniatures of many of his songs.

The plaint and frenzy of Berlioz' Romeo in his scene at the fete at Capulet's house, in his Dramatic Symphony, is largely autobiographical of the period of Harriet Smithson, the English Shaksperian actress, whom the composer married deliriously and lived with for a time wretchedly. The ballroom scene has brilliance and the bawling is appropriately noisy.

The love music for Romeo is more worthy of Berlioz and some of it again was ennobled by Mr Longy. In all, particularly in Mr Hill's pieces, Mr Rabaud conducted with imagination, taste and authority.

NEW MUSIC "AFTER" STEVENSON IN PROSPECT

Trans. — Mich. 24/19

Mr. Hill's Suite from "A Child's Garden of Verses" at the Symphony Concerts—The Boston Orchestra Takes Leave, for the Season, of New York—A New and an Old Entertainer—Mme. Frijsh to Return in May

FOUR pieces in Stevenson's "A Child's Garden of Verses" suggested to Mr. Edward Burlingame Hill his suite for orchestra, "Stevensoniana," to be played for the first times at the Symphony Concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next viz:

"The Marching Song" in which

Mary Jane commands the party,
Peter leads the rear;
Feet in time, alert and hearty,
Each a Grenadier.

286
"The Land of Nod," of the dreaming child:

Try as I like to find the way,
I never can get back by day
Nor can remember plain and clear
The curious music that I hear.

a Scherzo from "Where Go the Boats?"

Green leaves a-floating,
Castles of the foam
Boats of mine a-boating
Where will all come home?

and for quiet Finale "The Unseen Playmate":

When children are playing alone on the green,
In comes the playmate that never was seen.
When children are happy and lonely and good,
The Friend of the Children comes out of the wood.

The suite—no more than fifteen minutes long, but using some of the more subtle resources of the orchestra and testing the skill of the players—was heard for the first time at any concert from Mr. Damrosch and his orchestra in New York in February of last year. With one accord, the reviewers wrote warmly of it. Said Mr. Henderson, for example in The Sun: "The Marching Song," brought to the composer's mind something of the pompous make-believe of humor of the juvenile soldiers, together with the humor of the martial strains of the paper folded over the comb. "The Land of Nod" gave the hint for the lovely slow movement, in which the composer is at his best, making music rich in tender feeling and at the same time creating the appropriate atmosphere of elusiveness. "Where Go the Boats?" makes a charming scherzo. The finale, "The Unseen Playmate," in which fragmentary references to the previous movements are made, is winning in style. The whole composition shows poetic fancy and a firm command of delicate and interesting methods of musical presentation. But what seemed to the present observer to be the most attractive trait of the composition was its clear publication of large human sentiment. Any little boy who listened attentively to the music would be likely to think that if he had not a good papa of his own he would not mind being Mr. Hill's little boy."

The Tribune added: "Mr. Hill writes quite frankly in the idiom of the modern Frenchmen; Debussy and Ravel are his masters. He does not, however, write as a mere copyist, but appears to express himself spontaneously in his chosen manner. The only adverse criticism which could be levelled at the suite is that Mr. Hill's idiom is rather too sophisticated for the interpretation of such simple sentiments as those expressed by the poems. Yet despite this there were many charming touches of childhood, especially in the 'Marching Song,' while throughout, the contrasts of color and rhythm were interesting and well handled. Mr. Hill, in his music, may not possess the heart of a child, but he is a man whose heart reacts to the emotion of childhood and reacts quite spontaneously."

Leave-Takings in New York

At a concert on Saturday afternoon last in Carnegie Hall, the Boston Orchestra took leave of its public in New York for the season. The band and Mr. Rabaud were heartily applauded, and there were many signs of general and particular pleasure. Mr. Huneker recounts the occasion in The Times: "It was an enjoyable musical function, though the playing of the famous organization was not on a par with its Thursday evening performance. The second movement of the Saint-Saëns C minor Symphony was massive in its tonal beauty and the climax stunning. Mr. Rabaud always waits for a kettledrum climacteric with interest, and the artist who handles the sticks went for his instrument with a demoniacal intensity that must have pleased the French conductor. Saint-Saëns, like Franck, narrowly escapes genius. His knowledge is enormous, his invention mediocre. When he drops the thread of his musical discourse he resorts to the deadly chorale, or he lightly trips the gay fugato too."

"An excerpt from Franck's 'Redemption' followed. In it the string choir has seldom sounded so rich and sonorous. Bach was represented by his second concerto in F for violin, flute, oboe, and trumpet, played by Messrs. Fradkin, Laurent, Longy and Helm, and barring a false entrance of the trumpet in the first allegro—which slip, oddly enough, did not dislocate the phrase—the entire composition proved delightful. What music is this that, like a pure mountain source, sparkles and upgushes! 'Sadko,' a tone picture of Rimsky-Korsakov, is not so eloquent as several of his other suites or poems, yet it is Rimsky, and that says everything. Today 'Sadko' is rather tame to ears attuned to Stravinsky. The music served as a vehicle for some esoteric capering of the Russian Ballet several seasons ago. It is marked by fancy and vivid colors. Mr. Rabaud's reading was drab rather than kaleidoscopic, though the finesse was admirable. The afternoon closed with a brilliant but not precisely traditional interpretation of the 'Freischütz' overture. There was an ovation to the conductor and plenty of applause for the orchestra. No official announcement for next season's plans has been made as to conductors, but it might be a good idea to let well enough alone."

19-6
287
Mr. HAROLD BAUER was born at London, April 28, 1873. (His father was German by birth, his mother English.) He began his career as a violinist, a pupil of Pollitzer, who formed him in many ways. He played in public when he was nine years old, and for several years he gave concerts with his sisters, Ethel, a pianist, and Winifred, a violinist. The Musical Times reviewed a concert given April 17, 1888, and spoke of him as an "efficient pianist; but his ability chiefly displays itself on the violin." In 1892 he decided to be a pianist, and as such he is almost wholly self-taught; for the lessons from Paderewski were few, and Mr. Bauer does not call himself Paderewski's pupil. In 1893 Mr. Bauer made his début as a pianist in Paris, which he calls his home. He journeyed through Russia with the singer Nikita. He has given concerts in Germany, Spain, the Netherlands, Austria, Sweden, Brazil, and other countries of South America, and in Australia; concerts in Europe with Pablo Casals, violoncellist, also with Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and he has played with many orchestras.

His first appearance in the United States was at Boston, December 1, 1900, when he played at a Symphony concert Brahms's Concerto in D minor. He played in Symphony Hall with the Symphony Orchestra Schumann's Concert-piece, Op. 92, and Liszt's "Dance of Death," January 11, 1902, and on April 5 of the same year d'Indy's Symphony on a Mountain Air, for orchestra and pianoforte, Op. 25; on October 17, 1903, he played Tschaikowsky's Concerto No. 1, in B-flat minor; on February 3, 1906, he played Schumann's Concerto in A minor; on April 18, 1908, Emanuel Moór's Concerto, Op. 57.

He played in Boston with the Kneisel Quartet César Franck's Quintet, Op. 44, February 11, 1901; and on April 7, 1902, Bach's Sonata in A major, No. 2, for violin and pianoforte, and César Franck's Quintet in F minor; Brahms's Piano Quartet in C minor, November 17, 1903; Schubert's Piano Trio in B-flat major, December 5, 1905; Beethoven's Trio in B-flat major, Op. 97, January 14, 1908.

He played in Boston with the Arbos Quartet Tschaikowsky's Trio, November 23, 1903, and with the Hoffmann Quartet Brahms's Piano Quintet in F minor, November 12, 1903.

He gave pianoforte recitals in Boston, December 8, 27, 1900; January 1, 7, 15, February 23, 1901; January 21, February 4, 11, March 19, April 12, 1902; November 4, December 5, 1903; January 2, February 6, 1904; November 27, December 4, 11, 1905; February 4, 1906 (Sunday chamber concert in Chickering Hall); March 27, 1906; January 2, 16, 1908.

On April 27, 1908, he played Beethoven's Concerto No. 5 at a concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in aid of the Chelsea Relief Fund.

He visited Boston again in 1911, and on November 25 played Schumann's Concerto at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He gave recitals that season on December 4 (Schumann-Chopin-Liszt recital), January 13 and April 2, 1912.

286
"The Land of Nod," of the dreaming child:

Try as I like to find the way,
I never can get back by day
Nor can remember plain and clear
The curious music that I hear.

a Scherzo from "Where Go the Boats?"

Green leaves a-floating,
Castles of the foam
Boats of mine a-boating
Where will all come home?

and for quiet Finale "The Unseen Playmate":

When children are playing alone on the green,
In comes the playmate that never was seen,
When children are happy and lonely and good,
The Friend of the Children comes out of the wood.

The suite—no more than fifteen minutes long, but using some of the more subtle resources of the orchestra and testing the skill of the players—was heard for the first time at any concert from Mr. Damrosch and his orchestra in New York in February of last year. With one accord, the reviewers wrote warmly of it. Said Mr. Henderson, for example in The Sun: "The 'Marching Song,' brought to the composer's mind something of the pompous make-believe of humor of the juvenile soldiers, together with the humor of the martial strains of the paper folded over the comb. 'The Land of Nod' gave the hint for the lovely slow movement, in which the composer is at his best, making music rich in tender feeling and at the same time creating the appropriate atmosphere of elusiveness. 'Where Go the Boats?' makes a charming scherzo. The finale, 'The Unseen Playmate,' in which fragmentary references to the previous movements are made, is winning in style. The whole composition shows poetic fancy and a firm command of delicate and interesting methods of musical presentation. But what seemed to the present observer to be the most attractive trait of the composition was its clear publication of large human sentiment. Any little boy who listened attentively to the music would be likely to think that if he had not a good papa of his own he would not mind being Mr. Hill's little boy."

The Tribune added: "Mr. Hill writes quite frankly in the idiom of the modern Frenchmen; Debussy and Ravel are his masters. He does not, however, write as a mere copyist, but appears to express himself spontaneously in his chosen manner. The only adverse criticism which could be levelled at the suite is that Mr. Hill's idiom is rather too sophisticated for the interpretation of such simple sentiments as those expressed by the poems. Yet despite this there were many charming touches of childhood, especially in the 'Marching Song,' while throughout, the contrasts of color and rhythm were interesting and well handled. Mr. Hill, in his music, may not possess the heart of a child, but he is a man whose heart reacts to the emotion of childhood and reacts quite spontaneously."

Leave-Takings in New York

At a concert on Saturday afternoon last in Carnegie Hall, the Boston Orchestra took leave of its public in New York for the season. The band and Mr. Rabaud were heartily applauded, and there were many signs of general and particular pleasure. Mr. Hunkeler recounts the occasion in The Times: "It was an enjoyable musical function, though the playing of the famous organization was not on a par with its Thursday evening performance. The second movement of the Saint-Saëns C minor Symphony was massive in its tonal beauty and the climax stunning. Mr. Rabaud always waits for a kettledrum climacteric with interest, and the artist who handles the sticks went for his instrument with a demoniacal intensity that must have pleased the French conductor. Saint-Saëns, like Franck, narrowly escapes genius. His knowledge is enormous, his invention mediocre. When he drops the thread of his musical discourse he resorts to the deadly chorale, or he lightly trips the gay fugato toe."

"An excerpt from Franck's 'Redemption' followed. In it the string choir has seldom sounded so rich and sonorous. Bach was represented by his second concerto in F for violin, flute, oboe, and trumpet, played by Messrs. Fradkin, Laurent, Longy and Helm, and barring a false entrance of the trumpet in the first allegro—which slip, oddly enough, did not dislocate the phrase—the entire composition proved delightful. What music is this that, like a pure mountain source, sparkles and upgushes! 'Sadko,' a tone picture of Rimsky-Korsakov, is not so eloquent as several of his other suites or poems, yet it is Rimsky, and that says everything. Today 'Sadko' is rather tame to ears attuned to Stravinsky. The music served as a vehicle for some esoteric capering of the Russian Ballet several seasons ago. It is marked by fancy and vivid colors. Mr. Rabaud's reading was drab rather than kaleidoscopic, though the finesse was admirable. The afternoon closed with a brilliant but not precisely traditional interpretation of the 'Freischütz' overture. There was an ovation to the conductor and plenty of applause for the orchestra. No official announcement for next season's plans has been made as to conductors, but it might be a good idea to let well enough alone."

287
Mr. HAROLD BAUER was born at London, April 28, 1873. (His father was German by birth, his mother English.) He began his career as a violinist, a pupil of Pollitzer, who formed him in many ways. He played in public when he was nine years old, and for several years he gave concerts with his sisters, Ethel, a pianist, and Winifred, a violinist. The Musical Times reviewed a concert given April 17, 1888, and spoke of him as an "efficient pianist; but his ability chiefly displays itself on the violin." In 1892 he decided to be a pianist, and as such he is almost wholly self-taught; for the lessons from Paderewski were few, and Mr. Bauer does not call himself Paderewski's pupil. In 1893 Mr. Bauer made his début as a pianist in Paris, which he calls his home. He journeyed through Russia with the singer Nikita. He has given concerts in Germany, Spain, the Netherlands, Austria, Sweden, Brazil, and other countries of South America, and in Australia; concerts in Europe with Pablo Casals, violoncellist, also with Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and he has played with many orchestras.

His first appearance in the United States was at Boston, December 1, 1900, when he played at a Symphony concert Brahms's Concerto in D minor. He played in Symphony Hall with the Symphony Orchestra Schumann's Concerto-piece, Op. 92, and Liszt's "Dance of Death," January 11, 1902, and on April 5 of the same year d'Indy's Symphony on a Mountain Air, for orchestra and pianoforte, Op. 25; on October 17, 1903, he played Tschaikowsky's Concerto No. 1, in B-flat minor; on February 3, 1906, he played Schumann's Concerto in A minor; on April 18, 1908, Emanuel Moór's Concerto, Op. 57.

He played in Boston with the Kneisel Quartet César Franck's Quintet, Op. 44, February 11, 1901; and on April 7, 1902, Bach's Sonata in A major, No. 2, for violin and pianoforte, and César Franck's Quintet in F minor; Brahms's Piano Quartet in C minor, November 17, 1903; Schubert's Piano Trio in B-flat major, December 5, 1905; Beethoven's Trio in B-flat major, Op. 97, January 14, 1908.

He played in Boston with the Arbos Quartet Tschaikowsky's Trio, November 23, 1903, and with the Hoffmann Quartet Brahms's Piano Quintet in F minor, November 12, 1903.

He gave pianoforte recitals in Boston, December 8, 27, 1900; January 1, 7, 15, February 23, 1901; January 21, February 4, 11, March 19, April 12, 1902; November 4, December 5, 1903; January 2, February 6, 1904; November 27, December 4, 11, 1905; February 4, 1906 (Sunday chamber concert in Chickering Hall); March 27, 1906; January 2, 16, 1908.

On April 27, 1908, he played Beethoven's Concerto No. 5 at a concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in aid of the Chelsea Relief Fund.

He visited Boston again in 1911, and on November 25 played Schumann's Concerto at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He gave recitals that season on December 4 (Schumann-Chopin-Liszt recital), January 13 and April 2, 1912.

288
Coming again in 1913, he gave a concert with Mr. Thibaud, violinist, in Symphony Hall, December 28: César Franck's Sonata for Violin and Pianoforte; Beethoven's "Kreutzer" Sonata; Schumann's "Faschingsschwank."

On January 17, 1914, he played Brahms's Concerto No. 1, D minor, at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He gave pianoforte recitals on February 10, 1914 (programme of dance music: Bach, Suite in G minor; Schumann, Davidsbündlertänze, and music in dance form by Beethoven, Chopin, Ravel, Levy, Granados, César Franck, Schubert, and Brahms), April 4, 1914. On March 15, 1914, he gave a concert with Alma Gluck, soprano, in Symphony Hall. On November 28, 1914, he played Beethoven's Concerto in G major, No. 4, at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. On December 6 he gave a concert with Maggie Teyte in Symphony Hall.

1915. January 5, Kneisel Quartet concert (Brahms's Sonata in E minor for violoncello and pianoforte, and Schubert's "Forellen" Quintet); January 23, recital; February 23, March 29, concert with Mr. Casals; May 15, concert with Mr. Gabrilowitsch; November 7, with Philharmonic Orchestra of New York (Saint-Saëns Concerto in C minor, No. 4).

1916. January 16, concert with Mr. Casals; February 7, recital; February 25, Boston Symphony Orchestra (Brahms's Concerto No. 2); March 26, with Mr. Gabrilowitsch; April 29, recital; November 8, recital; December 16, recital.

1917. February 11, with Helen Stanley; February 24, music by Schönberg, Debussy, Royce, Scriabin, Franck, Laparra, Moussorgsky; April 2, with Mr. Thibaud; April 21, with Mr. Gabrilowitsch.

1918. October 27, with Mr. Thibaud.

1919. March 1, recital.

*
*
*

Works played by Mr. Bauer at concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra:—

1900. December 1, Brahms's Concerto in D minor (first performance in Boston).

1902. January 11, Schumann's Concert-piece, Op. 92, and Liszt's "Dance of Death" (the latter for the first time in Boston); April 5, d'Indy's Symphony on a Mountain Air for orchestra and pianoforte, Op. 25 (first time in Boston).

1903. October 17, Tschaikowsky's Concerto No. 1, in B-flat minor.

1906. February 3, Schumann's Concerto in A minor.

1908. April 18, Emanuel Moór's Concerto, Op. 57 (first performance in Boston).

1908. April 27. Beethoven's concerto No. 5, in E-flat major, at a concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in aid of the Chelsea Relief Fund.

1911. November 25, Schumann's Concerto in A minor.

1914. January 17, Brahms's Concerto No. 1, in D minor; November 28, Beethoven's Concerto in G major, No. 4, Op. 58.

1916. February 25, Brahms's Concerto No. 12, B-flat major, Op. 83.

19-7
289
Tempest and Tranquillity

Jacques Thibaud and Harold Bauer

288
Coming again in 1913, he gave a concert with Mr. Thibaud, violinist, in Symphony Hall, December 28: César Franck's Sonata for Violin and Pianoforte; Beethoven's "Kreutzer" Sonata; Schumann's "Faschingsschwank."

On January 17, 1914, he played Brahms's Concerto No. 1, D minor, at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He gave pianoforte recitals on February 10, 1914 (programme of dance music: Bach, Suite in G minor; Schumann, Davidsbündlertänze, and music in dance form by Beethoven, Chopin, Ravel, Levy, Granados, César Franck, Schubert, and Brahms), April 4, 1914. On March 15, 1914, he gave a concert with Alma Gluck, soprano, in Symphony Hall. On November 28, 1914, he played Beethoven's Concerto in G major, No. 4, at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. On December 6 he gave a concert with Maggie Teyte in Symphony Hall.

1915. January 5, Kneisel Quartet concert (Brahms's Sonata in E minor for violoncello and pianoforte, and Schubert's "Forellen" Quintet); January 23, recital; February 23, March 29, concert with Mr. Casals; May 15, concert with Mr. Gabrilowitsch; November 7, with Philharmonic Orchestra of New York (Saint-Saëns Concerto in C minor, No. 4).

1916. January 16, concert with Mr. Casals; February 7, recital; February 25, Boston Symphony Orchestra (Brahms's Concerto No. 2); March 26, with Mr. Gabrilowitsch; April 29, recital; November 8, recital; December 16, recital.

1917. February 11, with Helen Stanley; February 24, music by Schönberg, Debussy, Royce, Scriabin, Franck, Laparra, Moussorgsky; April 2, with Mr. Thibaud; April 21, with Mr. Gabrilowitsch.

1918. October 27, with Mr. Thibaud.

1919. March 1, recital.

* * *

Works played by Mr. Bauer at concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra:—

1900. December 1, Brahms's Concerto in D minor (first performance in Boston).

1902. January 11, Schumann's Concert-piece, Op. 92, and Liszt's "Dance of Death" (the latter for the first time in Boston); April 5, d'Indy's Symphony on a Mountain Air for orchestra and pianoforte, Op. 25 (first time in Boston).

1903. October 17, Tchaikowsky's Concerto No. 1, in B-flat minor.

1906. February 3, Schumann's Concerto in A minor.

1908. April 18, Emanuel Moór's Concerto, Op. 57 (first performance in Boston).

1908. April 27. Beethoven's concerto No. 5, in E-flat major, at a concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in aid of the Chelsea Relief Fund.

1911. November 25, Schumann's Concerto in A minor.

1914. January 17, Brahms's Concerto No. 1, in D minor; November 28, Beethoven's Concerto in G major, No. 4, Op. 58.

1916. February 25, Brahms's Concerto No. 12, B-flat major, Op. 83.

19-7 289
Tempest and Tranquillity

Jacques Thibaud and Harold Bauer

290

Symphony Hall.

20-1

SEASON 1918--19.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

HENRI RABAUD, Conductor.

TWENTIETH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, APRIL 4, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, APRIL 5, AT 8 P. M.

MOZART,

SYMPHONY in D major, (Köchel 504)

I. Adagio: Allegro

II. Andante

III. Finale: Presto

MALIPIERO,

SEVEN SYMPHONIC EXPRESSIONS, "Le Pause
del Silenzio," ("The Pauses of Silence")
(First time in Boston)

SAINT-SAËNS,

CONCERTO in B minor, No. 3, for Violin and Orchestra, op. 61

I. Allegro non troppo

II. Andantino quasi allegretto

III. Molto moderato e maestoso; Allegro non troppo

LISZT,

SYMPHONIC POEM, No. 6, for full Orchestra,
"Mazeppa," (After Victor Hugo)

Soloist:

JACQUES THIBAUD

291

JACQUES THIBAUD

The Brilliant French Violinist

SYMPHONY IN 20TH CONCERT

Malipiero's "The Pauses of Silence" Given for First Time in Boston

JACQUES THIBAUD, VIOLINIST, ASSISTS

By PHILIP HALE

The 20th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Rabaud conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Mozart, Symphony in D major (K. 504); Malipiero, "The Pauses of Silence" (first time in Boston); Saint-Saens, Concerto in B minor No. 3 for violin (Jacques Thibaud, violinist); Liszt, "Mazeppa," Symphonic Poem No. 6 (after Victor Hugo's poem).

Malipiero, whose composition, "Pauses of Silence," was performed here yesterday probably for the first time in this country, belongs to a young Italian group that includes Tommasini, Respighi, Pizzetti, Casella and some others. Tommasini is known here by a string quartet played some years ago by the Kneisels. An orchestral piece by him was recently performed in Chicago; one by Respighi in New York. It is said that Malipiero has studied attentively the music of Moussorgsky, Stravinsky and young Hungarian composers. The orchestral piece heard yesterday reveals him as an original thinker, a man of pronounced individuality, not only a thinker but a doer.

"The Pauses of Silence." What does the title mean? The composer has sensibly offered no public explanation. Some one gave the sub-title: "Shudders, Songs, Cries, Laments," but we prefer the simpler "Seven Symphonic Expressions"; for these little pieces joined together by a motive, which, at once announced, calls attention, are evidently expressions of moods. If the hearer's moods happen to be in sympathy with the composer's, he may dilate with the fitting emotion. These short pieces suggest mental conditions, but fortunately there is no printed program or argument.

Mr. Philip Greeley Clapp in his interesting article about Malipiero and the "Pauses," published in the Evening Transcript of Thursday says: "Mr. Rabaud is reminded of the vast, hot, hazy and mysterious landscapes of the Campagna and Sicily, with their strange and vivid colors echoed in sound by snatches of tune from the pipes of unseen shepherds; though, of course, he absolves the composer of any intention specifically to paint these scenes." Certain pages of music lead one to think that this conjecture is not unreasonable, but other pages suggest the tonal portraiture of mental conditions, as we have said; or the music might borrow a title from Walt Whitman: "Sleep Chasings."

The seven "expressions" are interesting in many ways. Not only do they appeal to the student and the mature musician by the harmonic structure and the instrumentation, but they make a sensorial appeal to the unprofessional. The boldness of the man, a boldness that does not seem affected, but is natural to his speech; striking orchestral effects and equally striking contrasts in mood; passages of the utmost wildness following those of unconventional but genuine beauty—these impress, even at one hearing.

Mr. George Moore knew in his sojourn in Paris a strange musician, one Cabaner, poor but wearing silk shirts, generous, talking magnificently about his art. The music by Cabaner that we have seen is most commonplace, but he should be remembered by a remark to Mr. Moore: "To express silence in music, I should need at least three brass bands." This saying is not so paradoxical as it seems at first. There were moments yesterday when one might be pardoned for thinking that Malipiero had pondered Cabaner's theory.

Strange as the music is, it made its way, for it was applauded with greater fervor than is customary when a new composition, not by a local musician, is brought before the public. Mr. Rabaud is again to be thanked for acquainting us with contemporaneous works.

Mr. Thibaud first visited Boston in November, 1903, yet he played here with the orchestra yesterday for the first time. He was famous throughout Europe before he came to this city. The neglect of this thrice admirable violinist for so many years is unaccountable. We believe, however, that he was once engaged, five or six years ago, but he was obliged to return unexpectedly to Paris. Yesterday he played Saint-Saens' concerto with the elegance that characterizes the music itself; he played with the purity and finesse in the phrasing with the beauty of tone, with, in a word, the consummate art that long ago put him in the very front rank of the world's violinists.

Mozart-Liszt-Malipiero. The stubborn reactionaries might insist that these three illustrate the gradual debasement of music. Nearly every composer is of his own period. In the 18th century there was little or no feverish emotional expression. Liszt was pre-eminently a man of his day and generation, but he foresaw much that is even now hailed as modern. For a time he was overshadowed by Wagner, who stole unblushingly from his scores. "Mazeppa" still quickens the blood. It is not without circus-pomp, but this is preferable to Liszt's occasional excursions in the field of childish, rank sentimentalism. The superb interpretation of "Mazeppa" by Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra should have convinced even the stubborn that Liszt has not been ejected by Time from the hall of the immortals.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Magnard, Hymn to Justice (first time in Boston); Beethoven, "Pastoral" Symphony; Foote, Four Characteristic Pieces; Dubois, overture "Frithiof."

RABAUD CONDUCTS UNUSUAL PROGRAM

Thibaud Justly Acclaimed in Saint-Saens Concerto

Mr Rabaud conducted another program of more than ordinary interest at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon. Mozart's D major symphony was played with true distinction. It was followed by a new symphonic voice out of Italy which laid lurid emphasis upon the interval of a century and a third between the composers. Jacques Thibaud, playing for the first time at these concerts, ennobled Saint-Saens' third concerto with an art which holds something more than violinistic skill. Last of all, Liszt's sturdy old war horse, "Mazeppa," in which the galloping beast blazed a path for later symphonic poems.

Although in this symphony Mozart wrote no minuet, there is the courtly manner of the dance. A patrician elegance marks every bar; music which no plebeian soul could have made or played. And yet it is free from snobbery. Following the dignity of the introductory adagio the allegro is like a psalm of thanksgiving. All life is aglow, yet without boisterousness, without the hint of excess. The beauty of the song, of the slow movement, with less of the melancholy of Mozart than some, was appropriately sung, and the last movement played with a spirit which, in attaining ardor, did not mar clearness or proportion.

Composer of New School

"The Pauses of Silence, Seven Symphonic Expressions," played for the first time in Boston, is by a young Italian, G. Francesco Malipiero, who is a member of a new school of composition demanding recognition in that country. The article reprinted in the program book from an address delivered in New York in February, by Ugo Ara, returning violist of the Flonzaley Quartet, is singularly interesting and informing.

In it he fixes the position of the group of young idealists of which Malipiero is a member as between the futuristic Bolsheviks, who enthrone violence and noise, and the conservatives, such as the established Sgambati, Martucci and Bossi, the last of whom was Malipiero's teacher.

Malipiero's score commands instant attention, at first perhaps by its fearless, daringly aggressive individuality, but it is an individuality which speaks for itself, as from a desire for bold expression, made in sincerity rather than merely with the intent of occasioning amazement or uplifted eyebrows. Whether or not the ascribed subtitle: "Shudders, songs, cries, laments," be accepted as a program, the insatiate, hectic unrest makes its effect. It plays about and returns to the first theme of mingled protest and questioning, and all ends with the question unanswered.

Work Well Worth Hearing

There are moments when the poignant outcry best betokens the anguish of silence in the soul which it may have broken. And there are moments, as in the piling of one tonality clashing in the brass upon another near the close, when the effect is more crass than stupendous, and the tragedy becomes pathos. All in all, a work well worth hearing.

Mr Thibaud's art is of a finer fiber than is to be associated ordinarily with the polished exterior of Saint-Saens' concerto. While he played it with something more than an urbane, well-bred elegance, he did not attempt to give its graceful contours or rhapsodical brilliance an emotional depth which would have been incongruous.

He is not a man for the multitude, but his skill is ever commanding—yesterday superb in strength and ardor—and his spirit is one which communes with the loftiest beauty.

In all Mr Rabaud conducted with the discrimination, the poetic insight and warmth which he has taught us to expect. Liszt's spavined old steed, with his luckless rider, raced head and tail in air down the course with a new gait.

MEMORABLE CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Thibaud's Playing, New Italian Piece, Liszt's Tone Poem

Post ——— Apr. 5/19
BY OLIN DOWNES

G. Francesco Malipiero's "The Pauses of Silence," "seven symphonic expressions," was played for the first time in Boston yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The composer is one of a group of young modern Italians who are not interested either in the vainglory of sensational operas or the traditional symphonic writing of the German school, but who are setting out boldly and seriously to attempt a new development of the musical art.

This was one of the striking features of the concert. Two others were Jacques Thibaud's performance of Saint-Saens' B minor violin concerto and Mr. Rabaud's superb interpretation of Liszt's tone-poem, "Mazeppa." Mozart's symphony in D major (Kochel 504) opened the programme.

STIRS THE IMAGINATION

Malipiero's music is by no means as discordant and as terrible as one had been led to believe by the now famous sub-title bestowed on the music by someone else than the composer: "Shudders, songs, cries, laments." We would that these words had been dispensed with. The original title is sufficient to stir the imagination and to indicate ultra-modern, if not esoteric, character of the composition. There is a central theme, played by a solo wind instrument in the poetic opening section. This theme recurs, transformed, set off by complimentary phrases, and it holds together divergent moods. Divergent as these moods are, however, the transitions did not seem abrupt yesterday, but logical changes, and an impression of clarity and unity prevailed.

There are unusual orchestral combinations, there are curious rhythmical patterns, there is poetry and grotesquerie. In this latter direction, however, the composer is out-Schonberged by Arnold Schonberg. Other of his ideas show, as it seems to us, harmonic tendencies of the modern French character, and also, perhaps, of Stravinsky, who is reputed to have influenced Malipiero. And there was, as we thought, a passing glimpse of the cloven hoof of Giacomo Puccini.

Has Italian Sensibility

One can only speak now of passing impressions of a new and interesting piece of music. There is music that has only to be heard once for a hearer of any experience to know that it is bad. There is other music which immediately commands respect and deliberation, and when such music is heard it is not wise to venture snap judgments. This may be said: The music has refinement and Italian sensibility and clearness. It is also commendably brief and concentrated in character. Much is said in a short time. Or would it be better to say that unusual moods are quickly established and effectively linked together. The music is entirely free of classic principles of form, and it seems to us very well made. What was the composer's intention in this work? Was he thinking of the silence of which Maeterlinck speaks in "Wisdom and Destiny"—that silence in which may occur the most terrible or exalting of spiritual dramas? There is at least the effort, it appears, to portray psychical states and impressions of a kind not easily defined or portrayed. A listener could say that his ears has shown him vistas of a kind unknown to the physical eye. In some pages the sensitive hearer might recall the unreal yet intense sensations of a nightmare.

Made Great Concerto Greater

Mr. Thibaud, who played for the first time at these concerts, gave what was in the estimation of the writer by far the greatest performance of a solo violinist heard this season at these concerts. We feel that Mr. Thibaud has yet to be fully appreciated by the great public. He has the purest emotional force, tempered by the high intellectuality of a great artist. Everything that was great in Saint-Saëns' concerto was made greater by the violinist, and everything that was mediocre in inspiration was given dignity and significance by him.

Mr. Thibaud's tone—he has now fully recovered from his experiences in the war—is not surpassed for warmth and nobility, nor do we know of a violinist, save, possibly Ysaye at his greatest, who seems to us to unite so impressively the fire of the virtuoso and an inalienable sense of esthetic values. It is not astonishing that the violinist was recalled times innumerable when he finished playing. He had given one of the memorable performances in the history of late seasons in Symphony Hall.

Liszt's Tone Poem

The playing of Liszt's tone poem was an astonishing piece of virtuosity on the part of conductor and orchestra. Other Symphony conductors had made a war-horse of this brilliant work. Mr. Rabaud kindled the music to a more fiery ardor, to a more convincing portrayal of the wild ride, than any of his predecessors of recent years. The rhythm was more headlong. This effect was gained in part by the well chosen tempo and in part by not over-accenting every heavy beat of a measure.

Mr. Rabaud is always broad in his musical conceptions. He brings home to the hearer in an inescapable manner the salient lines of a composition. And the good old conclusion, with its Hungarian pomp and extravagance, was played not politely, or academically, but with contagious gusto, and for every last ounce of tone in Liszt's splendiferous orchestra.

Music in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, Massachusetts—On the twentieth Boston Symphony Orchestra program Mr. Rabaud produced, for the first time here, a work of the new Italian school, by G. Francesco Malipiero, entitled "Le Pause del Silenzio" ("The Pauses of Silence"). This is in "Seven Symphonic Expressions," so called, but the work is in one movement. In these movements or episodes, there is a motive, which is supposed to represent songs, shudders, cries and lamentations.

On a first hearing, it is next to impossible to view the composer from his own or, in fact, any especial standpoint, or to say whether Malipiero is an innovator or an imitator; for his expression is strangely reminiscent of Debussy, Strauss, and many another of the latter day impressionists. He uses about every known instrument in the modern orchestra, and scores very cleverly. But does the composer say anything worth while? One hopes he does, but the answer is not favorable at the present moment. Possibly the piece suffered by following a wonderfully clear performance of the Mozart symphony in D, without minuet, which began the program.

Then there was the Liszt "Mazeppa" Symphonic Poem, the closing number of the concert. Once a puzzler to the wise ones, it is now well understood, although it is as blatant as ever, for the most part.

Jaques Thibaud was the soloist, and he played the now well-worn violin concerto in B minor of Saint Saëns, for the first time here, although he has been heard in the work with the orchestra in Cambridge, and elsewhere. Saint-Saëns wrote the concerto for Sarasate, and it could also well be said that it was written for Thibaud, for the performance showed a complete understanding between composer and interpreter. In clearness, finish, and general exposition, there was little left to be desired. Such a performance was memorable, a model of its kind.

On the evening of Wednesday, April 2, Sergei Adamsky, tenor, gave a concert, mostly of Russian music, though there were two Spanish songs by Osma, from the cycle "Cretares di mi Terre" with others by Italian and American writers. Mr. Adamsky showed pleasing voice in purely lyric numbers, but in such as the improviso from Giordano's "Andrea Chenier," an intensely dramatic piece, the singer was not so fortunate, for despite much tonal beauty, his vocal mechanism was hardly adequate. A group of Russian folk songs were sung in well nigh faultless vocal finish and authoritative interpretation. The singer was assisted by Arthur Hadley cellist, and Edna Sheppard, pianist, who played Chevillard's violoncello sonata, with fine ensemble, although the work was one so dry and without musical value, that one regrets that two such excellent artists should have wasted their labor on such a work.

On the evening of Thursday, April 4, there was a concert by Rosa Raisa, soprano, and Giacomo Rimini, baritone, both members of the Chicago Opera Company, which brought to mind the old-fashioned opera "star" concert of long ago. The program included a great variety, from "Casta diva" and the "Largo al factotum" to things of the present moment, and the "extras" were nearly equal to the program itself. Miss Raisa again gave evidence that she has a wonderful voice, but it was also evident that her sphere is in opera, and not as an interpreter of lyric songs. Mr. Rimini sang the "Largo al factotum" in loud voice without a suggestion of dynamic variation, and that was the principal fault in the singing of his other numbers. There was no variety or contrast. The applause was often in inverse ratio to the interpretation.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its regular concert in Cambridge on the evening of Thursday, April 3, at which Joseph Malkin, the first cellist of the orchestra, was the soloist. The event of chief interest was the repetition of Edward Burlingame Hill's four pieces for orchestra, "Stevensoniana," heard the previous week in Boston. The impression of good writing obtained at the former hearing was strengthened. Cambridge residents have sometimes complained regarding the abilities of the soloists who "assist" the orchestra at these concerts. Such complaint might well be in order now. Mr. Malkin's wobbly intonation and scratchy tone marred an otherwise enjoyable concert.

New Music in Cambridge

That part of the Boston Symphony concert at Cambridge, last night, which followed the intermission was new to the season's concerts: Haydn's Violoncello Concerto, in D major, chosen and played by Mr. Joseph Malkin, the excellent virtuoso of the orchestra, a "Little Suite" by Roger-Ducasse in first performance at these concerts, and Beethoven's Overture to Egmont. The first section of the programme, comprised Saint-Saëns's Second Symphony in A minor, and Mr. Edward Burlingame Hill's "Stevensoniana," which sounded particularly well in Sanders Theatre, and which deservedly was the occasion of much applause and acknowledgment.

The diminutive suite of Roger-Ducasse stands in the memory vividly for its six minutes. It has the French aptitude of treating a light, almost a popular, theme in a delicately flavored manner to gratify a fastidious palette. Our native composers have sometimes written in this view, but they have tried to be important and have been lengthy instead. They have missed Roger-Ducasse's gusto of brevity—the fleeting tingle of the here and gone (from all accounts the "French Suite" by the same composer has not this virtue). But the "Petite Suite" is cleverly orchestrated and cleverly ordered. "Remembrance," with a song of strings and wood-winds, gives a foundation; "Smiling," which by theme is nothing more than the familiar parlor kind, adds sweetness, and "Trumpeting" ("Clannonneve"), using the full orchestra, of course, gives the piquant "kick." It is all over in a flip and a toss. For its neat serviceableness between two seniors numbers you could scarcely find a counterpart.

MORE GOSSIP ABOUT MR. RABAUD OR ANOTHER

Mr. Toscanini's Reported "Willingness" to Come to Boston—The Parisian's Position—Mr. Heifetz Discloses New Qualities and Heightens and Deepens the Old—A Remarkable Recital—Mr. Kreisler's Return Next October

Trans. — Apr. 4, 1919
THESE are the days in which it is possible to hear any thing and all things about the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra for next year. "Day unto to day uttereth speech," but it is hardly true that "night unto night showeth knowledge." Nevertheless it is time to record the saying in New York of a close friend of Mr. Toscanini, hitherto well informed about the conductor's intentions. According to him Mr. Toscanini "expressed his willingness to assume the leadership of the Boston orchestra after an urgent request had been transmitted to Italy by Senator Lodge." Whether these words refer to negotiations in progress last summer or to soundings and bargainings more recently undertaken does not appear. The mention of Senator Lodge tends to imply the earlier quest, since in it the trustees of the orchestra invoked the aid of eminent statesmen and preferred governmental rather than musical channels as a way to their goal.

In either alternative, a wide gap separates Mr. Toscanini, expressing a willingness to become the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra from Mr. Toscanini visible and audible in Symphony Hall. It is not necessary to know him intimately to know also that he is a man of many minds and many moods over a proposal, gratifying indeed to many of his ambitions as a conductor, yet breaking for the time many of his cherished ties as a man. It was these ties that drew him back to Italy in the years of the war. Now, if he should come next autumn to Boston he must part them again. What his final decision may be, no man knoweth—or at least sayeth—but above and beyond any conductor in Europe, except Mr. Nikisch, whose German affiliations put him out of the question, Mr. Toscanini seems worthy of the new quality and the old prestige of the Symphony Orchestra.

It is even possible to hear in the gossip of the town, though it is impossible to say how truly, that Mr. Rabaud has himself signalled Mr. Toscanini—and Mr. Mengelberg—to the trustees as conductors of the first rank. More interesting, however, to the frequenters of the Symphony Concerts is Mr. Rabaud's own disposition toward another year in Boston. As some say, who profess to be more or less in his confidence, he prefers to return to Paris in the spring and busy himself anew with the writing of music since by profession and inclination, he is composer rather than conductor. Like report also asserts that he has found the hundred concerts that he must lead in a season, in Boston, in New York, in many another city, a severer strain upon his physical and nervous energies than he cares to endure for another year. On the other hand, equally plausible sayings run that he is an eminently reasonable man: that there are arrangements and arrangements afoot "of which we shall soon hear." Meanwhile, no one, apparently, can or will speak with knowledge and authority about the conductorship next year. None the less it is credibly reported that the trustees have several times discussed it. Certainly, also, at the concert of Saturday, Mr. Rabaud, earnest as was his effort, admirable sometimes, as was the outcome, seemed a tired man.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

FROM MOZART, THROUGH LISZT, TO MALIPIERO

Mr. Rabaud Freshens a Programme, and Does Both Well and Ill with It — His Eloquence with Liszt, His Stiff Prose with Mozart—Mr. Thibaud Shines with His Own Virtues, and Also Recalls Sarasate—The Italian's Novel and Penetrating Music

THE programme set for orchestra and audience at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon seemed like happy return to the more catholic and cosmopolitan days of the Symphony Concerts. Only one French piece, and that the "soloist's" concerto, stood upon it—as agreeable a sensation as a single German number used to be in the lists of other years. More than once in the past, the frequenter of the Symphony Concerts (unless he loves routine and has no curiosity about widely different musics) has been sated with German pieces. It is equally possible to be surfeited with French items and with them, as the musical year lengthens, some ears and minds are nearing the point of saturation which, in the concert-hall, is also the point of ennui and indifference. It was respite and pleasure, therefore, to hear an Italian symphonic piece—the first that Mr. Rabaud has put upon a programme in five months in Boston—and also a symphonic poem from Liszt, hitherto, like the other Czechs, an overlooked composer in the conductor's lists. The more widely these range, the better for the interest and the prestige of the concerts with open-minded hearers; while, of course, every one in the audiences of Friday and Saturday is, and has long been, such. By natural inclination and acquired habit, Mr. Fiedler and Dr. Muck tended, in the progress of a season, to choose over-much German music. By like impulses Mr. Rabaud has tended to an excess of French items. In all three instances it is hard to believe (as extremists say) in deliberate and calculated propaganda. Each conductor probably followed instinct and custom as missionary for the music of his country, for the music in which he had been bred, in which he believed and with which he made his reputation.

Yet, in an idealistic view—the mode of the moment, is it not?—the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra should be missionary for nothing but the most interesting music that he can assemble, played in the ablest fashion that he can achieve. He should put by his own likings and dislikes; he should know no cults or exclusions or nationalities; he should do no favors, curb every prejudice, work with single mind and heart for the quality of his concerts alike in programme and performance. Then their prestige would be his prestige—a greater and more lasting glory than any other means and any other end might win. The repute of the Symphony Orchestra at home and abroad in these later years has been rooted in the catholicity of its programmes, in the cosmopolitan choice of its personnel according to ability and nothing else, in the breadth of view, actual or acquired, of its conductors. No doubt these are counsels of perfection, bearing hard upon many a human inclination and infirmity, but so far, in the long run, this living tradition, these enkindling standards, have prevailed.

A familiar piece, yet one heard not too often at these concerts—Mozart's symphony in D major, the symphony without a minuet—began the afternoon and another familiar piece—Liszt's tone-poem, "Mazeppa"—ended it. Mr. Rabaud was divining in the pace he chose for the ride of Byron's, Hugo's and Liszt's hero, in the fashion in which he rhythmized it. The orchestra answered him readily, and the measures kept the graphic quality, generated the excitement which is half the virtue nowadays of these "romantics" in the poetry, painting and music of the middle of the nineteenth century. Skilful, too, were conductor and orchestra with the suspensive, quasi-mysterious measures that link the Mazeppa whirled from woe to woe with the Mazeppa exalted to state and power. Presumably they hint the reawakening of a dauntless spirit; certainly they hint at sundry transitional passages in the music-dramas of Wagner. As fortunate were conductor and orchestra in the tonal pomps of the end. They were grandiose as the matter and the manner of the music bade—exuberantly rich of tone and not merely blatant as they were a few weeks ago in the much applauded climax of the overture to "The King of Ys." Yesterday the clapping was less in the auditorium; but the artistic consciences on the stage must have run truer. Once more, Mr. Rabaud characterized this highly colored, sharply rhythmized, emphatic and excited romantic music; again he gave it the vitality, the illusion hard to summon in these days of other moods and tempers in the arts. Such pieces, beyond any other that he has played this winter, are his trade. It is a pity that what seems to many a superfluous scruple, should deprive audiences of the pleasures of his Wagner.

On the other hand Mr. Rabaud has succeeded ill with the symphonies of Mozart and the other eighteenth-century music that he has thus far played. Manifestly, they have failed to interest audiences as of old; while relatively scanty, in comparison with the applause of the past, have been present plaudits for them. The reason seems not far to seek. The conductor is too stiff, too literal with this music of line, of patterns in sound, of flowing figure and airy arabesque. Such a music invites a grace and elegance of performance, an aristocratic voice that he and the orchestra may not give it. The symphony of yesterday constantly bids to light modulation of pace and accent, to delicate play of light and shade, to an airy elegance in the finale, a pensively songful melancholy in the slow movement, a plastic animation in the first allegro. Instead, Mr. Rabaud made his way through all three movements faithfully, lucidly and intelligently, and the orchestra dutifully followed the leader. So to play Mozart is to stiffen the agility of the music, to cloud its little upspringing graces, to strip away its glamour of tonal fancy, to miss its quality of air and fire, clear and softly glowing. Mozart's handiwork, as in some of the arabesques of the Andante and in the twists and the turns of the finale, is too fine, too supple for such playing. The elegant, the aristocratic note vanishes. Yesterday, Mozart's symphony in D major was little more than restated painstakingly as an item in the work of the composers, in the history of music.

It was even possible to wish the silly, futile wish that Mr. Thibaud might have played this symphony of Mozart as he has played within easy memory one or another of the composer's violin pieces, as he played, on Friday, the violin part in Saint-Saëns's concerto in B minor. It was music that betrayed none of his limitations as the big voice of Beethoven even in sonatas, occasionally does; it was music that he might merely have set forth to the audience with his usual beauty of flowing and shimmering tone, finesse of shading, inflection, transition, play of intelligence, fancy and elegance. So doing, he would hardly have reaped less applause than that which his hearers heaped upon him. Yet as it happened, he chose to reanimate, to transfigure the hackneyed concerto, stalking-horse and spoil of violinists of all degrees and of none.

Remembering them, it was like revelation to many a listener to hear the slow movement played with such curving and recurving loveliness of line, such grace of motion, such charm of melody and melancholy, such insinuating and glamouring modulations as flowed from Mr. Thibaud's bow. Here, though Saint-Saëns wrote the concerto late in the seventies of the nineteenth century was the veritable music of softly glowing air and fire that Mozart's should have been. In the long first movement, came no thought of the composer's readiness and deftness, of the skillful weaving of the symphonic web, of the expertly drawn threads of the violin part. Rather, Mr. Thibaud touched all this pattern-weaving with the soft lustres of his tone; set figures in motion by its undulations; with its fineness, penetration and sensibility gave the music such voice as it has hardly known since Sarasate's time.

For the instant, the listener believed in the beauty of these measures, because he could not doubt the beauty with which Mr. Thibaud was clothing them. In the finale, this two-fold beauty of music and performance sounded richer, flowed more amply, stirring, quickening the ears that the slow division had caressed. Again under Mr. Thibaud's persuading, the listener was ready to believe that Saint-Saëns had written with imagination as well as with skill; that he also was striking fire. Deceitful is memory and comparisons are pitfalls, but there were those in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon who, listening to Mr. Thibaud in this concerto, heard also, as though it were upon the stage, the voice of Sarasate's violin. Mr. Thibaud is indeed himself; but he is like to the Spaniard, finest-textured of all the violinists of his day, as is no other fiddler of our immediate time.

Since Malipiero's novel piece—for "The Pauses of Silence," in spite of seven divisions, is a rounded whole—has been recently described in this place and since it will be repeated at Symphony Hall this evening, there is no need now to set down more than first and quick impressions. In ten minutes the music comes and goes; while from first measure to last it is written in an individual idiom, wrought in an individual design, fed by individual emotions. Even after a single hearing there is no questioning the clear impression, the lively interest of that idiom. Malipiero not only thinks in terms of the harmonies and the timbres of our time; he also imagines in them. He has not only imagined new musical sounds, impressive—sometimes beautiful—upon the ear; he has also devised his own means to produce them. Whatever his mysterious title may or may not imply, he has written music that has not only a distinct voice and color, but also distinct moods and atmosphere of its own. The "motto motive," already cited in these columns, not only binds the seven divisions together, but impregnates and haunts them. If the imaginative hearer likes, it may imply the stream of life, the stream of time, the iterations that are the human lot. It hoops, as it were, a music embodying the sensations that are the variants, the ebullitions, the concentrations of such living. In one and another division Malipiero has written music of strenuous or fiery voice, of eager, restive longing, of hot, tense contemplation. Whatever the mood, there is no doubting that emotion has prompted and warmed it, that imagination has called it to life. Malipiero's brevity is the brevity not of the economy that considers, but of the intensity that burns away. As it was said in this place Thursday, the listener cannot choose but hear—and as it seemed on Friday, applaud as well.

H. T. P.

M. THIBAUD SCORES AT SYMPHONY

Music Rather Than Technique the Object Attained by Artist

"PAUSES OF SILENCE" YELLS, SOBS, GROANS

Malipiero, New Italian Composer, Out-Noises the Dissonance-Mongers

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

The Symphony Program:
Mozart. Symphony in D major.
Malipiero. "The Pauses of Silence." Seven Symphonic Expressions.
St. Saëns. Violin Concerto in B minor.
Soloist, M. Jaques Thibaud.
Liszt. "Mazeppa," Symphonic Poem.

The three-movement symphony written by Mozart to please the Prague taste of 135 years ago does not greatly excite the concert auditor of today. Of course there is suavity, graceful leading of the voices, all that gentility which we prize in Mozart, but not the dramatic force which the twentieth century musician craves. There is nothing in its pretty measures which is a task to our great orchestra and the performance was without flaw, and had some virility as well. It was roundly applauded and the performance deserved this tribute.

dulum swing to the welcome a full-
Some of the modern and to find that ers seem in a great utterly abolished up for the past devo- number was to us melody and are hur- of the concert.
the procession of the and melodious, gers. frantic straining work might be a dawns who seek hazards.

EFFECTS. played it in just name not yet "arrived" here was plenty dictionaries (he was ved, but music in 1882), seems to go ns of technique fossi, his teacher, in of the artist. The fects, and this search nt throughout.
with his title. "The second movement ce!" It suggests the ming and con-the fire of the e the demon of
pon Saint-Saëns,
o great a length,
ying carried the ud aroused the n and certainly is recalled again

e a poultice came wounds of Sound."
e are seven poultices
eems to be a mustard regard the symphonic curing Silence. The interrupt Silence are sobs, and other genial character. The chief ork is brevity. There erency amid the ravgiven by a figure an-beginning and the ree end of nearly every

Of course all instruloyed from contrabas-one. The work might studies in tone-color-certainly interesting in rch of the finale
as few modern

ions are of the most d bizarre character. made the most this "Swimming in and so the "Tar-but Malipiero drowns ed" galloped to se it ends with an un-o's pauses and for the musical anar-s (or rather deds defy all laws. Weterated.

he orchestra played it nations which y had given a hundred said an eminent e could not have de-ghtful are those this tonal mixup. fire no reviews.
are the concerts

SAENS. for we have all ruption the pendulum expect from him, to moderate conserv-ss than perfechape of St. Saëns, and Symphony Hall re getting a very large auty. Tartini's mposer recently, there Wieniawski's in listening to his stood out with to, especially when his work. En-an artist as M. Thi- course, but not e been having so man, the program.

prodigies lately that

and melancholy, such insinuating and glamouring modulations as flowed from Mr. Thibaud's bow. Here, though Saint-Saëns wrote the concerto late in the seventies of the nineteenth century was the veritable music of softly glowing air and fire that Mozart's should have been. In the long first movement, came no thought of the composer's readiness and deftness, of the skilful weaving of the symphonic web, of the expertly drawn threads of the violin part. Rather, Mr. Thibaud touched all this pattern-weaving with the soft lustres of his tone; set figures in motion by its undulations; with its fineness, penetration and sensibility gave the music such voice as it has hardly known since Sarasate's time.

For the instant, the listener believed in the beauty of these measures, because he could not doubt the beauty with which Mr. Thibaud was clothing them. In the finale, this two-fold beauty of music and performance sounded richer, flowed more amply, stirring, quickening the ears that the slow division had caressed. Again under Mr. Thibaud's persuading, the listener was ready to believe that Saint-Saëns had written with imagination as well as with skill; that he also was striking fire. Deceitful is memory and comparisons are pitfalls, but there were those in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon who, listening to Mr. Thibaud in this concerto, heard also, as though it were upon the stage, the voice of Sarasate's violin. Mr. Thibaud is indeed himself; but he is like to the Spaniard, finest-textured of all the violinists of his day, as is no other fiddler of our immediate time.

Since Malipiero's novel piece—for "The Pauses of Silence," in spite of seven divisions, is a rounded whole—has been recently described in this place and since it will be repeated at Symphony Hall this evening, there is no need now to set down more than first and quick impressions. In ten minutes the music comes and goes; while from first measure to last it is written in an individual idiom, wrought in an individual design, fed by individual emotions. Even after a single hearing there is no questioning the clear impression, the lively interest of that idiom. Malipiero not only thinks in terms of the harmonies and the timbres of our time; he also imagines in them. He has not only imagined new musical sounds, impressive—sometimes beautiful—upon the ear; he has also devised his own means to produce them. Whatever his mysterious title may or may not imply, he has written music that has not only a distinct voice and color, but also distinct moods and atmosphere of its own. The "motto motive," already cited in these columns, not only binds the seven divisions together, but impregnates and haunts them. If the imaginative hearer likes, it may imply the stream of life, the stream of time, the iterations that are the human lot. It hoops, as it were, a music embodying the sensations that are the variants, the ebullitions, the concentrations of such living. In one and another division Malipiero has written music of strenuous or fiery voice, of eager, restless longing, of hot, tense contemplation. Whatever the mood, there is no doubting that emotion has prompted and warmed it, that imagination has called it to life. Malipiero's brevity is the brevity not of the economy that considers, but of the intensity that burns away. As it was said in this place Thursday, the listener cannot choose but hear—and as it seemed on Friday, applaud as well.

H. T. P.

M. T. No. 1 SCC SI EURO U.

Music Rat

nique thBig Inc

tained mand

cia

"PAUSES

YELLS, S

Malipiero,

Composer

Disson

By L

Mozart.

Malipiero.

Symphonic

St. Saens.

Liszt.

The

written

Prague

not grow

of tod

grace

gent

but for 1917.

The

ure

ch

with at period

Now the pendulum swing to the other extreme. Some of the modern Italian composers seem in a great haste to make up for the past devotion to singable melody and are hurrying to join the procession of the resonance-mongers.

MAKING NEW EFFECTS.

Malipiero, a name not yet "arrived" in the musical dictionaries (he was in Venice in 1882), seems to go on and even Bossi, his teacher, in making new effects, and this search even with his title. "The Pauses of Silence!" It suggests the "Silence like a poultice came To heal the wounds of Sound."

here there are seven poultices each one seems to be a mustard tice, if we regard the symphonic

Besides sessions as curing Silence. The shing's and, Groans, Sobs, and other genial essories of the work is brevity. There able talk which is given by a figure an-equally less appearing at the end of nearly every war work expression." Of course all instru-

China plants are employed from contrabasdered by the on to xylophone. The work might

The talking machine will be called "studies in tone-coloring, chapters in this direction only.

The modulations are of the most spite of all their continuous and bizarre character. made the most

Wagner called this "Swimming in and so the "Tara Sea of Tone," but Malipiero drowns ed" galloped to in it. Of course it ends with an un-o's pauses and resolved chord, for the musical anar-is (or rather de-chist must needs defy all laws. Weferated.

suppose that the orchestra played it nations which well, but if they had given a hundred said an eminent false notes we could not have de-ghtful are those ected them in this tonal mixup. fire no reviews,

are the concerts

or we have all expect from him,

ss than perfec-

swung back to moderate conservatism in the shape of St. Saens, and, a program full although we are getting a very large auty. Tartini's dose of this composer recently, there's Wieniawski's was delight in listening to his stood out with violin concerto, especially when his work. En-played by such an artist as M. Thi-course, but not baud. We have been having so man, he program.

youthful violin prodigies lately that

and melancholy, such insinuating and glamouring modulations as flowed from Mr. Thibaud's bow. Here, though Saint-Saëns wrote the concerto late in the seventies of the nineteenth century was the veritable music of softly glowing air and fire that Mozart's should have been. In the long first movement, came no thought of the composer's readiness and deftness, of the skilful weaving of the symphonic web, of the expertly drawn threads of the violin part. Rather, Mr. Thibaud touched all this pattern-weaving with the soft lustres of his tone; set figures in motion by its undulations; with its fineness, penetration and sensibility gave the music such voice as it has hardly known since Sarasate's time.

For the instant, the listener believed in the beauty of these measures, because he could not doubt the beauty with which Mr. Thibaud was clothing them. In the finale, this two-fold beauty of music and performance sounded richer, flowed more amply, stirring, quickening the ears that the slow division had caressed. Again under Mr. Thibaud's persuading, the listener was ready to believe that Saint-Saëns had written with imagination as well as with skill; that he also was striking fire. Deceitful is memory and comparisons are pitfalls, but there were those in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon who, listening to Mr. Thibaud in this concerto, heard also, as though it were upon the stage, the voice of Sarasate's violin. Mr. Thibaud is indeed himself; but he is like to the Spaniard, finest-textured of all the violinists of his day, as is no other fiddler of our immediate time.

Since Malipiero's novel piece—for "The Pauses of Silence," in spite of seven divisions, is a rounded whole—has been recently described in this place and since it will be repeated at Symphony Hall this evening, there is no need now to set down more than first and quick impressions. In ten minutes the music comes and goes; while from first measure to last it is written in an individual idiom, wrought in an individual design, fed by individual emotions. Even after a single hearing there is no questioning the clear impression, the lively interest of that idiom. Malipiero not only thinks in terms of the harmonies and the timbres of our time; he also imagines in them. He has not only imagined new musical sounds, impressive—sometimes beautiful—upon the ear; he has also devised his own means to produce them. Whatever his mysterious title may or may not imply, he has written music that has not only a distinct voice and color, but also distinct moods and atmosphere of its own. The "motto motive," already cited in these columns, not only binds the seven divisions together, but impregnates and haunts them. If the imaginative hearer likes, it may imply the stream of life, the stream of time, the iterations that are a human lot. It hoops, as it were, a music embodying the sensations that are the plants, the ebullitions, the concentration of such living. In one and another vision Malipiero has written music of strenuous or fiery voice, of eager, restless longing, of hot, tense contemplation. Whatever the mood, there is no doubting that emotion has prompted and warmed it, that imagination has called it to life. Malipiero's brevity is the brevity not of the economy that considers, but of the intensity that burns away. As it was said in this place Thursday, the listener cannot choose but hear—and as it seemed on Friday, applaud as well. H. T. P.

M. THIBAUD SCORING SYMPHONY

Music Rather nique than tained

"PAUSES OF YELLS, SCREAMS

Malipiero,
Composer, (The Dissonance

By LOUIS

The Symphony
Mozart. Symphony Malipiero. "The Symphonic Expression
St. Saens. Violin
Soloist, M. J.
Liszt. "Mazeppa,"

The three - mo
written by Moza Prague taste of not greatly excite of today. Of cour graceful leading o gentility which w
but not the drama twentieth century
There is nothing
ures which is a ta chestra and the without flaw, and as well. It was and the performa tribute.

total showed that we talking machines, val
as against $79,117 ta valued at $2,090,371,
009 talking machines 414,631, in 1918. The records and supplies 1918, were valued at pared with $173,159,
1917. For the eleven November, 1918, reco
sories were exported 104,778, as compared to 1917 and $1,197,000

it was a pleasure to welcome a full-grown artist again and to find that the boys have not utterly abolished the adults. This number was to us the chief point of the concert. Shapely, intelligible and melodious, utterly devoid of frantic straining for effects, the work might be a model to those moderns who seek to astonish at all hazards.

And M. Thibaud played it in just the right spirit. There was plenty of technique displayed, but music rather than exhibitions of technique seemed to be object of the artist. The ensemble was excellent throughout.

The melody of the second movement was especially charming and contrasted well with the fire of the finale. In this finale the demon of development seizes upon Saint-Saens, and it is carried to too great a length, but the brilliant playing carried the day, and M. Thibaud aroused the heartiest enthusiasm and certainly deserved it. He was recalled again and again.

And now we can exclaim, with the ghost in "Hamlet"—"Liszt, Liszt, oh Liszt!" And it was good to welcome this composer again after his long absence from the symphonic programs. There have been many horses in music, from Wagner's Walkure stable to Berlioz's black pair who gallop to Hades, but Liszt's Mazeppa steed may rank with any of them. M. Rabaud gave the great Mazeppa theme with barbaric splendor and the wild ride was made exciting enough. The changes of the theme aforesaid from sadness to triumph and the fiercely victorious march of the finale form a climax such as few modern composers attain in spite of all their efforts. M. Rabaud made the most of his opportunities, and so the "Tartar of the Ukraine breed" galloped to success and Malipiero's pauses and symphonic expressions (or rather depressions) were obliterated.

"Happy are those nations which have no histories," said an eminent Frenchman, and delightful are those concerts which require no reviews, adds the critic. Such are the concerts of Jascha Heifetz, for we have all learned now what to expect from him, which is nothing less than perfection. He crowded Symphony Hall last Sunday and gave a program full of dignity and beauty. Tartini's "Devil's Trill" and Wieniawski's "Souvenir de Moscow" stood out with especial splendor, in his work. Encores were added, of course, but not during the course of the program.

JOHN McCORMACK
has set a pheno in talking mach and royalties.

Mr. JOSEPH JACQUES THIBAUD, violinist, was born at Bordeaux, France, on September 27, 1880. Until he was thirteen years old, he was taught by his father. Entering the Paris Conservatory he took lessons of Martin Marsick and in 1896 was awarded a first prize. (First prizes were also awarded that year to Messrs. Sechiari and Monteux, pupils of Berthelier, and Soudant, pupil of Lefort.) Thibaud's brother, Joseph Charles, born at Bordeaux on February 25, 1875, took a first prize at the Paris Conservatory for pianoforte-playing in 1892. Another brother, Henri Bernard, a violoncellist, and a student at the Paris Conservatory, was born at Bordeaux on July 8, 1877.

In his twelfth year Mr. Thibaud had played in public at Angers. In Paris he had become known by his brilliant solos at the Café Rouge in the rue de Tournon, frequented by Conservatory pupils, who were in the habit of playing there in ensemble and as soloists. He joined Colonne's orchestra in 1897 and in 1898 became the solo violinist of that orchestra. In 1899-1900 he appeared as a virtuoso in towns of France, and at Brussels, Mannheim, and Geneva; in 1901 at Berlin, Amsterdam, Lisbon; in 1902-03 in Russia, the Scandinavian countries, Roumania, Italy, Spain.

His first appearance in Boston was on November 7, 1903, when he played César Franck's sonata with André Benoist, and pieces by Bach, Saint-Saëns, Vieuxtemps, Marsick, and Wieniawski.

A second visit to this country was made in 1913-14 and on December 28, 1913, Mr. Thibaud gave a concert with Harold Bauer in Symphony Hall: Sonatas by Franck and Beethoven (the Kreutzer), Bach's Chaconne, and a Sarabande and Gigue by Bach. He gave a concert with Carlos Salzedo, harpist, in Jordan Hall, January 31, 1914: Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole; pieces by Beethoven, Bach, Desplanès-Nachez, Saint-Saëns, Fauré, Wieniawski.

When the war broke out, he went into active service. Late in 1916 he was given leave of absence from the French Army on account of injuries received while on duty in the trenches.

He played in Boston with George Copeland in a concert at Symphony Hall, December 24, 1916: Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole, Chausson's Poème, and pieces by Saint-Saëns. Nicolai Schneer, accompanist.

On April 2, 1917, he gave a concert with Harold Bauer in Jordan Hall: Sonatas by Beethoven, Franck, Mozart.

January 12, 1918, recital in Jordan Hall: Lekeu's Sonata; Saint-Saëns's Concerto in B minor; Bach's Chaconne; pieces by Guiraud, Marsick, Saint-Saëns, Wieniawski. March 24, concert with Guiomar Novaes in Symphony Hall: Beethoven's Sonata, F major, Op. 24; Mozart's Concerto in E-flat; Vieuxtemps's Ballade and Polonaise. October 27, concert with Harold Bauer in Symphony Hall: Grieg's Sonata, C minor; Franck's Sonata; pieces by Ysaye and Wieniawski.

Out of "New Italy" Comes Novel Music

Trans. — Apr. 3, 1919
Background and Foreground to Malipiero's "Pauses of Silence," to Be Played for the First Time in America at the Symphony Concert Tomorrow

IN these days of government by slogan, it must be a sign of the eternal perversion of the artistic mind that many of the ill-considered commonplaces of musical criticism which have done duty—and more than duty!—for a generation or two are being dragged into daylight and there subjected to severe re-examination. Two or three years ago the man in the street who cared about musical matters at all would have no more thought of doubting the general notion that Italian musicians have no interest or talent for instrumental music than of doubting today that the earth is round, or five centuries ago that it was flat, or five years ago that the French cannot fight, or that Bostonians are all acute Anglomaniacs, or that the millennium is around the corner of the next decade, waiting in sorrowful patience, but ultimate confidence, for the enactment of certain critical legislation by the Congress. It is true that the symphonic talent of Sgambati has been recognized, probably quite as enthusiastically as it ever will deserve, and that a few Americans who have happened to be in the right place at the right time have realized that in the now elderly Scontrino there abide a wealth of ideas and the power to express them which merit still wider recognition. It has long been suspected, also, that the apparent instrumental silence of Italy might not be wholly independent of a publishing monopoly which has made its successes with operatic works of high rank the excuse for encouraging the composition of inferior operas by printing them and then foisting them upon a bored public as the principal activities chiefly to the editions of Beethoven's parts are printed clefs instead of the they may be "easy" the drift of America has been to the s a starting point; happy conjunction Mr. Hugo Ara to ublic to the notion exclusively confined n once put it, to atic singing, organization."

reason why America of the national eral, and of its ar- articular—there has A tradition of opera ay when Italy had n this field than it pini, and the more r men had only to before a fully pre- eard, enjoyed, was asked no questions. h in the infallibility Germany was gal- ance of its old life civic, and industrial led our universities ssors, our journals videntious comparisons l German efficiency usiness, our legisla- socialism, and our larys with the east and, with traditional ties of language, has l in advertising its ellences. What home he Encyclopedia Bri- ore than locally in- take it without a alt? The French and s, to say nothing of have surely shown how little of what to cliques is missed s that their aggress- s attract. od of our undoubted propaganda little has ew Italy" movement lf, probably because , wholly sincere, and the upbuilding of a ements at home, and ement of a party in ploitation and unscrup- ltsiders. Beginning in Italy with more fulfilment of its nal credit, while ave every prom- has just had to of extermination all. sign visitor who back of the "New sterling loyalty degree, the hap- optimism which with a level-head- ing off at a tan- gly humanitarian ht and the meth- Apparently all rgetic; nobody is as the spirit of believes devoutly high to be con- nobody will listen make Italy pre- et nobody covets ings, or desires nation's developinvigorating an expression in the ing so flat and programme is at faint stirrings there has ap- artists, including ers, who have on but want the bably in the end present they are needs a friend," to have secured on certain critics e shrewd enough to work hunt- of hidden sin- o the first music s "New Italy"—

Malipiero's "Pauses of Silence" to be played

Mr. JOSEPH JACQUES THIBAUD, violinist, was born at Bordeaux, France, on September 27, 1880. Until he was thirteen years old, he was taught by his father. Entering the Paris Conservatory he took lessons of Martin Marsick and in 1896 was awarded a first prize. (First prizes were also awarded that year to Messrs. Sechiari and Monteux, pupils of Berthelier, and Soudant, pupil of Lefort.) Thibaud's brother, Joseph Charles, born at Bordeaux on February 25, 1875, took a first prize at the Paris Conservatory for pianoforte-playing in 1892. Another brother, Henri Bernard, a violoncellist, and a student at the Paris Conservatory, was born at Bordeaux on July 8, 1877.

In his twelfth year Mr. Thibaud had played in public at Angers. In Paris he had become known by his brilliant solos at the Café Rouge in the rue de Tournon, frequented by Conservatory pupils, who were in the habit of playing there in ensemble and as soloists. He joined Colonne's orchestra in 1897 and in 1898 became the solo violinist of that orchestra. In 1899-1900 he appeared as a virtuoso in towns of France, and at Brussels, Mannheim, and Geneva; in 1901 at Berlin, Amsterdam, Lisbon; in 1902-03 in Russia, the Scandinavian countries, Roumania, Italy, Spain.

His first appearance in Boston was on November 7, 1903, when he played César Franck's sonata with André Benoist, and pieces by Bach, Saint-Saëns, Vieuxtemps, Marsick, and Wieniawski.

A second visit to this country was made in 1913-14 and on December 28, 1913, Mr. Thibaud gave a concert with Harold Bauer in Symphony Hall: Sonatas by Franck and Beethoven (the Kreutzer), Bach's Chaconne, and a Sarabande and Gigue by Bach. He gave a concert with Carlos Salzedo, harpist, in Jordan Hall, January 31, 1914: Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole; pieces by Beethoven, Bach, Desplanès-Nachez, Saint-Saëns, Fauré, Wieniawski.

When the war broke out, he went into active service. Late in 1916 he was given leave of absence from the French Army on account of injuries received while on duty in the trenches.

He played in Boston with George Copeland in a concert at Symphony Hall, December 24, 1916: Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole, Chausson's Poème, and pieces by Saint-Saëns. Nicolai Schneer, accompanist.

On April 2, 1917, he gave a concert with Harold Bauer in Jordan Hall: Sonatas by Beethoven, Franck, Mozart.

January 12, 1918, recital in Jordan Hall: Lekeu's Sonata; Saint-Saëns's Concerto in B minor; Bach's Chaconne; pieces by Guiraud, Marsick, Saint-Saëns, Wieniawski. March 24, concert with Guiomar Novaes in Symphony Hall: Beethoven's Sonata, F major, Op. 24; Mozart's Concerto in E-flat; Vieuxtemps's Ballade and Polonaise. October 27, concert with Harold Bauer in Symphony Hall: Grieg's Sonata, C minor; Franck's Sonata; pieces by Ysaye and Wieniawski.

Out of "New Italy" Comes Novel Music

Trans. — Apr. 3, 1919
Background and Foreground to Malipiero's "Pauses of Silence," to Be Played for the First Time in America at the Symphony Concert Tomorrow

IN these days of government by slogan, it must be a sign of the eternal perversity of the artistic mind that many of the ill-considered commonplaces of musical criticism which have done duty—and more than duty!—for a generation or two are being dragged into daylight and there subjected to severe reëxamination. Two or three years ago the man in the street who cared about musical matters at all would have no more thought of doubting the general notion that Italian musicians have no interest or talent for instrumental music than of doubting today that the earth is round, or five centuries ago that it was flat, or five years ago that the French cannot fight, or that Bostonians are all acute Anglomaniacs, or that the millennium is around the corner of the next decade, waiting in sorrowful patience, but ultimate confidence, for the enactment of certain critical legislation by the Congress. It is true that the symphonic talent of Sgambati has been recognized, probably quite as enthusiastically as it ever will deserve, and that a few Americans who have happened to be in the right place at the right time have realized that in the now elderly Scontrino there abide a wealth of ideas and the power to express them which merit still wider recognition. It has long been suspected, also, that the apparent instrumental silence of Italy might not be wholly independent of a publishing monopoly which has made its successes with operatic works of high rank the excuse for encouraging the composition of inferior operas by printing them and then foisting them upon a bored public as the principal reason why American of the national general, and of its particular—there has been a tradition of opera when Italy had in this field than it cini, and the more men had only to before a fully pre-heard, enjoyed, was asked no questions. h in the infallibility Germany was gal-ance of its old life civic, and industrial- led our universities ssors, our journals ividual comparisons German efficiency business, our legisla-socialism, and our larys with the east and, with traditional ties of language, has in advertising its ellences. What home he Encyclopedia Bri-ore than locally in- take it without a alt? The French and s, to say nothing of have surely shown how little of what to cliques is missed s that their aggress-s attract. lod of our undoubted propaganda little has New Italy" movement if, probably because wholly sincere, and the upbuilding of a vements at home, and ment of a party in ploitation and unscr-atsiders. Beginning in en the principal rope were forced of reconstruction, ask of unifying centuries of ad- of government the evils which compared with like problem at essed an ignorant tion and corrup- almost too firm- r. Yet, thanks to he doctrine which esently to evolve, is for long been national develop- tarian as that of destructive. Thus Italy with more fulfilment of its nal credit, while ave every prom- has just had to of extermination all.

sign visitor who back of the "New sterling loyalty degree, the hap- optimism which with a level-head- ting off at a tan- gly humanitarian ht and the meth- Apparently all rgetic; nobody is has the spirit of believes devoutly high to be con- nobody will listen make Italy pre- et nobody covets ings, or desires nation's developinvigorating an expression in the ing so flat and programme is st faint stirrings there has ap- artists, including ers, who have on but want the bably in the end present they are needs a friend," n to have secured on certain critics e shrewd enough to work hunt- of hidden sin. o the first music is "New Italy"—

Malipiero's "Pauses of Silence" to be played

302

Mr. JOSEPH JACQUES THIBAUD, violinist, was born at Bordeaux, France, on September 27, 1880. Until he was thirteen years old he was taught by his father. Entering the Paris Conservatory he had lessons of Martin Marsick and in 1896 was awarded a first prize. (Prizes were also awarded that year to Messrs. Sechiari and Montepupils of Berthelier, and Soudant, pupil of Lefort.) Thibaud's brother, Joseph Charles, born at Bordeaux on February 25, 1875, took a first prize at the Paris Conservatory for pianoforte-playing in 1892. And his brother, Henri Bernard, a violoncellist, and a student at the Paris Conservatory, was born at Bordeaux on July 8, 1877.

In his twelfth year Mr. Thibaud had played in public at Angers. In Paris he had become known by his brilliant solos at the Café Roue, the rue de Tournon, frequented by Conservatory pupils, who were in the habit of playing there in ensemble and as soloists. He joined Colonne's orchestra in 1897 and in 1898 became the solo violinist of the orchestra. In 1899-1900 he appeared as a virtuoso in towns of France and at Brussels, Mannheim, and Geneva; in 1901 at Berlin, Amsterdam, Lisbon; in 1902-03 in Russia, the Scandinavian countries, Roumania, Italy, Spain.

His first appearance in Boston was on November 7, 1903, when he played César Franck's sonata with André Benoist, and pieces by Brahms, Saint-Saëns, Vieuxtemps, Marsick, and Wieniawski.

A second visit to this country was made in 1913-14 and on December 28, 1913, Mr. Thibaud gave a concert with Harold Bauer in Symphony Hall: Sonatas by Franck and Beethoven (the Kreutzer), Bach's Chaconne, and a Sarabande and Gigue by Bach. He gave a concert with Carlos Salzedo, harpist, in Jordan Hall, January 31, 1914: Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole; pieces by Beethoven, Bach, Desplantes-Nacament, Saint-Saëns, Fauré, Wieniawski.

When the war broke out, he went into active service. Late in 1914 he was given leave of absence from the French Army on account of injuries received while on duty in the trenches.

He played in Boston with George Copeland in a concert at Symphony Hall, December 24, 1916: Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole, Chopin's Poème, and pieces by Saint-Saëns. Nicolai Schneer, accompanist.

On April 2, 1917, he gave a concert with Harold Bauer in Jordan Hall: Sonatas by Beethoven, Franck, Mozart.

January 12, 1918, recital in Jordan Hall: Lekeu's Sonata; Saint-Saëns's Concerto in B minor; Bach's Chaconne; pieces by Guiraud, Marsick, Saint-Saëns, Wieniawski. March 24, concert with Guido Novaes in Symphony Hall: Beethoven's Sonata, F major, Op. 10, No. 3; Mozart's Concerto in E-flat; Vieuxtemps's Ballade and Polonaise. October 27, concert with Harold Bauer in Symphony Hall: Grieg's Sonata, C minor; Franck's Sonata; pieces by Ysaye and Wieniawski.

ty. Its fortunate
it an exception-

the southern sea

ried list of amuseal attractions and sit Combining

wling; yachts and ads for motoring.

ome of America's arlors, offer ample

PHILADELPHIA

CE

ass.

ISTRATION

20-7

a contractual condition of releasing the superior pieces. That exemplary "house" has confined its orchestral activities chiefly to the publication of luxurious editions of Beethoven in which the viola parts are printed in the treble and bass clefs instead of the viola (alto) clef, so that they may be "easy to read." For two long the drift of American musical curiosity has been to the north-east, with Paris as a starting point; and it has required the happy conjunction of a world war and Mr. Hugo Ara to awaken our musical public to the notion that Italy has not exclusively confined itself, as Mark Twain once put it, to "the lighter arts of operatic singing, organ-grinding, and assassination."

"New Italy"

EV RID TU

There is an excellent reason why Americans are not informed of the national growth of Italy in general, and of its artistic expressions in particular—there has been no propaganda. A tradition of opera has existed since a day when Italy had less to be proud of in this field than it has now; Verdi, Puccini, and the more deserving of the lesser men had only to present their works before a fully prepared public which heard, enjoyed, was ready for more, and asked no questions. A waning musical faith in the infallibility and all-sufficiency of Germany was galvanized into a semblance of its old life by that educational, civic, and industrial propaganda which filled our universities with exchange professors, our journals with regretful and invidious comparisons between American and German efficiency in government and business, our legislatures with paternal socialism, and our metaphorical Little Marys with the east wind generally. England, with traditional ties of blood and real ties of language, has never been backward in advertising its genuine or fancied excellences. What home is complete without the Encyclopedia Britannica, and what more than locally informed person would take it without a considerable dash of salt? The French and the Russian composers, to say nothing of their literary leaders, have surely shown that they understand how little of what they lose by devotion to cliques is missed by the vast audiences that their aggressive actions and antics attract.

During all this period of our undoubted education by rival propaganda little has been heard of the "New Italy" movement outside of Italy itself, probably because it is wholly patriotic, wholly sincere, and rightly devoted to the upbuilding of a noble Italy by improvements at home, and not to the aggrandizement of a party in power by reckless exploitation and unscrupulous deception of outsiders. Beginning in

Malipiero's "Pauses of Silence" to be played 303 en the principal rope were forced of reconstruction,

ask of unifying centuries of ad-of government
the evils which s compared with like problem at essed an ignorant tion and corrup-
almost too firm-
r. Yet, thanks to he doctrine which esently to evolve, s for long been national develop-arian as that of destructive. Thus Italy with more fulfilment of its nal credit, while ave every prom-has just had to of extermination
all.

sign visitor who back of the "New sterling loyalty degree, the hapoptimism which with a level-headling off at a tan-gly humanitarian ht and the meth-Apparently all retic; nobody is has the spirit of believes devoutly high to be con-nobody will listen make Italy pret nobody covets
ings, or desires nation's developinvigorating an expression in the ing so flat and programme is st faint stirrings

s there has ap-artists, including sers, who have on but want the bably in the end present they are needs a friend," n to have secured on certain critics
e shrewd enough to work hunt-
of hidden sin.
o the first music
is "New Italy"—

302

Mr. JOSEPH JACQUES THIBAUD, violinist, was born at Bordeaux, France, on September 27, 1880. Until he was thirteen years of age he was taught by his father. Entering the Paris Conservatory he received lessons of Martin Marsick and in 1896 was awarded a first prize. Prizes were also awarded that year to Messrs. Sechiari and Monod, pupils of Berthelier, and Soudant, pupil of Lefort.) Thibaud's brother, Joseph Charles, born at Bordeaux on February 25, 1875, took a first prize at the Paris Conservatory for pianoforte-playing in 1892. Another brother, Henri Bernard, a violoncellist, and a student at the Conservatory, was born at Bordeaux on July 8, 1877.

In his twelfth year Mr. Thibaud had played in public at Angers. In Paris he had become known by his brilliant solos at the Café Roux, the rue de Tournon, frequented by Conservatory pupils, who were in the habit of playing there in ensemble and as soloists. He joined Colonne's orchestra in 1897 and in 1898 became the solo violinist of the orchestra. In 1899-1900 he appeared as a virtuoso in towns of France and at Brussels, Mannheim, and Geneva; in 1901 at Berlin, Amsterdam, Lisbon; in 1902-03 in Russia, the Scandinavian countries, Roumania, Italy, Spain.

His first appearance in Boston was on November 7, 1903, when he played César Franck's sonata with André Benoist, and pieces by Beethoven, Saint-Saëns, Vieuxtemps, Marsick, and Wieniawski.

A second visit to this country was made in 1913-14 and on December 28, 1913, Mr. Thibaud gave a concert with Harold Bauer in Symphony Hall: Sonatas by Franck and Beethoven (the Kreutzer), Bach's Sonatas, and a Sarabande and Gigue by Bach. He gave a concert with Carlos Salzedo, harpist, in Jordan Hall, January 31, 1914: Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole; pieces by Beethoven, Bach, Desplantes-Nacament, Saint-Saëns, Fauré, Wieniawski.

When the war broke out, he went into active service. Late in 1914 he was given leave of absence from the French Army on account of injuries received while on duty in the trenches.

He played in Boston with George Copeland in a concert at Symphony Hall, December 24, 1916: Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole, Chopin's Poème, and pieces by Saint-Saëns. Nicolai Schneer, accompanist.

On April 2, 1917, he gave a concert with Harold Bauer in Jordan Hall: Sonatas by Beethoven, Franck, Mozart.

January 12, 1918, recital in Jordan Hall: Lekeu's Sonata; Saint-Saëns's Concerto in B minor; Bach's Chaconne; pieces by Guiraud, Marsick, Saint-Saëns, Wieniawski. March 24, concert with Guion Novaes in Symphony Hall: Beethoven's Sonata, F major, Op. 10, No. 3; Mozart's Concerto in E-flat; Vieuxtemps's Ballade and Polonaise. October 27, concert with Harold Bauer in Symphony Hall: Grieg's Sonata, C minor; Franck's Sonata; pieces by Ysaye and Wieniawski.

Atlantic TOURS

Includes hotels, meals, Pullman, Via Rail or Steam.

Call or send for our Tour Book.

Colpitts-Beekman

Ticket and Tourist

333 Washington St.,

(R)

ADOPTS BAY STATE

Recreation Huts to Become

Centres for Ambitious Soldiers

to Better Themselves

Recreation huts for soldiers are to be turned into educational centres for the benefit of men who are "get ahead" upon their return. Plans now in effect, under the War Department is co-operation with the National War Work Council. Y. M. C. A., are described in a letter to students issued by the Department of University Extension. Massachusetts Board of Education newsletter states that when the first under consideration of the Department made an investigation of the courses of study while in the army and intensive and could be of advantage where soldiers are shifted from one post to another. Courses of the Massachusetts Extension Department were best adapted for the end. In February, after the call came, sheets covering one hundred were sent to France.

Applications for the courses are chiefly from soldiers who are returning to fit themselves for bettered when they get home than they have obtained before the war. Of these men, this new spirit is aroused by Army training discipline. The courses cover ranging from elementary foreign-speaking soldiers mechanical drawing and calculation are also provided for nurses to study along the lines of

OFFSET VOTERS' GENE

Watertown Selectmen Cut Off

Wages of Firemen, Policemen

307

the early seventies, when the principal nations of continental Europe were forced to commence a great era of reconstruction, Italy set about the task of unifying a people separated by centuries of adherence to the system of government by small States, with all the evils which that system entails. As compared with Germany, which faced a like problem at the same time, Italy possessed an ignorant and undisciplined population and corruption and pauperism seemed almost too firmly rooted ever to disappear. Yet, thanks to the moral soundness of the doctrine which Italy's leaders managed presently to evolve, the southern country has for long been committed to a policy of national development as liberally humanitarian as that of its rival has been brutally destructive. Thus the present moment finds Italy with more than a beginning of the fulfilment of its aims realized, to its eternal credit, while a nation which in 1870 gave every promise of magnificent future has just had to be pushed to the verge of extermination in order to be tolerated at all.

Ideals and the Arts

What strikes the foreign visitor who stumbles upon the spirit back of the "New Italy" movement is the sterling loyalty of persons of high and low degree, the happy combination of an optimism which dares attempt anything with a level-headedness which forbids darting off at a tangent, and the astonishingly humanitarian quality of the aims sought and the methods used to attain them. Apparently all are sincere, and all energetic; nobody is lukewarm, and nobody has the spirit of the profiteer; everybody believes devoutly that there is no aim too high to be confidently striven for, yet nobody will listen to a quack; all agree to make Italy pre-eminent in the world, yet nobody covets another nation's good things, or desires to interfere in another nation's development or happiness.

Naturally so active and invigorating an idealism is bound to seek expression in the arts as surely as anything so flat and flabby as our "uplift" programme is bound to stifle even the first faint stirrings of artistic impulse. Thus there has appeared in Italy a group of artists, including a fair number of composers, who have ceased to cry for the moon but want the earth instead, and will probably in the end get their share of it. At present they are in the state "when a feller needs a friend," and such a friend they seem to have secured in Mr. Ara, not to mention certain critics in those countries which are shrewd enough to set the national energy to work hunting hidden talent instead of hidden sin. So much for background to the first music Boston is to hear from this "New Italy"—Malipiero's "Pauses of Silence" to be played

The Man and the Work

According to Mr. Jean-Aubry, Malipiero was born at Venice in 1882. He received much of his musical instruction from Enrico Bossi, not unknown here as a composer, and he studied modern French and Russian scores as well as "the researches of the young Hungarian musicians"—possibly Bela Bartok, or the group which recognize Schönberg as guide, philosopher and friend. In his early days he wrote compositions which he now prefers to disavow; Mr. Jean-Aubry does not describe the traits of these pieces, but leaves it to be inferred that they are conventionally modern. A "Sinfonia del Silenzio e della Morte" (1910) is recognized by Mr. Jean-Aubry as a work in which Malipiero's individuality begins to stand out; but even this is rejected as "youthful" by the composer. This critic refers in appreciative terms to the following "mature" or nearly mature works: "Poemetti Lunari" (1910); the aforementioned symphony; "Canossa," a one-act tragedy; "Sogno di un Tramonto di Autunno," a tragic poem founded on one of d'Annunzio's lyrics; a number of songs including "Sonnets des Feés" (d'Annunzio), "Cinq Melodies," and "Keepsake" (all recent, the last 1918); piano pieces, including "Preludi Autunnali," "Poemi Aslani" (1916), and "Barlumi" (recent); orchestral compositions, "Impressioni del Vero" (two orchestral suites—the adjectival noun "Vero" is translated "Nature" by Mr. Jean-Aubry), a suite, "Armenia," and two compositions, "Pause del Silenzio" and "Ditirambo Tragico," which Mr. Jean-Aubry, writing in January of this year, says have not been performed; and two mimodramatic works, "Sette Canzoni" and "Pantea," both of which evidently are accompanied not only by orchestra, but by singers with text appropriate to the action.

09 he became the kind of amendment of the code en's Bible Class one of Crowder claims great tist Church, New Yavag ed not one single syst
D. Rockefeller, Jr. And not one single liber le Unitarian Fellows to the other hand, import came minister of ed; Idea that a court-marti of Schenectady, succepl nivalry and honor not go L. Sullivan, D. D. jary rules of law.
ministerial work he Crowder says that all the fac has been an editor n his subject are now to be a New York Herald and n the investigation by th utor to newspapers an leral. I have already not motor General that I wou

ES OUT TENANTS

Dwelling House Damage Extent of $2000

ty-five tenants of the Charter street, North End ed early this morning b ed in the cigar and fru a & Contrino on the fir e smoke came up throug e tenants were arouse ilding, assisted by fir of the door and fire-e they were taken fro into the windows of th
ng. The building is construction and sto Moritti. The dama

Liberalization

ment whether the pianist had played for only one of Schönberg's Six Short Pieces for Piano. As there are still people in the world, even in Boston, who ardently favor or oppose "generative" treatment in music of more than one movement, it may be good to point out that the motto is not only actually quoted in six of the movements, but that several motives are contrived so as to resemble others in melody, rhythm, outline, or a combination of these, and that this resemblance is manifestly intended by the composer.

Symphony Hall.

an ideal as the "New course, the man in

be more impressed
f Malipiero's style
or the charm of no doubting that startling disson-
apparent concern
ars or doubly ten-
than you or I have Jumbo-Jumbo wor-concert-goer who Strauss to Ravel
rg and Stravinsky
Ornstein between
r timidly inquiring
this, all strange-
ure of familiarity;
by it. Malipiero
—we shall all be le while, if only
st will be whether
s ideas, and ex-
For the present
f Malipiero's dis-
the slightest de-
all the time, or been so success-ofession at large er of being over-
can score as well
can support. It find a man who
this held, espe-
sion differ from ors in the direc-
piro's score is e is struck by es on any given ument has more
ve, except pos-
In spite of this es, there seems passage in the very sure hand
and the results
effortless.
as never lack in rhythm. On uses of Silence"
ther than com-
does not lack gness to deigns in this reendency to over-

lures as "ostinato"
motives have too
much force; it is impossible work.

all is on extreme "expressions" can- minutes to perform. ing step with a men; recall the his "later manner," gs—to choose two For better or for to see brevity us ould I say under- o be; the coming ating symphonies ree evenings to clip to the van- expect to see the of a single sus- say, the French mo, swelling out gar as fortissimo, away again to by gushing audi- aster of the ages, nampionship in a le with courage entire festival solitary double are drum. How is "reserve" and

great deal of dis-
it a short piece of
is as likely as not ten by Sunday o
t. Very well; it is that the "Le Pause
prove to be of any
On the other hand,
"New Italy" move-
ut wish well to any o much enthusiasm qualities to com-
ll retain its present
its high promise,
generate into stere-
t it is only begin-
yet. The musical
l in her silence; and,
t who was stopped
r, we may beat our
t choose but hear.
LIP GREELEY CLAPP

The Man and the

According to Mr. was born at Venice much of his musical rico Bossi, not unk poser, and he studie Russian scores as w of the young Hung sibly Bela Bartok, or nize Schönberg as a friend. In his early positions which he n Mr. Jean-Aubry doe of these pieces, I inferred that they ar ern. A "Sinfonia Morte" (1910) is rec Aubry as a work in dividuality begins to this is rejected as " poser. This critic terms to the followi mature works: "Po the aforementioned a one-act tragedy; " di Autunno," a tra one of d'Annunzio's songs including "So nunzio), "Cinq Melo (all recent, the last cluding "Preludi Aslani" (1916), an orchestral composit "Vero" (two orchestr noun "Vero" is to Mr. Jean-Aubry), a two compositions, "Ditirambo Tragico, bry, writing in Jan have not been per dramatic works, "Pantea," both of v accompanied not only singers with text ap Boston is to hear zio" at the Sympl week; I am indebt the privilege of cor score. To one who edge of Italian, "P mean much or littl tionary meaning of in sound are silen

Analyses

The second, agitato, 3-4. A bassoon, the contrabassoon, and the contrabasses commence a running accompaniment figure; the horns enter with a counter-rhythm; then the violins are added to the rest. A snatch of dance music is tossed off by clarinet, English horn, and xylophone; the rest of the orchestra picks it up, and there is rough and savage treatment of this and other material. There is a return to the opening figures, and at the close the motto is again heard, this time in the oboes.

The third "expression" opens with repeated slow chords for strings and harp, in a steady, quiet pulsation. Again the woodwind instruments answer each other back and forth with short figures of a pastoral character. A broad melody is begun by the violins, and completed by other instruments: this is then developed and elaborated, with suggestions of changing keys. The quiet mood of the opening returns, but there is a more pronounced melancholy. The motto makes its reappearance at the end.

In sound are silence, pauses in silence powder says that all the facts subject are now to be a the investigation by the General. I have already not Director General that I would in that investigation unless for the reason that such ma beyond his jurisdiction, an er reason that he himself qualified. It was of him and I spoke when I said in my Secretary of War, in November the views of the Inspector Army, together with those our military advisors are

Director General

ate no specific controversy you are to investigate or intelligently address a sta-med it advisable so to do.
seems to be the case, the
as to do with my statemeenate Committee on Militastatement, for which of cou-sible, speaks for itself.

all, however, it is my judgment that an adequate and helpful investigation of the existing system of military administration of it during the war is beyond your province. The attitude toward it, and the way to deal with it, are not, when faced with particular incidents to which the limited capacity of inquiry can be applied; they are extra-departmental questions involving fundamental and general considerations of law and justice, which cannot justly be confined to the War Department or any bureau or office which are entirely beyond your jurisdiction.

les, whatever of controversy upon these fundamental questions concerning which I have given to my views, directly involved the honor of the Government of War, whose subordination is even more; it directly involves the honor of the War Office as well. I beg to say that the record will show that this was a most noble and final endeavor, made near the close of the war, to subject the whole of the departmental supervision to the control of the Secretary of War, the Assistant Secretary of War, the

Symphony Hall.

sion
 o the poetic content of the work, it too close a verbal analysis, lying h of the most representative modern oes in the fertile middle region be-programme and abstract music. Mr.
 is reminded of the vast, hot, hazy, terious landscapes of the Campagna ily, with their strange and vivid choed in sound by snatches of tune
 the pipes of unseen shepherds:
 of course he absolves the composer intention specifically to paint these Whether the composer had such tion or not, no son of Italy can fail been influenced by these land-off the operatic stage at least.

live sympathy with Nature there are in these little pieces, and along the kind of more personal response characterizes the introspective poets such as Debussy and, to a less Chopin, not to mention Sibelius in his symphony, which has pleased a few here in Boston. Malipiero, is not exclusively personal, but Italian as well, even to the exaggerated, almost a swagger, which we sympathize with or deplore, according to our prejudices, in Verdi, Puccini, Mascagni—but which kindles the blood whether or no. Also, there is the sparkle and self-confidence in these little pieces. So we may admire to delight many by their confession, while they annoy some who are old men in years and all who are old men by temperament.
Young people are welcome to sniff at them; I find these seven "expressions" a remodiment in tones of the passion of an energetic and sanguine but thoughtful and reflective young man, all of which, even to his idle fancies, is the pride, ambition, and spirit-

an ideal as the "New

course, the man in
be more impressed
f Malipiero's style
or the charm of
no doubting that startling disson-
apparent concern
ars or downy ten-than you or I have
umbo-Jumbo wor-
concert-goer who Strauss to Ravel
rg and Stravinsky
Ornstein between
r timidly inquiring
this, all strange-
re of familiarity;
by it. Malipiero
—we shall all be le while, if only
st will be whether
s ideas, and ex-
For the present
f Malipiero's dis-
the slightest de-
all the time, or
been so success-
profession at large er of being over-
can score as well
can support. It
find a man who
this held, espe-
question differ from ors in the direc-
piero's score is e is struck by e on any given ument has more
ve, except pos-
In spite of this
s, there seems passage in the very sure hand
and the results
effortless.
s never lack n rhythm. On ses of Silence"
ther than com-
does not lack gness to des in this reency to over-

lures as "ostinato"
motives have too
ance; it is impos-le work.

all is on extreme "expressions" can- minutes to perform. ing step with a men; recall the his "later manner," gs—to choose two For better or for o see brevity as ould I say under- o be; the coming ting symphonies ree evenings to clip to the van- pect to see the of a single sus- say, the French mo, swelling out ar as fortissimo, away again to by gushing aud- aster of the ages, nampionship in a le with courage entire festival solitary double are drum. How is "reserve" and

great deal of dis-
a short piece of as likely as not by Sunday or Very well; it is the "Le Pause
ve to be of any
the other hand, ew Italy" move-wish well to any much enthusiasm
qualities to com-
tain its present
high promise.
erate into stereis only begin-
The musical her silence; and,
who was stopped
e may beat our oose but hear.
FREELY CLAPP

at the Symphony Saturday.

The Man and the

In the London Mercury, 1919, Mr. G. Jefferies, in an article concerning the title, "A Great Art," apparently feels that the work needs explanation. He begins by recalling the several causes of Ravel, Sévécac, Rodin, and Stravinsky; and then asks: "Which were the causes or myself? Let us see."

According to Mr. Jefferies, Malipiero was born at Venice in 1876. He was a friend of the young Hungarians, notably Bela Bartok, and he studied the Russian scores as well as those of the young Hungarians. In his early positions which he held, he was not only a composer, but also a conductor. He has written a number of these pieces, but the most important are the "Sinfonia Mortale" (1910) and the "Sinfonia di Autunno," a tragedy in three acts, written in 1911. He has also written a number of songs, including "Sinfonia Mortale" (1910) and the "Sinfonia di Autunno," a tragedy in three acts, written in 1911. He has also written a number of songs, including "Sinfonia Mortale" (1910) and the "Sinfonia di Autunno," a tragedy in three acts, written in 1911.

He has also written a number of songs, including "Sinfonia Mortale" (1910) and the "Sinfonia di Autunno," a tragedy in three acts, written in 1911. He has also written a number of songs, including "Sinfonia Mortale" (1910) and the "Sinfonia di Autunno," a tragedy in three acts, written in 1911. He has also written a number of songs, including "Sinfonia Mortale" (1910) and the "Sinfonia di Autunno," a tragedy in three acts, written in 1911.

He has also written a number of songs, including "Sinfonia Mortale" (1910) and the "Sinfonia di Autunno," a tragedy in three acts, written in 1911. He has also written a number of songs, including "Sinfonia Mortale" (1910) and the "Sinfonia di Autunno," a tragedy in three acts, written in 1911. He has also written a number of songs, including "Sinfonia Mortale" (1910) and the "Sinfonia di Autunno," a tragedy in three acts, written in 1911.

In sound are silence, pauses in sound should be sound. Or, or local, "break silence" found ideas to the composers be denied Malipiero's titles are often even mystical; the merely a fanciful work he is about to break he thereby imbues with something of the magic as he may Lord Dunsany is not of this same trick. in the term, nor in the orchestral expression that Malipiero is a little series (I don't suite) "preludes." yet, "nocturnes!" A of the "expressions" the lie to the name. titles; the composer hearers' curiosity and leave the rest music to stimulate

Analyses

The first "expression" readily remembered in unison; this series for the series. Immense are spread soft chords and celesta, over which instruments answer figures of a pastoral a change of rhythm development, culminating in a chant-like movement. Then the little pastiche over again with new tation. At the close recalls the motto.

The second, agitated the contrabassoon, commence a running the horns enter with then the violins are snatch of dance music, English horn, rest of the orchestra is rough and savage other material. The opening figures, and is again heard, this

The third "expression" ed slow chords for steady, quiet pulsation instruments answer forth with short figures. A broad melody violins, and complete this is then ed, with suggestions quiet mood of the there is a more peaceful. The motto makes an end.

The fourth is again lively. Furious runs for strings and woodwind serve as background for a new dance figure, which is developed even more savagely than that of the second movement. After a greatly increased pace has led to a climax, the original tempo is restored; but this time heavily divided trills replace the furious runs of the opening. At the close a loud chord of brass is suddenly cut off, leaving a flute and an oboe, which have entered softly in a totally different key, to complete a reminiscence of the motto.

The fifth begins quietly with mysterious chords for low woodwind, five solo cellos, and a solo contrabass, recalling the manner of the chantlike passage for strings in the first movement. A slow rhythmic figure for horns is added, and there is a plaintive melody for oboe. In the middle portion there is more antiphonal calling back and forth among the various instruments; then the opening chords return. The usual reappearance of the motto is this time entrusted to three flutes.

The sixth opens with a martial tune for trumpets in G major, accompanied by a pair of horns in F sharp major; then the keys shift to A flat and G. New rhythmic elements are introduced, first by the trombones, then by the woodwind. Toward the end much is made of the alternation of soft brass chords with sforzando chords for strings and woodwind in altogether different keys. The motto is finally quoted by the trumpets.

The seventh "expression," which serves as emotional and formal climax of the set, opens with formidable crescendos of various sets of instruments, always so arranged that two unrelated chords are sounding simultaneously. An answer is afforded by modal progressions of chords for strings, harp and celesta, which are in keeping with two similar passages in previous movements, albeit not directly quoted from them. Two interruptions in the shape of upward rushes of the strings, the bass clarinet, and the harp lead to an "atmospheric" middle portion, after which the opening measures return and lead to a brilliant polyharmonic climax. The motto reappears in all four horns, as at the beginning of the set; the final chord is an unresolved suspension which melts into a silence the "pauses" of which are now over for the time being.

The foregoing is less an attempt at formal analysis than a bit of description to prepare the way for a hearing by pointing out how the composer presents his material. For formal analysis it is only necessary to take the wind out of the sails of the conservative by assuring them, upon honor, that the several movements are in three-part form. They are played without pause, so the unwary may find themselves in the position of the audience at Mr. Ornstein's concert a couple of seasons ago, when only the initiated knew at a certain moment whether the pianist had played all or only one of Schönberg's Six Short Pieces for Piano. As there are still people in the world, even in Boston, who ardently favor or oppose "generative" treatment in works of more than one movement, it may be bloodshed to point out that the motto is not only actually quoted in six of the seven movements, but that several motives are contrived so as to resemble others in harmony, rhythm, outline, or a combination of the three, and that this resemblance is manifestly intended by the composer.

Symphony Hall.

Impression

As to the poetic content of the work, it eludes too close a verbal analysis, lying as much of the most representative modern music does in the fertile middle region between programme and abstract music. Mr. Rabaud is reminded of the vast, hot, hazy, and mysterious landscapes of the Campagna and Sicily, with their strange and vivid colors echoed in sound by snatches of tune from the pipes of unseen shepherds; though of course he absolves the composer of any intention specifically to paint these scenes. Whether the composer had such an intention or not, no son of Italy can fail to have been influenced by these landscapes, off the operatic stage at least. Imaginative sympathy with Nature there surely is in these little pieces, and along with it the kind of more personal response which characterizes the introspective poets of music, such as Debussy and, to a lesser degree, Chopin, not to mention Sibelius in his fourth symphony, which has pleased a fortunate few here in Boston. Malipiero, however, is not exclusively personal, but decidedly Italian as well, even to the expansive gesture, almost a swagger, which one is struck by we either sympathize with or deplore, according to our prejudices, in Verdi, Puccini, Sgambati, Mascagni—but which kindles our blood whether or no. Also, there is plenty of the sparkle and self-confidence of youth in these little pieces. So we may expect them to delight many by their contagious enthusiasm, while they annoy some of those who are old men in years and all of those who are old men by temperament. Matter-of-fact people are welcome to sniff as they will; I find these seven "expressions" the embodiment in tones of the passing moods of an energetic and sanguine but sensitive and reflective young man, all of whose thought, even to his idle fancies, is colored by the pride, ambition, and spirit-

ideal as the "New course, the man in

be more impressed

Malipiero's style

no doubting that

startling disson-

apparent concern

ars or doubly ten-

than you or I have

umbo-Jumbo wor-

concert-goer who

Strauss to Ravel

rg and Stravinsky

Ornstein between

timidly inquiring

this, all strange-

ure of familiarity;

by it. Malipiero

we shall all be

tle while, if only

est will be whether

as ideas, and ex-

For the present

of Malipiero's dis-

the slightest de-

all the time, or a solitary double snare drum. How his "reserve" and

"

great deal of dis-

it a short piece of

is as likely as not

ten by Sunday or

t. Very well; it is that the "Le Pause

prove to be of any

On the other hand,

"New Italy" move-

it wish well to any

much enthusiasm

qualities to com-

ll retain its present

its high promise.

generate into stere-

t it is only begin-

yet. The musical

in her silence; and

t who was stopped

r, we may beat our

choose but hear.

IP GREELEY CLAPP

at the Symphony Saturday.

The Man and the

In the London Mail of May, 1919, Mr. G. J. Aronson, in an article concerning the title, "A Great Art," apparently feels that the title needs explanation. He begins by recalling the several causes of the war: Ravel, Sévère, Ravel, and Stravinsky; and ends: "Which were or myself? Let us decide."

According to Mr. Aronson, Malipiero was born at Venice, and much of his musical training was at the hands of the Russian scores as well as the young Hungarian Bela Bartok, or, possibly, Schönberg as a friend. In his early positions which he held, Mr. Jean-Aubry does not infer that they are of these pieces, but that they are of the "Sinfonia Morte" (1910) is recalled as a work in which individuality begins to be rejected as a pose. This criticism leads to the following mature works: "Preludio" (the aforementioned one-act tragedy), "di Autunno," a tragedy of d'Annunzio's songs including "Sonetto," "Cinq Melodrami" (all recent, the last including "Preludio Asiani" (1916), an orchestral composition "Vero" (two orchestral movements), "Vero" is the title of two compositions, "Ditirambo Tragico" (1917), and "Pantea," both of which have not been performed. The dramatic works, "Pantea," both of which have not been performed, are accompanied not only by singers with text, but by a large orchestra.

Boston is to hear Malipiero at the Symphony Saturday; I am indebted to the privilege of conducting the score. To one who has heard the edge of Italian, "Pantea" means much or little. The motto makes a stationary meaning of end.

should be sound. Or, or local, "break silence" found ideas to the composers be denied Malipiero's titles are often even mystical; the merely a fanciful way he is about to break the thereby imbues with something of much the better for magic as he may complete a reminiscence of the motto. Lord Dunsany is not of this same trick. In the term, nor in orchestral expression that Malipiero is a little series (I don't suite) "preludes." yet, "nocturnes." A of the "expressions" the lie to the name. titles; the composer hears' curiosity and leave the rest music to stimulate

Analyses

The first "expression" readily remembered in unison; this serves for the series. Immense are spread soft chords and celesta, over which instruments answer figures of a pastor, a change of rhythm, development, culmination of chant-like movement, then the little pastiche over again with new tation. At the close recalls the motto.

The second, agitated, the contrabassoon, commence a running the horns enter with then the violins are snatch of dance music, clarinet, English horn, rest of the orchestra is rough and savage other material. The opening figures, and is again heard, this

The third "expression" ed slow chords for steady, quiet pulsation instruments answer forth with short figures. A broad melody violins, and complete: this is then ed, with suggestions quiet mood of the there is a more p. The motto makes end.

in sound are silence, pauses in silence

The fourth is again lively. Furious runs for strings and woodwind serve as background for a new dance figure, which is developed even more savagely than that of the second movement. After a greatly increased pace has led to a climax, the original tempo is restored; but this time heavily divided trills replace the furious runs of the opening. At the close chord of brass is suddenly cut off, a flute and an oboe, which have softly in a totally different key, complete a reminiscence of the motto.

The fifth begins quietly with my chords for low woodwind, five solo and a solo contrabass, recalling the of the chantlike passage for strings, first movement. A slow rhythmic for horns is added, and there is a melody for oboe. In the middle there is more antiphonal calling forth among the various instruments the opening chords return. The appearance of the motto is this trusted to three flutes.

The sixth opens with a martial trumpets in G major, accompanied pair of horns in F sharp major; keys shift to A flat and G. New elements are introduced, first by the bones, then by the woodwind. To end much is made of the alternating soft brass chords with sforzando strings and woodwind in altogether different keys. The motto is finally of the trumpets.

The seventh "expression," which emotional and formal climax set, opens with formidable of various sets of instruments so arranged that two unrelated are sounding simultaneously. I answer is afforded by modal progression of chords for strings, harp and which are in keeping with the similar passages in previous movements, albeit not directly quoted from it. Two interruptions in the shape of rushes of the strings, the bass clarinet, the harp lead to an "atmospheric" portion, after which the opening return and lead to a brilliant polyphonic climax. The motto reappears in horns, as at the beginning of the final chord is an unresolved which melts into a silence the which are now over for the time

The foregoing is less an attempt at formal analysis than a bit of description prepare the way for a hearing as out how the composer presents material. For formal analysis necessary to take the wind out of the conservative by assuring honor, that the several movements three-part form. They are a pause, so the unwary may find in the position of the audience Ornstein's concert a couple of seasons ago, when only the initiated knew at a certain ual absorption of such an ideal as the "New Italy" programme.

Symphony Hall.

Means and Methods

For the present, of course, the man in the street is liable to be more impressed with the strangeness of Malipiero's style than with the force or the charm of his ideas. There is no doubting that he uses some very startling dissonances with no more apparent concern for his hearers' tender ears or doubly tender harmonic prejudices than you or I have for the theology of the Mumbo-Jumbo worshippers. The harried concert-goer who has been dragged from Strauss to Ravel and then on to Schönberg and Stravinsky with perhaps a little Ornstein between may even be pardoned for timidly inquiring "What next?" As to this, all strangeness is subject to the cure of familiarity; no work stands or falls by it. Malipiero is in abundant company—we shall all be poly-harmonists in a little while, if only to be conventional. The test will be whether any particular writer has ideas, and expresses them tellingly. For the present I confess to liking many of Malipiero's dissonant effects without in the slightest desiring to listen to them all the time, or even every week.

Of late orchestration has been so successfully cultivated by the profession at large that we have been in danger of being overrun by more experts who can score as well as Wagner than the trade can support. It is therefore a pleasure to find a man who knows some new effects in this field, especially as the effects in question differ from their immediate predecessors in the direction of simplicity. Malipiero's score is plentifully active; yet one is struck by the extreme scarcity of notes on any given page. Probably each instrument has more measures silent than active, except possibly some of the strings. In spite of this extreme economy of forces, there seems not to be a thin-sounding passage in the whole seven movements. A very sure hand has penned these pages, and the results seem not only certain, but effortless.

Malipiero's melodic ideas never lack profile, either in shape or in rhythm. On the other hand, in "The Pauses of Silence" they are mostly motives rather than complete melodies. He surely does not lack the power or the willingness to develop his themes; if he errs in this respect at all it is in a tendency to overures as "ostinato" motives have too much; it is impossible work.

all is an extreme "expressions" can minutes to perform. ping step with a men; recall the his "later manner." ngs—to choose two For better or for to see brevity as ould I say under- to be; the coming iting symphonies three evenings to d clip to the van- expect to see the r of a single sus- say, the French simo, swelling out lgar as fortissimo, away again to by gushing audi- master of the ages, championship in a diple with courage n entire festival t solitary double t snare drum. How his "reserve" and great deal of dis- a short piece of is as likely as not ten by Sunday or t. Very well; it is that the "Le Pause prove to be of any On the other hand, "New Italy" move- it wish well to any o much enthusiasm qualities to com- ll retain its present its high promise. generate into stere- t it is only begin- yet. The musical in her silence; and, t who was stopped r, we may beat our t choose but hear. LIP GREELEY CLAPP

Secretary of War Responsi-

"If responsibility for the situation as has existed in the

at the Symphony Saturday.

The Man and the

In the London Musician, 1919, Mr. G. J. article concerning the title, "A Great Art," apparently feels that the needs explanation; he begins by recalling promptly and outsp the several causes Ravel, Sévère, and Stravinsky; and lows: "Which were or myself? Let us deed."

According to Mr. was born at Venice much of his musical rico Bossi, not unko poser, and he studie Russian scores as w of the young Hunga sibly Bela Bartok, or nize Schönberg as a friend. In his early positions which he n Mr. Jean-Aubry doe of these pieces, b inferred that they ar ern. A "Sinfonia Morte" (1910) is re Aubry as a work in dividuality begins to this is rejected as "poser. This critic terras to the followi mature works: "Po the aforementioned a one-act tragedy: "di Autunno," a tra one of d'Annunzio's songs including "So nunzio), "Cinq Melo (all recent, the last cluding "Preludi Aslani" (1916), an orchestral composi "Vero" (two orchest noun "Vero" is to Mr. Jean-Aubry), a two compositions, "Ditirambo Tragico bry, writing in Jan have not been perf dramatic works. "Pantea," both of accompanied not only singers with text ap Boston is to hear zio" at the Symph week; I am indebt the privilege of con score. To one who edge of Italian, "P mean much or litt tionary meaning of in sound are silence, pauses in silen should be sound. Or or local, "break silen found ideas to the composers be denied piero's titles are ofte even mystical; the merely a fanciful wa he is about to brea he thereby imbues with something of much the better for magic as he may Lord Dunsany is not of this same trick. in the term, nor in orchestral expression that Malipiero is a little series (I don't suite) "preludes." yet, "nocturnes." A of the "expressions" the lie to the name. titles; the composer hearers' curiosity and leave the rest music to stimulate

Analyses

The first "expre readily remembered in unison; this ser for the series. Imm are spread soft ch and celesta, over w instruments answer figures of a pastor a change of rhyth development, culminat of chant-like movin then the little past over again with new tation. At the clos recalls the motto.

The second, agite the contrabassoon, commence a running the horns enter w then the violins are snatch of dance m clarinet, English ho rest of the orchestra is rough and savage other material. Th opening figures, and is again heard, this The third "expre ed slow chords for steady, quiet pulsatio instruments answer forth with short figu acter. A broad m violins, and compl ments; this is then ed, with suggestions quiet mood of the there is a more p The motto makes

The fourth is again lively. Furious runs for strings and woodwind serve as background for a new dance figure, which is developed even more savagely than that of the second movement. After a greatly increased pace has led to a climax, the original tempo is restored; but this time heavily divided trills replace the furious runs of the opening. At the close chord of brass is suddenly cut off, a flute and an oboe, which have softly in a totally different key, plete a reminiscence of the motto.

The fifth begins quietly with my chords for low woodwind, five solo and a solo contrabass, recalling the of the chantlike passage for strings first movement. A slow rhythmic for horns is added, and there is a melody for oboe. In the middle there is more antiphonal calling forth among the various instrumen the opening chords return. The appearance of the motto is this trusted to three flutes.

The sixth opens with a martial trumpets in G major, accompani pair of horns in F sharp major; keys shift to A flat and G. New elements are introduced, first by bones, then by the woodwind. To end much is made of the alter soft brass chords with sforzando strings and woodwind in altoge ferent keys. The motto is finally the trumpets.

The seventh "expression," which emotional and formal climax set, opens with formidable of various sets of instruments so arranged that two unrelate are sounding simultaneously. I answer is afforded by modal pr of chords for strings, harp and which are in keeping with eilar passages in previous m. albert not directly quoted fr Two interruptions in the shape rushes of the strings, the bass cl the harp lead to an "atmospher portion, after which the opening return and lead to a brilliant po climax. The motto reappears horns, as at the beginning of final chord is an unresolved w which melts into a silence the which are now over for the time

The foregoing is less an attel mal analysis than a bit of de prepare the way for a hearing is out how the composer preser material. For formal analysis necessary to take the wind oute of the conservative by assuring honor, that the several moved three-part form. They are plab pause, so the unwary may find in the position of the audience Ornstein's concert a couple of seasons ago. when only the initiated knew at a certain

Symphony Hall.

be located, it must be the Secretary of War. I instructed me in November of particular importance concerning the policies of matters concerning the dealt with by me except of the Judge Advocate

"The difficulties of ac been due to the fact that fact responsible for the had no authority of dire help and means. That served for General C but little time and atten fice. He knew little or administration of this war and was entirely assumed in his other duties by the Secretary of War of this office, he was the provost marshal ge the War Council, and, in the department for a liaison officer. It was man to be both provost Judge Advocate General war councillor and do h place, and this I clearly in November, 1917, I aske of an order under section me, the senior officer in charge of the policies of "It was a case in whic er desired, and the Secre mitted him, to assume m that were in no sense rel of greater capacity than could carry. This was b operated to the great h were' department. It proved arstic stacle

"General Crowder take existing Clemency Board, still held as the presiden by him upon his return though he discovered the in good faith, and were allay public apprehensi

"I organized tw this office, but the of the War Depart instructed the revind department themse clemency upon standing the facta of the War Depart was limited to adn question of legalle eration could be he tion, and applicatw six months.

To Prevent Investigation

"Shortly after he subn tion to the committee of occasion to address a le officer of the Judge Advoc department in France, in w reference to an admini which he had adopted as was necessary to do so off a threatened Congre work little accented figures as "ostinato" material. Perhaps his motives have too strong a family resemblance; it is impossible to judge by a single work.

Most surprising trait of all is an extreme brevity; the entire set of "expressions" cannot take much over ten minutes to perform. Here Malipiero is keeping step with a number of the younger men; recall the brevity of Schönberg in his "later manner." of Stravinsky in his songs—to choose two examples at random. For better or for worse, we are about to see brevity as much overdone (or should I say underdone?) as length used to be; the coming men, instead of writing symphonies which take two or three evenings to perform, will prune and clip to the vanishing point. I still expect to see the day when the composer of a single sustained tone for, let us say, the French horn, beginning pianissimo, swelling out to forte (nothing so vulgar as fortissimo, of course), and dying away again to nothing, will be hailed by gushing audiences as the supreme master of the ages, only to sacrifice his championship in a brief space to a disciple with courage enough to compose an entire festival cycle consisting of a solitary double pianissimo tap on the snare drum. How the critics will praise his "reserve" and "economy of material!"

To Conclude

All this may seem a great deal of discussion upon and about a short piece of uncertain merits which is as likely as not destined to be forgotten by Sunday or next week at the latest. Very well; it is easy enough to grant that the "Le Pause del Silenzio" may not prove to be of any particular importance. On the other hand, Malipiero may, and the "New Italy" movement must. One can but wish well to any earnest attempt with so much enthusiasm and so many engaging qualities to commend it. Perhaps it will retain its present individuality and fulfil its high promise, perhaps it will only degenerate into stereotyped eccentricity—but it is only beginning; the end is not yet. The musical "New Italy" has paused in her silence; and, like the wedding guest who was stopped by the Ancient Mariner, we may beat our breasts, yet we cannot choose but hear.

PHILIP GREELEY CLAPP

21-1

306

307

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1918-19.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

HENRI RABAUD, Conductor.

TWENTY-FIRST PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, APRIL 11, AT 2.30 P.M.

SATURDAY, APRIL 12, AT 8 P.M.

MAGNARD,

HYMNE À LA JUSTICE, ("Hymn to Justice")
(First time in Boston)

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY in F major, No. 6, "Pastoral," op. 68.

- I. Awakening of serene impressions on arriving in the country. Allegro, ma non troppo
- II. Scene by the Brook-side. Andante molto moto
- III. Jolly gathering of the Country Folk. Allegro; In tempo d'allegro Thunderstorm; Tempest. Allegro.
- IV. Shepherd's song. Gladsome and thankful feelings after the storm. Allegretto.

FOOTE,

FOUR CHARACTER PIECES, (after the Rubaiyat of Khayyám)

- I. Andante comodo
- II. Allegro deciso
- III. Comodo
- IV. Andantino ben marcato; Molto allegro; Tempo primo

DUBOIS,

OVERTURE to "Frithiof"

Photo by Press Illustrating Service.

Reproduction of Bas-Relief of Arthur Foote Made by Bashka Paeva of Boston

BOSTON, Jan. 19.—It was due to the fact that her sister is a pupil of Arthur Foote that Bashka Paeva, a young Russian sculptress, recently made a bas-relief of the eminent composer, which is reproduced above. Miss Paeva, whose family came to this country but a few years ago, has studied at the Boston Art Museum with Bela Pratt, the noted sculptor, who is especially well known for his statues placed in front of the Boston Public Library.

TEACHING BEETHOVEN TO BOSTON

M. Rabaud Earnestly Trying to Acquaint Us With His Symphonies

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

THE SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

Magnard—Hymn to Justice.

Beethoven—Pastoral Symphony.

Foote—Four character pieces from "Omar

Khayyam."

Dubois—Overture to "Frithjof."

There was no soloist and from an artistic standpoint the symphony concert needs none. From a box office point of view, however, the great prima donna, the celebrated pianist, the pyrotechnical violinist, is quite essential and there never is a long waiting line when they are absent.

Magnard's martyrdom in the war has caused his music to be played more frequently than it otherwise would have been. Intrinsically it is scarcely up to the level of Debussy, Ravel, Chabrier and other modern Frenchmen. But his "Hymn to Justice" is distinctly above his average work. It is well developed and logical as well as original. It has good contrasts and much use is made of a plaintive figure of three notes. But the work has not the serene majesty one would imagine in a portrayal of justice. It has passages which seem to speak of vengeance and the rather savage chorale towards its ending might suggest a Hymn of Hate. It ends seemingly with exhaustion. We were glad to see the composition heartily applauded. It was worthy of the tribute. All through this concert the enthusiasm was much above the average and recalls were astonishingly numerous.

THE PASTORAL, AGAIN.

M. Rabaud is devoting himself to the task of making Boston acquainted with a certain composer named Beethoven, but we can assure him that we have often heard this man's symphonies before and perfectly given, and we do not need them with such frequency. The first movement of the Pastoral symphony pictures joyous feelings on coming into the country, but whether it is the joy of the summer boarder or the joy of the farmer at seeing him is somewhat doubtful. As the advertisement said "fishing, bathing and picnic facilities," these are sketched in the subsequent movements. In the second movement the boarder is "by the brook." The stream has evidently been fished out judging by the length of time he stays without a single bite except that of a mosquito (oboe). He, however, solaces himself as best he can (two horns) in pre-prohibition times.

The third movement is devoted to picturing a picnic. The keen observer will notice the spread upon the grass, the driving away of the bugs, the ants that lodge themselves securely in the boarder's trousers, and finally the dance on the green. Of course, there is a heavy shower, and equally, of course, there is not an umbrella in the party. This is proved by there being nothing descriptive of an umbrella in the music, which pictures everything else. The boarder comes to a sudden resolution (shown by the resolution of the dominant into the tonic) and breathes a hymn of thanksgiving as he buys a ticket back to the city.

Of the performance of the work there is nothing new to say. No one can read anything new into the Pastoral symphony and no good conductor can fail to grasp its general effects and meaning. But M. Rabaud read the symphony very conscientiously, making every repeat, and won a triumph with it, recall following recall.

FOOTE'S MELODIC THOUGHTS.

Arthur Foote's four orchestral sketches inspired by the Rubaiyat are among the best American works which have been given at these concerts. Mr. Foote has as much contrapuntal learning as any of the natives, but he does not chase after complexities, he does not juggle with rhythms he does not strive for gigantic size nor does he make his score overwhelming to prove that he is "modern" in tone-coloring. Per contra, he leads his voices easily, he has melodic thoughts and he stops when he has delivered his message.

Photo by Press Illustrating Service

Reproduction of Bas-Relief of Arthur Foote Made by Bashka Paeva of Boston

BOSTON, Jan. 19.—It was due to the fact that her sister is a pupil of Arthur Foote that Bashka Paeva, a young Russian sculptress, recently made a bas-relief of the eminent composer, which is reproduced above. Miss Paeva, whose family came to this country but a few years ago, has studied at the Boston Art Museum with Bela Pratt, the noted sculptor, who is especially well known for his statues placed in front of the Boston Public Library.

TEACHING BEETHOVEN TO BOSTON

M. Rabaud Earnestly Trying to Acquaint Us With His Symphonies

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

THE SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

Magnard—Hymn to Justice.

Beethoven—Pastoral Symphony.

Foote—Four character pieces from "Omar

Khayyam."

Dubois—Overture to "Frithjof."

There was no soloist and from an artistic standpoint the symphony concert needs none. From a box office point of view, however, the great prima donna, the celebrated pianist, the pyrotechnical violinist, is quite essential and there never is a long waiting line when they are absent.

Magnard's martyrdom in the war has caused his music to be played more frequently than it otherwise would have been. Intrinsically it is scarcely up to the level of Debussy, Ravel, Chabrier and other modern Frenchmen. But his "Hymn to Justice" is distinctly above his average work. It is well developed and logical as well as original. It has good contrasts and much use is made of a plaintive figure of three notes. But the work has not the serene majesty one would imagine in a portrayal of justice. It has passages which seem to speak of vengeance and the rather savage chorale towards its ending might suggest a Hymn of Hate. It ends seemingly with exhaustion. We were glad to see the composition heartily applauded. It was worthy of the tribute. All through this concert the enthusiasm was much above the average and recalls were astonishingly numerous.

THE PASTORAL, AGAIN.

M. Rabaud is devoting himself to the task of making Boston acquainted with a certain composer named Beethoven, but we can assure him that we have often heard this man's symphonies before and perfectly given, and we do not need them with such frequency. The first movement of the Pastoral symphony pictures joyous feelings on coming into the country, but whether it is the joy of the summer boarder or the joy of the farmer at seeing him is somewhat doubtful. As the advertisement said "fishing, bathing and picnic facilities," these are sketched in the subsequent movements. In the second movement the boarder is "by the brook." The stream has evidently been fished out judging by the length of time he stays without a single bite except that of a mosquito (oboe). He, however, solaces himself as best he can (two horns) in pre-prohibition times.

The third movement is devoted to picturing a picnic. The keen observer will notice the spread upon the grass, the driving away of the bugs, the ants that lodge themselves securely in the boarder's trousers, and finally the dance on the green. Of course, there is a heavy shower, and equally, of course, there is not an umbrella in the party. This is proved by there being nothing descriptive of an umbrella in the music, which pictures everything else. The boarder comes to a sudden resolution (shown by the resolution of the dominant into the tonic) and breathes a hymn of thanksgiving as he buys a ticket back to the city.

Of the performance of the work there is nothing new to say. No one can read anything new into the Pastoral symphony and no good conductor can fail to grasp its general effects and meaning. But M. Rabaud read the symphony very conscientiously, making every repeat, and won a triumph with it, recall following recall.

FOOTE'S MELODIC THOUGHTS.

Arthur Foote's four orchestral sketches inspired by the Rubaiyat are among the best American works which have been given at these concerts. Mr. Foote has as much contrapuntal learning as any of the natives, but he does not chase after complexities, he does not juggle with rhythms he does not strive for gigantic size nor does he make his score overwhelming to prove that he is "modern" in tone-coloring. Per contra, he leads his voices easily, he has melodic thoughts and he stops when he has delivered his message.

No. 2 of the set seemed the most successful; in this harp and flute did excellent work and the form was of crystal clearness. Its fiery chief theme contrasted well with the gentle episode which followed it. It pictures departed glory in the Courts of Jamshyd. No. 3 was a more delicate picture, referring to the "Jug of Wine, loaf of Bread,—and Thou" which every reader recalls.

No. 4 had a beautiful horn melody, which was very well played and was very prominent in the first and last parts of the number. It was somewhat too homophonic for the excellent master of counterpoint whom we possess in Mr. Foote, but it was bound to make a success with any public and the work was applauded to the echo until the composer had risen from his seat in the audience and bowed many times.

VIKING IN KID GLOVES.

When it comes to the portrayal of the old viking, Frithjof, there is a composer named Bruch who has told his story in tones so eloquently that all other attempts seem weak beside his cantata. Dubois gives us a viking in kid gloves (No. 11s), who occasionally gets angry upon the trombones. It is a polite and gentlemanly sea-rover that we get here, in spite of the occasional explosions and the forcible chromatic ending. It is, however, good music, well-constructed even if it does not quite rise to its subject. This topic belongs to the northern composers by inheritance and we doubt whether any Gallic composer can handle it adequately.

Music in Boston

Special for The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, Massachusetts—After the performance of the twenty-first symphony concert, one is glad to commend Mr. Rabaud for several things in his conducting, and among these are:

For the first performance in Boston of the "Hymn to Justice" by Albéric Magnard, a composer little known in this country, but whose untimely passing, at the beginning of the war, has given a peculiar interest to him and his music. The work heard at this concert is lofty in spirit, well put together, and there is a most effective climax, in the shape of a chorale, at the end, prophetic, perhaps, of the time when "Justice the great peacemaker shall draw the hearts of men together." It was superbly played and should be heard again.

Also for the second performance of Arthur Foote's Four Character Pieces (after the Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám), the first performance being some seven years ago. A second performance is always welcome of any work worth doing at all, and Mr. Foote's Character Pieces improve on further acquaintance. There is ingenuity, and imagination all through, with more than a trace of real orientalism. Mr. Foote received a double portion of enthusiastic appreciation, which he well deserved, for he has done yeoman service for the cause of musical righteousness in Boston for many years.

Then one must record one of the best performances of Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony heard here in many a season. It was pastoral in the best sense, unaffected, dignified; an ideal musical picture.

Dubois' "Frithjof" overture was revived after 15 years of rest, and it proved pleasing, giving a reminder that it was written just before the younger school of French composers began their experimental search for new things, of which some have proved the worth, while others might as well have been left unsaid.

AFTER-WAR MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

"Hymn to Justice" for First Time

Here

Post

Apr. 12, 1919

BY OLIN DOWNES

Albéric Magnard's "Hymn to Justice" was performed for the first time here at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

The other compositions were Beethoven's sixth ("Pastoral") symphony; Four Character Pieces after the Rubáiyat of Omar Khayyám, and Dubois' overture to "Frithjof."

PUPIL OF D'INDY

There are different versions of the tragic story of Magnard's end. At the outbreak of the war he sent his wife and two daughters to Paris. He remained in his country home. It is said that, seeing a group of Uhlans, on Sept. 3, 1914, approaching his house he fired and killed two of the troopers. A volley was the answer and Magnard fell. Others tell it differently as regards details. Magnard was one of the most conscientious and independent of modern French composers, careless of public success, devoted to his art. Pierre de Breville said that d'Indy's two greatest works were his opera "Fervaal" and his pupil Magnard.

The "Hymn to Justice" was composed in 1902. Therefor it had nothing to do with the war. But it might have, because of its dramatic spirit and its singular significance at this time. No longer is Magnard disdainful of the people, as one might well infer from more recondite and complicated of his works. The writing is eminently direct. There is great rhythmical vigor. The themes are virile and well contrasted. The finale choral-like passage is simple and unlabored. The orchestration is not ultra refined, but it sounds. Most of the instruments are working most of the time, but they are employed with skill and without thickness or muddiness of the tone. The "Hymn to Justice" has the character of a brilliant composition for a public occasion very well done. "Magnard," said Henri Lichtenberger when this composition was first performed at Nancy in 1903, "evoked with great emotional intensity the impression of justice, the avenger and the peacemaker, warlike and formidable when arrayed against evil but redolent of peace and concord when in a final chorale she draws the hearts of men together." Nothing could have been a more fitting testimony to the composer than Mr. Rabaud's fiery performance of his work, which was received with great enthusiasm.

In the Pastorale Symphony, a work which ages, Mr. Rabaud surprised his hearers by calling attention now and again to a detail other conductors who have been heard in this city have missed, and in treating certain passages with unconventional tonal balances which were not only interesting but appeared as the intention of the composer. The reverence, enthusiasm and scholarship with which this conductor has interpreted Beethoven's music has been one of the great features of the Boston Symphony season.

It was a pleasure to hear again the music of Mr. Foote. It is simple, it is short, it says less rather than more, and all with excellent taste, with ideas developed logically and according to their deserts. Would that more composers wrote so simply, honestly and well. This entertaining music was applauded so long that the composer had several times to rise and bow his acknowledgments.

MAGNARD HYMN AT SYMPHONY

Boston Hears Impressive
Work of French Composer for First Time

FOUR CHARACTER PIECES BY FOOTE

Herald Apr. 12, 1919
The 21st concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon.

The program was as follows: Magnard, "Hymn to Justice" (first time in Boston); Beethoven, "Pastorale" Symphony in F major, No. 6; Foote, four character pieces (after the Rubáiyat of Omar Khayyám); Dubois, Overture to "Frithjof."

"Hymn to Justice" Impressive

The "Pastorale" was the fifth of Beethoven's symphonies to be played this season. Mr. Rabaud brought forth two more French composers, and in the music of Arthur Foote completed the list of our local composers, to all of whom he has paid his impartial respects.

When the Flonzaleys played the serenade from Magnard's quartet this season it seemed as if the proud and terrible event of his death in defending his home against the Germans would make more of an impression upon the world than his music. Yesterday it seemed otherwise. The "Hymn to Justice" requires no outer tragedy to emphasize its nobility, and Magnard could scarcely have left a finer monument.

To his friends it must breathe to the life the nature of this austere idealist, but susceptible artist. Justice shows an alternately grim and merciful aspect.

312

which finally ascends to the triumphant hymn. From the standpoint of style and workmanship it is sonorous, straightforward and conventional music. There is even a hint of galloping Valkyries in the strings. Common-place music has often taken similar lines. A hymn tune is only a hymn tune—unless there is a Bach or Beethoven or Franck to transfuse it with devout beauty. And Magnard may be added to the list. It is not hard to perceive in Magnard Franck via d'Indy. Not by skilful dispensation of brass did Magnard become impressive, but by the sheer force of passionate sincerity. To conceive the rugged theme which the basses give out was in itself a rare creative stroke, and in that phrase the work with three-quarters written, for songfully it unfolds of its own accord and carries all with it. Of the handful of French works which Mr. Rabaud may be eagerly thanked for acquainting us with, this is surely one, just as surely as Dubois's vapid overture to "Frithjof" is not one.

Mr. Foote's Four Pieces

Mr. Foote's four characteristic pieces are as pleasantly unpretentious as any one could wish. For the most part simple melody and accompaniment, with nice orchestral effects in plucked strings or piquant percussion, ever neat and lucid—never new. It is music that always gratefully takes the expected turn. It is neither distinctive on the one hand; nor "catchy" on the other, but keeps a fastidious middle ground. It only lightly touches orientalism now and then, but oriental or otherwise, it remains innocuous.

For some of us at least, and we may count ourselves fortunate, the Pastorale symphony is as fresh and lovely as ever, unantiquated by later effects in tempests simply because it is the marvelous and self-sufficient Pastorale symphony. Mr. Rabaud conducted it with an understanding born of his close and particular affection for the music of Beethoven. For serene music of even flow he has also an aptitude. What might have been a slight stiffness and lack of detailed clarity on some of the earlier pages rose to fine and lilting animation in the country dances and a warmly sympathetic reading in the music of the storm.

Next Week's Program

The program for next week is as follows: Cesar Franck, Symphony in D minor (repeated by request); Laparra, "A Basque Sunday poem for orchestra with pianoforte (first performance), soloist, Raoul Laparra; Glinka, "Kamarinskaya," fantasy for orchestra on two Russian folk songs; Weber, overture to "Der Freischutz."

MAGNARD'S NOBLE NEW "HYMN TO JUSTICE"

Rabaud and Orchestra Win
Long Applause

Arthur Foote Given Ovation After His Omar Khayyam Music

Geobe

Apr. 12/19

Mr Rabaud is to be thanked for bringing to its first performance here yesterday afternoon Alberic Magnard's "Hymn to Justice," op 14. Compared with his music in smaller forms—songs, arias, pieces for piano and chamber music—it is more impressive, more individual.

This score is arresting, because of its well-defined ideas, the cohesion and balance in their development and because of the deep inspirational character of the lofty and noble sentiment it embodies. With what a sense of the dramatic irony of life does one hear this "Hymn of Justice"—not a Hymn of Hate—and recall the tragic manner of the composer's death 12 years after it was written, one of his country's first defenders against the Boche.

This is such a score as we should have expected a French patriot to write who was an accomplished musician, had he composed it after the war begun, a score representing a people whose place is not one primarily of vengeance, whose Premier—his name as his acts is synonymous with mercy—can repay his would-be assassin with life and a tempered term.

Two Fundamental Themes

Magnard uses two fundamental musical themes. Out of the first, short, aggressive, belligerent, snarling voices of discord are heard at the outset. The succeeding pages seethe with violence, incrimination, conflict. Out of this embroilment emerges the chorale-like theme which speaks of peace and humanity. One era has been to destroy, the other to build, conserve, forgive. The close is one of majestic beauty with the rapt note of ecstasy and of the triumph of the spirit.

Following it, Mr Rabaud gave a performance of Beethoven's sixth symphony, which matched those of the seventh, the third, the fifth, the "Coriolanus" overture. How modern this "program" music sounded, this forerunner in many a bar of the modern symphony poem. Here was Beethoven at ease among companions, telling the story of the country festival or partaking in it, in jovial mood, untroubled for the time by any tragic conflict, except that of the passing storm, its thunder and lightning.

314

How euphonious, how clear and how delightful in the folk vein of it all. Here were the groups of merry-making, dancing peasants, German peasants, but given to innocent pastoral pleasures, and of a day long before. They were told their destiny was to be linked with the domination of the world.

The storm music as played in so dramatic a manner made one question if this actually were not music of the early 20th rather than early 19th century.

Recall Conductor Repeatedly

Mr Rabaud was recalled a number of times. When he had brought the orchestra to its feet, he was kept bowing upon the stand by the increasing applause of the audience, which spoke plainly enough the admiration in which it holds him.

Of Arthur Foote's expressive Four Character Pieces after quotations from the Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam, the last is particularly happy in suggestion of Oriental sensuousness and imagery. The theme heard in first horn—beautifully played by Mr Jaenicke—and the first stand of cellos, is richly, hauntingly exotic, and the hearer awaits its return. Has Mr Foote transcribed it into a song? If not will he not consider so doing? He was given what is an unusual reception to local composers, being obliged four times to rise from his seat on the floor and bow.

A brilliant performance of Dubois' somewhat conventional overture to "Frithjof" brought the concert to a close. It will be repeated tonight. Both concerts week after next will occur on Saturday, April 26, on account of the parade.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

INTERESTING MUSIC, BECOMINGLY PLAYED

Mr. Rabaud Finds Fresh and True Voice for Beethoven, Pastoral—A Large and Eloquent Piece by Magnard—Mr. Foote's Pleasant Suite and Applauding Neighbors—Old Dubois Resuscitated for Ten Minutes

WHEN, toward the middle of May, Mr. Rabaud, returning from Boston through Bordeaux to Paris, alights in the Gare d'Orléans—or is it the Gare Montparnasse?—his fellow-composers are in gratitude bound to assemble in numbers on the arrival-platform to salute him. Scarcely one of them writing symphonic music—old, young or of the middle generation, academic or advanced, eminent or believing himself eminent—has he overlooked in the twenty-two programmes of the Boston orchestra under his leadership. The sallow and chubby Saint-Saëns, yellow and smooth as a billiard ball should be there to greet him. Never before in a single season have so many of his pieces been played in a series of Symphony Concerts in America. Beside him may hobble the venerable Dubois now in his eighty-third year. Did he not have an inning yesterday, the first he has won in a decade or two at Symphony Hall, with his overture to the Scandinavian saga of "Frithjof"? Why should he not propose his songful motive in the clarinet for the yearning heroine, set another stalking through the violoncellos for the fated but valorous hero, and let a third thunder in two choirs for the wrath of the gods, pursuing our Frithjof? Old, safe formulas these, as safe the "working-out"—Allegro Appassionato ed Agitato—according to the good old rules applied by a skilful technician who has studied "the best models." As free from peril the measures of lamentation, the episodes of tumult. Cher Vieux! Who dares say "old hat"? Why should he not receive from his colleague of the Institute the privilege—if it is so to be named—of a hearing in Boston town? He should and he did, and for a dozen minutes an audience listened to this music by formula and process, gave it a polite round of applause—and departed.

To return to the arrival platform on that "May Night"—as composers like to entitle their pieces—of Mr. Rabaud's return to Paris. There also should be gathered the next younger generation of French music-makers—D'Indy, Fauré, Bruneau. Often has the repatriated conductor set their music in his lists. Modestly in the middle distance the eye of the imagination describes the youngest of the established composers—Ravel, Schmitt, Roger-Ducasse. Mr. Rabaud, catholically minded, has "recognized" them all. With courtesy, on the outskirts, might wait the representatives of the dead—of Debussy, Magnard, Lalo, of Franck, most of all, since our conductor has given him such place on the programmes of a season as in Boston, he never enjoyed before. And at the very door of the railway carriage—if Monsieur Ravel will let him pass and Monsieur d'Indy make a little room—should be at least an under-secretary from the Ministry of Fine Arts. Truly Mr. Rabaud has been loyal and efficient apostle with French music to the Bostonian Gentiles. There are poignées des mains, perhaps baisers according to masculine French custom. The Under-Secretary cries "Well done!" Detached voices are heard asking "How many performances?" Members of the Institute intone the melody of a new hymn to fraternity—but the eye and the ear of fancy can bear the spectacle no longer. An even-handed and discriminating man in the choice and the performance of the music of his Parisian brethren, Mr. Rabaud need dread no home-coming.

21-5

And Dubois was not the only "Vieux" of whom the conductor was considerate. Mr. Foote is no octogenarian to make a Bostonian third in a triad with Messieurs Saint-Saëns and Dubois. Indeed, he rose sprightly in his place to acknowledge the clapping of a whole audience of neighbors, bestowed not only upon the four Character-Pieces they had just heard but upon all his life and works these sixty-six years among us. The music, dating no more than twenty years back was as fresh-sounding to the ear as the composer was lively to the eye. Programmes at Symphony Hall are not over-blessed with such short, light, amusing numbers. Mr. Rabaud has diligently sought them. After seven years of silence, Mr. Foote's suite, which is of them, found voice again "at these concerts." Perhaps, it will not hereafter lie mute so long. Quatrains of Omar, as often as not celebrating the wine-cup—shameless Foote in these "dry" days!—suggested the music and more than once the composer tinges it with readily recognized but not too exotic Oriental color. Ingeniously, fancifully, he paints a tone-picture, suggests a mood by the working of melodic figures. Again a more sustained melody serves the design. In many a measure, these are the happy turns in modulation, transition, contrast, background of a well-practised composer, working con amore at a light task. Mr. Foote is as brief as though we were one of the "new men"—what an anticipating habit these old fellows have? in its modest kind his music charms, diverts; while orchestra and conductor played it as though they were sharing the pleasure of their hearers. Indeed, it was Mr. Rabaud's day for the lightly running touch and the band's day for clear, pliant, songful tone. Discerning was he in the swift, elastic pace at which he took all four movements—the episode of the storm necessarily excepted—of Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony; in the rhythmic verve and the light accent that he laid upon the music; in the easy flow that he lent to progression and climax; in the smoothness of phrasing and the limpidity of tone that he enjoined upon the orchestra and that it readily returned. Rarely did he fall into the "reverent" literalness that has been known to dull his versions of the classics; as seldom did the band fall into the raggedness of tone, the roughness of phrasing, known also to beset them in those pieces. And that, too, in a symphony in which Beethoven is prone by design or by idiosyncrasy to reiterated figures.

So played, the first division became anew fresh and sunny instrumental song, end- less in fancy; the slow division wrought afresh its charm of brookside solitude and revery, sentimental, as it should be but Gallically free from every dripping languor. The dexterous detailing of the scherzo enhanced the composer's playful fancy; the finale was not inflated into a species of congregational singing, but kept, like the rest of the symphony at Mr. Rabaud's hands, its intimacy, its lyric quality of sensation and expression.

315

The conductor not only perceived but felt; not only released the music to his hearers but clothed it with heightening fancy and brightening voice. It is not necessary to take the Pastoral Symphony too seriously; it is not even essential to believe that Beethoven wrote it to fulfill the theories and gratify the prejudices, ninety odd years later, of Monsieur d'Indy, sometimes reputed an opinionated man. Enough that it is hard to remember when the music has sounded with such voice of bright sunshine, fresh air, blue and white sky dappled woodland and flowing brook and with such illusion of the sensations these pleasures of the open breed in quickened man. Of nature and of man stirred by nature but inarticulate in his pleasure, Beethoven has made a tone-poetry, light, lyric, glowing. Down from its classic pedestal at last came the Pastoral Symphony, to sound as human as Beethoven's self when he wandered through the Vienna woods. Out of the "standard repertory," it slipped to charm afresh. Mr. Rabaud has seemed the last conductor from whom to expect this good deed. Yet he did it.

Benefactor was the leader likewise to Magnard, as yet a composer barely heard in Boston in symphonic pieces and even dreaded there by those who have made acquaintance with a fragment of his chamber music. When "The Flonzaleys" played two months ago that Serenade from a string quartet, a more meditated, a more desiccated music seemed seldom to have fallen in dry and flavorless powder from a composer's pen. Of another quality, however, was Magnard's "Hymn to Justice," as conductor and orchestra played it yesterday—the first of the composer's symphonic numbers to be heard here since the forgotten, but eloquent, "Dirge" of 1905 and Mr. d'Indy's visit. Magnard hymns the retributive power of justice in long and large measures of propulsive and pulsant energy. Magnard hymns the solace that justice may also bestow in briefer, gentler, softer colored, more songful measures. The two motives out of which, accordingly, he fertilizes the music, may not arrest the ear or wear too significant a profile. Seemingly there is Wagnerian process as well as Wagnerian color in the periods in which he develops, contrasts, enriches them. Little, however, does the hearer take thought of these shortcomings

—If shortcomings they be—before the fiery energy with which the music runs its course and the exalted voice in which it speaks Magnard's passion and imagery. As technician, as colorist, in this "Hymn to Justice," he may be this, that, or the other; but there is no hearing without clear impression that he could write nobly of the abstractions that take life in the souls and the speech of men—and music.

H. T. P.

A New Suite by Laparra, "A Basque Sunday," to Be Played at the Symphony Concerts Next Week—A Hint About the Piece—Covent Garden Becomes London's Opera House Again—Overlooked Russian Operas—Items and Opinions

AT the Symphony Concerts of next week, on Friday afternoon, April 18, and on Saturday evening, April 19, Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra will play for the first times anywhere a Suite, "A Basque Sunday," written by Raoul Laparra, the French composer, who cultivates a true music of Spain. The suite contains a significant piano-part, and here in Boston the composer will play it. How able and vivid a pianist he is, especially in this Spanish music, a little audience of Bostonians discovered last November, when, with Miss Stanley for singer, he played in Symphony Hall his cycle of Spanish songs and dances. There also they learned how interesting in itself and how graphic in impression is Mr. Laparra's music of Spain, especially of the Basque country that he knows better, deeper and more responsively than even the other Spanish provinces. Here was music that summoned atmosphere, compassed illusion, bore unmistakable mark of truthful and sympathetic imagery. For further quickening to the new Suite, a part of the Bostonian public may still recall Mr. Laparra's Spanish music-drama, "La Habanera," seen and heard at the Opera House in Russellian days, while a few may have sat before the companion-piece, "La Jota," represented some years ago at the Opéra-Comique in Paris. In brief outline of the new piece, the composer writes the following note:

The idea of the Suite is to express musically the principal episodes of a Basque holiday, viz: I. Toward the Church, which supplies a kind of aural prelude with the call of the organ and bells of the distant mass. II. At the Pelota Game, which is the national game of the Basques and takes place in the afternoon. It is expressed by a lively Scherzo. III. Before a White House gives the Andante. It relates to the rest-time which one enjoys in those ancestral but always smiling homes of the Basque country, about sunset. IV. At the Festa forms the Finale and was suggested by the dances and songs of the evening, out on the open square of the village.

As to the music, I have not aimed, in the present work, at any melodic or rhythmical use of the native folk-lore, though acquainted with it from childhood. It is rather a generalized impression received in the country. For the theme and main development were written there, while the definitive form was given to it only recently.

The other numbers upon Mr. Rabaud's programme for next week are Franck's Symphony; Glinka's Fantasia, "Korarin-skala," upon two Russian folk-songs; and Weber's overture to his opera, "Der Freischütz." With reason, Mr. Rabaud may desire to be heard in Franck's symphony with which he was eloquent last November in Cambridge and which he now "repeats by request." The Russian Fantasia, long unheard at the Symphony Concerts, will be virtually a new piece. But was it not one of the besetting sins of German conductors that they played these "hackneyed old" overtures of Weber?

SYMPHONY LOSES 35 TO LABOR UNION

Cannot Join Federation and Remain in Orchestra, Says Judge Cabot

Boston Symphony Orchestra players are at perfect liberty to join the American Federation of Musicians, but if they do they cannot remain members of Boston Symphony Orchestra, declared Judge Frederick Cabot, of the Symphony Corporation, last evening.

There is a serious difference of opinion between Judge Cabot, the American Federation of Musicians, and some of the Symphony players, since the Symphony players requested the American Federation of Musicians to come to Boston and unionize the musicians.

Speaking of the situation last night, A. E. Brenton, national organizer, said:

"There are two serious points of difference between Judge Cabot and the Federation of Musicians. The first difference is that of nationality. The federation cannot take foreigners into its membership. It insists that all its members be citizens. With the authorities of the orchestra, however, a man is hardly eligible to play in the orchestra unless he comes from some country other than the United States.

MINOR DIFFERENCE.

"The second difference is theoretical, more than real. The Symphony management insists that the orchestra leader be the sole judge as to when a man is to be discharged. We cannot agree to that, for, if we did, it would apply to all bodies of musicians all over the country. But as no member of the orchestra in Boston is ever discharged before his contract has expired, that is a very minor difference.

"So the affair resolves itself into this; if members of the Boston Symphony join the American Federation, they automatically leave that organization, for by the rules our members must play in orchestras where there are only Americans playing. If they all join then Judge Cabot says the orchestra will disband.

35 IN UNION NOW.

"As a matter of fact, thirty-five orchestra members have joined the union already. Others may join at the expiration of their contracts. The Symphony management, last season, when there was prospect of their players joining, gave them a $250 bonus and $10 a week for the Summer months, to sign their contracts immediately. They did. But it was the agitation of the American Federation of Musicians that got them that bonus, whether they realize it or not. It is probable that some other cash inducement may be offered the members this season, so that they will refuse to join. It is even possible that the management might offer the players a salary for fifty-two weeks in the year, making them able to live on a self-respecting basis all Summer, which they cannot do at present.

"The whole cause of dissatisfaction among Symphony players, that induced them to call in the union mediation, is that members of the Symphony Orchestra are used not as human beings but as machines. They are not allowed to have a grievance committee. No one complaint is listened to. In every other orchestra all over the country there is a chance given for members to air their troubles with a view to remedy.

LOWEST SALARIES.

"Boston Symphony, thirteen years ago, was the best in the country. Now it is a poor third. Now, far from paying the best salaries, it pays the lowest in the country. Our salary schedule provides for a minimum of $55 a week; the minimum in the Boston Symphony is $40. The Boston organization is a large part foreign in its membership; the New York Symphony, the New York Philharmonic and the symphony orchestras of Philadelphia and Cincinnati, are all American.

"Yet Judge Cabot solemnly assured me that he would disband the Boston Symphony before he would allow it to be run as the New York Symphony is run. This, when the Boston organization is rapidly losing ground each season."

D PROGRAMME

18, AT 2.30 P. M.

IL 19, AT 8 P. M.

Y in D minor
tro non troppo troppo
by request)

FOUR POPULAR VERSES for Orchestra
no forte, "Une Dimanche Basque," ("A Day") ("Towards the Church")
ote. ("The Pelote Game") faison Blanche. ("In front of a White At the Fair") performance.)

or Orchestra on two Russian Folk-songs aia"

to "Der Freischütz"

ist:

APARRA

in Pianoforte

The following compositions of Mr. Foote have been played at the subscription concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston:—
 1887, February 5, overture "In the Mountains," Op. 14 (first time).
 1888, April 14, overture "In the Mountains."
 1889, November 23, Suite for strings, D major, No. 2, Op. 21 (first time).
 1891, January 24, Symphonic Prologue to "Francesca da Rimini," Op. 24 (first time).
 1893, February 4, "The Skeleton in Armor," Ballad for chorus, quartet, and orchestra, Op. 28. Singers: Mrs. Marie Barnard Smith, Miss Lillian Carlsmith, George J. Parker, Clarence E. Hay (first time in Boston).
 1895, March 2, Prologue to "Francesca da Rimini."
 1896, March 7, Suite in D minor, Op. 36 (first time).
 1898, February 26, Songs with piano: Elaine's song, "Sweet is true love"; Irish Folk-song. Mrs. Henschel, soprano. The composer played the pianoforte accompaniments.
 1903, March 28, Suite in D minor, Op. 36.
 1909, April 17, Suite in E major, Op. 63, for string orchestra (first time).
 1912, April 20, Four Character Pieces, Op. 48 (first time in Boston).
 Mr. Foote's Suite for strings, Op. 12, was played in Boston at a "Popular Concert" of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, May 15, 1886.

PLEASE NOTE

The Twenty-third Matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, scheduled for Friday, April 25, coincides with the time named for the Parade of the 26th Division. Therefore this concert has been postponed until Saturday, April 26, at 2.30 p.m.

Tickets dated Friday afternoon, April 25, should be used for the concert Saturday afternoon, April 26.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1918--19.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

HENRI RABAUD, Conductor.

TWENTY-SECOND PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, APRIL 18, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, APRIL 19, AT 8 P. M.

FRANCK,

SYMPHONY in D minor
 I. Lento; Allegro non troppo
 II. Allegretto
 III. Allegro non troppo
 (Repeated by request)

LAPARRA

POEM on FOUR POPULAR VERSES for Orchestra with Pianoforte, "Une Dimanche Basque," ("A Basque Sunday")
 I. Vers l'Eglise. ("Towards the Church")
 II. Au jeu de Pelote. ("The Pelote Game")
 III. Devant une Maison Blanche. ("In front of a White House")
 IV. A la Fête. ("At the Fair")
 (First performance.)

GLINKA,

FANTASY for Orchestra on two Russian Folk-songs
 "Komarinskaia"

WEBER,

OVERTURE to "Der Freischütz"

Soloist:

RAOUL LAPARRA

Mason & Hamlin Pianoforte

Raoul Laparra

LAPARRA POEM AT SYMPHONY

Enthusiastic Audience Recalls Composer Several Times

RABAUD SYMPHONY NEXT SATURDAY

Herald — Apr. 19, 1919
By PHILIP HALE

The 22d concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Rabaud, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Franck, Symphony in D minor (by request); Laparra, first performance of "A Basque Sunday"; poem on four folk songs for orchestra and piano (Mr. Laparra, pianist); Glinka, Kamarskaya; Weber, overture to "Der Frieschuetz."

Mr. Laparra is not unknown here. His opera "La Habanera," produced in December, 1910, at the Boston Opera House, won the admiration of a few. The grim story and the absence of any celebrated singers no doubt accounted for the apathy of the general public. On some the opera exerted a peculiar fascination, by reason of the originality and the individuality of the music. Although the composer was a prix de Rome, there was no evidence that he had worshipped in any Parisian chapel, whether it had been dedicated to Massenet, Franck, d'Indy or Debussy. The music was wedded to the text; it served as commentary; it emphasized situations and strengthened moods; it was now appropriately melodramatic; it was now intensely tragic; it was always dramatic. As the murderer in the play was haunted by the spectre of his victim, slain while the habanera was sounding in the square, so the hearer after the passing years still sees the awful apparition, remembers the silent group in the second act, hears again the habanera, also the music in the church yard. The opera brought a region of Spain and a phase of Spanish life and customs vividly before the spectators. They that had traveled in Spain recognized the realism of the composer, a realism still more vivified and heightened by the necessary imaginative, poetic touch.

Mr. Laparra was also known here before yesterday by some songs heard in concert halls, by piano pieces played by Mr. Bauer, and by the concert of last November in which his "Musical Journey Through Spain" was performed by him and the singer, Mme. Helen Stanley.

Familiar with Biscay and the Biscayans, Mr. Laparra in his "Basque Sunday" has not deliberately taken thematic material from folk-tunes, he has not slavishly followed Biscayan rhythms; but, as Grieg in Norway, he has written in music his impressions, shaped and colored by the region, its people, its life and customs. As depicted by him in tones the Biscayan village would not be a desirable resort for the nervous, nor would the Biscayan Sunday win the approval of any "League for Preserving the Sabbath." Not even the sound of the organ and the mention of church in the first movement would reconcile the members of this league to the yells accompanying the game of pelote in the Scherzo, and the drinking, bawling and delirious dancing in the finale. This disapproval should not keep one from enjoyment of the music itself.

Again we find the strong and pungent note of individuality. Again we find refreshing audacity in musical treatment. Again we find boldness in melody, in the harmonious scheme, in the employment of orchestral instruments. The first movement, "Towards the Church," is curiously fashioned, with its mixture of ecclesiastical feeling and rough joy in living. The tonal picture of the Game of Pelote, which may be taken as a scherzo, is singularly picturesque, with its mad theme for the bassoon, the exciting background for the violin solo and piano. The third movement, "Before a White House," the house where the Biscayan's forefathers' fathers were born and died, has a strange, romantic beauty; full of simple sentiment expressed by the solo string quartet, sentiment that is sincere, affecting. The Finale, "At the Feast," is a frenzied page of maddening dance rhythms.

The "Poem" met immediately with favor. The audience, evidently impressed deeply by the beauty of "Before a White House," recalled the composer at the end several times and heartily.

Franck's Symphony, heard at the first concert of this season, led by Mr. Monteux, was played yesterday by request. The performance was a most impressive one; not only with respect to the more salient and familiar features of the nobly spiritual composition, but by reason of beauties in the detail that had escaped the attention of previous conductors or had been ignored by them. Yet these points were made by Mr. Rabaud, not with the air of a discoverer, but as if they must have been recognized by any intelligent and sensitive musician. Mr. Rabaud was as fortunate in entering into close communion with Franck as he has been with other composers of the French school, as he has been with Beethoven; for it is not too much to say that Beethoven at these concerts has been revealed in all his tenderness, his strength, his grandeur by Mr. Rabaud. Yesterday after the symphony he was thrice recalled, not in a perfunctory, or merely complimentary manner, but enthusiastically.

Hearing Glinka's fantasy on two Russian folk songs, one is amazed at the praise bestowed on it by Rubinstein and Tchaikowsky. No doubt Glinka himself would have rubbed his eyes if he could have read what his successors wrote about the fantasy; but let us not forget that "Kamarinskaya" was composed in 1848 and Glinka was more or less of an amateur.

Is the overture to "Der Freischuetz" aging fast? Yesterday the quartet for horns was none too well played. The once famous pizzicato for the appearance of Samiel no longer thrills me; Max playing on the clarinet does not move us. Would we be excited by the scene in the Wolf's Glen, even with the excellent pyrotechnical display at the Dresden Royal Opera House? Romanticism, though attacked at the time for its extravagance, has its day. When a romantic work is purest, it becomes classic. Witness Beethoven, Berlioz, Chopin, Schumann.

This concert will be repeated tonight. The concert of Friday next, on account of the parade, will take place on Saturday afternoon, April 26. The program of that concert and of the one in the evening of the 26th is as follows: Rabaud, Symphony No. 2, E minor (first time at these concerts); Mehul, "O des Amants, le plus fidele" (from "Ariodant") (Sophie Braslau); Bach, Polonaise, Ron-do and Badinerie from Suite in B minor, No. 2, for flute and strings (Mr. Laurent, flutist); Moussorgsky, Songs with orchestra: Death's Serenade, The Banks of the Don, On the River Dnyeper (Miss Braslau); Beethoven, overture to "Egmont."

Music in Boston ^{April 19, 1919}

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, Massachusetts—The twenty-second program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra furnished much musical thought, about equally divided between the pleasurable and the profitable. There was another opportunity given to hear the D minor symphony of César Franck, which Mr. Rabaud gave so impressively at Cambridge earlier in the season. Once again it showed its worth, if it needed to do so, and, from the manner in which it was received, there is no doubt that the symphony has come into its own. That is to say, it has a permanent niche in the standard orchestral repertory.

Then followed a work of the impressionist sort, entitled "A Basque Sunday," by Raoul Laparra. The performance was the first on any occasion. The work is for orchestra and piano, and on this occasion, the solo part was taken by the composer.

As one has often said, first impressions are not only uncertain, but as a rule unfair to the work itself. "A Basque Sunday" is in four short movements: "Toward the Church," "The Pelote Game," "In Front of a White House," and "At the Fair." The general idea of the work is to express musically the principal episodes of a Basque holiday.

To any not acquainted with the local color, the impressions must be on the musical side only. This is in no sense a piano concerto, but for the most part purely orchestral, with the piano in a very subordinate position. The orchestration is full, with addition of organ in the first movement suggestive of ecclesiastical atmosphere. One notes much noise in the first and last movements, with the third movement pleasing for its quiet mood, well contrasted. The composer knows his orchestra and the Basque idiom, but so far as the piano is concerned, it might as well have been left out, and the celesta or harp substituted. Mr. Laparra, on the creative side, shows imagination and ingenuity, with evidence of adequate training. As a pianist, he did not furnish himself with opportunity for display, but in the ensemble passages was most acceptable. Further than that one cannot judge, except to say that the performance was most brilliant.

Glinka's orchestral fantasy "Kamarinskaya," heard here several times in the early years of the symphony series, has not been heard, however, at these concerts for 25 years until the present. Probably it was new to almost every one that heard it, and proved a pleasing number. The ever-popular "Freischütz" overture made a happy ending.

SYMPHONY BY FRANCK WINS PRAISE

Elson Finds Much Merit
in Work of French
Composer

ONE OF BEST FROM FRANCE, SAYS CRITIC

Efforts of Artists Samaroff and De Gogorza Cause Favorable Comment

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

THE PROGRAM.

Franck—Symphony in D minor.
Laparra—"A Basque Sunday," orchestral poem with piano.
Soloist—M. Raoul Laparra.
Glinka—"Kamarinskaya," Russian fantasy.
Weber—"Freischuetz Overture."

Passion week is not specially noted for musical activity except in the churches, nor did the Symphony program reflect the holy season in any of its selections. We cannot have Franck's symphony too often. It is one of the finest works that has come from modern France, and we are astonished that Gounod ever dared to speak slightly of its composer. Its first movement is largely developed from a figure of three notes, a figure that has been used by Beethoven in a sonata, and gloriously by Wagner as the "Fate motif" in the Trilogy, but Franck does not plagiarize and manages to glean new effects in spite of two great composers having been before him.

There is much of sadness in the work, yet not a trace of sentimentality, nor, on the other hand, of the morose ugliness which many moderns give when they wish to express dissatisfaction with the general state of the universe.

All is dignified and attractive in spite of the great amount of learning displayed. The omission of the regular Scherzo (the work is in three movements) adds to the earnest effect, and the second movement is a slow and brooding one, like the second movement of Beethoven's seventh symphony.

The instrument of melancholy, the English Horn, is prominently used here, and it was excellently played.

READING ELOQUENT.

The reiteration of the preceding matter in the Finale makes that movement a climax and summing up of the whole work. The reading of this was eloquent, and all the skillful contrapuntal touches were finely brought out.

This symphony does not grow tiresome by repetition but gains constantly by closer acquaintance. The first movement has never been so heroically read in Boston. The work created great enthusiasm, and M. Rabaud was recalled over and over again.

M. Laparra's work suffered somewhat by comparison. Our own opinion of the matter of Spanish music must be given modestly, for we confess but a slight acquaintance with its subtleties, but Spanish musicians whom we have interviewed on the subject, doubt whether this composer gives voice to the true national spirit. This refers chiefly to his recent Spanish concert, but it may be that the Basque type is different from the spirit of more southern parts of the nation.

Picturesque it all was, beyond a doubt, and the movements were well-contrasted. The first, "to the Church," had bells and organ and a hymn-like theme, which is much interwoven later on. M. Laparra is led astray by his own ingenuity, and he cares more for skilful combinations than for preserving the folk-song spirit. He is in strong contrast with Glinka in this.

In the second movement there is a portrayal of a popular game, Pelota, and there is much spirit. Again the skill of the composer is displayed, and even canonic treatment is present, the spirit of the symphonic suite is preserved and this may be called the Scherzo.

The next movement is the slow one, a siesta before a country home, with the piano rather prominent in some parts, while the finale has the usual brilliancy of this movement in symphony.

We do not find the atmosphere well preserved in this work, any more than in the composer's "Habanera" or in his Spanish entertainment. He lacks simplicity and directness. He treats folk-themes, or what should be folk-themes, as Richard Strauss ats "Funicoli-Funicola" in his Italian symphony, so that they become artificial.

SPICY AND SHORT.

The trick of having a sudden ending is used constantly by the composer. But the whole is spicy and short. The piano is used sometimes as an orchestral color, an integral part of the score, and sometimes with solo effect. This last is especially the case in the third movement, the most poetic part of the work.

There are rhythmic juggleries in the finale, and sudden pauses in plenty of piccolo pepper, and the work is certainly exciting. M. Laparra's skill in the use of the modern orchestra was everywhere apparent.

What with the skill of the composition, and the brilliancy of his own piano playing, he certainly deserved the triple recall which came at the end of the work. With the reservations above made it certainly was worth hearing, and will probably hold its place in the modern repertoire.

After basking in the Basque music we made an excursion into Russia. Not to the Bolsheviks, but in the times when that country was somewhat happier than it is today. In the old days the moujiks (the male peasants) used to dance the Kamarinskaia by forming a large circle, hooking elbows all around and jumping, kicking and singing to a very emphatic rhythm.

Glinka, the very father of modern Russian music, has preserved this style and added another theme to it to give artistic contrast. He preserves the Russian spirit in all of its naive simplicity, which is better than M. Laparra's idealization.

The character of the work is bacchanalian, the words belonging to the dance are unquotable, and it is all a very good picture of a merry-making before vodka was abolished and the moujiks were obliged to take to drinking furniture polish.

It was given with the heartiest spirit, but can scarcely be fully appreciated by any one who is unfamiliar with the Russian peasantry and their potation capabilities. The work has a certain monotony of repetition which is not out of place in such a folkdance, but which might seem tame to those who do not understand this school.

After the Basque and the Russian folk-music, there came a touch of the German, for Weber's Freischuetz is absolutely founded on the folk-music of his native land. The dramatic touches were well attended to. The horn quartette was smoothly played, the ominous pizzicato "A" upon the contrabasses which follows, was impressive, the trombone gave its touch of evil in the midst of rejoicing, and the triumphant coda brought the concert to a successful ending. How healthy all such folk-music is in these artificial days! It will be a great boon to music when the composers begin again to draw their inspiration from the people and give their message with more simplicity.

SYMPHONY PERFORMS NEW WORK

Laparra's Suite Given

First Public Hearing

Post — Apr. 19/19
BY OLIN DOWNES

One of the most brilliant concerts of its season was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud conducting, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Rabaud outshone himself in familiar and less familiar music.

The first performance anywhere of a brilliant and fascinating suite, "A Basque Sunday," by Raoul Laparra, with the composer as pianist in the orchestra, gave additional distinction to the concert.

OFF BEATEN TRACK

Mr. Laparra is known here in Boston by his sombre and fantastical opera "La Habanera," produced at the Boston Opera House in 1911. He also gave a concert of songs and piano pieces suggested by scenes and melodies of Spain, last fall, in Symphony Hall, when he was assisted by Miss Helen Stanley, soprano. Some liked his music. Some did not. All, however, were agreed that this music had uncommon virility, conviction, physiognomy. A composer to be reckoned with.

For Mr. Laparra has ideas and convictions of his own. He has not kept to the beaten track. He has not deliberately tried to be original. But he has expressed in his music, with remarkable directness and spontaneity, his hunger, as one might say, his passion, for life. He knows it in some of its most primitive aspects. A traveller in many lands, he has lived with the people, known them, heard their songs and learned their thoughts. Spain, and the Basque country, partly through heredity, partly through circumstances, have from his early boyhood been much in his thoughts.

In Four Parts

The opera "La Habanera" was strong, ultra-romantic, and very gloomy. It had a tragic mask, like some parts of Spain, especially Castile, where this music was composed. The Basque country, according to Mr. Laparra, is a wholly different land. The people are primitive in habits and thought, but the racial temper is happier as the environment is more ingratiating than in Castile.

These four symphonic pieces performed yesterday are entitled, respectively, "Towards the Church," "The Pelote Game," "In Front of a White House" and "At the Fair." The titles are generally indicative of the nature of the musical pictures. In the first the organ peals, bells clang in a characteristically dissonant and picturesque manner, there are rude fragments of happy songs, brilliantly developed, there is joyous tumult and processional, with, finally, the chorale of the organ for a background. The Pelote game is the national game of ball, which practically replaces the bull fight with the Basques as a national pastime. The girls look on. The men shout joyously. Here is a sentence or two from the native verse which Mr. Laparra has used: "Falta, by the devil . . . have you heard arrows whistling? They were not more rapid than the ball. Yo, yo, yo . . . Do you hear how one laughs, with rage or joy? See how the players bound beneath the regard of their sweethearts. . . . And may my throat tear, may my heart burst, if only my triumphant Iriztina (cry of joy) resounds from the plain to the mountain, from the mountain to Spain, from Spain to the sea, meowing the victory of those of Anoa!"

"Before a White House"

"Before a White House" refers to the houses which dot the smiling Basque landscape, ancestral dwellings inhabited by successive generations, "the house of my father's forefathers," where the young husband parted from his parents in death, and brought his bride. "How many times," runs Mr. Laparra's epigraph, taken from a Basque poem, "how many times, like now, my little white house, has the gleam of the lamp illumined the windows since the lost epoch when the tender will of two lovers erected you on the green hill?" This is a movement of very simple, tender feeling, a nocturne of the most poetic beauty.

In this music Mr. Laparra has retained all the elemental force shown in his operas, but has struck a much more joyous note, and one certain to be popular in the best sense of the word. His pieces are short, concentrated, concise in form. They smell of the soil. They express virile, happy emotions. Not many composers of today are so capable of throwing themselves open to nature, to impressions, to human brotherhood as this one. The colors are crude and vivid; there are exuberant and fascinating rhythms, and an orchestral scheme original as it is true to the subject and individual with the composer.

Piano as Part of Orchestra

The piano is used as an orchestral instrument and not as a vehicle for soloistic display. The pungent dissonances employed on occasion, as in the second movement, suggest the wild cries of players. What is more wonderful is the manner in which the sense of actual physical movement is communicated. There is an incredible naturalness and distinctness and vitality in this music.

What it is that the composer sees or hears, or feels, that goes down on paper. There is no sense of a medium mastered, of a compromise effected between artistic formulas and truthful expression. This music is utterly original, alive, genuine, gripping. There is no room for argument.

Simple and Exquisite

Then consider the simplicity and effect with which by means of a few chords for strings, a solo violin, cello, oboe, flute, horn, piano, the exquisite eloquence of the third movement is achieved. What could be more beautiful, more homely, more of the heart? Everything is simple, fresh unsophisticated. How a composer who graduated from modern Paris contrived to remain so is a question which cannot possibly be answered. But the music is here, and it is to be hoped that Mr. Laparra will compose more orchestral works of similar quality. This element in art is a tonic needed today.

A word for the thrice admirable solo playing of Mr. Fradkin, concert master of Messrs. Malkin, Longy, Laurent and others.

The composer was recalled five times after this performance.

The Franck Symphony

Mr. Rabaud met with even a heartier reception after the performance of Franck's D Minor Symphony. Of all the performances of this work which we have heard in Boston this was at once the most noble and beautiful, because of the fineness and eloquence of the phrasing, the elasticity of pace, the rich instrumental colors, the inspired logic with which the music was set forth. Most of Franck's phrases are in themselves short-breathed, but thought was welded to thought so cunningly, instruments entered so exquisitely with their phrases—thanks to our superb solo players of the orchestra—everything had such tenderness, loftiness and grandeur of vision that the most indifferent hearer was caught up and carried away by Franck's celestial vision.

Then there was Glinka's masterpiece, the variations on the tune of the Russian dance, or wedding dance and song, "The Kamarinskaja." It is the work of a Russian Mozart and this composer in all his lifetime surely did nothing more perfect. In the fiery and romantic performance of Weber's overture to "Der Frieschutz," which brought the concert to an end; the triumphal song of Agatha did not for once sound like the noise of a circus band. The more's the pity that we have so few opportunities left of listening to Mr. Rabaud. The audience throughout the concert was quick and warm with applause of his efforts.

FIRST PERFORMANCE OF LAPARRA'S WORK

"A Basque Sunday" Proves Picturesque Score

It is difficult to say which the more compels admiration, Raoul Laparra's new score, "A Basque Sunday," played yesterday afternoon at the Symphony concert for the first time anywhere, or his own paraphrasing program for each of the four movements. This pungent, stimulating, keenly individual manner of employing as arbitrary a medium as language for an expression in a folk vein, teeming with character, reminds of Mr. Laparra's libretto for his grim and absorbing little opera, "The Habanera," heard in Boston nearly 10 years ago.

The composer, born a Frenchman, confesses to an indescribable fascination for Spain from his boyhood, a fascination which impelled repeated wanderings across the border and sojourns, living at times with the peasants and sharing their life, as during the two years he spent later in Burgos, in the heart of the Castile, where he conceived and wrote the libretto and score of his "Habanera."

Others may have been enamored of curious, sequestered or exotic forms of life, but have been halting in their efforts to translate it for the senses of those by geography, experience or predisposition strange to it.

Discloses Unusual Gifts

Having heard Mr. Laparra's one opera known here, and certain of his songs, the hearer is not surprised in this score by the unusual gifts it discloses. None could have conceived or written it but an individualist of rare imagination, one who, out of a few bold strokes, could find red blood, flaming colors, life, stark and unadorned, vividly realistic, yet not by photographic methods; one who could make his heightened speech an idealization of theirs, could portray phases of their consciousness, could set up an illusion of their thoughts and customs, not yet sandpapered by cosmopolitanism, for the mountainous character of certain Spanish provinces, tends to isolate their people and distinctive customs are preserved.

This is a different music of Spain than that of Debussy's sensuous "Iberia," than the gorgeous, at moments voluptuous, scores of Chabrier and Rimsky-Korsakoff. In the lamented Granados' piano music, himself a Spaniard, he has transcribed rhythms from native dances. Laparra denies an attempt at such literal translation, and has made his purpose rather to reflect impressions gathered from the Basque folk.

Mr. Laparra has taken four mottoes from popular songs and from their varied moods evolved literary masterpieces in the nature of scenarios, as graphic and pictorial as the art of the Spanish Goya, each a phase of the Basque Sunday holiday. They are:

1—"Toward the Church," in which finally the participants enter the edifice and join in the service with the organ, leaving the door open behind us, so that our mingled songs may escape, awakening the dead and hastening the step of the living lingering on the road," this last a typical conceit, reflecting the rugged invention of this man's poetic mind.

"At the Game of Pelote"

2—Scherzo: "At the Game of Pelote"—the Basque popular pastime.

3—Andante: "Before the White House, relating to the time of rest that one enjoys in those ancestral, always smiling homes of the Basque country, about sunset."

4—"At the Feast—Oh then! What a Sabbath, Mme. Marie! Is it the tambourine of the fat chiripi that I hear or a hog's head that one smashes?"

The patrician, pastoral beauty of the song of the slow movement, sung by string quartet and all, and the staggering contrast of the final orgy, ribald and profane, superbly sensual yet never common, are recollections of what would seem to have been a sympathetic and brilliant performance.

Mr. Laparra, who played admirably the music he has given to the piano, purely as an ensemble instrument even as organ and celesta, was recalled again and again with enthusiasm.

Mr. Rabaud is said to have played Franck's symphony by request. The choice was a fortunate one. It only proves its undying beauty by repetitions, and was befitting the day, as music symbolizing the spirit of life as perpetual, recreative, triumphant. Mr. Rabaud's performance was one of nobility and understanding.

The "Kamarinskaya" fantasy on the two Russian folk songs, the marriage song and the dance, by Glinka, who blazed a noble path for his disciples and Russian compatriots, deserves more than a passing word as a prophesying score.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

INTERESTING MUSIC; ELOQUENT PERFORMANCE

Forebodings Over Franck, Even with Mr. Rabaud at His Warmest—Weber in Romantic Voice — Glinka Piquant and Amusing—Mr. Laparra's Novel, Graphic and Imaginative Suite, "A Basque Sunday"

ONCE upon a time the fourth, fifth and sixth symphonies of Chaikovsky, his fantasias, "Romeo and Juliet" and "Francesca da Rimini," one and another of his suites and concertos were played often at Symphony Hall. Mr. Paur, Mr. Gericke and in measure Mr. Fiedler lavished their abilities as conductors upon this music; year after year audiences heard it gladly; symphonies, fantasias, suites were all frequent "repertory pieces." Yet nowadays Chaikovsky's name appears seldom upon the programmes of the Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Muck occasionally inscribed it there—from a sense of duty; Mr. Rabaud has written it on none of his lists. By common and seemingly justifiable report, both the German and the French conductor thought poorly of the Russian's pieces; while the common presumption went that "nobody but a few old ladies" cared to hear them. By many a sign the presumption was and is unwarranted; perhaps Mr. Monteux, next season, will courageously brush it away. None the less, it is easy to discover the source of a mistaken belief. Chaikovsky's music had become stale; it had indeed been played so often at the Symphony Concerts that discerning and exacting listeners heard only its shortcomings and conventions, were deaf to its merits and individualities. A Chaikovsky, morbid of mood, neurotic of feeling, obscured the Chaikovsky of sensibility, imagination and vision. A Chaikovsky of dripping and repetitious melodies, of boisterous contrasts and climaxes, of rhythmic furies, over-shadowed the Chaikovsky of passion in song, of power in the manipulation of orchestral masses and instrumental color. And so his music descended to its present low and neglected estate, because too frequent performance had stripped it of glamour and illusion.

Thought of Chaikovsky's undeserved fate recurred yesterday afternoon when for a second time within one season Franck's symphony led the programme. In recent years and as modern symphonies go, it has been played at Symphony Hall oftener than any other. Dr. Muck admired it warmly, was eloquent with it. Mr. Monteux chose it last autumn for his first pair of concerts. Mr. Rabaud essayed it last autumn in Cambridge, repeated it in other cities, chose it for the concerts of yesterday and today. In recent years again, Franck's symphonic music, in proportion to its extent, has had large and recurring place in the active repertory of the orchestra. Whatever the piece, whatever the occasion, audiences have heard it intently, applaudively, especially when the chosen number happened to be this symphony in D minor. There was not a sign on Friday that it was stalling upon ears thrice and four times familiar with the substance, the course, the manner of the music.

Yet the foreboding would come that the fate of Chaikovsky overdone might sooner or later be the fate—for a while—of Franck over-repeated at the Symphony Concerts. He is no Bach, no Beethoven to withstand any and all vicissitudes. Superior he is to the Russian in the quality of his musical thought, the scope of his musical imagination, the depths and the heights of his feeling, the texture of his workmanship. Yet in this symphony Franck has his clear idiosyncrasies of procedure—the full-throated climax, for example, falling abruptly away into the voice of a single piercing melody; modulations, progressions, colorings that under much repetition tend to become mannerisms. Again the Franckian passion that pervades the music—the insistent aspiration, the reiterated ascents from tonal shadow into tonal radiance—is as distinctive and dominant as many a mood that possesses Chaikovsky and permeates one and another of his symphonies. Not always is it possible for the listener to respond to the relatively narrow, the highly intensified, the frequently pletistic cast of Franck's spirit. Human nature is prone to search out the shortcomings of that with which it is intimate, and Franck's symphony in D minor is now more familiar than any other in the modern repertory of the Symphony Orchestra.

To write these things is not to take away one jot from the eloquence of the performance that Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra achieved. In only one other symphony of the season, the fifth of Beethoven, has he attained to such boldness of outline, sweep of progress, power of cumulation, largeness of phrase and might of period. Once more he led as with a personal passion for the music, a passion he would have his hearers share. Like Mr. Monteux last autumn

he took the music at a quicker pace than is German wont with it; but less than Mr. Monteux he dwelt upon chiselled details. Rather, Mr. Rabaud was all for the propulsive power, the ardent ascent, the deep glow of the music. Widely he stretched Franck's canvas; largely and lucidly he laid upon it Franck's design; richly he colored it; magnificently he marshalled its progress; cleanly and sharply, he sounded its contrasts. It is hard to remember when the recurring and dominant motive of the symphony has so penetrated the ear and touched the heart; when the first movement has risen so passionately and powerfully from darkness into light; when the finale has sung with such tonal might and radiance. The tenderer, the more fanciful beauty of the middle divisions did not evade Mr. Rabaud, since, when he is stirred, he commands the gentleness as well as the strength of power; but it was the exaltation of the music that he most unfolded, that he best sustained. The orchestra, the audience felt the heat of the conductor's will with the symphony. It made the music molten; it burned away, for the instant, every sensation but that of Franck's beauty, power and passion. With many a music Mr. Rabaud is slow to kindle or kindles not at all. Once fired, however, he has been conductor in two symphonies, of no mean eloquence.

In the vein, moreover, was Mr. Rabaud through one of the most interesting and stimulating concerts of the year. As Shylock noted three centuries ago, there is no accounting for the aversions of men, and some there are who in these days of grace cannot abide the three overtures of Weber. The celebrated chord in the overture to "Oberon" only rasps their nerves; there is no magic for them in the vaporous measures wrought into the overture to "Euryanthe"; the horns—and they were indifferently played yesterday—at the beginning of the overture to "Der Freischütz," weave no spell of romance to call them; and charm as did Mr. Sand on Friday, they hear unmoved the clarinet invoking the dreamy Agatha. For them the Weberian flourish at the end of all three overtures is no unfurling of the many-colored banner of romance, no sounding of its trumpets, but only a contrived excitement of the theatre. There is no disputing over tastes, especially when those tastes have become aversions; but to the minority—or maybe the majority—to whom these overtures of a Weber remain an ever-renewed pageant of music and pageant of romance, there was delight in Mr. Rabaud's version of the prelude to "Der Freischütz." He was eloquent with Weber yesterday; he was eloquent with Liszt a week ago. Both are quasi-Wagnerian voices; yet a scruple that it is easy both to regret and respect keeps him from music in which he would surely shine.

And when, until yesterday, has music by Glinka been heard at a Symphony Concert? To the younger, to the middle generation in the audience, his resurrected fantasia, "Kamarinskaya" might plausibly have been labelled "New: First Time," written though it was in 1848. Both have come to expect their Russian music opulent with the colorings of Rimsky-Korsakov, nervous with the tremors of Chaikovsky, stark and drastic with the force and the truth of Musorgsky. "Kamarinskaya" is a thin music beside Rimsky's. Not one nor two Russian folk-songs can launch Glinka into either Chaikovsky's oozing melody or spurring rhythm. The composer of "Boris" may plausibly have believed this fantasia no more than conventional music-making. Yet here are two of the Russian folk-tunes that in their kind and degree are the voice of Musorgsky's people; here are the native springs of which Chaikovsky said Russian music drank; and here are the alternations of two tunes and certain contrapuntal ingenuities not unknown in the practice of the author of "Antar" and "Sadko." Truly, Glinka was the forerunner of them all—not only in the operas that Americans never hear like "A Life for the Tsar"—not the Soviet—or "Russian and Ludmilla," but also in these occasional symphonic pieces. All of which rambling leads neither here nor there for most of those hearing "Kamarinskaya" yesterday with interested and pleased ears. Enough for them that both the bridal song and the dance tune were fresh and piquant and that Glinka kept them in lively play and alternation. Agreed that "Kamarinskaya" must not be resurrected too often.

To everyone and in the literal sense of the words "New: First Time" was Mr. Laparra's suite, "A Basque Sunday," or as he prefers to call it, "Poem on Four Folk-Verses for Orchestra and Piano-forte." It was pleasant so to hear conductor and band producing the newest music of a deserving composer, to hear him taking the piano part, to see him receiving the hearty and repeated plaudits of the audience. For the Symphony Concerts should be no mere museum of music, but channel for voices freshly speaking in it. Already these columns have set the Basque background to Mr. Laparra's suite and recited the poems that are programme to it. In actual hearing the first division—"Toward the Church"—is tone-picturing of the breaking of a bright dawn, of chiming bells calling to the mass, of the glad some Basque spirit on the fête-day, the holiday of the week. Using the thin, gleaming textures, the incisive harmonies of the finer music of our day, Mr. Laparra is at first imaginative, pictorial, atmospheric. The music thickens, warms, glows and the imagination of the hearer catches the full-blooded Basque life, while his musical ear in the stricter sense of the words perceives

the glinting piano part. Every measure tells.

Then the sports of the day. First the game of pelota, with the ball flying back and forth along the wall of the court, with the spectators crying encouragement or derision upon the players. What suggestion for a scherzo and Mr. Laparra has not missed his chance! The music races and slithers along its course, parting and meeting, twisting, turning, inverting itself, quivering with the excitements of the game, crackling with the voices of the spectators. The tassel quirs; the first violin runs in and out; the piano keeps it brilliant company. Rhythm and motion, color and tumult animate the tone-picturing. Louder, sharper beats the music of the final division, the festa of the evening in the village square. A primitive folk are these Basque villagers and roughly rhythmized is the motif of their revels. There is wine in their heads now; their bodies begin to tingle; in a second motif is hint of that devil's dance, the fandango. But Mr. Laparra would not be French composer and French composer of the new generation did he not have logic in his frenzies. What is the music running in the head of the quieter bystanders? No other than that which took them to mass in the morning, sounding against the riotous merry-making, rounding, unifying the whole, renewing at the end the atmosphere of the beginning.

Here Mr. Laparra writes with imagination as well as with ingenuity. Imagination serves him again and sentiment colors it when he writes his songful "poem" of the Basque love of home—of "the white houses," their own, their forefathers', their children's and their children's children's. The measured, musing, simple-hearted music charms. The strings shimmer it duskily; the piano seems to silver it. There is poetic impulse, poetic impression in the low-voiced "poem." . . . So runs in Mr. Laparra's graphic or glamouring tones a Basque Sunday. "How different," observed the British matron as she emerged from the Russian Ballet's "Cleopatra"—"how different from the home life of our dear Queen!" How different likewise the Sunday of the Basques from that quasi-penal institution, the New England Sabbath—as different as is Mr. Laparra's suite from an evangelical psalm-tune.

H. T. P. to

Soloist

SOPHIE BR

SEE CHANGE OF DAY FOR AFTERNOON CONCERT

Hall.

Picasso's researches have much to say in the end the atmosphere of the beginning. Lartionov decomposes his animals into shapes of an almost geometrical simplicity, and then recomposes those shapes so that they become not only the animal, but the animal as expressive of the human passions which Jules Renard's sympathetic imagination read into their behavior. Take as an example the Peacock. Here is Jules Renard:

Il va sûrement se marier aujourd'hui.
Ce devait être pour hier. En habit de gala, il était prêt. Il n'attendait que sa fiancée. Elle n'est pas venue. Elle ne peut tarder.
Glorieux, il se promène avec une allure de prince indien et porte sur lui the present examples of their art ve carried their ideas a stage further in "Children's Tales" the general of each scene is admirably varied. scene of the witch, Kikimora, there almost crude vehemence of color sets just the right key by niscence of Russian peasant art and i's toys. The color here is treated ly and, as it were, half ironically. scene of the Swan Princess all is l to an almost monochrome scheme ve greys, pale dull blues and ochres a greenish light. And here as so he took the music at a quicker pace than is German wont with it; but less than Mr. Monteux he dwelt upon chiselled details. Rather, Mr. Rabaud was all for the propulsive power, the ardent ascent, the deep glow of the music. Widely he stretched Franck's canvas; largely and lucidly he laid upon it Franck's design; richly he colored it; magnificently he marshalled its progress; cleanly and sharply, he sounded its contrasts. It is hard to remember when the recurring and dominant motive of the symphony has so penetrated the ear and touched the heart; when the first movement has risen so passionately and powerfully from darkness into light; when the finale has sung with such tonal might and radiance. The tenderer, the more fanciful beauty of the middle divisions did not evade Mr. Rabaud, since, when he is stirred, he commands the gentleness as well as the strength of power; but it was the exaltation of the music that he most unfolded, that he best sustained. The orchestra, the audience felt the heat of the conductor's will with the symphony. It made the music molten; it burned away, for the instant, every sensation but that of Franck's beauty, power and passion. With many a music Mr. Rabaud is slow to kindle or kindles not at all. Once fired, however, he has been conductor in two symphonies, of no mean eloquence.

In the vein, moreover, was Mr. Rabaud through one of the most interesting and stimulating concerts of the year. As Shylock noted three centuries ago, there is no accounting for the aversions of men, and some there are who in these days of grace cannot abide the three overtures of Weber. The celebrated chord in the overture to "Oberon" only rasps their nerves; there is no magic for them in the vaporous measures wrought into the overture to "Euryanthe"; the horns—and they were indifferently played yesterday—at the beginning of the overture to "Der Freischütz," weave no spell of romance to call them; and charm as did Mr. Sand on Friday, they hear unmoved the clarinet invoking the dreamy Agatha. For them the Weberian flourish at the end of all three overtures is no unfurling of the many-colored banner of romance, no sounding of its trumpets, but only a contrived excitement of the theatre. There is no disputing over tastes, especially when those tastes have become aversions; but to the minority—or maybe the majority—to whom these overtures of a Weber remain an ever-renewed pageant of music and pageant of romance, there was delight in Mr. Rabaud's version of the prelude to "Der Freischütz." He was eloquent with Weber yesterday; he was eloquent with Liszt a week ago. Both are quasi-Wagnerian voices; yet a scruple that it is easy both to regret and respect keeps him from music in which he would surely shine.

And when, until yesterday, has music by Glinka been heard at a Symphony Concert? To the younger, to the middle generation in the audience, his resurrected fantasia, "Kamarinskaya" might plausibly have been labelled "New: First Time," written though it was in 1848. Both have come to expect their Russian music opulent with the colorings of Rimsky-Korsakov, nervous with the tremors of Chaikovsky, stark and drastic with the force and the truth of Musorgsky. "Kamarinskaya" is a thin music beside Rimsky's. Not one nor two Russian folk-songs can launch Glinka into either Chaikovsky's oozing melody or spurting rhythm. The composer of "Boris" may plausibly have believed this fantasia no more than conventional music-making. Yet here are two of the Russian folk-tunes that in their kind and degree are the voice of Musorgsky's people; here are the native springs of which Chaikovsky said Russian music drank; and here are the alternations of two tunes and certain contrapuntal ingenuities not unknown in the practice of the author of "Antar" and "Sadko." Truly, Glinka was the forerunner of them all—not only in the operas that Americans never hear like "A Life for the Tsar"—not the Soviet—or "Russian and Ludmilla," but also in these occasional symphonic pieces. All of which rambling leads neither here nor there for most of those hearing "Kamarinskaya" yesterday with interested and pleased ears. Enough for them that both the bridal song and the dance tune were fresh and piquant and that Glinka kept them in lively play and alternation. Agreed that "Kamarinskaya" must not be resurrected too often.

To everyone and in the literal sense of the words "New: First Time" was Mr. Laparra's suite, "A Basque Sunday," or as he prefers to call it, "Poem on Four Folk-Verses for Orchestra and Piano." It was pleasant so to hear conductor and band producing the newest music of a deserving composer, to hear him taking the piano part, to see him receiving the hearty and repeated plaudits of the audience. For the Symphony Concerts should be no mere museum of music, but channel for voices freshly speaking in it. Already these columns have set the Basque background to Mr. Laparra's suite and recited the poems that are programme to it. In actual hearing the first division—"Toward the Church"—is tone-picturing of the breaking of a bright dawn, of chiming bells calling to the mass, of the glad some Basque spirit on the fête-day, the holiday of the week. Using the thin, gleaming textures, the incisive harmonies of the finer music of our day, Mr. Laparra is at first imaginative, pictorial, atmospheric. The music thickens, warms, glows and the imagination of the hearer catches the full-blooded Basque life, while his musical ear in the stricter sense of the words perceives

the glinting piano part. Every measure tells.

Then the sports of the day. First the game of pelota, with the ball flying back and forth along the wall of the court, with the spectators crying encouragement or derision upon the players. What suggestion for a scherzo and Mr. Laparra has not missed slithers, ing, twi, ering w cracklin. The has in and company tumult a sharper sion, the lage squ Basque the moti their h tingle; I devil's d parra w French did he n is the i quleter which t soundin rounding the end

Here tion as tion ser it when the Bas houses, children The me sic char ily; the poetic I low-voic Laparra Basque served from tl "how d dear Q Sunday penal b bath—as from an

From the Celebrated Portrait by Repin

SEE CHANGE OF DAY FOR AFTERNOON CONCERT

Raoul Louis Felix Emile Mary Laparra showed musical instinct at an early age, so that his family was alarmed by his precociousness. He took pianoforte lessons when he was six years old; at the age of eleven he entered the Paris Conservatory, where his teachers were Diémer, Lavignac, Massenet, Gedalge. In 1900, on account of his health he was sent to Spain, after he had taken several prizes. He made Burgos his home and there composed his "Habanera." Two years afterwards he returned to the Conservatory. In 1903, a pupil of Gabriel Fauré, he was awarded the first grand prix de Rome. He not only lived in Rome; he travelled in Greece, Turkey, Armenia. In 1906 he visited Bayreuth. "I am nomadic in my habits," said Mr. Laparra to a reporter. "When I was a mere child I used to gallop on horseback across the Spanish frontier and ramble among the Pyrenees. Sometime in the long ago my ancestors lived in Spain, and although I am French I know that I am also Iberian in my mental makeup. The scientists call it atavism; be it what it may, it seems that from my earliest days I knew that I would find my true inspiration in Spain." In 1907 he married Miss Mary Sharafelt of Omaha, Neb. In 1913 Mr. Laparra came to the United States under the auspices of the French Government to study the landmarks of the early Spanish settlers on the Pacific Coast. He sojourned in California, Arizona, and Mexico.

*"The Basque dances were Salic and singular; the Zortico, Zortizo, or 'evolution of light,' consists of two parts, la danza real, the opening, and the arrin arrin, or the conclusion. This is largely capered at Azpeitia to the sounds of rude fifes, tambourines, and a sort of flageolet, el silbato, which resembles those of the Pifferari at Rome; and is probably equally antique. The Carrica is a dance performed in the streets; the Espata danza is a remnant of the primitive Tripudium of the Iberians."—Richard Ford in "Handbook for Travellers in Spain" (2d Ed., London, 1847).—P. H.

Into Boston Newly Troop The Basques

Inans. — Apr. 17, 1917.
Music of Racial Setting and Suggestion in Laparra's Suite, "A Basque Sunday," Novel Piece at the Symphony Concert

Tomorrow

IN the heart of the Pyrenees, between France and Spain proper, there lies a district known as the Basque country, comprising three provinces with six hundred thousand inhabitants. Politically the Basques belong to Spain, though not too whole-heartedly; spiritually they belong to the Jesuits; socially they belong to themselves, and indomitably so; historically they belong to whatever man can write their history; but this man's name has not yet been published to the world. The Basques themselves believe that they are the only pure-blooded descendants of those primitive Iberians from whom all Spain claims a more or less interrupted pedigree; and there is less definite evidence to assail this belief than one can muster, say, to prove that the moon is not made of green cheese.

Of Science and Skulls

Modern science is a marvellous thing. Since the invention of accuracy in the late seventies by the Germans, conjecture has disappeared from scientific investigation—at least, so we are told—and every scientist worthy the name confines himself to demonstrable truth. The result of this adoption of infallibility by science just as religion had dropped it, is that a mere layman, with no laboratory to support his mere reason, almost feels it his duty to believe all that the scientists tell him, even when they contradict themselves and one another, as they usually do. It appears so nearly hopeless to question any scientist, unless one is another bigger, better, and busier scientist. The Basque problems, however, are still among the few open questions that the experts have left us.

is very short of Verba and almost totally

...ed nationality were
...e wise men assured
...the skull is all-im-
...er attributes merely
...assured that "unit
...with certain physi-
...ing which the shape
...most significant, and
...traits" do not blend,
...er, usually in favor
...ype, we should jeal-
...y of our race from
...hich is no mixture,
...ernus. At the same
...that all the impor-
...lessly mixed as to
...ft to judge for our-
...humanity has been
...savagery without the
...mittee.
...re remarkably true to
...pected from their
...g and remaining at
...they are excellent
...thropologist, for they
...skull-shape. Unfor-
...nds himself in the
...yman who, on seeing
...first time, had 'to
...sense of perception
...ain't no sech ani-
...white men's skulls
...with faces to match,
...with faces to match.
...the other hand, is
...he top, with a narrow
...rding to rule, nobody
...a skull, but here it
...s. As the broad part
...neighboring Béarnaise
...as the narrow type of
...tures does not belong
...at all, one is about
...explain the type as a
...race. There is a very
...lagnon," to be found
...rance, which has the
...the Basque—a skull
...broad at the cheek-
...lagnon has left prehis-
...lf, as the Basque has

...but on the other
...e infected to an
...even to the point
...endings to indicate
...persons or things
...e should use whole
...ll these traits are
...very primitive lan-
...we are no nearer
...the Basques; their
...has much in com-
...an tribes; their de-
...recall the language
...r compound words
...hose of the North
...range that the wild-
...advanced to account
...t they are the de-
...mitive Iberians is
...re these Iberians?
...were African Ber-
...will have them Tar-
...ds." Some authori-
...s and wander with
...face of the globe.
...fferent accounts as
...he Lapps, the Rus-
...e North American
...Egyptians of old,
...cient and now long-
...few survivors of
...the lost tribes of
...entions several of
...le them, derives the
...ad-headed Béarnais
...Mediterraneans by
...oses of their claim
...he falls to explain
...their heads to those
...w a type "mixed"
...r mix can become
...comparatively recent
...ne possessed of a
...othing in common
...bors, but much in
...itive languages of
...ribes; and he ends
...asiasm which leads
...acquired traits can
...lity.

ounds

...tly quit soliloquizing,
...Basque skull, we are
...studying the Basque
...a tradition that the
...that spoken by all
...confusion of tongues
...t is the case, the rise
...n is not so difficult to
...ust be understood to
...herto malignant event.
...sques all go to heaven,
...e hid behind a door
...ng to learn their lan-
...success. The language

...f showing what a
...t the Basques have
...gentry. Apparently
...ating to travellers,
...experienced them
...charm in glowing
...ntly hospitable to
...migrants and im-
...ences. Their com-
...bal sort; they are
...ey have many old
...fuse to relinquish,
...reveal that origin
...ds of the ethnolo-
...are sturdy, self-

Raoul Louis Felix Emile Mary Laparra showed musical instinct at an early age, so that his family was alarmed by his precociousness. He took pianoforte lessons when he was six years old; at the age of eleven he entered the Paris Conservatory, where his teachers were Diémer, Lavignac, Massenet, Gedalge. In 1900, on account of his health he was sent to Spain, after he had taken several prizes. He made Burgos his home and there composed his "Habanera." Two years afterwards he returned to the Conservatory. In 1903, a pupil of Gabriel Fauré, he was awarded the first grand prix de Rome. He not only lived in Rome; he travelled in Greece, Turkey, Armenia. In 1906 he visited Bayreuth. "I am nomadic in my habits," said Mr. Laparra to a reporter. "When I was a mere child I used to gallop on horseback across the Spanish frontier and ramble among the Pyrenees. Sometime in the long ago my ancestors lived in Spain, and although I am French I know that I am also Iberian in my mental makeup. The scientists call it atavism; be it what it may, it seems that from my earliest days I knew that I would find my true inspiration in Spain." In 1907 he married Miss Mary Sharafelt of Omaha, Neb. In 1913 Mr. Laparra came to the United States under the auspices of the French Government to study the landmarks of the early Spanish settlers on the Pacific Coast. He sojourned in California, Arizona, and Mexico.

* "The Basque dances were Salic and singular; the Zortico, Zortizo, or 'evolution of light,' consists of two parts, la danza real, the opening, and the arrin arrin, or the conclusion. This is largely capered at Azpeitia to the sounds of rude fifes, tambourines, and a sort of flageolet, el silbato, which resembles those of the Pifferari at Rome; and is probably equally antique. The Carrica is a dance performed in the streets; the Espata danza is a remnant of the primitive Tripudium of the Iberians."—Richard Ford in "Handbook for Travellers in Spain" (2d Ed., London, 1847).—P. H.

Into Boston Newly Troop The Basques

Trans. — Apr. 17, 1917.
Music of Racial Setting and Suggestion in Laparra's Suite, "A Basque Sunday," Novel Piece at the Symphony Concert Tomorrow

IN the heart of the Pyrenees, between France and Spain proper, there lies a district known as the Basque country, comprising three provinces with six hundred thousand inhabitants. Politically the Basques belong to Spain, though not too whole-heartedly; spiritually they belong to the Jesuits; socially they belong to themselves, and indomitably so; historically they belong to whatever man can write their history; but this man's name has not yet been published to the world. The Basques themselves believe that they are the only pure-blooded descendants of those primitive Iberians from whom all Spain claims a more or less interrupted pedigree; and there is less definite evidence to assail this belief than one can muster, say, to prove that the moon is not made of green cheese.

Of Science and Skulls

Modern science is a marvellous thing. Since the invention of accuracy in the late seventies by the Germans, conjecture has disappeared from scientific investigation—at least, so we are told—and every scientist worthy the name confines himself to demonstrable truth. The result of this adoption of infallibility by science just as religion had dropped it, is that a mere layman, with no laboratory to support his mere reason, almost feels it his duty to believe all that the scientists tell him, even when they contradict themselves and one another, as they usually do. It appears so nearly hopeless to question any scientist, unless one is another bigger, better, and busier scientist. The Basque problems, however, are still among the few open questions that the experts have left us.

is very short of verbs and almost totally

We used to believe that language, cursed nationality were the wise men assured the skull is all-important attributes merely assured that "unit with certain physical which the shape most significant, and traits" do not blend, ner, usually in favor type, we should jealousy of our race from which is no mixture, vernus. At the same that all the imporelessly mixed as to ft to judge for our humanity has been savagery without the amitte. re remarkably true to xpected from their g and remaining at they are excellent hropologist, for they skull-shape. Unforinds himself in the yman who, on seeing first time, had to sense of perception ain't no sech ani white men's skulls with faces to match, with faces to match. the other hand, is he top, with a narrow dding to rule, nobody h a skull, but here it s. As the broad part ighboring Béarnaise as the narrow type of tures does not belong at all, one is about explain the type as a race. There is a very lagnon," to be found rance, which has the the Basque—a skull broad at the cheek-lagnon has left prehislf, as the Basque has

ounds

ly quit soliloquizing, a Basque skull, we are studying the Basque a tradition that the that spoken by all confusion of tongues it is the case, the rise n is not so difficult to ust be understood to herto maligned event. sques all go to heaven, e hid behind a door ng to learn their language. The language s, but on the other be inflected to an even to the point endings to indicate persons or things ve should use whole ll these traits are very primitive lan we are no nearer the Basques; their has much in com-an tribes; their de-recall the language r compound words those of the North range that the wild-advanced to account t they are the de-mitive Iberians is re these Iberians? were African Ber-vill have them Tar-ds." Some authori-s and wander with face of the globe. fferent accounts as the Lapps, the Rus-e North American Egyptians of old, cient and now long-few survivors of the lost tribes of nentions several of e them, derives the ad-headed Béarnais Mediterraneans by poses of their claim e fails to explain their heads to those w a type "mixed" r mix can become mparatively recent ne possessed of a othing in common bors, but much in itive languages of tribes; and he ends isiasm which leads acquires traits can lity.

f showing what a t the Basques have gentry. Apparently ating to travellers, experienced them charm in glowing ntly hospitable to mmigrants and im-ences. Their com-bal sort; they are ey have many old fuse to relinquish, reveal that origin ds of the ethnolo-y are sturdy, self-

Raoul Louis Felix Emile Mary Laparra showed musical instinct at an early age, so that his family was alarmed by his precociousness. He took pianoforte lessons when he was six years old; at the age of eight he entered the Paris Conservatory, where his teachers were Lavignac, Massenet, Gedalge. In 1900, on account of his he was sent to Spain, after he had taken several prizes. He made his home and there composed his "Habanera." Two years after he returned to the Conservatory. In 1903, a pupil of Gabriel Fauré, he was awarded the first grand prix de Rome. He not only won the prix de Rome; he travelled in Greece, Turkey, Armenia. In 1906 he was at Bayreuth. "I am nomadic in my habits," said Mr. Laparra to a reporter. "When I was a mere child I used to gallop on horseback across the Spanish frontier and ramble among the Pyrenees. At that time in the long ago my ancestors lived in Spain, and although I am French I know that I am also Iberian in my mental make-up. As the scientists call it atavism; be it what it may, it seems that in my earliest days I knew that I would find my true inspiration in Spain. In 1907 he married Miss Mary Sharafelt of Omaha, Neb. Mr. Laparra came to the United States under the auspices of the French Government to study the landmarks of the early Spanish civilization on the Pacific Coast. He sojourned in California, Arizona, and

* "The Basque dances were Salic and singular; the Zortico, Zortizo, or 'evolution' consists of two parts, la danza real, the opening, and the arrin arrin, or the conclusion. It capered at Azeitia to the sounds of rude fifes, tambourines, and a sort of flageolet, and resembles those of the Pifferari at Rome; and is probably equally antique. The Carru performed in the streets; the Espata danza is a remnant of the primitive Tripudium of the Richard Ford in "Handbook for Travellers in Spain" (2d Ed., London, 1847).—P. H.

Easter Styles

t f in ce is nd
 3.00
 T
 s
 I will uglas ellent retail d the W.L. hthe
 here.
 York

BOYS' Best in $3.00 $2

CAUTIC

Before you buy
W. L. Douglas na
the retail price is s on the bottom a inside top facing.
stamped price ha mutilated.

BEWARE OF F

Douglas
park St., 358.

BOSTON:

ington St (opp Frank

We used to believe that language, customs and long-continued nationality were signs of race, until the wise men assured us that the shape of the skull is all-important, and these other attributes merely accidental. We are assured that "unit traits" of character go with certain physical peculiarities, among which the shape of the skull is the most significant, and that, since these "unit traits" do not blend, but eliminate each other, usually in favor of the less civilized type, we should jealously guard the purity of our race from that "mixed blood" which is no mixture but a descent into Avernus. At the same time we are assured that all the important nations are hopelessly mixed as to race, besides being left to judge for ourselves how, if at all, humanity has been able to emerge from savagery without the aid of a Eugenics Committee.

Now, the Basques are remarkably true to type, as might be expected from their habit of intermarrying and remaining at home; at first sight they are excellent material for the anthropologist, for they have even a typical skull-shape. Unfortunately the expert finds himself in the position of the countryman who, on seeing a camel for the first time, had 'to soothe his outraged sense of perception by protesting, "Ther' ain't no sech animal." Well-ordered white men's skulls are long and narrow with faces to match, or broad and square with faces to match. The Basque skull, on the other hand, is broad and square at the top, with a narrow face and chin. According to rule, nobody has any right to such a skull, but here it is, and thus it persists. As the broad part is 'broader than the neighboring Béarnaise "all-broad" skull, and as the narrow type of face with delicate features does not belong with the broad skull at all, one is about equally at a loss to explain the type as a mixture or as a pure race. There is a very old race, the "Cro-Magnon," to be found here and there in France, which has the opposite traits from the Basque—a skull narrow on top and broad at the cheek-bones; but the Cro-Magnon has left prehistoric relics of himself, as the Basque has not.

Basques and Backgrounds

When we reluctantly quit soliloquizing, like Hamlet, over the Basque skull, we are but little helped by studying the Basque language. There is a tradition that the Basque language is that spoken by all mankind before the confusion of tongues at Babel; and if that is the case, the rise of man to civilization is not so difficult to account for, but must be understood to date from that hitherto maligned event. It is said that the Basques all go to heaven, since the devil once hid behind a door for eight years trying to learn their language, but without success. The language is very short of verbs and almost totally s, but on the other be inflected to an even to the point

endings to indicate persons or things
we should use whole all these traits are very primitive lan-
we are no nearer
the Basques; their
has much in com-
an tribes; their de-
recall the language
r compound words
those of the North range that the wild-advanced to account that they are the primitive Iberians is are these Iberians? were African Ber will have them Tar-ids." Some author- and wander with face of the globe. ferent accounts as the Lapps, the Rus- the North American Egyptians of old, cient and now long- few survivors of the lost tribes of mentions several of le them, derives the ad-headed Béarnais Mediterraneans by poses of their claim he fails to explain their heads to those w a type "mixed" r mix can become comparatively recent me possessed of a othing in common bors, but much in nitive languages of tribes; and he ends usiasm which leads acquired traits can ality.

f showing what a t the Basques have gentry. Apparently
 ating to travellers,
 experienced them
 charm in glowing ntly hospitable to mmigrants and im-nences. Their com-bal sort; they are
 ey have many old
 fuse to relinquish,
 reveal that origin
 ids of the ethnoloy are sturdy, self-

Raoul Louis Felix Emile Mary Laparra showed musical instinct at an early age, so that his family was alarmed by his precociousness. He took pianoforte lessons when he was six years old; at the age of eight he entered the Paris Conservatory, where his teachers were Lavignac, Massenet, Gedalge. In 1900, on account of his health he was sent to Spain, after he had taken several prizes. He made his home and there composed his "Habanera." Two years after he returned to the Conservatory. In 1903, a pupil of Gabriel Fauré, he was awarded the first grand prix de Rome. He not only won the prix de Rome; he travelled in Greece, Turkey, Armenia. In 1906 he married Miss Mary Sharafelt of Omaha, Neb. Mr. Laparra came to the United States under the auspices of the French Government to study the landmarks of the early Spanish on the Pacific Coast. He sojourned in California, Arizona, and

* "The Basque dances were Salic and singular; the Zortico, Zortizo, or 'evolution' consists of two parts, la danza real, the opening, and the arrin arrin, or the conclusion. The Carri capered at Azpeitia to the sounds of rude fifes, tambourines, and a sort of flageolet, el al resembles those of the Pifferari at Rome; and is probably equally antique. The Carri performed in the streets; the Espata danza is a remnant of the primitive Tripudium of the Romans."—Richard Ford in "Handbook for Travellers in Spain" (2d Ed., London, 1847).—P. H.

Easter Styles

Douglas
park St., ass.

BOSTON:

ington St. (opp. Fran Street (corner Howa glas Shoes for Women

YALE BOOMS

Will Be Only University
Mechanical Branches

Special to the Transcript
New Haven, Conn., April 10.—Yale University has decided to install the mechanical chemistry offer can university. It will fall and soon a large to its needs will be ere given in the Sheffield Sc be four years in leng more will be given in work.

Professor John Johns for the chair.

DR. MEIKLEJOHN TO President of Amherst
Kappa Orator

The annual address b Kappa Society of the Arts of Boston Univers on Friday evening, May Alexander Meiklejohn o- gr Professor George H. yesterday his program on "Conscience." The by ered under the auspices of philosophy of the Coll

Professor Harold W been educational directo hospital for blinded sol an has returned and resum da College of Business A.

I. Roy Hanna, for selo tary of the School of LaMa at the school yesterday. A ational director at the the Philadelphia M. pei

Boston Univer. s

tional Business S for week from 6.30 to 3 thai use of the stage, and slides showing the xte of the university bndin

Next Tuesday at 4.15 I Holt Hughes will give Theology an address c ences. The address will ordination of students opia

PLANS FOR JAC

Many New Features at annual Celebratio

Inga Little, '19, chas Day, has appointed th take charge of the pr occasion. Jackson Day lacking in general terms, but on the other hand its nouns can be inflected to an extraordinary degree, even to the point of special plural case-endings to indicate relations between the persons or things referred to, for which we should use whole descriptive clauses. All these traits are characteristic only of very primitive languages, but even here we are no nearer to placing the origin of the Basques; their lack of general names has much in common with certain African tribes; their descriptive case-endings recall the language of the Finns, and their compound words are said to resemble those of the North American Indians!

It is therefore not strange that the wildest theories have been advanced to account for the Basques. That they are the descendants of the primitive Iberians is claimed; but who were these Iberians? According to some they were African Berbers or Arabs; others will have them Tartars or other "Mongoloids." Some authorities ignore the Iberians and wander with the Basques over the face of the globe. Thus they figure in different accounts as a bunch of the Finns, the Lapps, the Russians, the Chinese, the North American Indians, the Picts, the Egyptians of old, the Phoenicians, the ancient and now long-extinct Etruscans, the few survivors of engulfed Atlantis and the lost tribes of Israel. Ripley, who mentions several of these theories to ridicule them, derives the Basques from the broad-headed Béarnais and the long-headed Mediterraneans by cross, and thereby disposes of their claim to antiquity, though he fails to explain the superior breadth of their heads to those of the Béarnais, or how a type "mixed" from traits that never mix can become constant, or how a comparatively recent people can have become possessed of a language which has nothing in common with any of its neighbors, but much in common with the primitive languages of geographically remote tribes; and he ends in transport of enthusiasm which leads to postulate that acquired traits can be transmitted by heredity.

ainers and Music

All this is by way of showing what a fascinating Gordian knot the Basques have been to the scientific gentry. Apparently they are no less fascinating to travellers, for everyone who has experienced them writes of their personal charm in glowing terms. They are evidently hospitable to guests, but hostile to immigrants and impervious to outside influences. Their community life is of a tribal sort; they are happy and contented; they have many old customs which they refuse to relinquish, but which seem not to reveal that origin which so fashions the heads of the ethnologists. In character they are sturdy, selfreliant, independent, freedom-loving, conservative and proud, like other mountaineers at home and abroad. They are amusingly aware of a sort of condescension on their own part in their political allegiance to Spain—a counterpart of the "I'm as good as you be, and a little better" of the rustic New England "hired man." Although they rarely bear arms for Spain, they have successfully held their provinces against invasion for centuries at a time.

332

The Basques have an interesting folk-music, which, like everything else connected with them, is highly distinctive, and very tantalizing to the ethnologist in its few points of contact with the rest of the world. For one thing, in the face of many learned assertions to the effect that folk-music invariably follows the "natural" rhythms of two, three, four or six beats, the Basques evolved a dance, the Zortzico, in $\frac{5}{8}$ time, long before the art of notation was at all widely disseminated. Isolated examples of this rhythm in naive music have been found here and there among the Indians and the negroes of this continent; possibly the Basques are transplanted Aztecs or Incas! There is a collection of Basque folk-music in existence, assembled by one Sallaberry and published at Bayonne (France, not New Jersey), in which not a single song appears, but this proves little, as the notation of an unusual rhythm by an amateur often produces results startling to a well-trained musician, and the redoubtable Sallaberry confesses himself to be a lawyer. I have heard and seen several Zortzicos, and there can be no doubt as to the authenticity and spontaneity of their $\frac{5}{8}$ rhythm. One very interesting feature of the Sallaberry collection is the presence of a fair number of songs decidedly Russian in character, and a few which are unmistakably Scandinavian. If the Basques are wanderers from Asia, these songs may well be unconscious souvenirs of various resting places; but what if they are Africans, Atlantists, Madagascarans or emigrants from the South Pole? Joking aside, William Wallace has pointed out the value to ethnologists of an analytical study of folk-music, and such a study might eventually solve the Basque riddle; but let no one be sure of this until it is accomplished beyond a doubt!

Laparra and His Suite

On Friday and Saturday of this week, Bostonians are to hear a Suite entitled "A Basque Sunday," by a composer, Raoul Laparra, who was born within the range of Basque influence and has lived among the Basque people. Mr. Laparra was born in 1876 at Bordeaux, of a Spanish father and an Italian mother. (Inasmuch as the profile portrait which accompanies most "Portrait of Abraham Lincoln and Child in Snow" and the other panel showing gifts have been received from Mrs. Hiram Hall; and very ushabti figures, from Wheelwright.

ent of prints has been purchased of sixteen prints of Lord Northwick by Jacobus.

All Fine Arts

now open:

—Loan Exhibition of French Arts—Crowninshield's Works. Arts—Etchings by Lepère. Arts—Wood-cuts by Lepère. —Works of American Masters. —Mr. Borein's Etchings. —Miss Gardiner's Wood-cuts. —Mr. Ranken's Interiors. —Members' Exhibition. —Women Painters and Sculptors. —Artists—Mr. Sharman's Pictures. —Architectural Exhibition. —Mr. Wood's Watercolors. —Mr. Smith's Watercolors.

NCH PAINTINGS

Works of Masters in the Loan Exhibition at the Fogg Art Museum

masterpieces of painting effective loan exhibition at the Fogg Art Museum; but not all the masterpieces. Early work by the diptych by Simon, across the large, bar, Lyon, an anonymous altar, the museum, and figures are standing, the School of the, ch is in a half-ruined, one of the windows in Marmion was a fifteenth ter, a native of Amlens, volume to do justice, especially edifying, of primitive art. Of the room; the martyrdom of a meere spaces which play about to have his feet in Degas's interiors, and his chest or abdomen perfectly balanced, hammer while a group ed horsemen look of the ladder leading to speak to t. At the left an angel before a person elaborately figured holding a Bible in his several other figures small portraits by Co great artistic merit as memorable is the likeness a cap and a close. The portrait immediately foregoing work observation, modelling a personality. One of the upper one at the resemblance to Francis has a rather more. Claude Cornelli, sixteenth century, and François I. attribute Paintings, those which consideration are the ex. Manet, Corot, Renoir, Courbet, David, Natard and André. For modern men, although how remote eighteenth represented in the show of recent date, the Degas loan exhibition here on the activity never slackens the end of the game, though its intensity rises and falls with the excitement the watchers, whose cheers are suggested by occasional outbursts. In one there is a witty double presentation theme in canon, which those familiar with the game of pelota may be able to perform the same actions not in time with each other are clearly suggested. At the close the of the winning side threaten to the throat and burst the heart."

A Basque "White House"

(From "Springtime in the Basque Mountains" by Arthur Lasenby Liberty. London, 1901)

and viola, with a constant thrum-pizzicato for the rest of the strings. The most remarkable Degas is that depicting professional dancers. It hangs just in front of him, and the head of a woman, four or five of the legs elevated to across the large, bar, out upon a garden, he top of the green hill? A young runs by its side, and three ancient o'ershadow it. It is here that I each St. John's Day a new coat me clothes it as in a young girl's day dress. And yet—Etche gal- (poor house)—how the lines of of dance, how its walls lean, so For it is there, behold, that opened to the light and closed in the eyes of my forefathers' has the sun descended behind it,

ore a White House (III)

Han bizi naiz ni bakean' Han bizi naiz ni bakean' SARRE) you see that little white house, he top of the green hill? A young runs by its side, and three ancient o'ershadow it. It is here that I off beyond the mountains? How many times, like now, my little white house, has the gleam of the lamp illumined the windows since the lost epoch when the tender will of two lovers erected you on the green hill?

(Mr. Laparra, who is not to be blamed for often thinking in French even when he is writing in English, may be interested to know that in Anglo-Saxon countries brooks run and fountains play. We gladly give him his choice as to which are active at the side of his white house.)

Tres calme, G major, 6 c 8.—After a couple of measures of introduction, a string quartet sings a little four-part song whose naive pathos ought to be that of folk-music, though I do not find its counterpart in the collection of the legalistic Sallaberry. This is simply accompanied by the rest of the strings muted, with harp here and there. The piano has a contrasting theme, and a few woodwind instruments find their way into the score before the ending, in which the English horn is prominent.

At the Feast (IV)

"Alta gaiztoa Tabernandago Picaro jocala ria!

On then! What a Sabbath, Madame Marie! Is it the tambourine of the fat chirip! that I hear, or a hogs-head that one smashes? It is a battle to the death between Cider and Wine! They are nothing to mature folks, these reliant, independent, servative and proud at home and abroad aware of a sort of own part in the to Spain—a country good as you be, a rustic New England they rarely bear a successfully held invasion for centuries.

The Basques have music, which, like ed with them, is very tantalizing few points of contact world. For one thing learned assertions music invariably rhythms of two, the Basques evolved in 3/4 time, long but was at all widely examples of this Adventure Pittoresque have been found Indians and the students of Spanish possibly the Basque awailed his "Popular publication of which Basque folk-music during the war. He by one Sallaberry is to play the piano (France, not New the coming performance single song appears he is living in New York, as the notation by an amateur Basque folk-music in startling to a we study of the score brings the redoubtable S melodies which are either self to be a lawyer ought to be; perhaps several Zortzicos, Laparra is so imbued doubt as to the a of his neighborhood the ely of their 3/4. After folk-tunes than the esting feature of it may be said in passing is the presence of lamented Granados. decidedly Russian-ized impression re few which are untried," and follows the If the Basques a decades ago but cor these songs may using little semi-realistic souvenirs of vari for reflective treatment what if they are A forwarded poetic analysis I qu Pole? Joking as cal analysis I have n has pointed out the score. am unable to of an analytical s parra's Basque quotation does so for me; the Basque riddle; b ethnologist may make of this until it or will. a doubt!

Laparra and His S

On Friday and Bostonians are to Basque Sunday," Laparra, who was of Basque influence the Basque people. in 1876 at Bordeaux and an Italian motif profile portrait with

of the foreign reviews shows several Basque able to confirm or refute of Basque origins by Laparra's head is brought top when he bows to Symphony Hall; at duct in attending his markedly dolichocephalic of the most varied list of his teachers in Massenet, Fauré, Lav tant organ and bells announce a theme of ard, and Gedalge—a hymnlike character which is undoubtedly tinction. A precocious the one of which the composer said, in an tunate in his parents, interview, that he conceived and wrote the to force or exploit a "main theme" in the Basque country.

ceived the Prix de Rome After a few measures, the first bassoon ried an American lad presents this theme in diminution; a viola duced an opera, "La answers, and the rest of the instruments which later received enter one by one or in groups, as the people Boston; and he follow of the countryside wake and set out for "La Jota." He has mass. The organ ceases for the time being; the theme in its new treatment acquires a dance-like character, as if to express the joy of life which one feels when out of doors at dawn. There is a modulation to C major, and the dance-like treatment of the theme is continued in 6-8 time by orchestra and piano. D flat major, 4-4-12-8; broad melodies and counter-melodies derived from the theme are played by strings and brass, while the woodwind and the piano continue the dance-like figures by way of decoration. The organ and bells reappear as before, and all the foregoing treatment is recapitulated, but in different keys. At the final broad climax in F minor, not only are the several variants of the theme combined as before, but the organ presents the theme itself in its original hymn-like form as a huge cantus firmus.

Mr. Laparra disclaims Basque folk-music in study of the score brings the redoubtable S melodies which are either self to be a lawyer ought to be; perhaps several Zortzicos, Laparra is so imbued doubt as to the a of his neighborhood the ely of their 3/4. After folk-tunes than the esting feature of it may be said in passing is the presence of lamented Granados. decidedly Russian-ized impression re few which are untried," and follows the If the Basques a decades ago but cor these songs may using little semi-realistic souvenirs of vari for reflective treatment what if they are A forwarded poetic analysis I qu Pole? Joking as cal analysis I have n has pointed out the score. am unable to of an analytical s parra's Basque quotation does so for me; the Basque riddle; b ethnologist may make of this until it or will. a doubt!

At the Game of Pelota (II)
"Carlos quintoren baratan
"Muthilak pilota' danzan.
Hogoi! Falta! (the words in Basque are the numbers)—By the devil! Have you heard arrows whistling? They were not more rapid than that ball—Yo! yo! yo! Do you hear how one laughs, with rage or joy? See how the players bound beneath the regards of their sweet-hearts. They will not be handsomer at the dance, tonight. Berrogoi eta borts! Hey, more lungs, crier! Those of the Guipuzcoa weaken. Berrogoi eta hamar. Victory! Yo! yo! yo! yooooo! Let me laugh. Bierretch! And may my throat tear, may my heart burst, but that my triumphant Irrintzinta (call of joy) resound from the plain to the mountain, from the mountain to Spain, from Spain to the sea, meowing the victory of those of Anoa! Allegretto vivo, G minor, 5-8—Over a dominant pedal of the relative major there are lively runs as the crowd gathers and the merrymaking begins; then the game commences with a skipping figure for bassoon, accompanied by a counter-melody for solo

Toward the Church

"Truskia yalgul baino
"Sabalsen hastendu
Awaken, to list, song! It is the one w ever since the birth which repeats to us and the bells of Ihol And after all, w getting up with the ing, on a beautiful S order, the cares u For it is a The great s yet arisen; but in the sky which is over the mountains one feels him coming to the fields.

Come then, away! Let us sing, let us dance already; and once in a while shall we stop a little to hearken to the voice of God rising from the villages. And then let us enter the church, eaving the door open behind us, so that our mingled songs may escape, awakening the dead and hastening the step of the living lingering on the road.

Lento ma non troppo, F minor, 4-4. Dis-Massenet, Fauré, Lav tant organ and bells announce a theme of ard, and Gedalge—a hymnlike character which is undoubtedly tinction. A precocious the one of which the composer said, in an tunate in his parents, interview, that he conceived and wrote the to force or exploit a "main theme" in the Basque country. ceived the Prix de Rome After a few measures, the first bassoon ried an American lad presents this theme in diminution; a viola duced an opera, "La answers, and the rest of the instruments which later received enter one by one or in groups, as the people Boston; and he follow of the countryside wake and set out for "La Jota." He has mass. The organ ceases for the time being; the theme in its new treatment acquires a dance-like character, as if to express the joy of life which one feels when out of doors at dawn. There is a modulation to C major, and the dance-like treatment of the theme is continued in 6-8 time by orchestra and piano. D flat major, 4-4-12-8; broad melodies and counter-melodies derived from the theme are played by strings and brass, while the woodwind and the piano continue the dance-like figures by way of decoration. The organ and bells reappear as before, and all the foregoing treatment is recapitulated, but in different keys. At the final broad climax in F minor, not only are the several variants of the theme combined as before, but the organ presents the theme itself in its original hymn-like form as a huge cantus firmus.

At the Game of Pelota (II)

"Carlos quintoren baratan
"Muthilak pilota' danzan.

Hogoi! Falta! (the words in Basque are the numbers)—By the devil! Have you heard arrows whistling? They were not more rapid than that ball—Yo! yo! yo! Do you hear how one laughs, with rage or joy? See how the players bound beneath the regards of their sweet-hearts. They will not be handsomer at the dance, tonight. Berrogoi eta borts! Hey, more lungs, crier! Those of the Guipuzcoa weaken. Berrogoi eta hamar. Victory! Yo! yo! yo! yooooo! Let me laugh. Bierretch! And may my throat tear, may my heart burst, but that my triumphant Irrintzinta (call of joy) resound from the plain to the mountain, from the mountain to Spain, from Spain to the sea, meowing the victory of those of Anoa! Allegretto vivo, G minor, 5-8—Over a dominant pedal of the relative major there are lively runs as the crowd gathers and the merrymaking begins; then the game commences with a skipping figure for bassoon, accompanied by a counter-melody for solo

A Basque "White House"

(From "Springtime in the Basque Mountains" by Arthur Lasenby Liberty. London, 1901)

violin and viola, with a constant thrumming pizzicato for the rest of the strings. From here on the activity never slackens until the end of the game, though its intensity rises and falls with the excitement of the watchers, whose cheers are suggested by occasional outbursts. In one place there is a witty double presentation of the theme in canon, which those familiar with the game of pelota may be able to explain; at all events, two groups of players performing the same actions not quite in time with each other are clearly enough suggested. At the close the cheers of the winning side threaten to "tear the throat and burst the heart."

Before a White House (III)

"Han bizi naiz ni bakean"
"(Ellsambuzu; 'Haitz mendia,' SARRE)
Do you see that little white house, on the top of the green hill? A mountain runs by its side, and three ancient oaks o'ershadow it. It is here that I live in peace.

At each St. John's Day a new coat of lime clothes it as in a young girl's Sunday dress. And yet—Etche galchoa! (poor house)—how the lines of its roof dance, how its walls lean, so wearily! For it is there, behold, that were opened to the light and closed in death the eyes of my forefathers' fathers.

Thus, how many times, at this same hour, has the sun descended behind it, off beyond the mountains? How many times, like now, my little white house, has the gleam of the lamp illumined the windows since the lost epoch when the tender will of two lovers erected you on the green hill?

(Mr. Laparra, who is not to be blamed for often thinking in French even when he is writing in English, may be interested to know that in Anglo-Saxon countries brooks run and fountains play. We gladly give him his choice as to which are active at the side of his white house.)

Tres calme, G major, 6 c 8.—After a couple of measures of introduction, a string quartet sings a little four-part song whose naive pathos ought to be that of folk-music, though I do not find its counterpart in the collection of the legalistic Sallaberry. This is simply accompanied by the rest of the strings muted, with harp here and there. The piano has a contrasting theme, and a few woodwind instruments find their way into the score before the ending, in which the English horn is prominent.

At the Feast (IV)

"Alta gaiztoa Tabernandago
"Pleace jocal-ria!

On then! What a Sabbath, Madame Marie! Is it the tambourine of the fat chirip! that I hear, or a hogs-head that one smashes? It is a battle to the death between Cider and Wine! They are nothing to mature folks, these larks. Yet, nevertheless, it is good to hear the laughter of the young people and to chant again in the evening the songs of the dawn!

The girls dance, the boys sneer, the drinkers bawl their songs of labor. And into all this hubbub I mingle prudently the holy chant of the morning, even though the wine of Irrougeli dulls my memory. For the Cascarotes intrude now; and among these bohemians of bewitched glances, who knows where this dance might lead us, which sweeps everything, this frenzied arin-arin where the buck-footed Mr. Debroua (the devil) is sure to sneak in.

Allegro energico, F minor, 6-8—Horns and kettledrums commence a persistent accompaniment figure of marked rhythm, with trills in the woodwind; all the strings present a rude dance-tune, and the brass instruments follow suit. There are plentiful modulations, with a lot of orchestral ventriloquizing, and clever shifts of rhythm from 6-8 to 9-8 and back again; then the oboe introduces a second theme in C minor. Both themes are treated anew, exchanging keys. In the final climax the organ combines the hymn-like principal theme of the first movement with the dance-tunes of this, and there is a riotous climax.

In Survey

There is nothing radical in the material or the treatment of this little suite, nor is it consciously conservative. It seems to be quite spontaneous, and proportionally pleasing; in spite of a very direct appeal, I should expect it to wear well. There is much in the external impression of the work which recalls Bizet without the reproach of imitation—not the Bizet of "Carmen," but rather the Bizet of "L'Arlésienne" and still more of "Roma." The work will not only please, it will refresh.

Formally the suite presents a rather complicated and exceedingly well executed example of "generative treatment" in the first movement, after which it drops learning overboard. The man in the street need not be in the slightest degree repelled by the "generative" episode, which is artfully concealed as it should be, instead of thrust forward like a sore thumb or a new pair of gloves, as dutiful young composers sometimes thrust it. To say, however, that the suite is simple of effect does not in the slightest degree imply poverty of resource on the part of the composer, who is, on the contrary, exceedingly fluent in the unpopular arts of counterpoint and thematic variation.

To the present reviewer, the absence of the Zortzico rhythm and character from any and all parts of the suite is in the nature of a distinct lack, because the Zortzico is the exclusive artistic property of the Basque, as well as pleasing on its own merits. Probably the composer could answer quite properly that he has not aimed to exhaust the interest of Basque music in a single suite, or even that one who knows the Basques intimately attaches less importance to the Zortzico than such a total stranger as the present reviewer. At all events, the present suite seems to bear out the theory that the Basques are a cross between the Béarnais and the Mediterraneans!

PHILIP GREELEY CLAPP

enrolment of the University of Illinois steadily increasing from year to year shown by the fact that 3465 undergraduates and 174 graduates were registered at the colleges at Urbana at the end of fourth day of registration for the quarter. The number registered for corresponding day of the second quarter of the present year was 3562. The number for the corresponding day of the second semester last year was 3460.

MORE FRENCH STUDENTS COMING

American Colleges Offer Eighty Additional Scholarships for Next Year

Chicago, April 17—Dr. Robert L. Kelly, executive secretary of the Association of American Colleges, announces that he has cabled to the French Government eighty additional scholarships for French girls for the academic year of 1919-20. These have been offered by American institutions. Already 114 girls and 34 disabled French soldiers have been placed. Dr. Kelly states that French schools have offered openings to American soldiers and 5800 of them have been filled.

Kappa Sigma's Fiftieth Anniversary

Washington, April 17—Announcement made that the fiftieth anniversary of founding of the Kappa Sigma Fraternity will be celebrated at a meeting here April 22-25, which will be attended by delegates from seventy-eight colleges and chapters throughout the country. The delegates will visit the University of Virginia where the first chapter of the fraternity was organized. Among the speakers will be former Secretary McAdoo and Admiral Cary Gravson.

Laparra's Startling Music

Post

Apr. 13, 1919.

"Brutally Direct, Not Kid-Gloved," Says Olin Downes of Spanish Genius Who Will Play His Own Compositions Here Next Week

An uncommon work, by a composer of uncommonly individual and picturesque tendencies, will be heard at the Boston Symphony concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. This is the suite for orchestra and piano, "A Basque Sunday," in the performance of which the composer will play the solo instrument.

The music of Laparra is known and admired by those who believe that neither life nor art is a kid-glove affair. His opera, "La Habanera," given at the Boston Opera House in 1912, startled the conservatives and made an indelible impression on the receptive, because of its enormous virility and its combination of realism and the extravagant romanticism at which most modern composers of today sniff superciliously. The country portrayed was Castile, a tremendous and gloomy land, the ghost of Spain's mighty past, and a thousand years removed from the brilliancy and gaiety of the Seville of which Bizet wrote in "Carmen." Another opera was "The Jota," the principal musical and dramatic theme founded, as in the case of the "Habanera," on the rhythm of the Spanish dance. Last October Mr. Laparra and Mme. Helen Stanley gave a concert of compositions strongly Spanish in character in Symphony Hall. It will be seen that Spain has obsessed the imagination of this composer.

Mr. Laparra himself claims that this is a result of atavism. He was born in Bordeaux, near the Spanish border. His parentage is part French and part Spanish. Even as a small boy he often galloped over to "the other side" and found himself in a country which appealed to him more than his own home. Look at the man and you see a Latin, not a Gaul. He has the dark olive complexion of a Spaniard, black hair and black eyes of almost feverish brilliancy. He is rather small in stature. The physique is not powerful, but one has the impression of an exceptionally virile and sensitive temperament.

Laparra has wandered far and wide over the earth. He knows the Orient and the Occident. He is acquainted with the primitive music of Turkey and of the North American Indian, and the more primitive the music, one is inclined to think, the more interesting to him. But Spain remains his spiritual if not his actual birthplace. The genius of this strange land possesses him.

Excels in Color

Laparra's music is the most brutally direct, the most crudely and vigorously colored, perhaps, of an opera composer of the day. He is not, perhaps, a lover of art for art's sake. He has always observed life at first hand, lived with the simple people, recorded his impressions, musically, in his own way. He is no follower of the schools or of any artistic clique or group of theorists. The heart, not the head, must lead the way. Laparra has gone his own way with a naive enthusiasm and an unconscious courage, and his artistic end appears to make him oblivious of obstacles.

Not that he lacked schooling in his art. His precocity as a child alarmed his parents. Fortunately it was balanced from the beginning by his almost primitive love and craving for nature. He studied the piano at six and entered the Paris Conservatoire at 11. In 1900 a violent illness sent him to Spain to recuperate for two years. It was at this time, and in this place, that "La Habanera" was conceived. Paris forgets quickly. When Laparra returned he found the conservatory had as good as forgotten him. Nevertheless, he set to work with characteristic energy and in 1903 took the Prix de Rome.

Laparra is interested in several other arts than his own. He loves architecture, poetry, painting. A series of lively sketches made by himself recall his days in the Eternal City.

There are also drawings by fellow students, and a few of them are signed by Andre Caplet, who was French conductor at the Boston Opera House for several seasons. In the second year of his scholarship Laparra visited Greece.

larks. Yet, nevertheless, it is good to hear the laughter of the young people and to chant again in the evening the songs of the dawn!

The girls dance, the boys sneer, the drinkers bawl their songs of labor. And into all this hubbub I mingle prudently the holy chant of the morning, even though the wine of Irrougeli dulls my memory. For the Cascarotes intrude now; and among these bohemians of bewitched glances, who knows where this dance might lead us, which sweeps everything, this frenzied arin-arin where the buck-footed Mr. Debroua (the devil) is sure to sneak in.

Allegro energico, F minor, 6-8—Horns and kettledrums commence a persistent accompaniment figure of marked rhythm, with trills in the woodwind; all the strings present a rude dance-tune, and the brass instruments follow suit.

To the present reviewer, the absence of the Zortzico rhythm and character from any and all parts of the suite is in the nature of a distinct lack, because the Zortzico is the exclusive artistic property of the Basque, as well as pleasing on its own merits. Probably the composer could answer quite properly that he has not aimed to exhaust the interest of Basque music in a single suite, or even that one who knows the Basques intimately attaches less importance to the Zortzico than such a total stranger as the present reviewer. At all events, the present suite seems to bear out the theory that the Basques are a cross between the Béarnais and the Mediterraneans!

PHILIP GREELEY CLAPP

A Player at Pelota Placing the Ball

Pelota—A Spanish Game, Not Unlike Hand-Ball. It is Played in a Court With a Small Rubber Ball, and a Long Curved Gauntlet or Cestus, Fitted to the Right Hand

pealed to him more than his own home. Look at the man and you see a Latin, not a Gaul. He has the dark olive complexion of a Spaniard, black hair and black eyes of almost feverish brilliancy. He is rather small in stature. The physique is not powerful, but one

Laparra's Startling Music

Post

Apr. 13, 1919.

"Brutally Direct, Not Kid-Gloved," Says Olin Downes of Spanish Genius Who Will Play His Own Compositions Here Next Week

An uncommon work, by a composer of uncommonly individual and picturesque tendencies, will be heard at the next evenchestra in the poser

has the impression of an exceptionally virile and sensitive temperament.

Laparra has wandered far and wide over the earth. He knows the Orient and the Occident. He is acquainted with the primitive music of Turkey and of the North American Indian, and the more primitive the music, one is inclined to think, the more interesting to him. But Spain remains his spiritual if not his actual birthplace. The genius of this strange land possesses him.

Excels in Color

and that affair.
it the

Laparra's music is the most brutally direct, the most crudely and vigorously colored, perhaps, of an opera composer of the day. He is not, perhaps, a lover of art for art's sake. He has always observed life at first hand, lived with the simple people, recorded his impressions, musically, in his own way. He is no follower of the schools or of any artistic clique or group of theorists. The heart, not the head, must lead the way. Laparra has gone his own way with a naive enthusiasm and an unconscious courage, and his artistic end appears to make him oblivious of obstacles.

Not that he lacked schooling in his art. His precocity as a child alarmed his parents. Fortunately it was balanced from the beginning by his almost primitive love and craving for nature. He studied the piano at six and entered the Paris Conservatoire at 11. In 1900 a violent illness sent him to Spain to recuperate for two years. It was at this time, and in this place, that "La Habanera" was conceived. Paris forgets quickly. When Laparra returned he found the conservatory had as good as forgotten him. Nevertheless, he set to work with characteristic energy and in 1903 took the Prix de Rome.

Laparra is interested in several other arts than his own. He loves architecture, poetry, painting. A series of lively sketches made by himself recall his days in the Eternal City.

There are also drawings by fellow students, and a few of them are signed by Andre Caplet, who was French conductor at the Boston Opera House for several seasons. In the second year of his scholarship Laparra visited Greece,

(From the Encyclopædia of Sport his

Turkey and Armenia gathering material for the score of an opera, "Amphytrion," which has not been performed.

He went to Bayreuth in 1906, and lived not with the tourists, but with a peasant's family in Dusseldorf. "La Habanera" was produced in Paris in 1908. It frightened many of the critics, and drew attention to a rising talent. A second opera, "La Jota," was given in 1911. In 1912 Laparra came to America under the auspices of the French government to study the landmarks of the early Spanish settlers on the Pacific coast. He went first to Mexico, then to Arizona and California, where he spent much time about the old missions which dot that State. An opera on a Mexican theme has been sketched. Mr. Laparra also studied, very curiously, the music of the American Indians. In 1913, he married the former Miss Mary Shara-felt of Omaha, Neb.

Composes Wherever Mood Moves Him

Laparra has noted down his musical ideas in cabs, on trains, on shipboard, and muleback. As may be seen, he is temperamentally a nomad. Money to him means opportunity to travel. He has also the literary temperament, and his libretti and manifestos remind one strongly of the pronouncements of the romantic composers like Berlioz, with whom Mr. Laparra has not a little in common. ("Un romantique retarde"—"a belated romanticist," said Mr. Caplet). He writes himself into his music. "It seems to me that from my earliest days," he once said, "I knew that I would find my true inspiration in Spain."

The suite "A Basque Sunday" was composed in the country of which the music speaks. It is thus described, for the Post, by Mr. Laparra:

On the two western slopes of the Pyrenees Mountains, part in France, part in Spain, lives a mysterious race whose origin has never been established. It is the Basque people.

Its language has nothing in common with any other idiom in the world. Its customs are strongly different from those of its French and Spanish neighbors. It resisted the Arabs and the Romans, and though now divided between two of the European powers, has never been absorbed by them and has remained a people, in spite of the conventional limitations.

It has been a frequent mistake to confound the Basques with the Spaniards, from whom in all regards they are as remote as the Yankees from the Patagonians. The bull fights, though practised, are as foreign there as they are in the south of France. So are the "flamenco" songs and dances.

The people are deeply religious, but without the passionate expressions of the Spanish Catholicism. It is a calm faith, robust like those chants of the Basque church, which the ox-drivers sing again on the road while leading their heavy beasts hitched to the full wheeled carts, which resemble the chariots of the early migrations.

The national game is athletic and full of wild excitement, but without the red drama of the Spanish bull fight. One village sends its three best players against the three best ones of another town. They meet on a rectangle before a high wall, against which the ball is thrown with strength by the batter, to rebound to a point where he hopes that the adversary will not be at hand to the high wall, against which the ball is augmented by the special glove they use, or "chisters," a long, cone-shaped crescent basket, which is used to catch as well as to throw the ball. A crier calls the points in long modulations, which are real songs in themselves. The girls, in the graded stone seats, wear the color of their favorite teams, and when the points are hotly disputed one hears the ancestral calls, in which are expressed either the furor or the joy. This game, called "Pilota," has spread all over Spain and South America.

The dances are also typical of the country. Among them shines particularly the energetic "zortzico," with a splendid rhythm in 5-8 time.

Composed in Tower

The houses, whitewashed anew every year on St. John's Day, seem, in spite of their old age, eternally young, and sprinkle the landscape with their clear spots on top of the green hills against the higher Pyrenees. For, in contrast again with Spain, the country is a laughing one, traversed by so many brooks running down from the mountains to the sea.

One of the points from which the Basque land might be embraced in one of its broadest and most inspiring aspects is the hill of Bordegaine, above the little port of Ciboure in France. From there, beyond a succession of valleys, an extraordinary development of mountains is perceived from the "Rhune" in France to the colossally proportioned "Three Crowns" in Spain, while the sea flees from cape to cape to the fading distances of the Cantabric coast. And before these immensities you are, on the top of Bordegaine, in the most intimate and romantic corner—a church, ruined by the quasi-forgotten battle of Napoleonic times.

Against it a rustic shed has been erected by the peasants with blocks of granite and gigantic beams to protect a shrine where the miraculously preserved virgin of the ruined church has been placed. A few steps away stands a cross of the 14th century and a strange building without age, color of rain, a sort of tower overtopping still higher this commanding place. It was between these three things, the tower, the cross and the church, that much of Raoul Laparra, composer of "A Basque Sunday," to be performed at the Symphony concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Where "A Basque Sunday" was composed. The church of Bordegaine, destroyed in a battle between Wellington and Soult, a relic of the 14th century, and the old Spanish tower which Mr. Laparra made his workroom.

the "Basque Sunday" was written. The supreme peace of that spot, as though against the sky, was necessary to express with a freer and clearer mind the intense joy of the valley. Only on rainy days shelter had to be sought in the deserted tower, and it was not without a certain thrill that one could enter that dwelling, in remembering the dark story which developed there some years before.

An old bachelor, an "American," as they call in that country the Basques who have returned from the new continent, retired there with a coffer containing the fortune amassed overseas, a gay fellow, a good singer and a hearty drinker. No one, however, had any access to his tower, until one day there came another "American" unknown in the country, and whom the people of Ciboure nicknamed "Don Carlos."

From that time the life of the solitary tower became particularly animated. Echoes of songs and of laughter used to escape from it until a late hour. But on a certain night of violent tempest, the joyous noise, which had been more boisterous than ever, was succeeded by a shrill scream, so long and so terrible that the owner of the next farm, awakened in spite of the distance and the gale, did not dare to open his window.

But in the morning he said to his wife, "Woman, something queer happened last night toward the tower. Let us go and see." They went. Around the tower everything was silent. They knocked; no answer. They entered the little kitchen, always silence, the shutters closed. They climbed the stairs to the landing where the "American" always slept. No one there, and such darkness everywhere! They went to the third and last floor, but before reaching it the man was arrested by two feet upon his head, while the woman behind him exclaimed, "Andre Maria! There he hangs!" They roused up the town, and amidst the exclamations of amazement, the prayers and the imprecations, it was found that the famous coffer had disappeared. So had "Don Carlos," and never to return.

Since then the old tower had remained closed until a musician, to the astonishment of the town, asked the key, to make of it his working retreat. Thus, stories which become legends, legends which are believed to be stories, the whole Basque country is full of them, with the added charm of its own mystery, that never to be found origin, which enhances the poetry of its landscapes and the haughty beauty of its humanity.

The idea of "a Basque Sunday" is to express musically the principal episodes of a Basque holiday:

1. Toward the church, which supplies a kind of auroral prelude with the call of the organ and bells of the distant mass.

2. At the Pelote game, which is the national game of the Basques, and takes place in the afternoon. It is expressed by a lively scherzo.

3. Before a white house gives the Andante. It relates to the rest time which one enjoys in those ancestral but always smiling homes of the Basque country, about sunset.

4. At the feast forms the finale and was suggested by the dances and songs of the evening, out on the open square of the village.

There follow the English translations of the four popular poems, which I use as epigraphs for the different movements. They are the very subjects of the corresponding parts.

As to the music, I have not aimed in the present work to any melodic or rhythmical use of the native folk-lore, though acquainted with it from childhood. It is rather a generalized impression received in the country. For the theme and main development were written there, while the definitive form was given to it only recently.

No. 1—Toward the Church—

"Iruskia yalgui bainolchen

"Sabalsen hastendu argia canta berrien."

Awaken, to listen to this "new" song! It is the one which has been sung ever since the birth of the Master and which repeats to us, there, the organ and the bells of Iholdy.

And after all, what is better than getting up with the birds in the morning, on a beautiful Sunday, the farm in order, the cares under the sandals? For it is a beautiful Sunday! The great sower, he has not yet arisen; but in the sky which is over the mountains one feels him coming to the fields.

Come then away! Let us sing, let us dance already; and once in a while shall we stop a little to hearken to the voice of God rising from the villages. And then let us enter the church, leaving the door open behind us, so that our mingled songs may escape, awakening the dead and hastening the step of the living lingering on the road.

No. 2—At the game of Pelote—

Carlos quintoren baratzan

"Muthilak pilota" dansan.

Hogoi! Falta, by the devil! Have you heard arrows whistling? They were not more rapid than the ball—Yo!

Yo! Yo! Do you hear how one laughs, with rage or joy? See how the players bound 'neath the regard of their sweet-hearts. They will not be handsomer at the dance tonight. Berrogoi eta bortzi! Hey, more lungs, Crier! Those of the Guipuzcoa weaken. Berrogoi eta hamar. Victory! Yo! Yo! Yo! Yooooo! Let me laugh, Pierretch! And may my throat tear, may my heart burst, but that my triumphant Irrintzina resound from the plain to the mountain, from the mountain to Spain, from Spain to the sea, meowing the victory of those of Anoa!

No. 3—Before a White House—"Han bizi naiz ni bakean" (Elisambuzu; "Haitz mendia," Sarre).

Do you see that little white house, on the top of the green hill? A fountain runs by its side, and three ancient oaks o'ershadow it. It is here that I live in peace.

At each St. John's day a new coat of lime clothes it in a Sunday dress of young girl. And however—Etche gai-choa! ("poor house")—how the lines of its roof dances, how its walls lean, so wearily! For it is there, behold, that were opened to the light and closed in death the eyes of my forefather's fathers.

Thus, how many times, at this same hour, has the sun descended behind it, off beyond the mountains? How many times, like now, my little white house, has the gleam of the lamp illumined the window since the lost epoch when the tender will of two lovers erected you on the green hill?

No. 4—At the Feast Aita Gaiztoa Tabernandago Picaro Jocalaria!

On then! What a Sabbath, Madame Marie! Is it the tamborine of the fat chiripi that I hear, or a hogshead that one smashes? It is the battle to the death of the cider and the wine! They are worth nothing to mature folks, these larks. Yet, nevertheless, it is so good to hear the laugh of the young and to reintonate in the evening the songs of the dawn!

The girls dance, the boys sneer; the drinkers brawl their songs of labor. And in all this hubbub I mingle prudently the holy chant of the morning, even though the wine of Irroulegui dulls my memory. For the Cascarotes intrude now; and, among these bohemians of bewitched glances, who knows where this dance might lead us which sweeps everything, this enraged arinarin where the buck-footed Mister Debroua (the Devil) is sure to sneak in.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1918-19.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

HENRI RABAUD, Conductor.

TWENTY-THIRD PROGRAMME

SATURDAY, APRIL 26, AT 2.30 P.M.

SATURDAY, APRIL 26, AT 8 P.M.

RABAUD.

SYMPHONY in E minor, No. 2

- I. Allegro moderato
- II. Andante
- III. Allegro vivace
- IV. Allegro; Andante

(First time at these Concerts)

MÉHUL,

AIR, "O des amants le plus fidèle," from 'Ariodant' Act II., Scene II.

BACH,

MOVEMENTS from the SUITE in B minor No. 2, for Flute and Strings

- I. Polonaise with Double: Moderato
- II. Rondo; Allegretto espressivo
- III. Badinerie: Presto

(FLUTE SOLO, Georges Laurent)

MOUSSORGSKY,

SONGS with Orchestra

- I. "Serenade of Death"
- II. "On the Banks of the Don"
- III. "On the Dnyéper"

BEETHOVEN,

OVERTURE to Goethe's "Egmont," op. 84

Soloist:

SOPHIE BRASLAU

express musically the principal episodes of a Basque holiday:

1. Toward the church, which supplies a kind of auroral prelude with the call of the organ and bells of the distant mass.

2. At the Pelote game, which is the national game of the Basques, and takes place in the afternoon. It is expressed by a lively scherzo.

3. Before a white house gives the Andante. It relates to the rest time which one enjoys in those ancestral but always smiling homes of the Basque country, about sunset.

4. At the feast forms the finale and was suggested by the dances and songs of the evening, out on the open square of the village.

There follow the English translations of the four popular poems, which I use as epigraphs for the different movements. They are the very subjects of the corresponding parts.

As to the music, I have not aimed in the present work to any melodic or rhythmical use of the native folk-lore, though acquainted with it from childhood. It is rather a generalized impression received in the country. For the theme and main development were written there, while the definitive form was given to it only recently.

No 1—Toward the Church—

"Iruskia yalgui bainolchen

"Sabalsen hastendu argia canta berrien."

Awaken, to listen to this "new" song! It is the one which has been sung ever since the birth of the Master and which repeats to us, there, the organ and the bells of Iholdy.

And after all, what is better than getting up with the birds in the morning, on a beautiful Sunday, the farm in order, the cares under the sandals? For it is a beautiful Sunday! The great sower, he has not yet arisen; but in the sky which is over the mountains one feels him coming to the fields.

Come then away! Let us sing, let us dance already; and once in a while shall we stop a little to hearken to the voice of God rising from the villages. And then let us enter the church, leaving the door open behind us, so that our mingled songs may escape, awakening the dead and hastening the step of the living lingering on the road.

No. 2—At the game of Pelote—

Carlos quintoren baratzan

"Muthilak pilota" dansan.

Hogoi! Falta, by the devil! Have you heard arrows whistling? They were not more rapid than the ball—Yo!

Yo! Yo! Do you hear how one laughs, with rage or joy? See how the players bound 'neath the regard of their sweet-hearts. They will not be handsomer at the dance tonight. Berrogoi eta bortz! Hey, more lungs, Crier! Those of the Gulpuzcoa weaken. Berrogoi eta hamar. Victory! Yo! Yo! Yo! Yooooo! Let me laugh, Pierretch! And may my throat tear, may my heart burst, but that my triumphant Irrintzina resound from the plain to the mountain, from the mountain to Spain, from Spain to the sea, meowing the victory of those of Anoa!

No. 3—Before a White House—"Han bizi naiz ni bakean" (Elisambuzu: "Haitz mendia," Sarre).

Do you see that little white house, on the top of the green hill? A fountain runs by its side, and three ancient oaks o'ershadow it. It is here that I live in peace.

At each St. John's day a new coat of lime clothes it in a Sunday dress of young girl. And however—Etche gai-choa! ("poor house")—how the lines of its roof dances, how its walls lean, so wearily! For it is there, behold, that were opened to the light and closed in death the eyes of my forefather's fathers.

Thus, how many times, at this same hour, has the sun descended behind it, off beyond the mountains? How many times, like now, my little white house, has the gleam of the lamp illumined the window since the lost epoch when the tender will of two lovers created you on the green hill?

No. 4—At the Feast Aita Gaiztoa Tabernandago Picaro Jocalaria!

On then! What a Sabbath, Madame Marie! Is it the tamborine of the fat chiripi that I hear, or a hogshead that one smashes? It is the battle to the death of the cider and the wine! They are worth nothing to mature folks, these larks. Yet, nevertheless, it is so good to hear the laugh of the young and to reintonate in the evening the songs of the dawn!

The girls dance, the boys sneer; the drinkers brawl their songs of labor. And in all this hubbub I mingle prudently the holy chant of the morning, even though the wine of Irroulegui dulls my memory. For the Cascarotes intrude now; and, among these bohemians of bewitched glances, who knows where this dance might lead us which sweeps everything, this enraged arinarin where the buck-footed Mister Debroua (the Devil) is sure to sneak in.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1918-19.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

HENRI RABAU, Conductor.

TWENTY-THIRD PROGRAMME

SATURDAY, APRIL 26, AT 2.30 P.M.

SATURDAY, APRIL 26, AT 8 P.M.

RABAU.

SYMPHONY in E minor, No. 2

I. Allegro moderato

II. Andante

III. Allegro vivaci

IV. Allegro; Andante

(First time at these Concerts)

MÉHUL,

AIR, "O des amants le plus fidèle," from 'Ariodant' Act II., Scene II.

BACH,

MOVEMENTS from the SUITE in B minor No. 2, for Flute and Strings

I. Polonaise with Double: Moderato

II. Rondo; Allegretto espressivo

III. Badinerie: Presto

(FLUTE SOLO, Georges Laurent)

MOUSSORGSKY,

SONGS with Orchestra

I. "Serenade of Death"

II. "On the Banks of the Don"

III. "On the Dnyéper"

BEETHOVEN,

OVERTURE to Goethe's "Egmont," op. 84

Soloist:

SOPHIE BRASLAU

Sophie Braslau

(Photograph by Mishkin)

Ablest of the Younger Altos of the Metropolitan Opera House and Assisting Singer at the Symphony Concerts of Saturday

SYMPHONY GIVES ITS 23D CONCERT

Herald — Apr. 27/19
Audience Pays Impressive Tribute to Conductor Rabaud

RECALLS HIM TWICE TO GIVE OVATIONS

By PHILIP HALE

The 23d concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Rabaud conductor, announced for Friday afternoon, was postponed until yesterday afternoon on account of the parade. The concert was repeated last night. The program was as follows: Rabaud, Symphony, No. 2, E minor (first time at these concerts); Mehul, Recitative, "Que dis-je?" and Aria "O des Amants, le plus fidele" from "Ariodant" (Sophie Braslau of the Metropolitan Opera Company); Bach, Polonaise, Rondo and Badinerie from Suite No. 2, B minor, for flute and strings (George Laurent, flute); Moussorgsky, Three Songs with orchestral accompaniment; Death's Serenade, the Banks of the Don, On the River Dnieper (Miss Braslau); Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont."

Mr. Rabaud's symphony was first played in Paris in 1899, when he was 23 years old. It was played under his direction. For this work he was awarded the Monbinne prize of 3000 francs. The symphony was heard in Boston 11 years ago at one of Mrs. R. J. Hall's concerts, conducted by Mr. Longy. There have been four double performances in Philadelphia. The symphony has been played by the New York Symphony orchestra, the Chicago Symphony orchestra, the Minneapolis Symphony orchestra, and it was performed at the Worcester Festival of 1917.

A prize composition is often and justly looked on with suspicion. To satisfy the average judges, the work must be strictly orthodox; all the conventions must be observed; above all, there must be no trace of originality.

Mr. Rabaud's Symphony is a brilliant exception to the rule. While the workmanship displayed must have satisfied the most critical, the music is far from being pedantic. There is no counterpoint merely for counterpoint's sake. The fresh, vigorous, beautiful themes are developed in an interesting and often dramatic manner. While the different movements are well contrasted, there is a unity of the whole by reason of the ingenious and at times unexpected use in the later movements of preceding themes. The announcement of the virile motif at the beginning at once arouses attention. This and the next theme are followed by a pleasing song for the oboe. This thematic material is worked out in masterly fashion. The whole movement is strongly dramatic, but not theatrical. Here, as in the movements that follow, the hearer recognizes a composer of a sensitive, poetic nature, whose innate virility is controlled by a fine, not finical taste.

This first movement, energetic, now melancholy, wistful, now exultant, is on the whole the expression of a perturbed soul. The slow movement and the Scherzo are in a different vein. The former has for its chief subject an impressive Chorale of quiet, solemn melody. This theme is used in the following movements with marked effect. It is introduced in the Scherzo, after a light and tripping first subject, introduced with great cunning; witness the violent of it skillfully orchestrated. And in this Scherzo, as in the other movements, Mr. Rabaud has shown that he knows when to stop. He does not insist too strongly on an idea though it may please him; he is not enamored of his own thoughts; he does not repeat, dilute, weary. In some respects the Finale is the most striking movement of the four. The opening, whirling measures, the mysterious mutterings, the voices hinting, prophesying, stir the imagination of the hearer. And in the Finale as in the Scherzo, the mood is suddenly changed, by the introduction of quieter, contemplative measures. Nor is the apotheosis a blatant appeal, a trap set for the applause of the unthinking.

The production of this symphony is one of the leading features of a season that has been remarkable for the excellence of the programs and for the bringing out of many unfamiliar works that richly deserved a hearing. The reception given to this symphony yesterday afternoon was much more than a compliment to a departing and honored guest. The music itself made an immediate and deep impression. At the end, when Mr. Rabaud was recalled the second time, not only the orchestra, but the audience rose spontaneously and paid a tribute long to be remembered.

Mr. Rabaud sensibly gave only three of the seven movements in Bach's

Suite. These afforded Mr. Laurent, the solo flutist, opportunity to show his skill and taste, as he had already done in the Scherzo of the symphony, as he had already done at concerts in the past.

Miss Braslau, who sang here at a subscription concert for the first time, brought out an air in the grand style from Mehul's forgotten opera. The aria is interesting, and not only as an example of the heroic French manner of 120 years ago. There is a dignity, a nobility in this air, so that one can understand the enthusiasm of Berlioz. Miss Braslau, whose voice is a rich one, of liberal compass, also of true contralto quality, sang the old music dramatically and with full appreciation of the varied emotional contents. It was a pleasure to hear Moussorgsky's songs, which she sang in Russian. Here, again, she sang dramatically, but she did not overstep the line that separates the concert from the opera. And how the three songs differed! Death serenading the maiden who at last is his; the charming song of the garden by the Don, with Masha coming from the well; and then the savage cry of the Cossack to the river Dnieper, foretelling the triumph of Ukraina; singularly effective, the three, as Miss Braslau sang them.

RABAUD CHARMS IN 2 CONCERTS

Adv. + Am. Apr. 27, 1919.
Second Symphony a Worthy Work; Composers Prefer Not to Conduct

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

PROGRAM.

Rabaud. Symphony in E major.
Mehul. Air from "Aroldant."
Soloist, Miss Sophie Braslau.
Bach. Three movements from B minor suite.
Moussorgsky. Three songs with orchestra.
Miss Braslau.
Beethoven. "Egmont" overture.

At this concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon and repeated in the evening, we find revealed the true reason why M. Rabaud goes back to Paris: A little fatigue, a good deal of home sickness, but chiefly the desire to get back to composition. A man who can write so clear and symmetrical a symphony does not care greatly for conducting.

Spite of Berlioz and Wagner, of Richard Strauss and Mendelssohn, the average composer does not long for conducting, while the thorough conductor had better give up composition. When Hans Richter took up conducting as his life work he put all his compositions in the stove, lit them, and made a cup of coffee over the flames. After that cup of coffee he became one of the greatest of conductors.

The Rabaud symphony explains also why we have had little of the extreme modern French school in our programs, for it moves along the regular path which St. Saens and Franck trod, and it does not indulge in eccentricities or vagaries. There is good counterpoint, fine interweaving of themes, and these themes are intelligible if somewhat sombre at times. The first movement is tragic, just as Franck's D minor symphony is mournful.

A STRIKING COMBINATION.

The slow movement also has some sorrowful touches, but there is a tranquil, chorale-like theme in contrast. Only in the third movement does a lighter mood set in, and here, against the dance-like theme, comes the chorale-like melody of the second movement, a striking combination. The working up of this theme, both in the second and third movements is masterly and again reminds strongly of the style of Cesar Franck, although more dramatic than that master.

There is more thematic transference in the finale, both from the second and the first movement, combined with new subject matter. It is again plaintive and sorrowful. Although there are major effects at the final climax and a return of chorale treatment, chief emotion of the work is struggle rather than triumph. We long for a bit of Schumann's broad virility at the close. The third movement seemed to receive the most appreciation, but we found the turbulence of the first movement and the skilful combinations of the finale the most masterly portions of the work. At the end of it (in the afternoon) the orchestra and the audience rose and gave M. Rabaud a triumph such as is accorded to few composers in Boston.

The three movements from Bach's Suite for flute and strings require no new analysis. They showed that Bach is by no means the "dry-as-dust" composer that the uneducated imagine him to be. But they were almost new in the beauty of the flute-playing, especially in the coquettish "Badinerie." Our orchestra is to be congratulated on having two such artists as M. Georges Laurent and M. Georges Longy in its woodwind department. M. Laurent was vociferously applauded.

THE SCREAM OF VICTORY.

If the note of triumph was somewhat lacking in the opening work of this program, it was made up by the screams of Victory in the last number. We are told that "Freedom shrieked when Kosciusko fell" (he may have fallen on her toes) but she fairly yelled, according to Beethoven, after Egmont lost his head. Beethoven was always frenzied when he had Liberty for a subject, and the work was given with all the spirit which it demanded, the piccolo fully earning its salary, and the violins scaling the heights bravely, in the coda.

Miss Braslau won success in some entirely unfamiliar numbers. Mehul's music is seldom heard nowadays outside of France. We only remember him as the composer who once wrote an opera without any violins, at the request of Napoleon Bonaparte. Yet the air from "Aroldant" was very attractive and melodic, although the progressions in these old French operas are somewhat too obvious. Even Miss Braslau's noble alto could not make this number a thriller. But there was plenty of dramatic force in the first and last of her three songs by Moussorg.

The last song, "On the Dnieper," fairly waded in Bolsheviki style, in Polish and Jewish blood, and the music was exciting as the words. Miss Braslau sang it superbly, and in Russian, which is a sufficiently musical tongue to be called the Italian of the North.

The artist was recalled over and over again with great enthusiasm. The originality of the songs and the work of the singer deserved the tribute.

Mr. Rabaud's Symphony

Specialty for The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, Massachusetts—At one of Mrs. R. J. Hall's orchestral concerts given in this city more than 11 years ago, among the numbers heard was a symphony by Henri Rabaud. Both the composer and his works were unknown here except to a very few, and none among those who heard the work had the least idea that in the years to come the composer would be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and that his symphony would be heard at one of the regular concerts under the composer's direction. But it was just this that happened at the twenty-third symphony concert on April 26, the last but one in the present series.

While Mr. Rabaud's symphony (his second in E minor, op. 5) has been given several times during the past few years, the performance at this concert was the first in Boston, also believed to be the first in the country under the composer's direction. And so this last performance must have been the most authoritative of any given previously.

Mr. Rabaud won the Monbinne prize of 3000 francs with this second symphony, in 1899. And for once here is a work which proves to be a notable exception to the usual rule that a prize composition is seldom worth a hearing after the first one.

This symphony is neither an example of the ultra-modern French school of D'Indy and later writers, nor modeled on the conservative ideas of the older composers as represented by Saint-Saens. At times there is a suggestion of Franck, and here and there a faint reminiscence of Wagner, but all in all it is something more than pedantic or classically academic, for the themes are vigorous, and highly pleasing, worked out in a most interesting manner. The first movement is highly original and of many moods, from grave to gay, which suggest a little uncertainty as to just what the composer had in mind. The slow movement is distinguished by an impressive chorale, and this as a subject is heard as well in the scherzo which follows. This scherzo, by the way, is in Mr. Rabaud's happiest vein. The finale is many-sided in its thought, and there are many who will consider this movement the best of the four. Be this as it may, the symphony impressed greatly on the first hearing after many years. Its reception was far more than a farewell compliment to Mr. Rabaud, and it is pleasant to say that at the conclusion, both in the afternoon and in the evening, not only was the composer recalled several times, but that both orchestra and audience rose in their seats: a tribute as deserving as it was spontaneous.

Mr. Rabaud also gave three movements of the Bach B minor suite for flute and strings, and Mr. Laurent again showed his virtuosity in unmistakable manner. There was also an admirable performance of Beethoven's "Egmont" overture.

344

Between these numbers, Sophie Braslau, contralto of the Metropolitan Opera House, sang in admirable voice an unfamiliar aria from "Ariodant," one of Méhul's forgotten operas, also three songs of Moussorgsky. Most of the texts were gloomy in spirit, but the music was varied and interesting.

RABAUD'S RENDITION BRILLIANT

Post — Nov. 27/19
Beethoven's Overture

Features Next to Last Concert

BY OLIN DOWNES

The programme of the last Boston Symphony concert, but one, of the season, given yesterday afternoon, Henri Rabaud conducting, was as follows: Symphony No. 2 in E minor, op. 5, Rabaud; recitative and aria, "Odes Amants," from Méhul's "Ariodant"; Polonaise, Rondo and Baderie, from Bach's suite in B minor for flute and strings; three songs by Moussorgsky, with orchestral accompaniment, "Death's Serenade," "The Banks of the Don" and "On the River Dnieper"; overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Beethoven. Miss Sophie Braslau, contralto, of the Metropolitan Opera company, was soloist.

OUTSTANDING FEATURE

The overwhelming feature of a brilliant concert was the performance of Beethoven's overture. In at least 20 years it has not been so impressively interpreted in Boston, nor is it easy to conceive of a nobler, more dramatic conception than Mr. Rabaud's. It is astonishing, indeed almost incredible, but the fact not to be fairly or logically denied is that in the passage of years mentioned no German conductor has so thrilled and at least momentarily ennobled his hearers in performing the works of the great master. Beethoven, too, was a man who loved freedom. There has never been in the experience of the writer such an opening of this overture, so moving a treatment of the second theme, such a grim and heroic overshadowing of fate through the allegro, so exultant and uplifting a conclusion. Nor is it the least praise of the conductor that during the performance one forgot him and felt the beat of the wings of a mighty spirit above the gathering.

Music Utterly Sincere

Mr. Rabaud's symphony was written by a youth of 25 or thereabouts in 1898 or 1899. It is not the symphony of an innovator. The structure, firm, logical, well-knit, is on conventional symphonic lines. There is felt the Mendelssohn-Schumann romanticism of years gone by in the first and second movements. The wonder is that after these years the music is so pleasing. The scherzo, with its passing reminiscences of themes from other moments, and its captivating touches of orchestral color, such as the episode for harp and certain wind instruments, appears to owe something to Saint-Saëns. And it is more Gallic than the preceding two movements in idiom. Themes of the earlier movements again recur in the finale.

The music is utterly sincere, poetic, retrospective in character. We personally find too much of the string choir and not enough variety of combination of wood and brass in the instrumental scheme. Nevertheless, because of the sincerity and fineness of feeling, the well-contrasted themes, of lyrical or dramatic character, and the substantial structure, this symphony gave much pleasure. The audience, which was very enthusiastic, stood at the end of its performance, to honor the composer-conductor whom it has come to so greatly admire and esteem in the course of the season. It was the least demonstration which could fitly be made to one who has rendered such distinguished service as the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Choice Is Excellent One

Miss Braslau is to be congratulated on choosing songs and an aria of worth and not fatiguingly familiar to concert-goers. The aria of Méhul is old-fashioned but dramatic, demanding both technical brilliancy and control and high interpretive ability of the singer. Miss Braslau made an excellent impression both in the recitative and in the aria which followed. She has a superb voice, which has filled out and developed greatly in its different registers and in its capacity for color and for the flexible expression of feeling. This was shown not only in the aria but also in the songs of a composer incomparable among all his colleagues—modest Moussorgsky.

23-4

The wild song of the Cossacks' battle with the Polish and Jewish hosts on the banks of the Dnieper is peculiarly suited to the noble quality of this voice and the breadth of style which Miss Braslau can obtain. "The Banks of the Don" is as charming as it is inimitable, Russian, idyllic in its spirit. "Death's Serenade," one of the series of "Songs and Dances of Death," which Moussorgsky composed under the inspiration of the verse of his friend and close companion of the early '70s, Count Golitscheff-Koutousoff, is a song to freeze the blood, a song in the macabre mood, all too representative of one of the phases of Moussorgsky's genius. The dying maiden, in the night sweet-scented with the odors of June, hears the voice of the gallant, Death, who plunks his guitar, comes nearer, and at last triumphantly enfolds her in his arms.

Next Concert the Last

These are not songs for every singer. Miss Braslau, singing them in the original Russian, interpreted them very intelligently, with vocal resource which at times, and rightly, sacrificed sheer tonal loveliness to rhetorical and dramatic intent. She was warmly applauded and recalled. An admirable foil to this music were the charming movements from Bach's suite, in which Mr. Laurent, first flutist, excelled.

The concerts on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will be the final ones of the present Boston Symphony season, and the "Pops" season will open one week from tomorrow.

RABAUD'S SYMPHONY AND SONGS FROM MUSORGSKY

Trans. — Nov. 28, 1919
An Interesting and Grateful Music Characteristic of the Composer and Conductor
—Miss Braslau's Vivid Russian Excursion—Intermezzi of a Double Day—Sabbath Entertainments—Mr. Monteux Goes to Paris

THE memory of man runneth not to a day wherein the Symphony Orchestra has undertaken two concerts—one in the afternoon, another in the evening. Yet this thing befell on Saturday—last probably, of the perturbations of routine, of the departures from habit, that two years of war and an autumn of influenza have enforced upon band and audiences. The parade of returned troops on Friday, preoccupying the town and actually passing Symphony

345

Hall, put out of the question the usual afternoon concert. It befell accordingly on Saturday; while four hours later followed the usual repetition of the evening. Possibly the audience at either was smaller than is customary; but otherwise there was no observable consequence. No doubt the players, being musicians in an orchestra "did their bit" in grumbling, since it is the nature of their kind so to do. No doubt, Mr. Rabaud, already fatigued by a long and laborious season and naturally spending himself to the utmost upon his own symphony, felt the strain of a double occasion. Yet doubled only the more gratefully and immediately, was the return. For in the evening as in the afternoon the audience not only received the piece with eager interest and hearty applause, but rose in its places, along with the orchestra, in tribute to the just deserts of the Parisian composer and conductor who has dwelt and worked for a space in this town. Nor were both companies lacking in warmth towards Miss Braslau, the singer of the day from the "jeune troupe" of the Metropolitan Opera House.

Though Mr. Rabaud's symphony—number two in E minor opus five—has entered concert-halls in the United States only in recent years, it is relatively youthful work, written and played for the first time in Paris in 1899. By date of original performance at least, no more than a month separates it from the tone-poem, "La Procession Nocturne"; yet it hardly attains the finesse of handling, the adroitness of imagination, distinguishing that piece and still more the opera of "Marouf" and the incidental music to Mr. Firmin-Gémier's version of "The Merchant of Venice"—all three heard in Boston or in New York during the current season. On the other hand, the symphony bears few marks of the direct influence of illustrious elders. There are obvious kinships between the temperament of Mr. Rabaud, as man and composer in youth or in middle age, and the temperament of Franck. The music of the symphony more than once reflects these affinities. Nor is it without mark of the formal procedures that twenty years ago who pant for "reminiscences," no doubt become part of the common and accepted heritage of contemporary music. Those who pant for "reminiscences," no doubt heard in Mr. Rabaud's measures occasional hint of Wagnerian harmonies, progressions, tonal coloring; but where in the music of the middle and conservative generation of European and American composers are they not to be spied out by superfluously searching eyes?

So far as affinities are concerned, it seems fairest and truest to say that Mr. Rabaud's symphony is in the direct line of the symphonic tradition as it descends into our day from Beethoven through

346

Brahms and also through Franck. The large manipulation of tonal masses through the first movement foreshadows in a way the Mahler who ran to excess with them. It was possible in the ascent and amplification of the choral theme of the second movement to hear a faint hint of Bruckner. But no Mahler and (outside Vienna) no Bruckner existed musically in 1899, least of all in Mr. Rabaud's Parisian world. Rather, all these incidental kinships lie within the circle of the classical symphonic tradition continued. By the same token, except in unclouded lucidity and in unflagging logic of design, Mr. Rabaud's symphony bears no distinctively Gallic ear-marks. Within those traits, it is a French music. Otherwise, in 1899, any heir to the symphonic ages, having also the composer's mind, heart and hand, might have written it anywhere.

To hear the music, however, is to take little thought of these coordinations. Rather, Mr. Rabaud's symphony interests the ear, quickens the mind, stirs responsive emotion and generally pleases the hearer by intrinsic virtue. The motives out of which he builds it and which he intertwines in the successive movements, are as clear as the day and as plainly characterized. In development and progress with them, in contrast and cumulation, Mr. Rabaud discloses no little technical resource and invention. The lay ear follows with unconscious satisfaction in such unified and rounded work, the course of the symphony; the expert listener finds many a detail interesting and piquant. The music, however, is no mere music of an expert craftsman. Throughout it is animated with clear depth and range of mood, with communicating warmth of feeling, with grateful play of imagination. Grave power and large emotion sway and swing the tonal masses, the advances and the recessions of the first movement. The second, with its choral motive, works the illusion of deep and ascetic aspiration—an aspiration characteristically Rabaudian in freedom from the occasional sentimentality of Franck and the frequent sentimentality of Bruckner, in a recurring beauty also, to which the mind rather than the heart answers the quicker.

Out of both divisions shines a clear candor, a warm insistence of melody; for Mr. Rabaud is not of those composers who stifle instrumental song in workmanship or strangle it after a few measures lest they seem too simple in a sophisticated time. The scherzo renews this melodic frankness, touches it with fancy, suggests through all its freedom of form and lightness of pace the fine masculine quality of Beethoven's scherzi. Beethoven-like, again, are the iterated rhythms of the finale; but more Franckian are the mounting brightness and the final advance into large, swelling, choral-like close. A reflective, a logical symphony, if the hearer chooses to exalt these qualities in the music; a symphony warm and even rich with grateful melody; a symphony of exemplary and painstaking workmanship; but also a symphony animate with the directness of feeling, the fine imagination, the justice in all things that underlie the grave, the ascetic, the sincere and the scrupulous Henri Rabaud.

There was intermezzo in the concert when Mr. Laurent, the first flute of the orchestra, played with the string choir three of the seven divisions of Bach's familiar suite in B minor; while for finale stood Beethoven's overture to Goethe's play of "Egmont." Beyond peradventure it is a noble and eloquent music, a large and heroic tapestry in tones. Beyond questioning Mr. Rabaud and the orchestra played it, as they usually play romantic pieces, with light and heat. And yet, and yet, how many times has it been heard at the Symphony Concerts; while other overtures, even some of Beethoven's own, repose year in and year out upon the shelves of the neighboring library! No doubt the late Professor Norton read in "Hamlet" daily with pleasure; but not all of us at the Symphony Concerts are Nortons with Beethoven. There can be too much of him in a season; the standard repertory is indeed a convenient thing; but it has been known to turn classics hackneyed. Fortunately, there was Mr. Laurent to freshen Bach's suite and a Rabaud leading it whose ear at last had compassed the true balance in such pieces between the solo instrument and the accompanying choir. For the first time this season Mr. Rabaud's Bach was plastic; for the first time, the interwoven voices sounded in light and just proportion. Mr. Laurent, in turn, was fated to those imitative measures in which Bach writes for a flute as though he were composing for strings. Yet the little master played them as though they were native and grateful to his instrument; while in them and in the rest the rare brightness, fluidity, and transparency of his edgeless tone no less praised him.

Yet, next to Mr. Rabaud's symphony, the interest, the excitement, of the concert sprang from Miss Braslau's singing of three songs out of Musorgsky as scored for orchestra by various hands. First she made her way through an air from Méhul's opera, "Ariodant," in the semi-classic French manner of the end of the eighteenth century—music in which she proved her command of broad and marching declamatory measures, of the grave and stately phrases marshalled by the composer into large, expansive and ornate line, music, indeed, for the richness of Miss Braslau's alto tones, her measured dramatic energy, her amplitudes of style. Then ensued the three songs of Musorgsky. In one, Death as ironic lover serenades the wasted maiden he is about to snatch from the joy of light and life—music that now caressed with its sensuous voice and again pierced with boding and bitter interval or harmony. Another song glowed warm and still with amorous longing for the maid who passed—and glanced—along the flowery path beside the river—a music quivering with the fragrance of the scene, the leap of the impulse, a music of distilled beauty. The third, of the Dnieper when the waiting waters run red with the blood of Jew and Pole slain by savage Cossack hands, burnt into the imagination with fierce and leaping fires, a superb chant of vindictive and rejoicing massacre, an infuriate, pounding, tribal music.

22-5

And out of all three and out, as well, of Miss Braslau's imparting song, various as the three pieces and in full accord with each, rose the wondrous quality that sets Musorgsky apart from other composers. He who writes longs for those rare moments when the word becomes animate with the thing it should bear. He who composes must long equally for the moments—as rare also in kind—when the tone is as this thing alive. Such moments Musorgsky knew oftener than most composers. For him there was but one impulse, one goal—this living directness, this transmuting of the sensation, white-hot and naked, into the expression. There are many such moments in his music-drama of "Boris"; of them, no less, and the more for Miss Braslau's singing, were the three songs of Saturday.

Miss Braslau and Her Songs

Miss Braslau's pieces at the Symphony Concerts of Saturday promise to be as interesting as her rich and colorful voice, as the warmth of her ripening talents. Seldom has Méhul's name stood upon a programme at Symphony Hall, where Cherubini has too long represented the Parisian composers of the end of the eighteenth century and the beginning of the nineteenth. Possibly some of Méhul's overtures to operas would prove quite as interesting as the two or three from Cherubini that still keep place in the repertory of twentieth-century orchestras. At the least the air from Méhul's "Ariodant" that Miss Braslau will sing should whet curiosity. The opera, produced in Paris in 1799 to no small favor, was built upon an episode in Ariosto's poem, "Orlando Furioso"; the particular air of Miss Braslau's choice is a monologue of a longing and anxious woman over a lover gone to fight for her against a "traitorous" rival. The singer's other numbers are three songs of Musorgsky, a rarer name even than Méhul's on the programmes of the Symphony Concerts, but with better reason. For Musorgsky wrote few orchestral pieces, while "symphonic fragments" are not easily detachable from his music-dramas. The first of the chosen songs, "On the Banks of the Don," runs in playfully sentimental vein. The second, "Death's Serenade," is more characteristic in the fashion in which the composer adapts lightness of form and manner to the ironic voice and mood of the sinister serenader. When death sings the beauty of the maiden whom he covets, Musorgsky, according to his wont, is bitterly sensuous. The third song, "On the Dnieper," is a savage and equally characteristic piece, exulting in Cossack victory over Poles and Jews. Upon their blood the great river feasts.

347

A Warm Leave-Taking for Mr. Rabaud in Cambridge—Girl-Waiters at The Pops—The New Boston Quintet—Items and Incidents June 25, 1919.

OF all the publics to which the Symphony Orchestra plays none, unless it is that of Providence, has been so warm to Mr. Rabaud as the audience in Cambridge. Last evening it heard him lead the band for the last time and it signaled the occasion by unusually long, warm and sincere applause. At the end of the concert it held him on the stage for three or four minutes while the orchestra stood around him. For the most part the programme was one from which Mr. Rabaud's more interesting qualities as conductor shone. Besides fragments from a suite of Bach to be repeated at Symphony Hall tomorrow, it comprised Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony in fresh, plastic, and animating voice; Saint-Saëns's tone-poem, "The Youth of Hercules," as polished as leader and orchestra could make it; and Weber's overture to his opera, "Der Freischütz," romantic and ardent music of the sort in which Mr. Rabaud excels. At every turn of the concert the band seconded the conductor, while the eager and warm-hearted audience stimulated both.

Items and Announcements

Mr. Monteux, the new conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, paid a brief visit to Boston on Saturday to adjust various arrangements for the Symphony Concerts next year before he departs for Paris. He will sail from New York next Thursday, returning to Boston to take up his work at the beginning of September—two or three weeks earlier than has been the custom of his predecessors. In Paris he expects to pick up more than one new and interesting piece, French, Russian, Italian.

Miss SOPHIE BRASLAU, the daughter of a Russian physician, was born in New York on August 16, 1892. Beginning at the age of six to study the pianoforte, she looked forward to the career of a concert pianist; but she sang as an amateur until she was advised to study seriously for opera. She made her first appearance in public at the Metropolitan Opera House, as the little Prince in "Boris Godunoff." She has taken these parts at the Metropolitan: Maddalena in "Rigoletto"; The Sandman in "Hänsel u. Gretel"; Hua Quee in "L'Oracolo"; Comare in "Crispino e la Comare"; Azucena (fourth act) in "Il Trovatore"; the Innkeeper in "Boris Godunoff"; Mercedes in "Carmen"; Shanewis in Cadman's opera of the same name. She has sung with leading orchestras in various cities at music festivals, and in concert. She is now engaged to take the part of Amneris with Rosa Raisa as Aïda on the October tour of the Chicago Opera Company.

She sang in Symphony Hall, Boston, on November 4, 1917, as a member of a quartet from the Metropolitan Opera Company (Mabel Garrison, Giovanni Martinelli, Arthur Middleton): "O mio Fernando" from "La Favorita"; songs by Tschaikowsky, Arensky, Manney, Huerter and di Nogeno; quartet from "Rigoletto." On April 14, 1918, she took part with Mr. Gabrilowitsch in a Pension Fund Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra: "Mon cœur s'ouvre à ta voix" from "Samson et Dalila"; songs by Rachmaninoff ("Do not sing, oh Maiden"), Moussorgsky ("The Classicist"), and Scholitt ("Eili, Eili").

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Indiscipline in the Symphony Orchestra—

A Subscriber's Complaint—Miss Braslau's Novel Pieces Trans. Op. 24. 1919.

THE following letter bears witness to the fact that frequenters of the Symphony Concerts are beginning to note an obvious disregard of discipline in the orchestra and to chafe under it. The note comes from a subscriber of many years' standing at Symphony Hall and says:

That the Symphony Orchestra, as at present constituted, is in need of stricter discipline and of a more serious spirit was exemplified at the concert of last Friday afternoon. In the overture to "Der Freischütz" the quartet for horns at the beginning was played so ill as to attract the attention of the most inexperienced listener. The four players seemed vastly amused by their own poor doings. The chief offender was wreathed in smiles for a considerable period, while two of the others, giving evidence of equal amusement, indulged in a lengthy conversation, possibly on the subject. And all this while the rest of the orchestra was making its way through the overture. A little Prussian discipline might well be exercised.

The fashion in which, last Friday, the four horn-players "dealt with" the introduction to Weber's overture was evident to every ear—no less than, on other occasions, the seemingly wilful blaring of the trumpets or the careless raggedness of the string choir. Whispered conversation while the performance is proceeding and the smile that mocks may also be observed from time to time in the orchestra as they were of old in Mr. Fiedler's final years. The truth is that like any other body of a hundred men, variously tempered and minded, the Symphony Orchestra requires a severer discipline than the kindly and conscientious conductor of the present season has sometimes laid upon it. If Mr. Rabaud were conducting an orchestra of Rabauds, all would have gone well, but not every player sitting under him has his fine sense of obligation and conduct. Possibly the incoming Monteux will maintain a more rigid rule and hold the orchestra individually and collectively more strictly to it.

In any case it is high time to have done with the pretty notion fostered of late in some quarters that the Symphony Concerts are "gatherings of friends and lovers of music to try over interesting pieces," or, as one voice put it, that they were becoming "homey" again. Somehow it is hard to believe that to be "homey" is exactly a desirable quality in public and costly concerts undertaken by a celebrated orchestra, presumably cultivating the highest standards of performance. The atmosphere of the music-room or the studio is pleasant enough, but it is hardly the atmosphere that rewards and stimulates in the concert hall.

The Little Master From Paris

Georges Laurent

(Photograph by Horner)

First Flute-Player of the Symphony Orchestra and the Ablest It Has Known for Long. To Be Heard Tomorrow in a Conspicuous So'o-Part

Miss SOPHIE BRASLAU, the daughter of a Russian physician, was born in New York on August 16, 1892. Beginning at the age of six to study the pianoforte, she looked forward to the career of a concert pianist; but she sang as an amateur until she was advised to study seriously for opera. She made her first appearance in public at the Metropolitan Opera House, as the little Prince in "Boris Godunoff." She has taken these parts at the Metropolitan: Maddalena in "Rigoletto"; The Sandman in "Hänsel u. Gretel"; Hua Queen in "L'Oracolo"; Comare in "Crispino e la Comare"; Azucena (fourth act) in "Il Trovatore"; the Innkeeper in "Boris Godunoff"; Mercedes in "Carmen"; Shanewis in Cadman's opera of the same name. She has sung with leading orchestras in various cities at music festivals, and in concert. She is now engaged to take the part of Amneris with Rosa Raisa as Aïda on the October tour of the Chicago Opera Company.

She sang in Symphony Hall, Boston, on November 4, 1917, as a member of a quartet from the Metropolitan Opera Company (Mabel Garrison, Giovanni Martinelli, Arthur Middleton): "O mio Fernando" from "La Favorita"; songs by Tschalkowsky, Arensky, Manney, Huerter and di Nogeno; quartet from "Rigoletto." On April 14, 1918, she took part with Mr. Gabrilowitsch in a Pension Fund Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra: "Mon cœur s'ouvre à ta voix" from "Samson et Dalila"; songs by Rachmaninoff ("Do not sing, oh Maiden"), Moussorgsky ("The Classicist"), and Scholitt ("Eili, Eili").

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Indiscipline in the Symphony Orchestra—

A Subscriber's Complaint—Miss Braslau: Novel Pieces Trans. Apr. 24, 1919.

THE following letter bears witness to the fact that frequenters of the Symphony Concerts are beginning to note an obvious disregard of discipline in the orchestra and to chafe under it. The note comes from a subscriber of many years' standing at Symphony Hall and says:

That the Symphony Orchestra, as at present constituted, is in need of stricter discipline and of a more serious spirit was exemplified at the concert of last Friday afternoon. In the overture to "Der Freischütz" the quartet for horns at the beginning was played so ill as to attract the attention of the most inexperienced listener. The four players seemed vastly amused by their own poor doings. The chief offender was wreathed in smiles for a considerable period, while two of the others, giving evidence of equal amusement, indulged in a lengthy conversation, possibly on the subject. And all this while the rest of the orchestra was making its way through the overture. A little Prussian discipline might well be exercised.

The fashion in which, last Friday, the four horn-players "dealt with" the introduction to Weber's overture was evident to every ear—no less than, on other occasions, the seemingly wilful blaring of the trum-

pets or the careless raggedness of the string choir. Whispered conversation while the performance is proceeding and the smile that mocks may also be observed from time to time in the orchestra as they were of old in Mr. Fiedler's final years. The truth is that like any other body of a hundred men, variously tempered and minded, the Symphony Orchestra requires a severer discipline than the kindly and conscientious conductor of the present season has sometimes laid upon it. If Mr. Rabaud were conducting an orchestra of Rabauds, all would have gone well, but not every player sitting under him has his fine sense of obligation and conduct. Possibly the incoming Monteux will maintain a more rigid rule and hold the orchestra individually and collectively more strictly to it.

In any case it is high time to have done with the pretty notion fostered of late in some quarters that the Symphony Concerts are "gatherings of friends and lovers of music to try over interesting pieces," or, as one voice put it, that they were becoming "homey" again. Somehow it is hard to believe that to be "homey" is exactly a desirable quality in public and costly concerts undertaken by a celebrated orchestra, presumably cultivating the highest standards of performance. The atmosphere of the music-room or the studio is pleasant enough, but it is hardly the atmosphere that rewards and stimulates in the concert hall.

The Little Master From Paris

Georges Laurent

(Photograph by Horner)

First Flute-Player of the Symphony Orchestra and the Ablest It Has Known for Long. To Be Heard Tomorrow in a Conspicuous Solo-Part.

Rabaud's Farewell Work

Boston Symphony Conductor, on Eve of Returning to France, Will Conduct Orchestra in His Own Composition This Week—Olin Downes Discusses Precedents

The performance of Mr. Henri Rabaud's E minor symphony, which will be played by the Boston Symphony under his direction this week, will have more than ordinary interest, partly because of the fact that this will be one of the signs of Dr. Rabaud's leaving—he sails for France immediately after the final Symphony concerts of next week—and more for the reason that we shall hear a man who is an important figure both as a composer and a conductor interpret his own work.

Composers have conducted and conductors have composed their own works many times ere this in Boston. What makes Mr. Rabaud's position unique is the soundness of his accomplishment in both fields. As a rule a man either conducts well or composes well, but seldom makes significant contributions in the two capacities. The composer who has appeared most impressively as composer-conductor in Boston in the last 20 years is undoubtedly Richard Strauss. He conducted unforgettable performances of his "Till Eulenspiegel" and "Tod und Verklärung" with the Philadelphia orchestra, and his "Don Juan" and "Don Quixote" at a pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony. Vincent d'Indy was guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a brief tour. He was a composer rather than a brilliant conductor.

Before his coming, Pietro Mascagni, who, it seems, will be known by one work, "Cavalleria Rusticana," electrified small Boston audiences by his interpretation of his own work. Gustav Mahler's symphonies have been played, but not by him, in Boston. Mahler has conducted here in opera and in concert, and in the belief of a majority in America he is greater as a conductor, as an inspired and lofty-spirited interpreter of the music of great masters, than as a personal creator of music.

This is still truer of Felix Weingartner, who is also well known as a conductor of opera and symphony in this city. Arturo Toscanini, possibly the greatest operatic conductor in the world today, whose performances of "Tristan" and "Die Meistersinger," will live forever in the memories of Bostonians who heard them, does not compose.

If you should ask Mr. Rabaud what he thought of himself as a composer, he would be very modest indeed about it. Yet his "Procession Nocturne" is practically a part of the modern standard orchestral repertoire in France and is fast assuming the same position in orchestral music here. Rabaud's second symphony was played at Worcester two years ago. It is not as modern as the "Procession Nocturne," nor perhaps as mature in conception, but it is a beautiful and romantic work, possibly tinged with Schumanish sentiment, and bespeaking Mr. Rabaud's fine balance and self-possession as a composer. As a composer he has been well content to write down to the very best of his ability what is in him, without imitating or following any particular fad of the time. No one, probably, is better acquainted with the works of all modern composers than Mr. Rabaud. He, as well as many others who are far more vocal, can also discourse from Ravel and Stravinsky, and quote them on the keyboard. But he has neither intentionally nor unintentionally emulated them. He has been neither doctrinaire nor propagandist for his ideas about music of the present or future. He has not been discontented to stand on one side and commune with himself in his scores. Composing is a passion with him—not a protestation. A man of means, he works in music absolutely for music's sake, and always sanely, always nobly, always for a high ideal.

To some men it is given to be sweepingly individualistic, to ride over everybody and everything because of the relentless purpose of the genius within. Intent on accomplishing objects so particularly their own that they have no room in their minds or time for anything else, these men go on their way, either fail utterly or succeed in changing the musical map. In the latter case they stand out, lonely, isolated, torch-bearers of an epoch ahead of that in which they live. Others drone on in the way appointed and paved out for them, well content to tread lightly in other men's footsteps, suspicious of innovation, fearful and indignant at these wild fellows who no sooner see something solidly established than they wish to knock it over and invite the chaos from which man and the whole solid world have emerged.

There are still others, and their value to their art and their public is incommensurable, who see ahead and behind, who, standing in the present, foretell the future by the shadow thrown forward from the past. They cherish everything that is great in their sympathize with all true expressions of the spirit of the race. They are in and they are outside of their epoch. The very breadth of their appreciation and the keenness of their critical faculty may make impossible the driving energy, the consuming concentration on a single point, which is the strength and the weakness of many men of creative genius. But this light of the broad mind and the big soul shines everywhere, illuminates and kindles whatever it falls on, and this breadth, this fineness this nobility of spirit, seem to us the dominating and invaluable characteristics of Mr. Rabaud as a musician, as a composer, as an orchestral interpreter.

Nothing that he has done in a whole season has been, musically speaking, small, sensational or merely effective. It would be disillusioning in the extreme for those who do not follow constantly musical performances to realize of how very few conductors this could be said. Mascagni, Muck, Weingartner, Mahler—this gate would be too small for one of them to pass through.

We hasten to add that each and everyone of these men have done great things, musically in this city. But it does not reduce them to the level of ordinary leaders to say that not one of them has been wholly guiltless of emphasizing the outside instead of the inside of music, on occasion. It might be rejoined that all men are human. Mr. Rabaud, too, is human. It is human to fall short, to err. But in this particular direction it is to the lasting glory of this noble-minded musician that he has never for an instant deflected from the line of absolute sincerity, self-effacement, purity of purpose. There is only one other musician of international fame of whom we would feel confident to say the same thing. That is Mr. Vincent d'Indy.

The astonishing thing is the manner in which this unalterable spirit on the part of the most kindly and modest conductor in the world has made itself felt in the Boston orchestra and on the part of the audience. Mr. Rabaud is anything but a martinet, in rehearsal. Other conductors have drawn the reins much tighter, and in some respects this is advisable. Like other mortals, orchestra players are human, which means childish at times, conceited, petty. They need a firm hand and an ungentle reminder when necessary, and even the orchestra of this saintly city is no exception to the rule. But in this same orchestra, where there is bound to be a certain percentage inclined to obstinacy and self-opinion, the enthusiasm and the profound knowledge of Mr. Rabaud have made their way. The dullest player has responded to his enthusiasm. Most orchestras have dead spots in them, because of the routine and lifeless attitude of certain players. The Boston Orchestra has not only been improved in its personnel since last season, it has felt new life circulating through it. The tone is getting back some of the glow and the vitality which it had years ago and then lost to a certain extent more lately. The players may not jump and tremble under the eye and the tongue of an notable slave-driver, but they respond voluntarily, in performance, to the spirit of the music.

Those who play under Mr. Rabaud speak constantly of the inspiration in his face and eyes. The audience does not see this, but the atmosphere in the hall is unmistakable. It is the atmosphere of those who play and those who listen, thrilled by the presence of art.

To enumerate composition by composition the admirable accomplishments of Mr. Rabaud in the course of the season would be tedious and unnecessary. It may be said briefly that he has won in greater and greater degree as the season progressed the confidence, enthusiasm and personal friendship of his audiences. He and Mr. Monteux have done much to illumine the darkness of those who held to the old and provincial notion that only conductors are made in Germany and only Germans can conduct German music. Mr. Rabaud's interpretations of Beethoven, for one example, are too recent and too impressive to need recapitulation at this time. His revelations (constituting in Boston tardy justice to the composers concerned) in interpreting modern French and Russian music have been equally notable, if more expected, than his masterly treatment of music of the German school. His programmes have been carefully and wisely selected from a repertoire already, in greater part, familiar to him. Modern English composers, Scandinavian composers, the Russian Tchaikowsky have been conspicuous by absence. Mr. Rabaud would probably reply that he had but 24 programmes for one season as leader of the Boston Symphony, that in such a space of time, consistent with reasonable variety and balance of content, he wished to give his audience the best possible results of his musical knowledge and experience. As it is, with the exceptions noted, the programmes have been broad and catholic as the anti-German sentiment engendered by the war made possible, and even with the enforced restrictions far more interesting, varied and vital and colorful in performance than the programmes of Mr. Rabaud's predecessor of former years.

Mr. Rabaud will take with him to France not only the kindly sentiments of his audiences, but their keen appreciation of all he has done for them musically, in vitalizing and refining the quality of the orchestral performances, in giving the Boston public the benefit of the feeling and artistic traditions of the French people, an element which has not been sufficiently strong in the past in orchestral music in America.

MR. RABAUD AND HIS BOSTONIAN PUBLIC

Transl. Apr. 14, 1919.
The Timely Word That the Trustees of the Symphony Orchestra Owe to Him and to It, Yet Still Overlook—Mr. de Gogorza and Mme. Samaroff in Wide Range of Their Distinctive Abilities—Programmes and Plans in Prospect

IF Mr. Rabaud, having completed the term for which he was engaged as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, is quitting the post at the end of the present season, it seems only fair to him and to the public of the Symphony Concerts, that the Trustees should make announcement accordingly, however uncertain yet may be their choice of a new leader, by three pairs of concerts in the current schedule remain. In the past, when a conductor was about to leave the orchestra, after able and familiar service, it has been the custom of the audiences to make these final concerts the occasion of signal evidence of good will; while at the last concerts of all, there have usually been some special rites. Opinions may and do differ as to Mr. Rabaud's abilities as a conductor; but there is none to question the disinterestedness and the devotion with which he has served the orchestra and its public in a difficult hour. Many admire him warmly as a musician; not a few are kindly disposed to him as a man; all agree that to the utmost of his powers and with no thought of himself he has filled the post to which he came reluctantly, which he has found taxing beyond expectation.

If Mr. Rabaud is about to leave the orchestra, he deserves every sign in appreciation of this virtue that the public of Fridays and Saturdays may give in these final concerts; while as certainly those audiences would welcome the opportunity to testify to the esteem in which they hold him. As circumstances now are, they know not what to believe. From week to week, Mr. Rabaud continues as conductor; the trustees let fall no word as to the future; and the inference is that the leader will remain in his present post. From week to week the air buzzes with gossip about Mr. Rabaud's intention to return permanently to Paris and to the composing he prefers to conducting; and the inference is that in the remaining concerts of the year he is leading the orchestra for the last times. From week to week a like gossip names this, that, the other conductor as his successor, and present and future become yet more clouded. It is quite true that the Trustees of the orchestra and sundry guarantors of their deficit dwell on Olympian heights: Where no frost nor storm is, in clear blue windless abysses, High in the home of the summer, the seats of the happy immortals, Shrouded in keen deep blaze, unapproachable . . .

Yet from those august silences, they might let down upon the waiting ears and the petitioning eyes of the mere terrestrial mortals of Fridays and Saturdays at Symphony Hall a word as to Mr. Rabaud's fate or Mr. Rabaud's decision. His hearers, his orchestra, his audiences, above all he himself, deserve as much. Thereafter, if he is departing, the summer, the indispensable, the saving summer stretches before the Olympians for new choice.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1918--19.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

HENRI RABAUD, Conductor.

TWENTY-FOURTH PROGRAMME

[Last of the Season]

FRIDAY, MAY 2, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, MAY 3, AT 8 P. M.

MACDOWELL

SUITE in A minor, op. 42

- I. In a beautiful Forest
- II. Summer Idyl
- III. In October
- IV. The Shepherdess' Song
- V. Forest Spirits

SAINT-SAËNS

ODE IN TWO PARTS on the Poem of Victor Hugo
 "La Lyre et la Harpe," ("The Lyre and the Harp") for Soli, Chorus, and Orchestra
 (First time in Boston)

The Chorus has been trained by STEPHEN S. TOWNSEND

Soloists:

Soprano: OLIVE KLINE,

Contralto: MERLE ALCOCK,

Tenor: ARTHUR HACKETT,

Baritone: REINALD WERRENATH

LEADER RABAUD SAYS FAREWELL

Conducts Superbly Last Symphony Concert of the Season

ADMIRERS GIVE HIM LOVING CUP

Ronald May 2, 1919.

By PHILIP HALE

The 24th and last concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra's 38th season, Mr. Rabaud conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: MacDowell, Suite in A minor, op. 42; Saint-Saens, "The Lyre and the Harp," Ode for solo voices, chorus and orchestra (poem by Victor Hugo). The solo singers were Olive Kline, Merle Alcock, Arthur Hackett and Reinald Werrenrath.

While MacDowell's Suite in A minor is a less important work than his "Indian" suite, it is delightful by reason of its freshness, its youthful vitality, its lyric grace, its out-of-door spirit, the poetic fancy shown in the movements, "In a Haunted Forest" and "Forest Spirits." This music is by MacDowell, the lover of Nature, happy in his home at Peterboro; the MacDowell that was not without a dash of Gaelic mysticism in his composition. To him the forest was haunted by strange woodland creatures. To him the trees of years were sentient, companionable.

Saint-Saens's Ode was performed in Boston for the first time. We know of only one performance in the United States before that of yesterday—the one at Providence, R. I., by the Arion Society, conducted by Jules Jordan, in 1882. The neglect of this work is easily explained. The English translation of Hugo's poem is a wretched one, pedestrian and clumsy. The music, written for a Birmingham (Eng.) festival, is almost wholly without inspiration. That it is "well made" may be taken for granted. Saint-Saens is not in the habit of writing carelessly. The orchestral score is often interesting in itself; but there are few expressive or effective vocal pages; nowhere are there measures that move or thrill the hearer. The nearest approach to any marked effect is in the closing section of the first part in which a tenor solo is followed by the chorus. The soprano solo that opens the second part suffered yesterday, no doubt, from the inadequacy of the singer. The baritone solo, "Be Glad! the Stream Her Channel Scouring," almost of an operetta character in bolero rhythm, will always be applauded when it is sung with the spirit and the admirable diction displayed by Mr. Werrenrath. Another reason why it should be applauded is that it awakens an audience overcome by the paleness of the music that precedes it.

It is not necessary to speak of Hugo's Ode, contrasting Christian sobriety with pagan sensualism. The text should have inspired highly colored music. Alas, Saint-Saens expression of pagan sensualism is as a rule sobriety itself.

The chorus, which had been prepared by Stephen S. Townsend, was worthy of a more impressive composition. Its attack, variety of tonal graduations, prevailing euphony, deserved all praise. Mr. Rabaud conducted in a masterly manner playing upon chorus and orchestra as upon a responsive, eloquent instrument. The concert will be repeated tonight.

An audience that completely filled the hall applauded heartily the movements of the suite, and recalled Mr. Rabaud many times. At the end of the concert the applause for him was enthusiastic and prolonged. It seemed as if the audience was loath to lose him from its sight. No conductor for the past 30 years has received so great an honor; no conductor has so richly deserved it.

For the past season has in certain respects been the most brilliant during the last 30 years. The programs have been of engrossing interest; the performances have often been revelations—revelations of how music by Frenchmen should be played; revelations of the tenderness, the beauty, the profound emotion, the grandeur in the symphonies and overtures of Beethoven. There are some unfortunate persons in Boston who still maintain that only a German can "understand" Beethoven. There are some equally unfortunate in the audience that like to characterize Mr. Rabaud as "academic." They have ears and hear not.

German propagandism is persistent and insidious. There are some in Boston that are uneasy at the thought of any one but a German serving as conductor of this orchestra. Those that do not attend the concerts, some that are in the audience, lose no opportunity of carping, sneering, making false statements concerning the "deterioration" of this superb orchestra; the "inferior" character of the programs and the interpretations.

Mr. Rabaud has not been chauvenistic. Some German-Austrian composers have been represented with 27 performances in all; six Russians, nine Americans, two Italians, one Scandinavian. Beethoven led with 10 performances. The other German-Austrian composers were Bach, Brahms, Liszt, Mendelssohn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Weber. The Americans were Chadwick, Converse, Foote, Gilbert, Hadley, Hill, Kelley, Loeffler, MacDowell. The Russians were Borodin, Glinka, Moussorgsky, Rachmaninoff, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Tschalkowsky. The Italians were represented by Verdi and by Malipiero.

The list of works performed for the first time in Boston or at these concerts is an imposing one. Equally noteworthy is the list of soloists that appeared at these concerts for the first time. Among them were Meses. Easton and Braslau, Messrs. Gogorza, Werrenrath, Cortot, Laparra, Levitzski, Fradkin, Helfetz, Thibaud, Bonnet.

Mr. Rabaud's departure is mourned not only by the audience but by the men of the orchestra, who respect and admire his ability, who have found in him a considerate, sympathetic friend. The affectionate regard of the chorus was shown yesterday afternoon after the concert, when the members presented him with a handsome loving cup and sent to Mme. Rabaud a copy of the Paul Revere pitcher. Judge Cabot of the board of trustees presented these gifts with a few well-chosen words. Mr. Rabaud, touched by these tokens of the esteem in which he is held, expressed his gratitude in French and in English.

He bears with him the good-will and best wishes of his hearers. He will not soon be forgotten. His work and his influence will long outlive this season. As a conductor and a composer he has made for musical righteousness in this city. As a man, he has won all hearts by his sincerity, his modesty, his simplicity, his personal charm. The gallant nation of France, the nation of the finest arts, could not have sent to us a more accomplished and gallant gentleman.

May 3, 1919.
Mr. Rabaud Ends His Season

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The Friday afternoon concert of the concluding pair of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season was made memorable by the warmth of the greeting accorded Mr. Rabaud, both before and after the program, and by the presentation to him of a cup by the chorus which has assisted at two concerts.

The presentation took place at a reception with Major Higginson, the founder of the orchestra; Judge Cabot, the president of the board of trustees; Mr. Rabaud, and Mr. and Mrs. Stephen Townsend receiving. Judge Cabot made the presentation speech, voicing the appreciation of the conductor's efforts with orchestra and chorus, and Mr. Rabaud responded feelingly. There was also a gift for Mrs. Rabaud which consisted of a duplicate of a Paul Revere pitcher in the Boston Museum of Fine Arts.

The feature of the final concert of the thirty-eighth symphony season was the performance for the first time in Boston of Saint-Saëns' "The Lyre and the Harp," a setting of Victor Hugo's ode for solo voices, chorus, and orchestra. This is an "order work" written for the Birmingham Festival of 1879. Nearly 37 years ago, Jules Jordan produced the work in Providence, Rhode Island, for the first time in the country, and shortly after there was a performance in the old Chickering Hall, New York. Since then, for some reason, "The Lyre and the Harp" has not been heard until the present.

On a first hearing, the general impression is, that it is better than the usual "order" composition, but as a whole, not in Saint-Saëns' greatest manner. The work is divided into a dozen sections, or stanzas, with an orchestral prologue, and choral epilogue. Some of the sections are full choral, others, for solo voices, and one for vocal quartet. The scoring is full, including two harps, and also with a large use of the organ, as might be expected, for was not Saint-Saëns one of the greatest organists of his time, and was not the work written for an occasion where the organ is much in evidence?

The prologue, or as stated, prelude, opens mainly with organ solo, with the gradual addition of the orchestra. The first chorus is contrapuntal in character and well worked out. Some of the succeeding solo numbers are without especial distinction, but the tenor solo, with chorus, "God, the monarch of all creation," proved especially interesting. Undoubtedly, the gem of the whole work is the baritone solo "Be glad! The stream her channel scouring," a sort of vocal minuet, with dainty orchestration. The epilogue for chorus makes a quiet ending.

The soloists were Olive Kline, soprano, Merle Alcock, contralto, Arthur Hackett, tenor, and Reinald Werrenrath, baritone. They did well, individually and collectively, although some of the solo numbers were not interesting from a melodic standpoint. The chorus trained by Stephen Townsend was admirable as to voice and volume. And whether or not one would enjoy a second hearing, it can be said that the performance as a whole was superb at all points.

The other part of the program included the Suite in A minor by MacDowell. The five little movements are gems in their way, and the performance was in a truly ideal manner. And so Mr. Rabaud leaves Boston with the best wishes of all for a happy life in his own land as a composer-conductor.

RABAUD'S FAREWELL TO BOSTON

Symphony Conductor Given Parting Gift of Silver

Post May 3/19
BY OLIN DOWNES

The final Friday afternoon concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of the present season took place yesterday in Symphony Hall. The last concert of the season which Mr. Rabaud has conducted with such admirable results will take place this evening. The concert yesterday afternoon was in the nature of a leave taking between the conductor and his Friday afternoon audience, and the demonstration made by that audience showed how deeply it has come to appreciate, in the course of a season, the accomplishments of this gifted and brilliant leader. At the beginning of the concert "The Star Spangled Banner" was not only played by the orchestra, but sung by a large chorus.

GIFT IN SILVER

On every possible occasion—when Mr. Rabaud entered, after the opening performance of MacDowell's suite, in A minor, and the conclusion of Saint-Saëns' work for chorus, soloists and orchestra, after Victor Hugo's ode, "The Lyre and the Harp"—the quality and the duration of the applause evidently sought to speak in the characteristically undemonstrative fashion of New England audiences—of the esteem which it feels for this conductor and his work. Mr. Rabaud appeared to be much moved by this, acknowledging his greeting with characteristic modesty and indicating to the members of the orchestra his indebtedness to them for the achievements of a season.

Following the concert an informal reception for the conductor was held by Mr. and Mrs. Stephen Townsend and the chorus, whom Mr. Townsend has coached so effectively for the work with the orchestra during the past season. At this time Judge Cabot, president of the board of directors, presented Mr. Rabaud with silver tokens for himself and Mrs. Rabaud, who has remained in Paris. Mr. Townsend made a short speech and Major Higginson, founder and maintainer for so many years of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, wrung Mr. Rabaud's hand in appreciation of the conductor's accomplishments.

Has Won Artistic Triumph

Mr. Rabaud has won an exceptional artistic triumph in this city. He came unheralded. He was not known to the American public at all as a conductor. He was and is a very self-less man, not giving to practices and devices conceived to gain public attention. Mr. Rabaud had also to contend against a prejudice more or less unconscious yet deep-seated in a number of members of an eminently patriotic community: that great conductors are born only in Germany. Confronted with these conditions, and perhaps offending some by refusing in any way to work for their support or favor, Mr. Rabaud devoted himself to his task with an enthusiasm as effective as it was lacking in ostentation. He will be included in the list of the greatest conductors the Boston orchestra has known. Not the disciplinarian that his predecessor was, Mr. Rabaud has at least as profound a knowledge of his art, as broad a scholarship and deeper feeling, a keener ear and finer artistic sensibilities. No other Symphony conductor has shown so fine a sense of tonal values as Mr. Rabaud, save Wilhelm Gericke, who was inclined to be pedantic. There was a day when Mr. Nikisch, a virtuoso conductor of genius, led the Boston Symphony.

360

These are the three most salient figures in the list of Boston Symphony conductors of years past. Mr. Rabaud, who has without doubt his special limitations, and who has possibility not attempted to be the rigid drillmaster inaugurating a new regime, as might have been the case had he engaged for several seasons instead of for one, appears, on the whole, as the best balanced artist of them all. Mr. Monteux comes to Boston next season. It has been and it will be of great benefit to this city to listen to some fine French musicians at the head of the Boston Symphony.

Effective Solo Singers

The performances of yesterday do not call for extended comment, save that one marvelled again at the broad understanding and the quick sympathies of this conductor when he interpreted the charming pieces of the most poetic musical genius that America has yet known—Edward MacDowell. Saint-Saens' music was on the whole excellently sung by the chorus and by a capable and well prepared quartet of soloists, consisting of Miss Olive Klein, Mrs. Merle Alcock, Arthur Hackett and Reinold Werrenrath. But with due respect to the occasion and to the taste of Mr. Rabaud, we must confess that we found this composition deadly dull. As an impressive marshalling of choral and orchestral hosts, with effective solo singers, it is without doubt a valuable piece for an occasion. As such, let it be blessed and forgotten.

The dominating thought of the afternoon was regret at the departure of so remarkable a musician, so estimable a man as Mr. Rabaud, and gratitude for his invaluable services to this community. Long may he live and continue in the service and glorification of the art he loves!

M. RABAUD IN FAREWELL APPEARANCE

Adm. to Comm. May 19
Melodious Symphony Concert His Last Offering to Boston

CONDUCTOR GIVEN OVATION AT CLOSE

Works of MacDowell and St. Saens Ably Presented

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

PROGRAM.

MacDowell—Sylvan suite for orchestra.
St. Saens—"The Lyre and the Harp." Ode for solo voices, chorus and orchestra.

Everything was tuneful, popular and comprehensible in this last concert, at Symphony Hall, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, with which M. Rabaud took his farewell from Boston.

MacDowell's Suite in A minor is not his greatest orchestral work and it sometimes reflects the influence of his friend Raff, but it is tuneful and poetic, a graceful, unstrained work. First it pictures the "Haunted Forest" in which there is evidently the ghost of a piccolo player in the woods.

Very delightful is the third movement, "October," which is brief enough to be February, a brevity which we wish some of our over-swollen ones would imitate. It had just the glorious atmosphere of a New England Autumn, and the horns and woodwind are beautifully present in its measures.

"The Shepherdess" is chiefly flute supported by muted strings and horns instead of the oboe, which one would naturally expect in a picture of rustic innocence. The Finale is "Forest Spirits" (not moonshine whiskey, or Southron), and gives ghostly revelry of a sparkling, fairy-like, rather than of a morbid order. The whole work is one of the pleasant, enjoyable compositions of the native repertoire, full of poetic themes, well harmonized, well developed, well scored, and no attempt is made to astonish or to overwhelm anybody. Wherefore there was much applause.

SPICY INSTRUMENTATION.

St. Saens' "Lyre and Harp" is a comparatively early work, written for a Birmingham festival in England, and the composer is evidently careful not to become too abstruse for the audience he expected. There is fugal work, but never involved, and there are two guiding motives which even the youngest amateur can follow, and there are tunes and spicy instrumentation.

It is Victor Hugo's ode, representing Christianity and Paganism, upset into English by a translator who certainly deserves the booby prize. It is the weakest translation that we have seen in a long time. The Harp (Christianity) represents austerity and stern morality, while the Lyre (Paganism) is entirely given over to unseemly pleasure and frivolity, but the harp is copiously used in the passages representing the lyre. The subject is not a dramatic one, and becomes a trifle tedious.

There was a chorus of about 160, which had been finely trained by Stephen Townsend, who has done much good work on the choral side of these concerts. The soloists—Miss Olive Kline, soprano; Mrs. Merle Alcock, alto; Arthur Hackett, tenor, and Reinold Werrenrath, bass—were well balanced and generally good.

After a soft passage upon the organ, unison, and a contrasted theme which suggests that St. Saens had heard "Tannhaeuser," we get these two themes treated in alternation, giving the effect of a diluted Wagner. The Pagans go first to the bat with a chorus, "Sleep, Apollo's Fairest Son," after which the Christians get their innings with an alto solo, "Awake, Child of Poverty," excellently sung by Mrs. Alcock.

The club sandwich style of alternation is continued by a Pagan chorus and a Christian alto and bass solo, after which comes a more lengthy and important chorus, "Sing on, Jupiter Reigns," which makes the first score on the Pagan side. Jupiter reigns in a mildly contrapuntal manner and dabbles a little in fugue, as if Handel had replaced Wagner on the Pagan batting list.

361

This chorus, very well given, was the first important number, the accompaniment being finely developed and the whole being a good combination of classical and popular. Christianity now tries to even the score with a tenor solo and chorus, but in spite of the excellence of Mr. Hackett and the power of the chorus, the preceding number was the more worthy.

TWO POPULAR DUETS.

Part II. begins with a soprano solo, one of the large numbers of the work, and broadly and expressively given by Miss Kline. It pictures "The Eagle and the Dove," but here some partiality was shown, for while the eagle was not discernible the dove kept steadily cooing in the accompaniment, on the flute. That dove afterwards made her nest in "Samson and Delilah," for the downward chromatic sextolets of the flute were afterwards used to much better advantage in the great love song of that opera.

Two popular duets are in Part II., one for soprano and alto, and one for alto and tenor. Both were clearly tuneful and directly popular music. But the most popular solo number of the entire work is given to the baritone, another hit on the pagan side. It is rather Omar Khayyam-ish, and is entitled "Be Glad." It is intentionally a trifle superficial or vulgar, with drums, cymbals and triangle in the accompaniment to add to its spice. Of course it praises pleasure and does so in a bright three-eight rhythm, with a syncopation frequent on the second beat—a species of waltz with hiccoughs.

Sung by Mr. Werrenrath, which means that it was very well sung, this won a decided success and always will with the general public, although it is a little beneath even a Birmingham Festival work. Although applauded by the audience, it was at once rebuked by the Christian side who now came up for the final innings. A severe and stern quartet in which the theme of the harp (religion) was heard reproved this melodic frivolity, and then came an epilogue, short and indecisive, which did not inform us as to which side had won. It ended pianissimo and was excellently shaded.

This is a work which has direct melodies, clear treatment throughout, a sort of halfway house between scientific and popular music. But we scarcely found it the best number for our great symphony concerts. Altogether, then, the last concert of the season and M. Rabaud's conductorship was a refreshingly easy one, just a species of "omelette scuffle" dessert to the heavier musical banquet that had gone before.

RABAUD GIVEN OVATION.

At its close M. Rabaud had an ovation of which any conductor might be proud. He was recalled over and again and shouts and hurrahs rang through Symphony Hall, an affectionate farewell to a conductor who has conquered his way here.

But there was a little coda after all this. As soon as the public had departed on Friday afternoon, the chorus gathered in the foyer and had M. Rabaud brought before them. They then and there took revenge upon him for his use of the baton over them by presenting him with a silver loving cup. There was sly malice in this, for if he should stay in America he can only drink lemonade, ginger ale or milk out of it after July 1. But he evades this by immediately going abroad.

A large number of musical notabilities were present at this function, but it was best of all to see Major Henry L. Higginson recovered from his recent illness and gracing the farewell of the popular conductor.

SYMPHONY AUDIENCE FAREWELL TO RABAUD

Unprecedented Ovation for Retiring Leader

Yale — May 3, 1919
MacDowell Suite and "Lyre and Harp" of Saint-Saens Last Program

With the concert tonight, the 38th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have ended and with it the single year's conductorship of Henri Rabaud, who, by his own choice, will return to Paris, his home, there to find greater leisure for composition, and, it is said, to succeed M. Messager as conductor of the Conservatoire Orchestra.

There have been ample signs during the year of the deepening esteem and affection in which these audiences held Mr Rabaud. Again and again one might hear the remark, as one of the Symphony Orchestra's oldest subscribers said yesterday: "Mr Rabaud is a gentleman and he is a musician. We shall miss him." After his successor's name was announced in the newspapers several weeks ago, with the statement that Mr Rabaud preferred to decline the invitation of the directors to extend his contract, the audience on Friday afternoons, as presumably that on Saturday evenings, has been eager to show by fervor and duration of applause its regret and warm regard.

Yesterday afternoon, curiously discouraged rather than provoked by any momentary occasion to fan the higher personal enthusiasm or sentiment, there yet was a tribute given Mr Rabaud which cannot be recalled as offered to any other musician concerned with these concerts. Recalled three times alone at the end of the program, after he had brought out the four solo singers in Saint-Saens' cantata, the conductor was bidden farewell by hand-clapping succeeded by shouts and the pounding of feet, when not of canes, upon the floor. Obviously touched the conductor could only pantomime the sincerity of his appreciation to both orchestra and audience.

Insight and Scholarship

From week to week in recording impressions from Mr Rabaud's conducting, it has become singular to note how insistent was the recurring conclusion of a superlative beauty. The spirit of work after work was revealed, recreated, with more that was characteristic or poetic than had been recalled in previous performances. Consider his versatility in varying schools. In them it will not be easy to forget the distinction of his Schubert, Mozart, above all—Beethoven of his Franck and Debussy, Borodin and Rimsky-Korsakoff. He brought the same insight and scholarship to the American scores which he chose, and in his choosing he did not betray those for whom a "hearing" is more unkind than kind to the men who wrote them.

Of Mr Rabaud's program yesterday—what shall be said? Perhaps that it is most characteristic of the modesty of the man: Behold some laborers in the musical vineyard who court applause, who run to meet it, untroubled by perceptions or tact, to bask in its glow. But the retiring conductor appears to shun public adulation, as he would the plague. He would flee from it, go where it never more could overtake him, and if dragged back into its din, would plead for mercy. His manner is that of one there to aid in recreating the thoughts of the masters. With that done, he seems to say: "Ladies and gentlemen, I would much prefer you to applaud the composer, but if you insist, I must ask you to honor the orchestra also."

Another might have reserved for his last composition to conduct before this public some brilliant piece for orchestra alone, leaving such an effort as Berlioz' Roman Carnival overture or Chabrier's "Espana," something to play him off the platform in a spontaneous burst of applause, as a good starter to the farewell recalls and bows ad infinitum, etc., etc.

What happens? Either Mr Rabaud's good record as a program maker gets a fearful jolt, or else he shows symptoms of being a strategist. It may be that he is giving further proof of a personal admiration for the talents of the venerable Saint-Saens. Whether for these or other reasons he chose that composer's setting of Victor Hugo's ode, "The Lyre and the Harp," let some one else say. But this is clear, no score of the season has been so potent to combat insomnia or to allay excitement in an audience.

Artful Saint-Saens

Saint-Saens, urbane and a caricaturist among his many talents, may have said: "I am bidden to write a piece for Englishmen of this period (1879) to be performed at the Birmingham Festival. It must engage four solo voices, chorus and orchestra and, of course, organ. Remembering that the English revere Mendelssohn and worship Sir Arthur Sullivan, I shall beat them at their own game of sound, orthodox conventionality."

He did. The musical doctors of the cathedrals should have been delighted with it. There are a few enlivening reminiscences of "Samson and Delilah," which Liszt had brought out at Weimar only two years before, and Queen Victoria banned until years after. There are also tributes to Venus in "Tannhauser." But one gropes about for the Saint-Saens even of the second symphony.

The English translation is abominably adapted for the voices, for which the more credit to the four soloists—Merle Alcock, alto; Arthur Hackett, tenor; Reinald Werrenrath, baritone, and Olive Kline, a new lyric soprano who is worth a hearing in something better. Mr Werrenrath, in his banal but rhythmical number, reminding of the dance in Dagon's temple in Samson, had the only chance to stir the audience and used it.

There are sonorous chorus passages, others as in the epilogue of softly sustained harmony, which gave opportunity to the fine chorus superbly trained by Stephen Townsend.

MacDowell's suite in A minor of 42 began the program, music of an impassioned romanticist, whose Celtic imagination leaped to learn the secrets, the fantastic mysteries that peopled the fastnesses of nature. Music still fresh and vital today, nourishing the heart and purging the ear.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Yale — May 3, 1919
WARM FAREWELLS FOR MR. RABAUD
DEPARTING

Public and Semi-Private Tokens of Large Good-Will and High Appreciation—An Inauspicious and Slender Programme Divided Between MacDowell's Woodland
Suite and Saint-Saens's Boresome Ode,
"The Lyre and the Harp"—Musically, a Thin Afternoon

OF all conductors of his time Mr. Rabaud is surely the most modest, the most self-effacing. Yesterday, leading for the last time at an afternoon concert of the Symphony Orchestra, he took leave of one-half of his Bostonian public. This evening he will similarly farewell the other half. Now, Mr. Rabaud excels with the romantic music of French composers of the nineteenth century—of Berlioz, of Franck, of Lalo or Chabrier, of d'Indy in his earlier manner. Yet no such piece stood upon his programme for this final pair of concerts. Mr. Rabaud succeeds well with the highly colored, sharply rhythmized music of the Russians, like Rimsky-Korsakov; but he found no room for them in his list. Mr. Rabaud has read one or two symphonies of Beethoven—the fifth, say, or the sixth—penetratingly, warmly and has projected it largely, eloquently upon his hearers; yet no such number rounded out his year with the Boston Orchestra. It has been the nearly unvarying custom of his predecessor to signalize in some fashion the final concerts of a season. Yet as Mr. Rabaud assembled the programme and as conductor, orchestra, chorus and solo-singers accomplished it, yesterday afternoon ran in a routine that most of the preceding Fridays from November unto this May have escaped.

MacDowell's Suite in A minor—the music of woodland imagery—began the concert. It is a pretty, fanciful, tuneful piece that is thinning fast under the wear of time and change. It taxed neither conductor nor orchestra; the audience listened with easy pleasure to measures that might have come from Mendelssohn, less Mendelssohn's skill and imagination with instrumental color as such color went in his day. The rest of the concert fell to Saint-Saens's setting of Hugo's Ode, "The Lyre and the Harp," the dullest music that has been heard at the Symphony Concerts in all Mr. Rabaud's year. Again conductor, orchestra, chorus and solo quartet acquitted themselves ably, but they could not galvanize into semblance of life a mechanical and withered music. Parquet and balconies did their best to listen with interest, but before the Ode was half done, they yawned over this sandpapered Mendelssohn à la Française, A. D. 1879. Mr. Rabaud might becomingly have arranged these final concerts as epitome of his own abilities shining through French and German classics or semi-classics. Instead, he seemingly "consecrated" them to the greater glory of the dead-and-gone Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, disguised in the one instance as Edward MacDowell, American of Wiesbaden, and in the other as Camille Saint-Saens, Frenchman of Paris. It has been occasional reproach to some of Mr. Rabaud's programmes that he pretty-fied them with trivial, scrappy pieces, as though he, a conductor somewhat elderly in mind, though not in body, were providing "restful" entertainment for the elderly companies that hear and especially admire him. Trivial certainly were the two numbers of yesterday, but for the first time in all the year's experience of Mr. Rabaud, one and the longer, was downright dull. Yet manifestly the concert of Friday and the concert of today made double occasion for one of his usually stimulating lists.

Truly, the departing conductor is a self-abnegating man.

Yet with reason, the audience was not to be balked in its desire to testify its regard for Mr. Rabaud and its appreciation of the difficult work in a troubled time that he has accomplished, loyally, ably, without thought of self. It hailed him warmly when he came first to his place. At the end of MacDowell's Suite, it applauded conductor and orchestra as though they had just brought a masterpiece to revealing and enhancing voice. It did its best to clap the numbers in Saint-Saëns's Ode and fairly seized such occasion for plaudits as Mr. Werrenrath's orotund singing, for example, yielded. At the end of the concert, it repeatedly recalled Mr. Rabaud, while players, singers and hearers stood and some, even, shouted their farewells. Finally, after the audience had departed, a semi-private ceremony crowned the afternoon. Marshalled by Mr. and Mrs. Townsend and by Judge Cabot, chairman of the trustees of the orchestra, the Symphony Chorus gathered in the foyer behind the lower balcony and, with the judge for spokesman, gave Mr. Rabaud a silver cup, adding thereto a silver pitcher for Mme. Rabaud in distant Paris. The little ceremony was simple, sincere and deftly ordered. The more for this happy circumstance was the conductor plainly touched. What other tokens await him of the regard of his coworkers and his hearers, later incident may disclose and later record may tell.

Mr. Rabaud—a man of fine feeling in all things, except possibly his shadings of the German classics—paid his Bostonian public an agreeable and unobtrusive compliment when he divided his final programme between an American and a French composer. He was as happily prompted when he chose for the one our semi-classic MacDowell and for the other his own canonized Saint-Saëns. With one exception, however, MacDowell's orchestral pieces do not shine beside his "masterworks"—the more eloquent pianoforte Sonatas, for example. That exception is his "Indian Suite"—music that every European conductor at work in America has warmly and justly admired for richness of invention, energy of progress, largeness of mood, warmth of imagery, pictorial and poetic quality. In it and it only of MacDowell's orchestral pieces does the execution match the unfolding design, the prompting impulses. It is also music in which Mr. Rabaud, by many a token, would have been stirring to hear.

Instead the conductor chose the earlier Suite of forest scene and fairy suggestion. Throughout, it is mellifluous music that sometimes barely escapes naïveté of tune and that once and again courts a transparent prettiness perilously near to that of operetta. If these melodies run brief and thin they also run gracefully fancifully, while here and there a gentle wistfulness, a mystical mood, a glimpse of woodland vision agreeably colors or infects them. Indeed in the Finale of the revel of the Forest Spirits, MacDowell is close to light brilliance. Even in the days in which the Suite was new—the musically easy-going eighties that seemed to haunt Mr. Rabaud in this final programme—the harmonic and instrumental coloring ran none too rich. Now, to ears accustomed in such things to sensuous opulence or to the bite that is bitter-sweet, it sounds thin, pindling, as though the composer were painting in water-color and occasionally letting the white paper show. Yet by these shortcomings, this woodland music is more characteristic of the usual MacDowell—say of the songs and the lesser of piano-pieces than of the composer who was above his normal self in the finer Sonatas and who wrought his one tour de force in the "Indian Suite." Pretty pastime to hear remain these forest scenes, and a pretty shimmer of tone, polish of phrase, and lightness of accent did orchestra and conductor bring to them.

At the least MacDowell in his Suite was mildly amusing; while Saint-Saëns in his Ode was neither more nor less than bore-some. Pleasantly anticipating "The Lyre and the Harp," curious listeners wondered why, at home in Paris and abroad in both Europe and America, the music had been heard so seldom in the forty years of nominal existence. It had not proceeded for many measures before they discovered too plainly the grounds for this seeming neglect. Thereafter, theirs not to reason why it was resurrected at the Symphony Concerts; theirs but to do—if not to die—as courteous listeners upon an otherwise benignant occasion. To the technician, of course, Saint-Saëns is always interesting. Not a composer of his time has every working means of music so readily at his fingers' ends, uses them so expertly, gains his effects so precisely, lays on so neatly and variously his tonal brush-work, letting artifice glamor lack of animation, while polished surfaces hide inner hollows. Apt indeed in "The Lyre and the Harp" is Saint-Saëns's weaving of the choral parts, round run the phrases, smooth are the accents, clear the rhythms. A measurably exacting yet steadily grateful music to the choir, even as was Mendelssohn's before him. As well-made are the numbers for the solo-singers, chastely displayful of their voices, ingratiating to their hearers, pleasurably and piquantly varied in rhythm, march, color. The orchestra plays a short, low-voiced, sustainedly melodious prelude—presumably an invocation of Hugo's atmosphere of poetic vision. To like measures it returns with true Gallic logic, at the end. For an hour between, it discreetly and artfully accompanies the singing voices.

The rest is a well-made, perfunctory, brittle and withering music. Hugo's Ode in the original French is no masterpiece of visioning verse; in pedestrian translation into English it narrowly escapes banality; but in either it does contrast the sensuous pagan ideal of gods and men, life and faith, with the sterner Deity of the Hebrews, and the graven belief and practice of the servants of Jehovah. It is possible to conceive the Ode set in long duet for two voices in one of which should speak the Greco-Roman lyre, in the other the harp of David. Little, apparently, did Saint-Saëns take thought of these suggestions, obligations. To him the higher duty was to fulfill his commission from the Birmingham festival and provide a succession of viable and effective "Morceaux" pleasing to the assembled Britons as chorus and solo-singers ran them off as skilfully and conventionally. He has written his string of pieces, according to prescription and predilection, but with a polite disdain for either the clear substance or the inner implication of the text. For once he has declined even to be appropriate. The pagan notion of death smiles through a Eolero. Loves and hates speak the same artificial accents; the voice of the lyre and the voice of the harp are equally polished perfunctory, indistinguishable.

As Saint-Saëns delivered his Ode to the Birmingham Festival in the summer of 1879 exactly according to contract, so conductor, orchestra, chorus and solo-singers delivered it to the audience yesterday. The orchestra returned plastic accompaniment; clarity, warmth and pliancy of tone, smoothness of phrase, exactness of rhythm, niceties of shading and of diction—all the choral virtues in short—commended Mr. Townsend's choir; while one and all—Mmes. Kline and Alcock, Mr. Hackett and Mr. Werrenrath were as smooth and elegant with their solo or concerted measures as Saint-Saëns could have wished. Now and then, but far too infrequently through this drawing-room entertainment emerged the Rabaud, whom on other and more auspicious days, his audience had known as masterful conductor of masterpieces. As such it was sincerely regretting and speeding him.

H. T. P.

MR. HENRI RABAUD, REORGANIZER

May 3, 1919

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—On the stage of the Academy of Music, in Brooklyn, New York, a tall, bewhiskered, quiet, unassuming, obliging gentleman stepped out from the wings with the intention of thanking the orchestra players for their part in making a success of the presentation of his opera. He found himself in front of the footlights, and back of the footlights an applauding audience waiting to extend its congratulations to the composer for whom it had been calling.

Had Mr. Rabaud known that this was what he had to face, he never would have stepped from the wings. Mr. Monteux, the conductor, knew this, and only by the ruse of telling the composer of "Marouf" that he thought the musicians would appreciate a few words from him was he able to persuade him to step on to the stage.

This is the same man who, later, in Boston, when his own symphony was to be played by the orchestra which he conducted, said in reply to a question as to when he would rehearse it, "I do not think it will require much rehearsal. I know it; the men are fine players, and I do not like to trouble them with rehearsing my own work."

It was only at the earnest request of numerous patrons of the Boston Symphony concerts that Mr. Rabaud was persuaded to put this symphony on a program at all. It is interesting to record that at both performances of it audience and orchestra rose spontaneously to their feet as a tribute to the genius of the composer.

This is the sort of man whom future historians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have to place alongside of Sir George Henschel, who got the first band of players together, and William Gericke, who left a reputation as a hard drillmaster, but who gave the orchestra its ideal of precise playing which it has never lost and which now distinguishes it among the orchestras of the world.

Mr. Rabaud must be considered as reorganizer of this orchestra, for he came at a time when a Teutonic pilot had been dropped, and his task it was to steer the craft past dangerous shoals of threatening mediocrity and into the safe waters of Gallic eclecticism. The trustees of the orchestra wisely insisted that the conductor for the present season must be a Frenchman. They have made the same wise decision regarding next season's incumbent, Pierre Monteux.

Mr. Monteux, coming back as the regular conductor to the orchestra which he took in hand temporarily, will find a very different organization.

During the months in which Mr. Rabaud has been working with it, drilling, correcting, coordinating, and inspiring, he has gradually changed rigidity to plasticity, and coldness to warmth. There remains, however, much for Mr. Monteux to do. There are still in the orchestra many men technically American citizens whose training and sympathies are German. It was Mr. Rabaud's task to change the ideals of the organization; it will be Mr. Monteux's duty to see that there is no lapse.

Naturally in programs of the season the French school has predominated. Of the 104 compositions presented, only 25 were by German composers, and these were of the classics. Forty-eight compositions, almost half the total number, were of the French school; the rest were divided among Americans, Italians, Russians, and Scandinavians. Such a list cannot help but have given the audiences who have heard the concerts an appreciation of French music. The drilling and rehearsing must likewise have had an effect on the playing of the orchestra as a whole. Mr. Rabaud's work as reorganizer, then, is not to be measured in terms of men and instruments, but by that illusive measure with which one gauges ideals, and those are things whose force is cumulative.

Frequenters of concerts hereabouts will read with interest of the engagement and approaching marriage of Miss Renée Longy to Mr. Georges Miquelle, one of the French violoncellists of the Symphony Orchestra. The comely daughter of the excellent oboist of Symphony Hall, Miss Longy has been a familiar figure in our concert halls often as intent listener, sometimes as pleasurable performer. As Mme. Miquelle those who have known her as Miss Longy will expect to see and hear her with the old pleasure. Trans. May 2, 1919.

RABAUD'S FINE SEASON

Works of Allied Composers Were a Feature on All Symphony Programmes—Olin Downes on the Prospect for Native Music.

The Boston Symphony programme underwent important changes as a result of war conditions and the change of conductors made at the beginning of the season of 1918-19. There was less German music and more French music and American music and a good deal of Russian music. Yet German music was not absent from the programmes, although the conductors proceeded, as advancing allied armies proceeded during warfare, on the theory that a dead German was better than a live one. Dead German and Austro-Hungarian composers were worthily given place on the Boston Symphony lists to the number of 10. These were Bach, Beethoven, Brahms, Gluck, Liszt, Mendelssohn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann and Weber.

Twenty French composers were represented: Berlioz, Bizet, Bruneau, Chabrier, Debussy, Dubois, Dukas, Faure, D'Indy, Lalo, Laparra, Magnard, Massenet, Mehul, Rabaud, Rameau, Ravel, Rouget de Lisle, Saint-Saens, Schmitt. There were 10 American composers represented: Chadwick, Converse, Foote, Gilbert, Hadley, Hill, Stillman-Kelley, Loeffler, MacDowell, Smith. Six Russians: Borodin, Glinka, Moussorgsky, Rachmaninoff, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Tchaikowsky. Two Belgians: Van Campenhout and Cesar Franck. Three Italians: Gabetti, Malapiero and Verdi. Two English, if the name of Farnaby is to be added to that of Carey. One Pole: Chopin. One Norwegian: Grieg.

Modern English music, Tchaikowsky's music, with the exception of the variation for 'cello and orchestra played by Mr. Josef Malkin, the music of Sibelius, Sinding and other Northerners, were without representation, but as a whole the programmes were remarkably varied and balanced and made the most excellent musical fare. There were important novelties. Mr. Monteux provided two in the first concerts of the season, when he played Dukas' gorgeous ballet score, "La Peri" and Ravel's score, destined for a similar use, "Daphnis et Chloe." Ravel's work is more distinguished in material than Dukas' and the instrumentation is more imaginative and individual, yet the music of Dukas is very richly colored and pleasing to the modern ear. Among other things Mr. Rabaud produced were his own second symphony and his "Procession Nocturne," the last, in particular, a very poetic composition. Gilbert's dramatic "Prologue to Sygne's Riders to the Sea," Malapiero's "Pauses of Silence," a very interesting composition by one of the Italian ultra-modernists; the "Royal Hunt and Tempest," a significant page from Berlioz's "Les Troyens;" "Psyche's Sleep" and "Psyche Borne Away by the Zephyrs" of Franck; Hill's "Sten-sonia!" Laparra's "Basque Sunday"—there were others, but these are the most commanding of the novelties, and the most likely to remain for many years in the orchestral repertory.

Pierre Monteux, interviewed in New York by a representative of musical America, apropos of his engagement for next season as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said among other things that there has been "no great musical work growing out of the war, in France at least. Nor will there be for some time, I believe. Men's minds have been on other things. One writes, you know, to an occasion, and one cannot be equal to the occasion as it has been in France these four years."

We are personally naive enough to think that the time may well be at hand for America to produce some great music. The people here are changing with the times, or rather the times are finding them out, and stirring a strong latent idealism which plays a greater part in American character and development than some cynics who take their cut from Europeans' estimate of us realize. One has only to glance at the political and literary developments of the last seven years, developments which have progressed the more rapidly as the war called out the powers of the American mind, to realize that the nation is about to turn to self-expression in no small or uncertain vein. The younger generation has really commenced to think, and it has occasion and opportunity for thought as no generation in the United States has had since the wars for Independence and for the

366

During the months in which Mr. Rabaud has been working with it, drilling, correcting, inspiring, he has rigidity to plasticity, warmth. There is much for Mr. Monteux are still in the orchestra technically American training and sympathy. It was Mr. Rabaud the ideals of the orchestra be Mr. Monteux's there is no lapse.

Naturally in progress the French school. Of the 104 compositions only 25 were by Americans, Italian and Scandinavians. Such help but have given who have heard the appreciation of French drilling and rehearsal have had an effect on the orchestra. Rabaud's work as is not to be measured and instruments, measure with the ideals, and those force is cumulative.

Renee Longy, Pianist.

Frequenter of concerts hereabouts will read with interest of the engagement and approaching marriage of Miss Renée Longy to Mr. Georges Miquelle, one of the French violoncellists of the Symphony Orchestra. The comely daughter of the excellent oboist of Symphony Hall, Miss Longy has been a familiar figure in our concert halls often as intent listener, sometimes as pleasurable performer. As Mme. Miquelle those who have known her as Miss Longy will expect to see and hear her with the old pleasure. Trans. May 2, 1919.

RABAUD'S FINE SEASON

Works of Allied Composers Were a Feature on All Symphony Programmes—Olin Downes on the Prospect for Native Music.

Post May 12/19
The Boston Symphony programme underwent important changes as a result of war conditions and the change of conductors made at the beginning of the season of 1918-19. There was less German music and more French music and American music and a good deal of Russian music. Yet German music was not absent from the programmes, although the conductors proceeded, as advancing allied armies proceeded during warfare, on the theory that a dead German was better than a live one. Dead German and Austro-Hungarian composers were worthily given place on the Boston Symphony lists to the number of 10. These were Bach, Beethoven, Brahms, Gluck, Liszt, Mendelssohn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann and Weber.

Twenty French composers were represented: Berlioz, Bizet, Bruneau, Chabrier, Debussy, Dubois, Dukas, Faure, D'Indy, Lalo, Laparra, Magnard, Massenet, Mehul, Rabaud, Rameau, Ravel, Rouget de Lisle, Saint-Saens, Schmitt. There were 10 American composers represented: Chadwick, Converse, Foote, Gilbert, Hadley, Hill, Stillman-Kelley, Loeffler, MacDowell, Smith. Six Russians: Borodin, Glinka, Moussorgsky, Rachmaninoff, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Tchaikowsky. Two Belgians: Van Campenhout and Cesar Franck. Three Italians: Gabetti, Malapiero and Verdi. Two English, if the name of Farnaby is to be added to that of Carey. One Pole: Chopin. One Norwegian: Grieg.

Modern English music, Tchaikowsky's music, with the exception of the variation for cello and orchestra played by Mr. Josef Malkin, the music of Sibelius, Sinding and other Northerners, were without representation, but as a whole the programmes were remarkably varied and balanced and made the most excellent musical fare. There were important novelties. Mr. Monteux provided two in the first concerts of the season, when he played Dukas' gorgeous ballet score, "La Peri" and Ravel's score, destined for a similar use, "Daphnis et Chloe." Ravel's work is more distinguished in material than Dukas' and the instrumentation is more imaginative and individual, yet the music of Dukas is very richly colored and pleasing to the modern ear. Among other things Mr. Rabaud produced were his own second symphony and his "Procession Nocturne," the last, in particular, a very poetic composition. Gilbert's dramatic "Prologue to Synge's Riders to the Sea;" Malapiero's "Pauses of Silence," a very interesting composition by one of the Italian ultra-modernists; the "Royal Hunt and Tempest," a significant page from Berlioz's "Les Troyens;" "Psyche's Sleep" and "Psyche Borne Away by the Zephyrs" of Franck; Hill's "Steensonia!" Laparra's "Basque Sunday"—there were others, but these are the most commanding of the novelties, and the most likely to remain for many years in the orchestral repertory.

Pierre Monteux, interviewed in New York by a representative of musical America, apropos of his engagement for next season as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said among other things that there has been "no great musical work growing out of the war, in France at least. Nor will there be for some time, I believe. Men's minds have been on other things. One writes, you know, to an occasion, and one cannot be equal to the occasion as it has been in France these four years."

We are personally naive enough to think that the time may well be at hand for America to produce some great music. The people here are changing with the times, or rather the times are finding them out, and stirring a strong latent idealism which plays a greater part in American character and development than some cynics who take their cut from Europeans' estimate of us realize. One has only to glance at the political and literary developments of the last seven years, developments which have progressed the more rapidly as the war called out the powers of the American mind, to realize that the nation is about to turn to self-expression in no small or uncertain vein. The younger generation has really commenced to think, and it has occasion and opportunity for thought as no generation in the United States has had since the wars for Independence and for the unity of the States.

368

The nation has had a leader who has known as no other political leader since Lincoln how to arouse and translate into action the sentiments and visions of the people. The effect is already shown significantly, as we think, in the various new magazines which concern themselves with political issues and discuss them with an eagerness and enthusiasm of a young people entering a new intellectual and moral arena. These publications, such as the Nation, the New Republic, and other of similar views and interests, are constantly gaining in power and popularity, and are strongly tinging the thought of the rising generation—a generation with broader and loftier ideals than the previous one could know. Material expansion in America is now to accompany a corresponding or even greater spiritual development, and these are the circumstances and the atmosphere which have always produced music. America and the age are ripe for greater consummations than have yet been seen and which are certain to react and create tremendously in the field of art.

A VOICE FROM THE AUDIENCE

HENRI RABAUD'S brief reign over the Boston Symphony Orchestra is past. It is now the mellow hour of retrospect. In the silence that follows the last descending stroke of his baton, impressions, lingering from a score of concerts, steal back into the mind and gather themselves at last into judgments.

What a glorious reign it was, and how different from that of Dr Muck! True, we did not understand at first, and were inclined to be a bit rebellious; but as Mr. Rabaud learned his orchestra, and as the musicians discovered him, our prejudices relaxed. We emerged from the spell cast upon us by his predecessor. For it may justly be said that the conductor leads the audience as well as the orchestra—that he determines the mood of those beyond the proscenium arch as actually as he controls the performers. And this each conductor does after his own fashion. Dr Muck had compelled and dictated; Mr Rabaud merely beckoned. Yet there was something irresistible about his humble gesture.

Above all else, Mr Rabaud was human. He was quick to feel the joy or the pathos or the tenderness in the music, and he was able to communicate what he felt to the listener with unerring distinctness.

Although personally known to few people in Boston, Mr Rabaud was regarded by the public with real affection. Somehow one knew that he was a kindly and simple man. One felt almost certain that he habitually forgot his umbrella, and this gifted Frenchman leaves more than a personal impression. He was a worthy emissary of all that is best in French music. He was an unofficial ambassador. Post May 7/19

PAY TRIBUTE TO RABAUD

Post May 4/19
Impressive though simple ceremonies distinguished the leave-taking of Henri Rabaud, who conducted his last concert as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Symphony Hall. No conductor in the history of the orchestra has been given so warm a farewell. There was prolonged applause which delayed the opening of the concert when Mr. Rabaud appeared on the stage, and other demonstrations similar to those of the Friday afternoon audience the day before. Then, when the last note of Saint-Saens choral and orchestral work, "The Lyre and the Harp," had sounded, Major Higginson, the founder and maintainer until this year of the Boston Symphony, and Judge Cabot, the president of the now existing board of directors, rising from their seats, went arm in arm upon the platform and shook the conductor's hand.

Judge Cabot made a short speech of thanks and godspeed. The audience rose to its feet and showed its sympathy with these expressions of esteem from the past and the present directors of the orchestra's destiny. Meanwhile Mr. Fradkin, the concert master, went over to Mr. Longy, first oboist and assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, and asked if he would conduct the performance of the "Marsellaise," which was followed by another ovation for Mr. Rabaud and his glorious country. Mr. Rabaud, deeply moved by these demonstrations, showed his appreciation and his emotion in every gesture, and every line of his face as he made his acknowledgments of his reception.

He takes the train for New York this morning, and sails this week for Paris. No conductor has come to Boston with so little trumpeting of himself and his talents, and no conductor has departed with warmer esteem for his qualities as a musician and a man on the part of the Boston Symphony audiences, and everyone in this city who has come into contact with this distinguished and kindly gentleman.

M. Rabaud Bids Farewell

"Boston Symphony Orchestra Has Scored an Artistic Triumph in a Season Inaugurated Against the Most Serious Odds," Says Olin Downes

Post Apr. 27/19
The musical season proper comes to an end with the last Symphony concert which introduces the month of May. After the last Symphony concert, commence the Pop concerts, which go on into July. A belated recital or two interests if the performer is talented, and because the music "crickets" and concert-goers are if anything a little fresher for hearing than at the height of the season. But this week concludes the season proper, and one week from tomorrow Mr. Rabaud sails immediately for France.

Enough has been said in these columns about the surprising and impressive excellences of this conductor, to make overmuch recapitulation of them unnecessary. It is public knowledge, and knowledge which gives pleasure to this reviewer that Mr. Rabaud's audiences have become more and more aware of his greatness as an interpreter as the season has gone on. Pro-Germans, of course, still exist, and they have worked directly and indirectly to undermine him. Then there are others, sincere patriots as any in existence, who remain pro-German in their musical prejudices, and who have been, apparently, unable to realize what was long apparent to any unprejudiced person with a modicum of musical knowledge that in many interesting and important respects Mr. Rabaud was a different kind of a conductor than Dr. Muck, and that in certain respects Mr. Rabaud was the superior of the two men. These things are now becoming realized as Mr. Rabaud, unfortunately, is leaving for France. We plead guilty to the luxury, and the human pleasure of saying, "I told you so."

Next season Mr. Monteux returns. He conducted the first two concerts of the Symphony season just concluded, prior to the arrival here of Mr. Rabaud. How much the orchestra owes its present technical excellence to Mr. Monteux has not been fully appreciated—indeed, could not be fully appreciated—by those out of actual touch with the rehearsals. Mr. Monteux is in certain respects, perhaps, more of a man for discipline and the polishing of detail, than Mr. Rabaud, who has a marvellous sense of proportion and the adjustment of detail to the main outlines of a work. At all events, Mr. Monteux has already associated himself promisingly with the present development of the Boston Symphony, and he will have the opportunity of showing his talent fully next season. He would have been the conductor throughout this season if the trustees of the Boston Symphony had shown themselves more capable of quick and decisive action than they did last fall, when Mr. Monteux was appointed as a late makeshift, and could not cancel his already signed contract as French conductor for the season of 1918-19 at the Metropolitan Opera House. The public did not lose by this, for we had two brilliant French conductors instead of one. But next season Mr. Monteux will have full swing with the orchestra which he worked so effectively to whip into shape at the beginning of last season.

Pass from the conductors to the orchestra. This season the Boston Symphony was in its personnel almost one-third new. The best orchestra in the world does not become a truly organic, cohesive structure under such conditions for at least many months. It does not matter who the players are. They may be good or poor. The best man in the world will not blend their talents successfully until they have rehearsed and played together a long time. But in recent months the full glory of the new orchestra has appeared, and we venture to assert, some of our New York brethren to the contrary, that the Boston Symphony has seldom, even in palmiest days under William Gericke, been a nobler or more beautiful instrument than it now is. The performance of the Cesar Franck symphony, a week ago last night, a memorable performance of a work which has been played last winter in a number of different cities under Mr. Rabaud before it was played in Boston, was a case in point, and a good vehicle of comparison, for this symphony was one of Mr. Gericke's finest offerings, and Mr. Gericke had a supremely fine ear and an artistic conscience, too late appreciated during his long regime in Boston.

Well, the quality of the different choirs—possibly owing in part to the clear air of last Saturday, which always has a beneficial effect on musical instruments—has not in the memory of the writer been surpassed, if equalled, for sheer glory of orchestral tone. The writer has heard every performance of this symphony given in Boston since the first interpretation of Wilhelm Gericke, back in 1904, when this simple and heavenly work seemed strange and cryptic to the ear. He never heard the strings play more warmly and with more variety of nuance than in the passages of the first movement, and particularly of the slow movement. Nor does he remember the English horn solo played more admirably than it was played a week ago last night. Nor has he heard purer intonation and a finer balance of the wood-wind choir than in certain chords and isolated passages of this same movement. Nor has he heard from the brass, with the exception of a single solo instrument, a tone more brilliant, and at the same time mellow, a finer sonority, a crisper attack. Let the people who think only Germans can conduct, or make an orchestra, and those who prefer to turn their faces from the present to the past, say what they like. The fact is self-evident that the Boston Symphony, as an orchestra, and through its leaders, has enjoyed a rare artistic triumph in a season inaugurated against the most serious odds.

The programmes, too, have on the whole been better balanced and more interesting than for many seasons in the past. Certain composers, as we remarked last Sunday, have not been represented, and the absence of Wagnerian excerpts on the programmes disappointed some, while the absence of tone poems by Richard Strauss—quite rightly omitted from these concerts—were, musically speaking a serious loss. There is a moment, however, when national sentiment should have something to do with musical programmes, to say nothing of the direct financial benefit accruing to Strauss from every orchestral performance of one of his works. Richard Strauss was one of those who signed a document commending Germany's atrocious actions towards various nations, including the United States, in the war, and when Americans were dying like flies at the front was not the time to indulge in esthetic quibblings about art for art's sake, and of the innocence from bloodshed of German composers.

These circumstances limited the programmes in an inevitable way. But Bach, Handel, Mozart, Beethoven, Brahms were with us, as they shall always be, French composers, modern Russians and an important modern Italian—Malapiero—were given more than adequate representation. The list of soloists was a brilliant one, and included the newer and younger arrivals, as well as the long-established virtuosi of international fame. All in all, a very brilliant season, and one which gave valuable proof that German standards need no more dominate our orchestral policies in the future than German dyes need have dominated in another field in the past. A foreign influence directly detrimental to original musical development in America was materially reduced and modified in the course of the season, and this will surely hasten the development of American music and musicians to the point where they are not influenced unduly by the art of any foreign nation. From Europe we have been and we must be learning, but in America we must also learn to look to ourselves and create.

There is no truth whatever in the absurd report now going about the town that twenty, thirty and even forty men of the Symphony Orchestra will leave the band at the end of the present season in July, because they are dissatisfied with the conditions under which they now work or are anxious over the future of the concerts. As a matter of fact a few players are quitting the orchestra when The Pops are done because they are engaged only for the season of 1918-19. A few more are betaking themselves of their own motion to what they believe better posts with the Philadelphia or the Detroit Orchestra, each of which is improving its personnel. The total number of departures in both categories is less than ten and almost wholly among secondary players. A trade-journal of music in Chicago is the presumable source of these yarns, while gossip in Boston has also sped them. Evidently the Symphony Orchestra has sufficiently regained its prestige to stir the malice of those who dislike or dread it.

If this department is accurately informed several members of the Symphony Orchestra who were vociferous, a few weeks ago, about their departure from it, have taken second thought and renewed their contracts. Few and far between, as it now appears, will be the changes, next autumn, in the personnel of the band.

Symphony 100 Per Cent

The Market Trust Company of Brighton has subscribed to $100,000. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, representing 17 nationalities, yesterday reported its quota 100 per cent subscribed.

MORE WARM LEAVE-TAKINGS FOR MR. RABAUD

Simple and Sincere Ceremonies at the Final Symphony Concert — Miss Lowell and Mr. Loeffler Again—Miss Buell and Mr. O'Sullivan Over the Week-End—Laurels for Mr. Bodanzky as Symphonic Conductor—Items, Incidents, Opinions

AT the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening, Mr. Rabaud's leave-taking as conductor ended as warmly, simply and sincerely as it had begun at the concert of Friday. Again the audience filled Symphony Hall and listened with the utmost good will to the two pieces—MacDowell's Suite of forest music and Saint-Saëns's setting of Hugo's Ode, "The Lyre and the Harp," that in repetition divided the programme. Neither, however well done, exactly quickens applause, but at the end of the concert, there was Mr. Rabaud for the last time upon a familiar platform to stimulate it. Long, loud, general and genuine plaudits called and held him there beside the stand that Mrs. Higginson, as usual, had trimmed with flowers; while audience and orchestra stood and the band, led by Mr. Longy, sounded "The Marseillaise." Thereupon Judge Cabot, the chairman of the present trustees, and Mr. Higginson, the founder of the orchestra (now able to revisit public places) ascended the stage, shook the departing conductor warmly by the hand; while in two or three sentences Judge Cabot mingled congratulation and regret. The applause of the whole company confirmed the speaker until Mr. Rabaud, plainly stirred, sought refuge in the conductor's room, where other flowers and more intimate farewells awaited him. Yesterday morning he left Boston for New York, whence he sails for Bordeaux and Paris on Wednesday or Thursday next. As soon as he has thrown off the fatigue of an exacting season and of a task that he had hardly measured when he accepted it, he will surely keep a good memory of his work and his public in Boston. That public will remember him in as kindly fashion; for, never in all his years, has Mr. Rabaud conducted so ably and so devotedly as in the six months he spent in America. More than once, believing that he was only discharging his duty, he was really excelling himself. And now, after so bright a sunset, the sunrise of Mr. Monteux.

ing Guest"

SEE CHANGE OF DAY FOR AFTERNOON CONCERT

choirs—possibly owing in part to the clear air of last Saturday, which always has a beneficial effect on musical instruments—has not in the memory of the writer been surpassed, if equalled for sheer glory of orchestral tone. The writer has heard every performance of this symphony given in Boston since the first interpretation of Wilhelm Gericke back in 1904, when this simple and heavenly work seemed strange and cryptic to the ear. He never heard the strings play more warmly and with more variety of nuance than in the passages of the first movement, and particularly of the slow movement. Nor does he remember the English horn solo played more admirably than it was played a week ago last night. Nor has he heard purer intonation and a finer balance of the wood-wind choir than in certain chords and isolated passages of this same movement. Nor has he heard from the brass, with the exception of a single solo instrument, a tone more brilliant, and at the same time mellow, a finer sonority, a crisper attack. Let the people who think only Germans can conduct, or make an orchestra, and those who prefer to turn their faces from the present to the past, say what they like. The fact is self-evident that the Boston Symphony, as an orchestra, and through its leaders, has enjoyed a rare artistic triumph in a season inaugurated against the most serious odds.

The programmes, too, have on the whole been better balanced and more interesting than for many seasons in the past. Certain composers, as we remarked last Sunday, have not been represented, and the absence of Wagnerian excerpts on the programmes disappointed some, while the absence of tone poems by Richard Strauss—quite rightly omitted from these concerts—were, musically speaking a serious loss. There is a moment, however, when national sentiment should have something to do with musical programmes, to say nothing of the direct financial benefit accruing to Strauss from every orchestral performance of one of his works. Richard Strauss was one of those who signed a document commending Germany's atrocious actions towards various nations, including the United States, in the war, and when Americans were dying like flies at the front was not the time to indulge in esthetic quibblings about art for art's sake, and of the innocence from bloodshed of German composers.

Symphony I
The Market
Brighton has subse
Boston Symphony
senting 17 national ported its quota 100

These circumstances limited the pro-

"Welcome the Coming, Speed the Going Guest"

Again the Symphony Orchestra Changes Leaders

(Photograph by Mishkin)

Pierre Monteux

Conductor for 1919-20

Trans. Apr. 17, 1919.

It is again a misfortune to the Symphony Concerts that the trustees of the orchestra and the guarantors of deficits, who, presumably, have some share in their counsels, have been unable to choose and secure a conductor of the first rank for next season. It is a pity, perhaps that the chairman of the board and the manager of the orchestra did not make their projected journey to Europe in quest of a new leader. At the moment, travel on the Continent is indeed difficult, but personal persuasion has been known to succeed where correspondence from a distance and through "high quarters" has failed. The quality of the reconstituted orchestra, individually and collectively, is not to be questioned. In years it has not been excelled. Deep to all appearances is the purse of trustees and guarantors. The more the need, then, of a conductor of the first rank, so known and measured on both sides of the Atlantic, to make the most of this personnel, to restore and heighten the prestige of the orchestra at home and abroad, to be a bulwark against deficits. For the moment, such a leader may be unobtainable. The future, perhaps, may bring him.

None the less, the return of Mr. Monteux to the conductorship for the musical year, 1919-1920, is a clear step in advance. By profession, he is a conductor and nothing else, neither composing nor desiring to compose. Organizing his own concerts in Paris or else leading in the ballets of Mr. Diaghilev's Russians, dwelling and working in the United States for three years past, he is wholly independent of the "official hierarchy" of French music, of the Ministry of Fine Arts and its intrusive "missioning" in America. Like most of the younger and abler musicians of Paris, like Ravel and d'Indy among living composers, like Debussy before them, Mr. Monteux has been an "outsider," untouched by numbing and obligating influences which have reached even to Boston. Furthermore, he has not spent his whole life in Paris and within a little circle of Parisian makers of music. His work with the Russian Ballet carried him up and down Europe; his tour of the United States with it, his years at the Metropolitan Opera House have familiarized him in degree with our American world. Mr. Monteux is French, but he is also cosmopolitan. Mr. Monteux is a French musician, but he is widely read in the music of other lands and open-minded to it. Better still, he is an ardent "modernist," familiar with the music of the newer generation of composers in France, Italy, Russia, America, warmly disposed toward it, sympathetic, penetrating and eloquent when he brings it to performance. Far too few of their pieces have been heard and repeated at the Symphony Concerts. Yet they are needful there to bring back listeners who eagerly welcome the newer theories, the newer practice. Finally, the Symphony Orchestra needs more exacting rehearsal and a severer discipline. Last autumn, it learned that Mr. Monteux was tireless in preparation for performance and quietly insistent upon what he sought. In a word, from Mr. Monteux next year, the public of the Symphony Concerts has reason to expect the widely ranging programmes of a conductor broadly acquainted with symphonic music and variously interested in it and the standards of discipline and preparation of a conductor who spares neither himself nor his forces. By so much Mr. Monteux's return to the orchestra is of good omen.

(Photograph by Garo)

Henri Rabaud

Conductor in 1918-19

Bostonian ears first heard Mr. Monteux as conductor in the performances of the Russian Ballet at the Opera House in November of 1916, and according to the custom of such occasions, paid little heed to him. In the spring of 1918 they heard him as conductor of the Metropolitan Company in performances of Rimsky-Korsakov's opera-ballet, "The Golden Cockerel," of Mr. Gilbert's ballet, "The Dance in Place Congo" and in Saint-Saëns's opera, "Samson and Delilah." Again, after the manner of such occasions, they hardly singled his quality out of the general quality of the representation, but a few did discover him as a man of ability. In the autumn of 1918 they heard him as the conductor of two pairs of Symphony Concerts and of the reorganized orchestra at its beginnings—and closely noted and measured him. He then ranged through Franck's symphony, Beethoven's seventh symphony, Schumann's overture to Byron's "Manfred," Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem, "La Bonne Chanson," Debussy's "Iberia," "The Peri" (Dukas's "dance-poem") and fragments of Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe." He was then praised for quiet, alert and phant control of the orchestra, for keen ear to adjust the volume and test the quality of its voices; for the sense of design that projects and coordinates a symphonic piece in mass and in detail; for quick sense of rhythm, for as lively instinct to the moulded phrase or the incisive modulation; for warm regard to color and climax; for a pervading pace and accent that revealed and individualized the chosen music. If the divine fire was hardly in him, he was able, intelligent, imaginative, devoted—a conductor with an artist's mind and an artist's conscience. Again these proved traits are of good omen.

So much for the future. For the past and a little of the present, Mr. Rabaud departs by his own choice, preferring to be composer rather than conductor. As was written the other day in this place: "There is none to question the disinterestedness and the devotion with which he has served the orchestra and its public in a difficult hour. Many admire him warmly as a musician; not a few are kindly disposed to him as a man; all agree that to the utmost of his powers and with no thought of himself he has filled the post to which he came reluctantly, which he has found taxing beyond expectation." H. T. P.

1919

SYMPHONY HALL

34th Season

THE POPS

Orchestra of 80 Symphony Players

AGIDE JACCHIA, Conductor

OPENING NIGHT, MONDAY, MAY 5

PROGRAMME

1. ENTRANCE OF THE BOYARDS Halvorsen
2. OVERTURE, "William Tell" Rossini
3. { a. PASTORALE for wind octett D. Scarlatti
b. CAPRICCIO for strings (1685-1757) (Instrumentated by Mr. JACCHIA)
4. FANTASIA, "CARMEN" Bizet
5. RONDO CAPRICCIOSO Mendelssohn
6. HARP SOLO { a. "Idyll" Holy
b. "Spanish Dance" }
7. ENFANTILLAGE van Westerhout
8. FINALE of "Scheherazade" Rimsky-Korsakoff
9. FANTASIA, "Tosca" Puccini
10. SACRIFICIAL DANCE from "The Promise of Medea" Randegger
11. LOVE'S DREAM AFTER THE BALL Czibulka
12. RHAPSODY, "España" Chabrier

Tickets for the Opening Concerts now on sale. Reserved Seats at Tables, $1.00 and 75c. First Balcony, 75c. and 50c. Admission, 25c.

CONDUCTOR AT THE POPS

Agide Jacchia, Who Has Long Been Famous as a Conductor of Italian Opera, Returns to the Pops.

1919 POP SEASON OPENED

Absence of Wet Refreshments Keeps None Away

Post

May 6/19

The Pop season at Symphony Hall opened last night with a record-breaking attendance and an orchestra which surpassed its most brilliant record of previous Pop seasons in the qualities of the performances which were conducted by Jacchia.

FIRST DRY SEASON

If any feared that the absence of claret in the lemonade would make any difference to the public of these concerts they were quickly shown their error. The audience has seldom been at this early stage in the Pop season so large and so brilliant. Many musicians, social leaders, artists, as well as business men, and whole families out to enjoy the evening made part of it. John S. Sargent, the artist, and Georges Longy, the celebrated first oboist of the orchestra, sat within a few seats of each other. Everyone was in the highest spirits, and the orchestra was applauded to the echo.

To the eye there were a few new things about the hall. Greenery on the stage relieved the formality of the rows of orchestra seats. Girl waitresses took the place of the men of previous seasons, and gave touch of pleasing novelty to the occasion.

Capable Orchestra

The conductor of these concerts is fortunate indeed with the orchestra at his disposal. The Pop orchestra this season numbers 80, and these 80 represent a band of players probably without a superior in the world, both as regards technical capacity to play everything ever written.

Mr. Jacchia knows what his men can do, and he, an enthusiastic and extremely capable conductor, does not hesitate to put them through their paces. The concert opened with the brilliant and barbaric march, "The Entrance of the Boyars," by Halvorsen. Then came the overture to "William Tell." There were two charming small pieces by Scarlatti, instrumented by Mr. Jacchia. There was music from "La Tosca" and "Carmen."

"Scheherazade" on List

At the end of the second group of the programme was the maddening music which the great Russian, Rimsky-Korsakoff, penned for the finale of his piece after Persian folk-lore, "Scheherazade," a marvellous piece of music, of incomparable power and caprice and splendor, played by a band of virtuosos who drove every note home.

In the history of these concerts there has probably not been so brilliant an opening, either from the standpoint of music or of public attendance and appreciation. There was in the air the excitement and enthusiasm of an opening night, a feeling which stimulates musician and hearer alike. At the last of the programme Mr. Jacchia had a number of popular pieces, and the concert came to an end with Chabrier's swift-pulsing music based on Spanish airs, "Espana." Among the encores was Mr. Jacchia's arrangement of the famous Russian song sung by the boatmen of the Volga. The audience stayed to the last note and appeared loth to go.

Loan Night Tonight

The Pop concert tonight, for which a very attractive programme has been arranged, will be the occasion of speeches in behalf of the Victory Loan by Carter Glass, Secretary of the Treasury, and Vice-Admiral William S. Sims of the United States navy. Eleven hundred balcony seats will be sold to the public. The rest will be given away. Patriotic songs will be sung from 7:15 to 8 p. m.

—v—v—v—v—v—v—

DR MUCK WILL SOON SAIL AWAY FOR GERMAN SHORES

DR KARL MUCK.

Great Conductor Storm Center of
"German Spy" Talk
Until He Was Interned

Globe — June 29/19

In a few days a ship will sail from one of our ports carrying the man who, more than any other native of the Central Powers, was the storm center of the enemy alien problem in the war. Dr. Karl Muck, for eight years the idolized leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra but for the past year an inmate of a southern internment camp, will leave, he says forever, the country whose hospitality he abused in true Prussian fashion, according to Secret Service agents.

Of the hundreds of Germans whom the United States Government is sending home to Germany, Dr. Muck is undoubtedly the most prominent. After the death of Dr. Hugo Munsterberg he was the most widely known German in New England, if not in the country. Until the breaking of the storm which began with the famous "Star Spangled Banner" controversy and ended in his internment, he was one of the most admired.

Dr. Muck came to Boston from Berlin, where for 14 years he had been the principal conductor of the Royal Opera. He was a personal friend of the Kaiser and it was said when he first left Berlin that Wilhelm permitted him to go solely because of "the high regard which he had for America."

Was a Great Conductor

That Dr. Muck is one of the greatest conductors of the day not even those who felt his treachery to America most keenly will deny. When he came for his first American engagement in 1906, conservative musical critics declared that his arrival brought to America "one of the greatest conductors in Europe, a man who stands in the same class with Mottl, Nikisch, Richter and Weingartner." His career at Symphony Hall supported these opinions.

Dr. Muck remained in Boston until 1908, when he was recalled. He was given a tremendous sendoff. Banquets were given in his honor, he was presented loving cups and when he and his wife boarded the train for New York, hundreds of music lovers came to see them off. Four years later he returned, to remain as leader until his arrest for plotting against this country.

The charges against the Symphony conductor, when they were first made, seemed incredible to the majority of music lovers of Boston. Of course it was remembered that Dr. Muck was a friend of the Kaiser, that he defended Germany's invasion of Belgium and called the Belgians cruel, but most people put that down to natural loyalty to the land of his birth. It took much evidence to convince his hosts and employer that he had deliberately betrayed them.

The controversy over Muck's refusal to allow the orchestra to play the National anthem in Providence, R. I., is too recent to need much mention. True or not, the story created tremendous excitement all through the East. The incident occurred in November, 1917. The orchestra was then on tour and many cities refused to allow it to give concerts. In New York special policemen were sent to prevent a demonstration against the leader. Dr. Muck sent in his resignation, which was not accepted. A few days later the orchestra, led by Dr. Muck, played the National anthem, which was made a regular part of the program and in a few weeks the trouble was partially forgotten.

Arrested March 25, 1918

Then on March 25, 1918, Dr. Muck was arrested by agents of the Department of Justice and taken to Station 16, and later to the East Cambridge Jail. While Muck was arrested under the President's proclamation concerning enemy aliens, it was hinted at the time of his arrest and afterward that other and extremely sensational charges might be preferred.

Dr. Muck accepted arrest and confinement quietly, and apparently did not encourage those of his former friends who still believed him innocent, in their efforts for his release. It was said that he preferred internment to facing what the other charges might involve. He did not press his claim to Swiss citizenship because of his father's naturalization in Switzerland when the future leader was 8 years old. In April Dr. Muck was sent to the internment camp at Fort Oglethorpe, Ga., where he remained.

Dr. Muck was born at Darmstadt, Bavaria, in 1859. His father was a Government clerk, who intended his son for mercantile life. After leaving the gymnasium in Darmstadt he went to Heidelberg to study philosophy. It was while at the university that he became definitely interested in a musical career. The following year he went to the University of Leipzig, from which institution he received the degree of PhD in 1880.

It was the same year that he made what is generally supposed to have been his first professional appearance, although there is a story that he appeared as a pianist at the age of 11 and played the violin in a symphony orchestra a few years later. In 1880, however, he appeared successfully, but soon afterward gave up playing to become a conductor.

His Career as a Conductor

He was made chorus master of the Municipal Theatre at Zurich the same year. The following year he went to Salzburg, Austria, where he remained for a year and then transferred to Brunn, where he became conductor in the Municipal Opera House. This post he held until 1884, when he went to Graz for two years, then going to Prague. In the Bohemian capital he was conductor of German opera and philharmonic concerts.

During the six years he held this post he had many important engagements in other cities. He was conductor of the company which Angelo Neumann took to Russia to present for the first time in that country Wagner's "Nibelungen Ring." It was in Prague that he met his future wife. As a "guest conductor" he made his first Berlin appearance at the Lessing Theatre in 1891, where he made such an impression that he was offered the post of conductor at the Royal Opera.

The following year he accepted the offer and soon became principal conductor at the Royal Opera. During the 14 years which followed his appointment he conducted orchestras in every capital in Europe. He appeared often at Bayreuth and conducted many of the royal operas at Covent Garden. With Felix Motte he conducted the philharmonic concerts in Vienna in 1905. The following year he came to the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

APR 17 1920

VOLUME 39

1919-1920

m 125.5.39

1919-1920

SYMPHONY HALL

39th Season

24 FRIDAY AFTERNOON CONCERTS
AT 2.30

24 SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS
AT 8

BEGINNING OCTOBER 10, 11, BY

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SOLOISTS

JEAN BEDETTI	LOUISE HOMER
JOSEPH BONNET	FRITZ KREISLER
ALFRED CORTOT	JOHN McCORMACK
EMMY DESTINN	MARGARET MATZENAUER
FREDRIC FRADKIN	LEO ORNSTEIN
POVLA FRIJSH	SERGEI RACHMANINOFF
RUDOLPH GANZ	ALBERT SPALDING

PIERRE MONTEUX

particularly noted for his own Concerts Monteux and for his diversified and interesting programmes.

Several times he toured the larger cities of Europe conducting opera and ballet, and at the head of the Ballet Russe he came to the United States in 1916, after two years of honorable service in the French army. Boston saw and heard him for the first time as conductor of the Ballet in the same year, and two years later as the regular French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Last autumn he was offered the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but could not obtain his release except for a brief period when he led the two opening pairs of Symphony Concerts in Boston. Received with unprecedented acclaim, he impressed his hearers in that short time with the rare genius which few living conductors possess.

No conductor has come to the Boston Symphony Orchestra with a more distinguished record than Pierre Monteux. Prominent as a youth in chamber music, he early found his true vocation as conductor, and became a familiar figure in Paris, his native city, presiding over the orchestras at the opera and in the concert halls. He was

A PERMANENT ORCHESTRA ORGANIZED AND MAINTAINED SOLELY FOR CONCERT PURPOSES

Behind the present miraculous eloquence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which comes as close to the ideal of perfection as human fallibility can, there lies a long history of the application of musical genius, the constancy of high purpose, and the expenditure of wealth. Only gradually, through tireless years of upbuilding effort by one after another of the greatest conductors of Europe, has the goal been won.

There is another practical and less familiar reason for the sustained quality of the Boston Symphony Concerts: the orchestra has always been maintained "solely for concert purposes." That is to say, its players as a whole, in part, or individually, never "assist" at functions which are not primarily musical. The finest music is therefore the sole pursuit and the sole practice of all the individual musicians. On account of the long winter season and an additional summer season by a number of the players, the musicians' contracts in this orchestra alone extend through the entire year.

Circumstances have thus combined to make the orchestra Boston's single institution of world-wide reputation par excellence. Starting with twenty concerts in the first season, it now gives more than five times that number yearly, performing more often in the various cities of New England, the near South and the West than in Boston itself.

TIGHT BINDING

FRITZ KREISLER

MARGARET MATZENAUER,

JOSEPH BONNET

LEO ORNSTEIN

EMMY DESTINN

SERGEI RACHMANINOFF

JOHN MCCORMACK

WITH the passing of the war, the musical life of Boston, of which the Boston Symphony Orchestra the central and main source, promises to assume a new importance. The events of the last few years, awakening our national consciousness and occasioning international comparisons, have brought the discovery that we have been persistently undervaluing the rôle of music. From this circumstance came a tendency to take the Symphony Concerts for granted by the very consciousness of their marvelous perfection and their easy accessibility. The new appreciation of music is reflected in the subscription sales which already indicate an attendance exceeded in no former season.

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra is not merely one that contains accomplished virtuosos," a well-known critic has written, "the orchestra itself is a virtuoso." Its concerts through the length of a season comprise an epitome of the world's best music. Under the inspired guidance of Pierre Monteux the illustrious body may be expected to bring the older masterpieces to fresh and exquisite life; to set forth the modern scores in colorful and emotional magnificence. An additional pleasure is found in the famous singers, pianists and violinists who, as soloists, appear with this orchestra.

ALFRED CORTOT

POVLA FRIISH

FREDRIC FRADKIN

RUDOLPH GANZ

ALBERT SPALDING

JEAN BEDETTI

LOUISE HOMER

TIGHT BINDING

FRITZ KREISLER

MARGARET MATZENAUER

JOSEPH BONNET

LEO ORNSTEIN

EMMY DESTINN

SERGEI RACHMANINOFF

JOHN McCORMACK

WITH the passing of the war, the musical life of Boston, of which the Boston Symphony Orchestra the central and main source, promises to assume a new importance. The events of the last few years, awakening our national consciousness and occasioning international comparisons, have brought the discovery that we have been persistently undervaluing the rôle of music. From this circumstance came a tendency to take the Symphony Concerts for granted by the very obviousness of their marvelous perfection and their easy accessibility. The new appreciation of music is reflected in the subscription sales which already indicate an attendance exceeded in no former season.

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra is not merely one that contains accomplished virtuosos," a well-known critic has written, "the orchestra itself is a virtuoso." Its concerts through the length of a season comprise an epitome of the world's best music. Under the inspired guidance of Pierre Monteux the illustrious body may be expected to bring the older masterpieces to fresh and exquisite life; to set forth the modern scores in colorful and emotional magnificence. An additional pleasure is found in the famous singers, pianists and violinists who, as soloists, appear with this orchestra.

ALFRED CORTOT

POVLA FRIISH

FREDRIC FRADKIN

RUDOLPH GANZ

ALBERT SPALDING

JEAN BEDETTI

LOUISE HOMER

FLOOR PLAN OF SYMPHONY HALL
SHOWING THE LOCATION
AND PRICES OF SEATS
FOR THE 24 SATURDAY EVENING
BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS

STAGE

26 25 24	A	23 22 21 20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4	A	3 2 1
25 24 23 22 21 20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	B	26 25 24 23 22 21 20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	B	6 5 4 3 2 1
24 23 22 21 20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	C	23 22 21 20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	C	8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1
23 22 21 20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	D	20 27 26 25 24 23 22 21 20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	D	8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1
22 21 20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	E	28 27 26 25 24 23 22 21 20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	E	8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1
21 20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	F	28 27 26 25 24 23 22 21 20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	F	8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1
20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	G	28 27 26 25 24 23 22 21 20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	G	8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1
19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	H	28 27 26 25 24 23 22 21 20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	H	8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1
18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	I	28 27 26 25 24 23 22 21 20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	I	8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1
17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	J	27 26 25 24 23 22 21 20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	J	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	K	27 26 25 24 23 22 21 20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	K	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	L	27 26 25 24 23 22 21 20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	L	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	M	27 26 25 24 23 22 21 20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	M	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	N	27 26 25 24 23 22 21 20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	N	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	O	27 26 25 24 23 22 21 20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	O	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	P	26 25 24 23 22 21 20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	P	6 5 4 3 2 1
10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	Q	26 25 24 23 22 21 20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	Q	6 5 4 3 2 1
9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	R	26 25 24 23 22 21 20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	R	6 5 4 3 2 1
8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	S	26 25 24 23 22 21 20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	S	6 5 4 3 2 1
7 6 5 4 3 2 1	T	26 25 24 23 22 21 20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	T	6 5 4 3 2 1
6 5 4 3 2 1	U	26 25 24 23 22 21 20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	U	6 5 4 3 2 1
5 4 3 2 1	V	26 25 24 23 22 21 20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	V	6 5 4 3 2 1
4 3 2 1	W	26 25 24 23 22 21 20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	W	6 5 4 3 2 1
3 2 1	X	23 22 21 20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	X	11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1
2 1	Y	23 22 21 20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	Y	11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1
1	Z	23 22 21 20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	Z	11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1
	AA	23 22 21 20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	AA	11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1
	BB	23 22 21 20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	BB	11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1
	CC	23 22 21 20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	CC	11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1
	DD	23 22 21 20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	DD	11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1
	EE	23 22 21 20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	EE	11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1
	FF	23 22 21 20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	FF	11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1
	GG	23 22 21 20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	GG	11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1
	HH	23 22 21 20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	HH	11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1
	II	23 22 21 20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	II	11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1
	JJ	23 22 21 20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	JJ	11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1
	KK	23 22 21 20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	KK	11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1
	LL	20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	LL	10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1
	MM	20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	MM	10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1
	NN	20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	NN	10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1
	OO	20 19 18 17 16 15 14 13 12 11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	OO	10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1
	PP	10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	PP	8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1
	QQ	10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	QQ	10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1
	RR	11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1	RR	11 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1
	SS	6 5 4 3 2 1	SS	6 5 4 3 2 1

MASSACHUSETTS AVENUE CORRIDOR

FIRST AND SECOND BALCONIES
SHOWING THE LOCATION
AND PRICES OF SEATS
FOR THE
24 SATURDAY EVENING
BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS

STAGE

SECOND BALCONY.

SYMPHONY HALL,
HUNTINGTON AND MASSACHUSETTS AVENUES,
BOSTON.
FIRST BALCONY.

8

AMERICA'S GREATEST ARTISTIC POSSESSION

SEASON TICKETS are $60, $48, $36, $24, $15 and are free from any Federal Admission Tax

SEASON TICKETS for the Friday Afternoon and the Saturday Evening Symphony concerts are divided as to number and price as follows:

564 seats @ $60	} for 24 Concerts
1015 seats @ $48
1339 seats @ $36
1175 seats @ $24
*540 seats @ $15

(*There are no $15 seats for the Friday afternoon concerts)

SEASON TICKETS secure for the purchaser the exclusive right to the same location for the entire year, which location may be retained from season to season.

SEASON TICKETS effect a considerable saving compared with the cost of tickets for single concerts

SUBSCRIBE NOW

A few seats for Friday afternoons are still available

Seats for Saturday evenings may be obtained at all prices

Applications should be made at Symphony Hall, Boston

W. H. BRENNAN, Manager G. E. JUDD, Assistant Manager

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1919-1920

AMONG THE GREATEST ARTISTS

IT MEANS NOW

SEASON TICKETS are $60, $48, $36, $24, $15 and are free from any Federal Admission Tax

SEASON TICKETS for the Friday Afternoon and the Saturday Evening Symphony concerts are divided as to number and price as follows:

564 seats @ $60)
1015 seats @ $48)
1339 seats @ $36 for 24 Concerts
1175 seats @ $24)
*540 seats @ $15)

(*There are no $15 seats for the Friday afternoon concerts)

SEASON TICKETS secure for the purchaser the exclusive right to the same location for the entire year, which location may be retained from season to season.

SEASON TICKETS effect a considerable saving compared with the cost of tickets for single concerts

SUBSCRIBE NOW

A few seats for Friday afternoons are still available

Seats for Saturday evenings may be obtained at all prices

Applications should be made at Symphony Hall, Boston

W. H. BRENNAN, Manager G. E. JUDD, Assistant Manager

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON 1919-1920

1919-1920

SYMPHONY HALL

39th Season

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Boston Symphony Orchestra

100 MUSICIANS

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

24 Friday Afternoons at 2.30, beginning October 10
 24 Saturday Evenings at 8, beginning October 11

DISTINGUISHED SOLOISTS TO BE ANNOUNCED

SUBSCRIBE NOW TO SECURE BEST LOCATIONS

Season Prices: $60, $48, $36, $24, $15, no war tax. No payment required until September 1st.

Applications for tickets for either series of twenty-four concerts may be made at once (Subscription office will be kept open evenings during the Pop concerts). All inquiries by mail promptly answered.

Ticket holders for the season 1919-1920 will have an option on their same seats for following seasons.

W. H. BRENNAN, Manager

G. E. JUDD, Assistant Manager

SOME FACTS ABOUT MR. MONTEUX

PIERRE BENJAMIN MONTEUX, engaged to conduct the Boston Symphony Concerts for the coming season, has had a varied and interesting career.

He made his first mark in Paris, his native city, where, as a prize pupil of the Conservatory, he became a viola player in the Colonne Orchestra, and the orchestra of the Opéra-Comique.

At this period chamber music particularly absorbed him. He founded the Société de Musique Moderne, and took the viola part in several similar organizations which performed the interesting music of the day and the slighted music of the past.

Mr. Monteux has conducted the Concerts Colonne in Paris, at the Opéra, the Théâtre des Champs-Élysées, the Châtelet and the Odéon in Paris; Covent Garden and Drury Lane in London, and in the opera houses of Berlin, Vienna and Budapest.

He instituted the Concerts Monteux at the Casino, Paris, which quickly became famous. He toured Europe four times at the head of the Ballet Russe.

The declaration of war brought new duties. Called out in the first week of French mobilization, he served two years as private in the 35th Territorial Infantry; he fought at Rheims, Verdun, Soissons, and in the Argonne. After devoting two years of his career to continuous, faithful service, he was given his discharge.

Mr. Monteux came to the United States in 1916 as conductor of the Ballet Russe, in which capacity Boston first saw and heard him. As regular French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York, he visited Boston again in the spring of 1918.

Last autumn he was asked to become conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but the Metropolitan Opera Company could not afford to release him except for a brief period, when he conducted the two opening pairs of Boston Symphony concerts in Boston, pending the arrival of M. Henri Rabaud. Those concerts were sufficient to prove him one of the finest orchestral conductors living, as an enthusiastic public and press emphatically attested.

12

Comments on Mr. Monteux's conducting at the opening Boston Symphony Concerts in October, 1918

The Boston Herald:—

"Mr. Monteux has an exquisite sense of tonal values, of tonal balance and proportion. He is an invoker of euphony. He has the respect for clarity and logical development that characterizes his nation in literature and art. Mr. Gericke had these qualities, the exercise of which gave the Boston Symphony Orchestra international reputation; but Mr. Monteux has, in addition, warmth, imagination, emotional expressiveness. As an interpreter, Mr. Monteux has given memorable performances of works known and unfamiliar, performances that have been sane as well as brilliant and imaginative. As a man he has in a short time endeared himself to orchestra and public."—Philip Hale.

The Boston Post:—

"Mr. Monteux is a very simple man, rather under medium height, erect, uncommonly clear-eyed, unostentatious, self-possessed in the presence of an audience, and quietly master of his men. He had not conducted two minutes before it was apparent that he had made of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a finer instrument than it has been for many seasons. He is a supremely artistic interpreter, a man profoundly in earnest, and thoroughly equipped for his task."—Olin Downes.

The Boston Transcript:—

"Mr. Monteux has the most sensitive ear possessed by any conductor since Gericke—not less keen, and of Gallic clarity, precision, fineness is Mr. Monteux's sense of musical design and of revelation thereof to his hearers. To this insight, Mr. Monteux adds the musical intuition and experience that mould the phrase, shape the period, graduate the climax as with the composer's voice and ear. To all three he lends the imagination that discovers the just accent that distributes and shades colors, that vibrates to the subtle modulations of a Dukas or a Debussy—a manifold ability, intelligence, imagination, devotion dwell in him. He possesses the true artist's mind and—what is equally essential—the true artist's conscience."—H. T. Parker.

13

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Thirty-ninth Season, 1919-1920

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

1st Concert 1919

PERSONNEL

VIOLINS.

Fradkin, F. Concert-master. Theodorowicz, J.	Roth, O. Hoffmann, J.	Rissland, K. Bak, A.	Mahn, F. Gerardi, I.	Ribarsch, A. Traupe, W.
	Sauvlet, H. Goldstein, H.		Di Natale, J. Ringwall, R.
Thillois, F. Fiedler, B.	Goldstein, S. Henkle, R.	Pinfield, C. Kurth, R.	Gunderson, R. Fiedler, A.	Diamond, S. Deane, C.
	Bryant, M. Langley, A.		Kurkdjic, N. Leveen, P.

VIOLAS.

Denayer, F. Wittmann, F.	Berlin, V. Van Wynbergen, C.	Van Veen, H. Shirley, P.	Kay, W. Blumenau, W.	Grover, H. Salis, J.
-----------------------------	---------------------------------	-----------------------------	-------------------------	-------------------------

VIOLONCELLOS.

Bedetti, J. Schroeder, A.	Miquelle, G. Keller, J.	Nagel, R. Barth, C.	Belinski, M. Fabrizio, E.	Warnke, J. Stockbridge, C.
------------------------------	----------------------------	------------------------	------------------------------	-------------------------------

BASSES.

Kunze, M. Gerhardt, G.	Jaeger, A. Seydel, T.	Ludwig, O. Schurig, R.	Agnesy, K. Mattersteig, P.
---------------------------	--------------------------	---------------------------	-------------------------------

FLUTES.

Laurent, G.
Brooke, A.
DeMailly, C.

OBOES.

Longy, G.
Lenom, C.
Stanislaus, H.

CLARINETS.

Sand, A.
Mimart, P.
Forlani, N.

BASSOONS.

Laus, A.
Mueller, E.
Piller, B.

PICCOLO.

Battles, A.

ENGLISH HORNS.

Mueller, F.
Speyer, L.

BASS CLARINET.

Vannini, A.

CONTRA-BASSOON.

Fuhrmann, M.

HORNS.

Wendler, G.
Lorbeer, H.
Hain, F.
Gebhardt, W.

HORNS.

Van Den Berg, C.
Vershey, C.
Hess, M.

TRUMPETS.

Heim, G.
Mann, J.
Mager, G.
Kloepfel, L.

TROMBONES.

Adam, E.
Sordillo, F.
Mausebach, A.
Kenfield, L.

TUBA.

Mattersteig, P.

HARPS.

Holy, A.
Cella, T.

TYMPANI.

Neumann, S.
Gardner, C.

PERCUSSION.

Ludwig, C.
Zahn, F.

Burkhardt, H.

ORGAN.

Snow, A.

LIBRARIAN.

Rogers, L. J.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Thirty-ninth Season, 1919-1920

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

24th Concert 1920

PERSONNEL

VIOLINS.

Theodorowicz, J. Concert-master. Hoffmann, J.	Rissland, K. Mahn, F.	Gerardi, A. Barleben, K.	Sauvlet, H. Hamilton, V.
---	--------------------------	-----------------------------	-----------------------------

Berger, H. Pinfield, C.	Gundersen, R. Fiedler, B.	Leveen, P. Gorodetzky, L.
Thillois, F. Goldstein S.	Kurth, R. Fiedler, A.	Bryant, M. Murray, J.	Knudson, C. Messina S.
	Schoewe, R. Tapley, T.	Stonestreet, L. Reed, L.

VIOLAS.

Denayer, F. Shirley, P.	Van Wynbergen, C. Salis, J.	Van Den Berg, C. Kluge, M.	Mullaly, J. Gerhardt, S.	Zahn, F. Rogers, L.
----------------------------	--------------------------------	-------------------------------	-----------------------------	------------------------

VIOLONCELLOS.

Bedetti, J. Schroeder, A.	Miquelle, G. Keller, J.	Barth, C. Belinski, M.	Fabrizio, E. Warnke, J.	Stockbridge, C. Piller, B.
------------------------------	----------------------------	---------------------------	----------------------------	-------------------------------

BASSES.

Kunze, M. Gerhardt, G.	Seydel, T. Frankel, I.	Ludwig, O. Schurig, R.
---------------------------	---------------------------	---------------------------

FLUTES.

Laurent, G.
Brooke, A.
DeMailly, C.

OBOES.

Longy, G.
Lenom, C.
Stanislaus, H.

CLARINETS.

Sand, A.
Mimart, P.
Forlani, N.

BASSOONS.

Laus, A.
Mueller, E.

PICCOLO.

Battles, A.

ENGLISH HORNS.

Mueller, F.
Speyer, L.

BASS CLARINET.

Vannini, A.

CONTRA-BASSOON.

Piller, B.

HORNS.

Wendler, G.
Lorbeer, H.
Hain, F.
Gebhardt, W.

HORNS.

Van Den Berg, C.
Hess, M.

TRUMPETS.

Mager, G.
Mann, J.
Kloepfel, L.
Kearney, A.

TROMBONES.

Hampe, C.
Adam, E.
Mausebach, A.
Kenfield, L.

TUBA.

Wichman, A.

HARP.

Holy, A.

TYMPANI.

Neumann, S.
Rettberg, A.

PERCUSSION.

Ludwig, C.
Zahn, F.

Burkhardt, H.
Kandler, F.

ORGAN.

Snow, A.

LIBRARIAN.

Rogers, L. J.

THE OFFICERS AND TRUSTEES

OF THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

INCORPORATED

FREDERICK P. CABOT	-	-	President
GALEN L. STONE	-	-	Vice-President
ERNEST B. DANE	-	-	Treasurer

ALFRED L. AIKEN
FREDERICK P. CABOT
ERNEST B. DANE
M. A. DE WOLFE HOWE
JOHN ELLERTON LODGE
FREDERICK E. LOWELL
ARTHUR LYMAN
HENRY B. SAWYER
GALEN L. STONE
BENTLEY W. WARREN

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Thirty-ninth Season, 1919-1920

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

24th Concert 1920

PERSONNEL

VIOLINS.

Theodorowicz, J. Concert-master.	Rissland, K. Mahn, F.	Gerardi, A. Barleben, K.	Sauvlet, H. Hamilton, V.
-------------------------------------	--------------------------	-----------------------------	-----------------------------

Hoffmann, J.	Berger, H. Pinfield, C.	Gundersen, R. Fiedler, B.	Leveen, P. Gorodetzky, L.
--------------	----------------------------	------------------------------	------------------------------

Thillois, F.	Kurth, R.	Bryant, M.	Knudson, C.
Goldstein S.	Fiedler, A.	Murray, J.	Messina S.

Schoewe, R.	Stonestreet, L.
Tapley, T.	Reed, L.

VIOLAS.

Denayer, F.	Van Wynbergen, C.	Van Den Berg, C.	Mullaly, J.	Zahn, F.
Shirley, P.	Salis, J.	Kluge, M.	Gerhardt, S.	Rogers, L.

VIOLONCELLOS.

Bedetti, J.	Miquelle, G.	Barth, C.	Fabrizio, E.	Stockbridge, C.
Schroeder, A.	Keller, J.	Belinski, M.	Warnke, J.	Piller, B.

BASSES.

Kunze, M.	Seydel, T.	Ludwig, O.
Gerhardt, G.	Frankel, I.	Schurig, R.

FLUTES.

Laurent, G.
Brooke, A.
DeMailly, C.

OBOES.

Longy, G.
Lenom, C.
Stanislaus, H.

CLARINETS.

Sand, A.
Mimart, P.
Forlani, N.

BASSOONS.

Laus, A.
Mueller, E.

PICCOLO.

Battles, A.

ENGLISH HORNS.

Mueller, F.
Speyer, L.

BASS CLARINET.

Vannini, A.

CONTRA-BASSOON.

Piller, B.

HORNS.

Wendler, G.
Lorbeer, H.
Hain, F.
Gebhardt, W.

HORNS.

Van Den Berg, C.
Hess, M.

TRUMPETS.

Mager, G.
Mann, J.
Kloepfel, L.
Kearney, A.

TROMBONES.

Hampe, C.
Adam, E.
Mausebach, A.
Kenfield, L.

TUBA.

Wichman, A.

HARP.

Holy, A.

TYMPANI.

Neumann, S.
Rettberg, A.

PERCUSSION.

Ludwig, C.
Zahn, F.
Burkhardt, H.
Kandler, F.

ORGAN.

Snow, A.

LIBRARIAN.

Rogers, L. J.

THE OFFICERS AND TRUSTEES

OF THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

INCORPORATED

FREDERICK P. CABOT	-	-	President
GALEN L. STONE	-	-	Vice-President
ERNEST B. DANE	-	-	Treasurer

ALFRED L. AIKEN

FREDERICK P. CABOT

ERNEST B. DANE

M. A. DE WOLFE HOWE

JOHN ELLERTON LODGE

FREDERICK E. LOWELL

ARTHUR LYMAN

HENRY B. SAWYER

GALEN L. STONE

BENTLEY W. WARREN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Makes Victor Records

Just as you enjoy the exquisite interpretations of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at their concert, you can enjoy them whenever you wish on the Victrola.

It is one of the great triumphs of recording that enables you to hear so large an organization in your home, and it is significant that so famous an orchestra as the Boston Symphony makes Victor Records.

The absolute faithfulness of these Victor Records when played on the Victrola parallels the actual performance of this great orchestra itself.

Any Victor dealer will gladly play any of the Boston Symphony Orchestra records for you. Victrolas $25.00 to $950.

Victor Talking Machine Co.
CAMDEN, N. J.

WORKS PERFORMED AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS DURING THE SEASON OF 1919-1920.

Works marked with a double asterisk were performed for the first time in Boston.
Works marked with an asterisk were performed for the first time at these concerts.
Works marked with a dagger were performed for the first time anywhere.
Artists marked with an asterisk appeared at these concerts for the first time.
Artists marked with a double asterisk appeared for the first time in Boston.
Artists marked with a dagger are members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

	PAGE
ALBENIZ: "Catalonia," Folk Suite in three parts, No. 1, October 10, 1919.....	47
BACH: "My Heart Ever Faithful," November 28, 1919 (LOUISE HOMER).....	470
BALAKIREFF: "Thamar," Symphonic Poem (after a poem by Lermontoff), December 19, 1919.....	511
BEETHOVEN: Symphony, D major, No. 2, Op. 36, October 10, 1919.....	7
Symphony, B-flat major, No. 4, Op. 60, March 13, 1920 (this symphony was substituted for Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony performed at the Friday afternoon concert, March 12).....	000
Symphony, C minor, No. 5, Op. 67, November 21, 1919 (in memory of Henry Lee Higginson).....	402
"The Creatures of Prometheus," Ballet, Op. 43, Overture, Ballet No. 5, Adagio, October 24, 1919.....	158
Funeral March from the "Eroica" Symphony (in memory of Henry Lee Higginson), November 15, 1919.....	00
Overture to "Fidelio," Op. 72, April 16, 1919.....	1579
Overture to "King Stephen," E-flat major, Op. 117, November 14, 1919.....	330
Concerto, C minor, No. 3, Op. 37, April 16, 1919 (ALFRED CORTOT).....	1602
Concerto in D major for violin, January 23, 1920 (FRITZ KREISLER).....	867
* "Nature's Adoration," Op. 48, No. 4, with orchestra, November 28, 1919 (LOUISE HOMER).....	446
BERLIOZ: Fantastic Symphony, No. 1, C major, Op. 14, March 5, 1920; April 30, 1920 (by request).....	1195, 1729
"Harold in Italy," Symphony with viola solo, Op. 16 (†  FRÉDÉRIC DENEYER), November 14, 1920.....	287
Rákóczy March, from "The Damnation of Faust," March 26, 1920.....	1401
BLOCH: Psalms 137 and 114 with orchestra, November 14, 1919 (* POVLA FRIJSH).....	327

BORODIN: "On the Steppes of Central Asia," Orchestral Sketch, Op. 7, March 5, 1920.....	1243
Polovtsian Dances,* from "Prince Igor," April 9, 1920..	1543
BRAHMS: Symphony No. 1, C minor, Op. 68, December 26, 1919	587
Concerto No. 2, B-flat major, for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 83, November 21, 1919 (* FÉLIX FOX) (in memory of Henry Lee Higginson).....	386
"Ever Lighter grows my Slumber," Op. 105, No. 2, with orchestra, January 16, 1920 (*MARGARET MATZENAUER)	745
BRIDGE, FRANK: Sonnet for voice and orchestra, "Blow out, you Bugles,"  April 30, 1920 (JOHN MCCORMACK) ..	1764
CARPENTER: Concertino for pianoforte and orchestra, February 13, 1920 ( E. ROBERT SCHMITZ).....	984
CHABRIER-MOTTL: Bourrée Fantastique, November 28, 1919..	485
CHADWICK: "The Angel of Death," Symphonic Poem, November 14, 1919.....	314
CHARPENTIER: "Impressions of Italy," Orchestral Suite (viola solo, Mr.† DENAYER), February 27, 1920.....	1164
CHAUSSEON: Symphony, B-flat major, Op. 20, November 28, 1919	435
CONVERSE: Symphony in C minor,† January 30, 1920.....	891
DEBUSSY: "Prélude à l'Après-Midi d'un Faune [Églogue de S. Mallarmé]"—"Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun [Eclogue by S. Mallarmé]," October 10, 1919.....	36
"Jeux" ("Play"), a Danced Poem, January 2, 1900 (first performance in America).....	680
"La Damselle Éluë" * ("The Blessed Damsel"), Lyric Poem after D. G. Rossetti: Soprano,* ETHEL FRANK; Contralto,* CLARAMOND THOMPSON; female chorus trained by S. S. Townsend; February 27, 1920.....	1148
Petite Suite, March 26, 1920.....	1392
Fantasy for pianoforte and orchestra, April 16, 1920 (ALFRED CORTOT) (first performance in America)..	1613
DUKAS: Overture to "Polyeucte," * April 9, 1920.....	1504
DUPARC: "L'Invitation au Voyage"* with orchestra, November 14, 1919 (* POVLA FRIJSH).....	316
DVOŘÁK: Symphony No. 5, E minor, "From the New World," Op. 95, March 26, 1920.....	1351
Concerto for violin and orchestra, A major, Op. 53, October 17, 1919 (ALBERT SPALDING).....	110
ENESCO: Suite for Orchestra, Op. 9, October 17, 1919.....	113
FRANCK: "Le Chasseur Maudit" ("The Wild Huntsman"), Symphonic Poem, October 10, 1919.....	20
Aria, "Les Rois dont vous vantez la Gloire,"* from "La Rédemption," November 14, 1919 (* POVLA FRIJSH) ..	310
GILBERT: "The Dance in Place Congo," Symphonic Poem * (after George W. Cable), February 20, 1920.....	1085

GLAZOUNOFF: "Stenka Razine," Symphonic Poem, Op. 13,* January 2, 1920.....	690
GLUCK: Overture to "Iphigénie en Aulide," February 27, 1920	1119
GRIEG: Concerto in A minor for pianoforte, Op. 16, March 12, 1920 (HEINRICH GEBHARD).....	000
GRIFFES: † "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan" (after the poem of S. T. Coleridge), November 28, 1919.....	473
GOLDMARK: Overture to "Sakuntala," Op. 13, February 13, 1920	992
HANDEL: * Concerto in F major for Organ and Orchestra, No. 4, Op. 4, December 26, 1919 (JOSEPH BONNET)..	628
Air, "Ombra mai fù," from "Serse," November 28, 1919 (LOUISE HOMER).....	448
Concerto Grosso No. 5, D major, for string orchestra (edited by G. F. Kogel): Solo violins, Messrs. † THEODOROWICZ and † HOFFMANN; solo viola, Mr. † DENAYER; solo violoncello, Mr. BEDETTI, April 2, 1920..	1427
HAYDN: Symphony, B-flat major, "La Reine de France" (B. & H. No. 85),* October 31, 1919, March 6, 1920..	215,000
Symphony in G major (B. & H. No. 13), February 27, 1920 ..	1125
D'INDY: Symphony in B-flat major, No. 2, Op. 57, January 23, 1920.....	815
"Sinfonia Brevis de Bello Gallico" ("Short Symphony concerning the Gallic War"), No. 3, Op. 70, October 24, 1919 (first time in America).....	143
Symphonic Variations, "Istar," April 30, 1920.....	1748
LALO: Spanish Symphony for violin and orchestra, Op. 21, February 20, 1920 († FREDRIC FRADKIN).....	1064
LISZT: "Les Préludes," Symphonic Poem No. 3 (after Lamartine), October 24, 1919.....	183
The Dance in the Village Tavern (Mephisto Waltz): Second Episode from Lenau's "Faust," December 26, 1919.....	634
MACDOWELL: Concerto No. 2, D minor, for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 23, December 19, 1919 (* LEO ORNSTEIN)	526
MALIPIERO: "Pause del Silenzio" ("Pauses of Silence"): Seven Symphonic Expressions, March 5, 1920.....	1237
MENDELSSOHN: Symphony No. 5, "Reformation," Op. 107, January 2, 1920.....	663
Overture, Nocturne, Scherzo from the music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," March 12, 1920.....	1271
Overture to "Fingal's Cave," Op. 26, March 6, 1920.....	000
MOUSSORGSKY: "Une Nuit sur Mont Chauve" ("A Night on Bald Mountain"),* April 23, 1920.....	1676
"Hopak," * with orchestra, November 14, 1919 (* POVLA FRIJSH)	324

MOZART: Symphony in G minor (K. 550), February 20, 1920	1043
Overture to "The Magic Flute," March 6, 1920	000
Concertante Symphonie for violin and viola (K. 364): violin, Mr. † THEODOROWICZ; viola, Mr. † DENAYER, April 9, 1920	1503
Scene, "Non più! tutto ascoltae," and Aria, "Non temer, amato bene," with violin obbligato (Mr. † THEODORO- WICZ, violin; JOHN McCORMACK, tenor), April 30, 1920	1739
RABAUD: "La Procession Nocturne," April 23, 1920	1695
RACHMANINOFF: Concerto for pianoforte with orchestra, D minor, No. 3, Op. 30, October 31, 1919 (SERGEI RACHMANINOFF)	234
RAVEL: "Ma Mère l'Oye" ("Mother Goose"), Five Children's Pieces, April 9, 1920	1516
RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF: "La Grande Pâque Russe" ("The Rus- sian Easter"), Overture on Themes of the Rus- sian Church, Op. 36, January 30, 1920	904
Introduction and March from "Le Coq d'Or," * April 16, 1920	1627
SAINT-SAËNS: Pianoforte Concerto No. 5, F major, Op. 103, April 2, 1920 (RUDOLPH GANZ)	1470
Concerto for violoncello and orchestra, No. 1, March 6, 1920 († JEAN BEDETTI)	000
SCHMITT: "The Tragedy of Salome," suite for orchestra (after a poem by Robert d' Humières), December 19, 1919	529
SCHUBERT: Symphony in C major, April 23, 1920	1655
Unfinished Symphony in B minor, November 21, 1919 (in memory of Henry Lee Higginson)	367
"Erlking," Op. 1, with orchestra, January 16, 1920 (* MARGARET MATZENAUER)	752
SCHUMANN: Symphony, B-flat major, No. 1, Op. 38, October 17, 1919	75
Symphony, E-flat major, No. 3, "Rhenish," Op. 97, Febru- ary 13, 1920	967
Concerto for violoncello with orchestra, A minor, Op. 129, January 30, 1920 (*† JEAN BEDETTI)	898
* Bride's Song No. 1, * Bride's Song No. 2, being Nos. 11 and 12 of "Myrthen," Op. 25, January 16, 1900 (* MARGARET MATZENAUER)	750
SMETANA: Overture to "The Sold Bride," April 2, 1920	1473
STOJOWSKI: Symphony in D minor, Op. 21, January 16, 1920	739
STRAVINSKY: Suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu" ("The Fire Bird"), a Danced Legend,* October 31, 1919	252
SVENDSEN: Carnival at Paris, April 23, 1920	1708
VERDI: Aria, "O Don Fatale," from "Don Carlos," November 28, 1919 (LOUISE HOMER)	477

WAGNER: Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," March 5, 1920	1247
Prelude to "Parsifal," April 2, 1920	1444
Funeral Music and Immolation Scene from "Dusk of the Gods," January 16, 1920 (* MARGARET MATZENAUER)	770
"A Siegfried Idyl," October 24, 1919	168
Prelude to "Lohengrin," March 26, 1920	1372
"Forest Murmurs," from "Siegfried," March 26, 1920	1386
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," April 30, 1920	1766

SUMMARY.

ALBENIZ	1	HANDEL	3
BACH	1	HAYDN	3
BALAKIREFF	1	D'INDY	3
BEETHOVEN	10	LALO	1
BERLIOZ	4	LISZT	2
BLOCH	2	MACDOWELL	1
BORODIN	2	MALIPIERO	1
BRAHMS	3	MENDELSSOHN	3
BRIDGE	1	MOUSSORGSKY	2
CARPENTER	1	MOZART	4
CHABRIER	1	RABAUD	1
CHARPENTIER	1	RACHMANINOFF	1
CHAUSSEON	1	RAVEL	1
CONVERSE	1	RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF	2
DEBUSSY	5	SAINT-SAËNS	2
DUKAS	1	SCHMITT	1
DUPARC	1	SCHUBERT	3
DVOŘÁK	2	SCHUMANN	5
ENESCO	1	SMETANA	1
FRANCK	2	STOJOWSKI	1
GILBERT	1	STRAVINSKY	1
GLAZOUNOFF	1	SVENDSEN	1
GLUCK	1	VERDI	1
GRIEG	1	WAGNER	8
GRIFFES	1
GOLDMARK	1		100

Haydn's symphony "The Queen of France" was played twice, as was Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony.

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after Wagner's Prelude

ORCHESTRAL COMPOSITIONS PERFORMED FOR THE FIRST TIME.

CONVERSE: Symphony in C minor, January 30, 1920.
GRIFFES: "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," November 28, 1919..... 2

WORKS PERFORMED FOR THE FIRST TIME IN AMERICA.

DEBUSSY: Fantasy for pianoforte and orchestra (ALFRED CORTOT, pianist), April 16, 1920.
DEBUSSY: "Jeux," a Danced Poem, January 2, 1920.
D'INDY: "Sinfonia Brevis de Bello Gallico," No. 2, Op. 70, October 24, 1919..... 3

WORKS PERFORMED FOR THE FIRST TIME IN BOSTON.

SYMPHONIES, SYMPHONIC POEMS, ETC.

ALBENIZ: "Catalonia," Folk Suite in three parts, No. 1, October 10, 1919.
CHADWICK: "The Angel of Death," Symphonic Poem, November 14, 1919.
DEBUSSY: Petite Suite, March 26, 1920.
STOJOWSKI: Symphony in D minor, Op. 21, January 16, 1920 4
CONCERTOS.

CARPENTER: Concertino for pianoforte and orchestra (E. ROBERT SCHMITZ, pianist), February 13, 1920.
RACHMANINOFF: Concerto for pianoforte with orchestra, D minor, No. 3, Op. 30 (S. RACHMANINOFF, pianist), October 31, 1919..... 2

ARIAS AND SONGS.

BLOCH: Psalms 137 and 114 (* POVLA FRIJSH), November 14, 1920.
BRIDGE, F.: Sonnet, "Blow out, you Bugles" (JOHN McCORMACK), April 30, 1920.
FRANCK: Aria, "Les Rois dont vous vantez la Gloire" (* POVLA FRIJSH), November 14, 1920..... 4

10

WORKS PERFORMED FOR THE FIRST TIME AT THESE CONCERTS.

SYMPHONIES, SYMPHONIC POEMS, ETC.

BORODIN: Polovtskian Dances, from "Prince Igor," April 9, 1920.
DUKAS: Overture to "Polyeucte," April 9, 1920.
GILBERT: "The Dance in Place Congo," Symphonic Poem, February 20, 1920.

GLAZOUNOFF: "Stenka Razine," January 2, 1920.

HAYDN: Symphony, "La Reine de France," B-flat major (B. & H. No. 85), October 31, 1919.

MOUSSORGSKY: "A Night on Bald Mountain," Fantaisie for orchestra, April 23, 1920.

RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF: "Le Coq d'Or"; Introduction and March, April 16, 1920.

STRAVINSKY: Suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu," October 31, 1919. 8
CONCERTOS.

HANDEL: Concerto in F major for organ and orchestra, December 26, 1919 (JOSEPH BONNET)..... 1

CHORAL WORKS.

DEBUSSY: "La Damselle Elue," lyric poem (* ETHEL FRANK, soprano; * CLARAMOND THOMPSON, contralto, and chorus), February 27, 1920..... 1

ARIAS AND SONGS.

BEETHOVEN: "Nature's Adoration," with orchestra (LOUISE HOMER), November 28, 1919.

DUPARC: "Invitation à Voyage," with orchestra (* POVLA FRIJSH), November 14, 1919.

MOUSSORGSKY: "Hopak," with orchestra (* POVLA FRIJSH), November 14, 1919.

SCHUMANN: Bride's Song No. 1, Bride's Song No. 2, with orchestra (* MARGARET MATZENAUER), January 16, 1920 5

THE FOLLOWING ARTISTS HAVE APPEARED THIS SEASON.

	PAGE
BEDETTI,†  JEAN: January 30, 1920, Schumann's Concerto for violoncello. Sketch.....	897
March 6, 1920, Saint-Saëns's Concerto for violoncello, No. 1.....	000
BONNET, JOSEPH: December 26, 1919, Handel's Concerto in F major for organ and orchestra.* Sketch.....	626
CORTOT, ALFRED: April 16, 1920, Beethoven's Concerto for pianoforte, C minor, No. 3; Debussy, Fantasy for pianoforte and orchestra  (first performance in America). Sketch.....	1600
FOX,* FÉLIX: November 21, 1919, Brahms's Concerto No. 2, for pianoforte and orchestra.....	257
FRADKIN,† FREDRIC: February 20, 1920, Lalo's Spanish Symphony. Sketch.....	1063

FRIJSH,* POVLA: November 14, 1919, Franck, Aria  from "The Redemption"; Songs with orchestra; Duparc, Invitation au Voyage*; Moussorgsky, Hopak*; Bloch, Psalms * 137 and 114. Sketch.....	308
GANZ, RUDOLPH: April 2, 1920, Saint-Saëns, Pianoforte Concerto, No. 5. Sketch.....	1469
GEHBARD, HEINRICH: March 12, 1920; Grieg's Concerto in A minor for pianoforte, Op. 16.....
HOMER, LOUISE: November 28, 1919, Songs with orchestra: Beethoven, "Nature's Adoration"*; Handel, "Ombra mai fù"; Bach, "My Heart ever Faithful"; Verdi, "O Don Fatale," from "Don Carlos." Sketch.....	442
KREISLER, FRITZ: January 23, 1920, Beethoven's Concerto for violin. Sketch.....	865
MCCORMACK, JOHN: April 30, 1920, Mozart, Scene, "Non più! tutto ascoltae," and Aria, "Non temer, amato bene"; Bridge, Sonnet, "Blow out, you bugles"..	1737
MATZENAUER,* MARGARET: January 16, 1920, Songs with orchestra: Brahms, "Ever lighter grows my slumber"; Schumann, Bride's Songs * Nos. 1 and 2; Schubert, "Erlking"; Wagner, Immolation Scene from "Dusk of the Gods." Sketch.....	744
ORNSTEIN,* LEO: December 19, 1919, MacDowell's Pianoforte Concerto No. 2, D minor. Sketch.....	522
RACHMANINOFF, SERGEI: October 31, 1919, Rachmaninoff, Concerto for pianoforte, No. 3. Sketch.....	234
SCHMITZ, E. ROBERT: February 13, 1920, Carpenter, Concertino for pianoforte and orchestra. Sketch....	982
SPALDING, ALBERT: October 17, 1919, Dvořák, Concerto for violin and orchestra. Sketch.....	108
Sketch of Frédéric Denayer, viola ("Harold in Italy"), November 14, 1919.....	306
Sopranos: Mmes. Frijsh,* Matzenauer*.....	2
Contralto: Mme. Homer.....	1
Tenor: Mr. McCormack.....	1
Pianists: Messrs. Cortot, Fox,* Ganz, Gebhard, Ornstein,* Rachmaninoff, Schmitz.....	7
Violinists: Messrs. Fradkin,† Kreisler, Spalding.....	3
Violoncellist: Mr. Bedetti† (two performances).....	1
Organist: Mr. Bonnet.....	1
	16

MANY NEW WORKS FOR SYMPHONY

Monteux Brings Compositions New to Musical World for First Per- formance—Will Play Wagner

BY OLIN DOWNES

NEW YORK, Aug. 25.—The uncommonly frank and direct regard of Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for at least two seasons to come, was tinged with a fine Gallic irony when the writer told him of the departing pronouncement of Dr. Karl Muck, who left America a few days ago, to the effect that the Boston Symphony Orchestra could never again be the band that Muck had conducted, since the discharge of 29 German players.

NOT THE SAME, BUT BETTER

Mr. Monteux, who is a trifle fleshier than when last seen in Boston and looking very fit indeed after his summer vacation, raised his eyebrows a little and said in a thoughtful manner: "No! no! I don't suppose it can be the same. But"—as though pondering over some Euclidean mystery—"I don't speak of the conductor, but of the orchestra itself—may it not be, this band, even—a little better?"

Mr. Monteux debarked in the morning from an incoming steamer and stood smiling happily back of a fence which separated him from William H. Brennan, manager of the Boston orchestra.

The two men did not kiss, in the proverbial French style, when they met, but the cordiality of the meeting was unmistakable. Mr. Monteux was accompanied by Mrs. Monteux and his six-year-old daughter, who has already commenced to study music.

Mr. Monteux will come to Boston Wednesday and will set immediately to work arranging his programmes for the winter and studying in detail an extremely interesting assortment of new scores which he has brought with him from Paris.

He spent six weeks in Paris and six more weeks at the seashore with his family. He gradually collected scores and in a number of instances had friendly conferences with their composers, some of them old friends of the conductor. Mr. Monteux's talk about these men was a word picture of a number of composers of today who may be encountered in the course of a visit to Paris, France.

Saint-Saëns a Wagner Hater

Camille Saint-Saëns, that amazing compound of composer, essayist, scientist, globe-trotter, metaphysician and cordial hater of Germany, in his youth a Wagnerite and now a passionate declaimer—you might think Saint-Saëns in his twenties to hear the vigor of his arraignment—confronted Mr. Monteux with eagle nose and flashing eyes, and inveighed against coming productions of Wagner at the Paris Opera.

"They need new scenery there," shouted Saint-Saëns, "but they won't

FRIJSH,* POVLA: November 14, 1919, Franck, Aria *  from "The Redemption"; Songs with orchestra; Duparc, Invitation au Voyage*; Moussorgsky, Hopak*; Bloch, Psalms * 137 and 114. Sketch.....	308
GANZ, RUDOLPH: April 2, 1920, Saint-Saëns, Pianoforte Concerto, No. 5. Sketch.....	1469
GEHARD, HEINRICH: March 12, 1920; Grieg's Concerto in A minor for pianoforte, Op. 16.....
HOMER, LOUISE: November 28, 1919, Songs with orchestra: Beethoven, "Nature's Adoration" *; Handel, "Ombra mai fù"; Bach, "My Heart ever Faithful"; Verdi, "O Don Fatale," from "Don Carlos." Sketch.....	442
KREISLER, FRITZ: January 23, 1920, Beethoven's Concerto for violin. Sketch.....	865
MCCORMACK, JOHN: April 30, 1920, Mozart, Scene, "Non più! tutto ascoltae," and Aria, "Non temer, amato bene"; Bridge, Sonnet, "Blow out, you bugles"..	1737
MATZENAUER,* MARGARET: January 16, 1920, Songs with orchestra: Brahms, "Ever lighter grows my slumber"; Schumann, Bride's Songs * Nos. 1 and 2; Schubert, "Erlking"; Wagner, Immolation Scene from "Dusk of the Gods." Sketch.....	744
ORNSTEIN,* LEO: December 19, 1919, MacDowell's Pianoforte Concerto No. 2, D minor. Sketch.....	522
RACHMANINOFF, SERGEI: October 31, 1919, Rachmaninoff, Concerto for pianoforte, No. 3. Sketch.....	234
SCHMITZ, E. ROBERT: February 13, 1920, Carpenter, Concertino for pianoforte and orchestra. Sketch....	982
SPALDING, ALBERT: October 17, 1919, Dvořák, Concerto for violin and orchestra. Sketch.....	108
Sketch of Frédéric Denayer, viola ("Harold in Italy"), November 14, 1919.....	306
Sopranos: Mmes. Frijsh,* Matzenauer *.....	2
Contralto: Mme. Homer.....	1
Tenor: Mr. McCormack.....	1
Pianists: Messrs. Cortot, Fox,* Ganz, Gebhard, Ornstein,* Rachmaninoff, Schmitz .....	7
Violinists: Messrs. Fradkin,† Kreisler, Spalding.....	3
Violoncellist: Mr. Bedetti †  (two performances).....	1
Organist: Mr. Bonnet.....	1
	16

MANY NEW WORKS FOR SYMPHONY

Monteux Brings Compositions New to Musical World for First Performance—Will Play Wagner

BY OLIN DOWNES

NEW YORK, Aug. 25.—The uncommonly frank and direct regard of Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for at least two seasons to come, was tinged with a fine Gallic irony when the writer told him of the departing pronouncement of Dr. Karl Muck, who left America a few days ago, to the effect that the Boston Symphony Orchestra could never again be the band that Muck had conducted, since the discharge of 29 German players.

NOT THE SAME, BUT BETTER

Mr. Monteux, who is a trifle fleshier than when last seen in Boston and looking very fit indeed after his summer vacation, raised his eyebrows a little and said in a thoughtful manner; "No! no! I don't suppose it can be the same. But"—as though pondering over some Euclidean mystery—"I don't speak of the conductor, but of the orchestra itself—may it not be, this band, even—a little better?"

Mr. Monteux debarked in the morning from an incoming steamer and stood smiling happily back of a fence which separated him from William H. Brennan, manager of the Boston orchestra.

The two men did not kiss, in the proverbial French style, when they met, but the cordiality of the meeting was unmistakable. Mr. Monteux was accompanied by Mrs. Monteux and his six-year-old daughter, who has already commenced to study music.

Mr. Monteux will come to Boston Wednesday and will set immediately to work arranging his programmes for the winter and studying in detail an extremely interesting assortment of new scores which he has brought with him from Paris.

He spent six weeks in Paris and six more weeks at the seashore with his family. He gradually collected scores and in a number of instances had friendly conferences with their composers, some of them old friends of the conductor. Mr. Monteux's talk about these men was a word picture of a number of composers of today who may be encountered in the course of a visit to Paris, France.

Saint-Saëns a Wagner Hater

Camille Saint-Saëns, that amazing compound of composer, essayist, scientist, globe-trotter, metaphysician and cordial hater of Germany, in his youth a Wagnerite and now a passionate declaimer—you might think Saint-Saëns in his twenties to hear the vigor of his arraignment—confronted Mr. Monteux with eagle nose and flashing eyes, and inveighed against coming productions of Wagner at the Paris Opera.

"They need new scenery there," shouted Saint-Saëns, "but they won't get it when they produce Wagner."

26

Will Open With Wagner

"But I do not agree with that," said Mr. Monteux. "I plan to have Wagner on my first programme. And at Paris they will like it, too. There will be some trouble in the streets, probably, when they give Wagner, but"—he laughed—"I have known of trouble in the streets of Paris over smaller things than that. It will do the Opera no harm, and they will make money giving Wagner."

Mr. Monteux said to Saint-Saens, who, since he toured as pianist-composer with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the season of 1906-07, has particularly vivid recollections of this organization:

Suggests Own Works

"I want to play some of your music in Boston, but they are very familiar with your scores, of which my friend and colleague, M. Ravaud, has just given many brilliant performances."

Saint-Saens has not the reputation of a wit for nothing. His eye twinkled as he said—this composer of infinite productiveness and facility—"O, but they can't have heard all of them!" And that week Monteux received from Saint-Saens three letters, closely written, in a fine hand, of four pages each, of compositions which Saint-Saens mentioned as available for performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra!

D'Indy's Third Symphony

Mr. Monteux talked with D'Indy and will give in Boston the first performance in America of that distinguished composer's third symphony, a long work, with a furiously triumphant finale, inspired by the war. In this there will be poetic justice. In his last season in Boston Dr. Muck refused to perform any work by the Frenchman, D'Indy, because of the very frank utterances that D'Indy was making at the time, in Paris, regarding Germany's part in the war. The genius of D'Indy is perhaps more profoundly spiritual than the finished and cosmopolitan art of Saint-Saens, a great artist, but also a man of the world. And as with the music of D'Indy, the composer, who, though younger than Saint-Saens, is no longer young, so with the bearing of D'Indy, the man: He lives today more an inner than an outer life. He seems to be meditating profoundly on things not of this world.

First Hearing of Hure Symphony

A first production in the world of a symphonic importance will be the premiere, at a Boston Symphony concert, of a symphony with organ by Jean Hure, who alas, with this vast work completed, is succumbing gradually to a lung disease.

Two other first productions of great interest will be the first performances in America of an early and until now practically unknown "Fantasie for piano and orchestra" by Debussy, which will be played with the assistance of the pianist, Alfred Cortot, and per contra, one of Debussy's last important compositions. This will be the score of "Jeux" ("Play") which Debussy wrote for performance as a ballet, for the Russian dancer, Nijinsky.

Played It in 1913

"I particularly want to do this," said Mr. Monteux. "because I felt when I conducted the first performances of 'Jeux' in Paris and in London in 1913, that Nijinsky" (who appeared as a tennis player, with his racket on the stage) "adopted rather silly and unrelated action to some really charming music. Nijinsky is the great male dancer of the world. But the stage genius of the Russian ballet was not Nijinsky, but Fokine, who never came to America, and of whom Nijinsky was jealous."

Other modern works to be produced will be compositions by Florent Schmidt, Ravel, Ducasse, Albert Roussel. But Mr. Monteux is also a worshipper of the classics.

Give Ninth With Chorus

There will be played at least two symphonies of Beethoven—the fourth, and the ninth, with chorus—symphonies of Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms Mendelssohn, whom Mr. Monteux thinks it is the custom today to a little underrate, and, as Mr. Monteux hopes, for the last concert of the season, a production of Cesar Franck's "Beatitudes" with chorus.

Mr. Monteux will also give attention to music by Slavic composers, among them Dvorak, Tschalkowsky, Stravinsky, the latter to be represented, probably, by a suite from the exquisite music for the ballet, "The Bird of Fire."

It will be observed that the foregoing list of composers has practically a pre-war percentage of German names, with the exception of one or two modern German composers, such as Richard Strauss. When I asked Mr. Monteux if he would play Strauss, his answer was particularly interesting, in view of his refusal, during war time, to conduct a performance of Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" for the Russian ballet. "I would like to play him very much," he said. "I think that it is time to think of music and war as two different things. During the conflict it seemed to me wrong to conduct a performance of a work which would send a substantial royalty to a composer whose nation had outraged justice, while my own countrymen and comrades were dying in the trenches. But Strauss' music was not composed by the war, and the war is over. On the other hand, it would be as inhuman as it would be academic to expect the nations of the earth to forget in a day the frightful orgy of injury and suffering through which they have passed.

27

"Therefore, I think it not only sensible, but also only fair, to find out how my audiences feel about Strauss before I decide how soon I shall put his name on my programmes. Not to have him on one's programme is a loss to a conductor, because even Strauss' poorer music is so brilliantly orchestrated that it is certain to make a big effect. But one must have consideration for that which is a fact and not a theory: The state, following the cataclysm, of the nerves of the world."

NEW SYMPHONY HEAD DUE TODAY

Pierre Monteux Lands in New York and Takes Train for Boston

WILL GIVE SEVERAL NEW WORKS HERE

[Special Dispatch to the Herald]

NEW YORK, Aug. 25—Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived from Havre, France, this morning on the Lorraine, and was met at the dock by W. H. Brennan, business manager of the orchestra. They left New York tonight on the mid-night train.

Mr. Monteux was director of the French operas at the Metropolitan last year. At that time he received an offer from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but was unable to take it, as he was under contract with the Metropolitan Opera House, but conducted the orchestra until the arrival of Henri Rabaud.

He takes charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra following the vicissitudes of its former conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, who was interned because of his alleged sympathies for Germany and her allies, and who left last week for Europe.

Will Have Its Place

When asked if he intended to play German compositions, he said German music will have its place on the programs of the orchestra. "French music has never been properly interpreted in America," he said.

"My aim will be to give the American people the kind of music their tastes call for. I do not think there has been any change in people's tastes regarding music due to the war. For the last two years there has been a lack of music, and right now the general public is eager for music."

With Mr. Monteux were his wife and two children.

Mr. Monteux, on arrival in Boston will immediately begin to arrange his programs for the winter concerts. He has with him an assortment of new scores that he has brought from Paris.

He purposes to have Wagner on his first program. He has three letters from Camille Saint-Saens, containing scores which the French composer has mentioned as among his works available for giving before Boston audiences. Mr. Monteux will also give in Boston the first performance in America of D'Indy's third symphony, a work inspired by the war.

Another feature of the season will be the first performance at a Boston Symphony concert of a symphony with organ by Jean Hure. Two other first productions in America will be of the early "Fantasie for Piano and Orchestra" by Debussy, which will be played with the assistance of the pianist, Alfred Cortot, and one of the same composer's latest important compositions, the score of "Jeux" (plays) which he wrote for a ballet for Nijinsky, the Russian dancer. Other modern works produced will be by Florent Schmidt, Ravel, Ducasse and Albert Roussel.

Two symphonies—at least—of Beethoven, the fourth and the ninth, with chorus; symphonies by Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, Mendelssohn and Cesar Franck's "Beatitudes" with chorus, will be given.

Among the Slavic composers represented will be Dvorak, Tschalkowsky and Stravinsky, the latter probably by a suite from "The Bird of Fire."

Preparing for Symphony Season

Mr. Monteux Already at Work in Boston—Worcester Music Festival, Caruso's Return and Other Promises to Gladden Music Lovers' Hearts.

Post Sept. 7/19

Mr. Monteux is arrived in Boston and hard at work in the musical library of Symphony Hall. The Worcester music festival draws near. Mr. Caruso comes back to New York, and even the certainty of 12 concerts in Mexico at $7000 a concert fails to lighten his sorrow over the conscription by Italian socialists of his choice wines and viands on his estate in Italy. Arturo Bodansky, who will conduct a series of important orchestral concerts, in addition to his activities at the Metropolitan Opera House, has also returned. The lists of a number of new singers, five of them American girls, have been added to the Metropolitan personnel. Which means that the music critics, also, have to come back to town and sharpen their pencils.

Mr. Caruso, who came back with Mrs. Caruso and Caruso's 12-year-old son, Enrico, by another union, was expatriated in his statements against Soviet rule: "I consider that I was treated shabbily. They invaded my home in the name of the Soviet. Soviet! Bah! What do I care for the Soviet! They were well treated. They enjoyed my hospitality, which I freely gave to my starving countrymen, and then—they steal my Virginia hams! I do not drink the wine myself, but that which was contained in the demi-johns was sold—had been paid for, in fact—and I? I am unable to deliver it to the buyers! For that I came away earlier than I expected. I am anxious to come here, where I am not robbed. What they take from you here they take gently and with respect. Ask 'Big Bill' Edwards. See how genteel he is in taking it from you!"

At the Worcester Festival, given in Mechanics Hall, Worcester, October 6-10, there will be five concert programmes consisting entirely of works by American composers. This all-American programme was omitted last year because of the influenza epidemic. The programmes then proposed will be given with a very few alterations and additions next month. One of the important additions will be John Powell's "Rhapsodie Negre," a work which made a deep impression on discerning listeners when it was given for the first time at a recent Norfolk (Connecticut) music festival. The "Rhapsodie Negre" will be heard for the first time hereabouts. It was added to the festival programme at the suggestion of another American composer, himself a keen student of Negro folk-song, who earnestly recommended Mr. Powell's work for performance.

At this festival 19 American composers will be given a hearing. The big choral works will be George W. Chadwick's "Judith," Henry Hadley's "Ode to Music," and Mabel Daniels "Peace with a Sword." The soloists will be Mabel Garrison, soprano; Louise Homer, contralto; Emma Roberts, contralto; George Hamlin, tenor; Lambert Murphy, tenor; Reinold Werrenrath, baritone; Edgar Schofield, bass; Milton C. Snyder, bass; Frances Nash, pianist; and Mr. Powell as pianist as well as composer. As usual, the Worcester Festival chorus will consist of about 400 voices and there will be a large chorus of children's voices. Dr. Arthur Mees will conduct and the orchestra will be the orchestra of Philadelphia, led by its concertmaster, Thaddeus Rich.

Talking of American composers, there was interesting comment on the part of Dutch newspapers when Henry F. Gilbert's "Comedy Overture on Negro Themes" was recently played by an orchestra under Schaevoigt at the Kursaal at Scheveningen on Aug. 6. The programme opened with this composition, and there followed songs of Liszt and Mahlen, Strauss' "Don Juan," the "Tristan" prelude and Liszt's "Tasso." The critical commentary on Gilbert's work follows:

De Avondpost: "Schneevogt brought out as a novelty a comedy overture on Negro themes by Gilbert. For Negroes and for modern dancing girls this music is just suited. The true cake-walk rhythm was brought sharply to the fore by the orchestra, and even in the somewhat serious fugato treatment of the theme one fancies that he is in a modern dance hall. Naturally, great success."

Nieuwe Rotterdamsche Courant: "This piece is described by its title. It is both lively and clever and gives one the impression of a composer who knows well how to handle these fugitive themes. It is effectively orchestrated."

The "Het Vaderland":

"The 'Comedy Overture on Negro Themes,' by Henry Gilbert is a free, superficial rhythmic and melodic (frequently dreadfully banal) work. Even the quas-serious aspect of the fugue does not alter our general impression that it is an empty work; a husk without a kernel, having no reasonable justification for its existence."

Haagsche Courant:

"The concert opened with a piece new to us; a 'Comedy Overture on Negro Themes,' by Henry F. Gilbert, a composer of whom we know nothing but that he exists. It is full of life, well made, agreeable to listen to and easy to follow. It reflects the happy nature of the Negro themes upon which it is based and must be welcomed without protest. It received much applause."

Nieuwe Courant:

"Schneevogt began with an American novelty, 'Comedy Overture on Negro Themes,' by Henry F. Gilbert, a work whereof we know only the name. The first impression which we received was that of a Sousa march and a strong cake-walk rhythm, but later this music gives place to music of greater musical worth. Gilbert's overture sounds fresh in spite of its 20 years of age (we are so much influenced by the rapid changes in the art of music that the work of a composer of 20 years ago already sounds old-fashioned to us). Gilbert's aim in his music is to be characteristically American. Does Gilbert alone reflect the spirit of America in his happy overture or shall we rather trust to those who know the country through and through. The writer is not so fortunate and must, therefore, suspend judgment on this point."

Mr. Gilbert once said to us that humor was one of the most national things in the world. He thought that the humor of one race was likely to be a characteristic most easily misunderstood by another. That which is amusing in one's country may elsewhere be matter for insult.

The mission of an artist is to remove this provincialism, and to show all people how fundamentally and spiritually they are related to each other. In order to do this an artist must have within him, in equilibrium two things. The first, his profound consciousness of the spirit of his people, and his passionate union with that consciousness. The second, that quality of objectivity which enables him to see himself and his expression from a distant and impersonal viewpoint, where his critical feeling for form may guide his hand and his vision make clear the co-relations of himself, his art and the life of the world. It is this union of the creative urge and the inalienable critical intuition that makes the great artist the poet and prophet of his age. If one or the other element in his makeup is absent, his expression will be, in exact proportion, defective, narrow in its scope, temporary in its appeal and therefore incapable of enduring through successive periods when everything but the most fundamental emotions which make all humanity akin undergoes change. We think Mr. Gilbert has shown in his music a broader vision and a deeper racial consciousness than any of his contemporaries. The success of the "Comedy Overture" both in Russia and in different places of Europe, and its constantly growing acceptance in these states, seem to support this belief. The performance of the "Comedy Overture" was the sixth given within the last five months on this side of the water.

Mr. Sylvi Noack has resigned the position of second concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to become concert master for the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra, Walter Henry Rothwell, conductor.

We found Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, browsing about in the library of that esteemed institution and asked him about his work and some other questions. Was the American public, musically speaking, as serious as the Parisian musical public? "The public," said Mr. Monteux, philosophically, "is the public. There is also the musically 'elite'—you understand me? Well, there is an 'elite' in Paris, as everywhere else, which is in the minority. There is an 'elite' in American cities, and there are so many people in American cities, that it is a big 'elite'."

"But almost always," he went on, with a twinkle in his eye, "the applause is for the loud ending. For the soft ending there is little applause—everywhere—every time. At the Metropolitan last winter I said to Mme. Barrientos and Monsieur Carlo Hackett, the new young tenor, when they had sung at rehearsal the great duet from Gounod's 'Mireille': 'That is very fine. That is a very beautiful melody. You sing it charmingly. You will get much applause. You will sing this melody for the records and you will make much money.' But Mme. Barrientos disagreed. 'No!' she said, 'it has not a loud ending. You will see. We will get no applause.' She was right."

"Well," he shrugged his shoulders, "audiences are audiences, the world over. I have never had more courteous, interested and inspiring audiences than in America."

Mr. Monteux was fishing in a pile of letters. He pulled out one with a smile. "Do you know this hand-writing? It is Saint-Saens'. It is his fourth letter. It, too, is full of compositions, which he says I may perform if I choose at the Symphony concerts."

We asked him if he remembered anything of his experiences in the war. "Oh, that is far off now, and very unhappy. Who wants to remember the war? Did I kill a German? I think not one, though Hasselmans and I, fellow-musicians from Paris, met when both of us were in the trenches very near the Boche. I fired. Oh, yes! There were rifles on supports, stuck through the loopholes in the trenches. One stepped up quickly behind this rifle and pulled the trigger. But I am quite sure I hit no one during my service in the trenches and for that I am not unhappy."

We asked him how Romain Rolland, the famous author and musical critic, whose temperate expressions about the war in his book, "Above the Battle," had angered Frenchmen, during the conflict, was considered now in Paris. Mr. Monteux replied, "he is still unpopular. And I think in this the French people are right. Art, I agree, is greater than nations. It is above humanity. But artists are not. They are men. When the nation is in danger, art is to be put aside. One must fight."

"Was it hard to discipline an orchestra?" "Not if you have played in an orchestra, as I did, for many years before I conducted," replied Mr. Monteux. Then they cannot fool you. Otherwise they may play some joke. The same joke I played on some conductors 25 years ago, the same joke that orchestral players 65 years from now will be playing on conductors who do not thoroughly know the orchestra. For the rest, the men are there to be musicians and make their living, and a man who has been in the orchestra understands that joke!"

Traveler - Aug. 28/19
BY CHARLES A. PARKER
Traveler Staff Reporter

Pierre Monteux, Boston's new Symphony Orchestra conductor, today opened his new home at Brandon Hall, Brookline, where with Mrs. Monteux and little Denise Monteux, the six-year old daughter, he will live for the present.

Mr. Monteux succeeds Henri Rabaud and the latter's predecessor, Dr. Karl Muck, who was interned during the war and who recently left New York for Germany.

He was in Boston eight days in November, 1916, at the time of the presentation of the Russian Ballet here at the Boston Opera House and again last year for six weeks as leader of the Symphony Orchestra previous to the arrival of Rabaud.

He has appointments to meet a large group of New York composers and a group of the leading Boston composers.

Tomorrow he will begin the arrangement of the program for this winter.

Perhaps no conductor is better qualified to arrange a musical program for the edification and delectation of music-lovers in America than is Mr. Monteux.

Already it has been announced he will inculcate German symphonies into the winter's program.

Mr. Monteux comes to Boston with a wholly open-minded and refreshing viewpoint regarding the musical desires of Boston and of America.

"Now that the war is over, let us forget the war. It has no part in the selection of our musical programs." That is his attitude as regards musical standards from the point of view of what happened during the war.

It must be borne in mind that for 25 months Mr. Monteux lived with the soldiers of France—as one of them in the trenches.

"I had my violin with me," he related. "When it was possible I played. I played in the French churches on Sundays with an organist and a solo singer accompanying. Sometimes when there was no singer and no organ I played by my lonesome."

"I watched the shells flying overhead in Rheims, Verdun, Soissons, and later in Argonne."

In 1916 Mr. Monteux was released from military duties and came to this country.

Monsieur is of the dark type—with black hair, just as are the long, wavy curls of his little daughter; his own hair is inclined to be wavy—and deep brown eyes.

Music to Live

He is rather the subdued than the volatile style of Frenchman.

"Neither America nor any of the rest of the world has lost its love for music as a result of the war," he said today.

"In fact, the same old love exists and will always exist in the hearts of those with a true love of music. We shall have symphonies and music of a new character perhaps here and there. Of course, that is inevitable. But the time will not come when the world of music lovers will tire of classical music. That will remain and endure—just as some of our best in literature and in poetry remains and always will be dear to us."

"You ask whether we are to develop a true American type of music. Yes, perhaps so, but the time has not arrived for that. At present American music is not at its best. It is so much impregnated with the influence of old-world music—of the Italian and the Russian and the German composer."

"Today if we hear German music we recognize it at once from its typical characteristic; it is the same with Italian, with French, with Russian music."

"But American music is not so. Something as yet is lacking. The time may be near when all this will be changed. When the true American music comes—when we are able to present it in the

hony ne Home

heir little daughter, Denise.

says I may perform if I choose at the Symphony concerts."

We asked him if he remembered anything of his experiences in the war. "Oh, that is far off now, and very unhappy. Who wants to remember the war? Did I kill a German? I think not one, though Hasselmans and I, fellow-musicians from Paris, met when both of us were in the trenches very near the Boche. I fired. Oh, yes! There were rifles on supports, stuck through the loopholes in the trenches. One stepped up quickly behind this rifle and pulled the trigger. But I am quite sure I hit no one during my service in the trenches and for that I am not unhappy."

We asked him how Romain Rolland, the famous author and musical critic, whose temperate expressions about the war in his book, "Above the Battle," had angered Frenchmen, during the conflict, was considered now in Paris. Mr. Monteux replied, "he is still unpopular. And I think in this the French people are right. Art, I agree, is greater than nations. It is above humanity. But artists are not. They are men. When the nation is in danger, art is to be put aside. One must fight."

"Was it hard to discipline an orchestra?" "Not if you have played in an orchestra, as I did, for many years before I conducted," replied Mr. Monteux. Then they cannot fool you. Otherwise they may play some joke. The same joke I played on some conductors 25 years ago, the same joke that orchestral players 25 years from now will be playing on conductors who do not thoroughly know the orchestra. For the rest, the men are there to be musicians and make their living, and a man who has been in the orchestra understands that joke!"

Traveler Aug. 28/19
BY CHARLES A. PARKER

Traveler Staff Reporter

Pierre Monteux, Boston's new Symphony Orchestra conductor, today opened his new home at Brandon Hall, Brookline, where with Mrs. Monteux and little Miss Denise Monteux, the six-year old daughter, he will live for the present.

Mr. Monteux succeeds Henri Rabaud and the latter's predecessor, Dr. Karl Muck, who was interned during the war and who recently left New York for Germany.

He was in Boston eight days in November, 1916, at the time of the presentation of the Russian Ballet here at the Boston Opera House and again last year for six weeks as leader of the Symphony Orchestra previous to the arrival of Rabaud.

He has appointments to meet a large group of New York composers and a group of the leading Boston composers.

Tomorrow he will begin the arrangement of the program for this winter.

Perhaps no one is better fitted to arrange the edification of lovers in America.

Already it has inculcated German winter's program.

Mr. Monteux a wholly open viewpoint regarding Boston and of

"Now that I forget the war, selection of That is his attitude standards from what happened

It must be 25 months Mr. soldiers of France the trenches.

"I had my vated. "When I played in the Sundays with singer accompa there was no played by my I

"I watched the in Rheims, Ver in Argonne."

In 1916 Mr. from military country.

Monsieur is black hair, just curls of his hair is inclined brown eyes.

Mr.

He is rather volatile style of

"Neither America of the world has as a result of

"In fact, the will always ex with a true have symphon character perh course, that is will not come lovers will tire will remain an our best in li remains and alw

"You ask wh true American haps so, but th that. At prese at its best. It with the influ of the Italian German compo

"Today if w recognize it a characteristic; ian, with Fren

"But America thing as yet be near when When the true when we are

Monteux, New Boston Symphony Conductor, Opens Brookline Home

Pierre Monteux, Boston's new Symphony orchestra conductor, Mrs. Monteux and their little daughter, Denise.

scores of the symphony as such, it will be recognized. And it will possess the "dance spirit" which characterizes Russian music—not of the same style as that of Russia but with a style characteristically American.

Will Be Original

"I think it will come. It will be very original; very American."

Mr. Monteaux referred to the Boston composer Gilbert as one who has written themes having the originality and the true "color" of American music.

He is to confer with Loeffler, Chadwick, Converse, Foote and others here with a view to learning what the American music-lovers desire as American compositions.

Mr. Monteaux indeed is ready to present fully and generously all American scores that can be best presented by orchestration and which seems likely to find favor with Americans.

"Americans want the classics in music," he said. "That means German compositions."

"Hitherto Italian music has failed for the concert. There have been no symphonies. Today, Casella and four or five other young Italians have written musical poems and ballads which seem worthy of production."

"Some of these will be given by the Symphony Orchestra this winter. I cannot say how these will be received. Personally I like them. It is another question as to what audiences will say."

D'Indy Symphony

"A new symphony written by D'Indy will perhaps prove of interest here. He is an old man—a spectator to the things that have been transpiring in France for the past four terrible years, but he seems to have translated the spirit of the war into his scores."

"Boston has a different spirit of musical appreciation from New York. Here we are, to a very praiseworthy degree, looking for the good, the appreciable in our music. The New Yorker, it seems to me, is always trying to compare what he hears with something that he has heard before."

"He is what you might call a pessimist, while we here are optimists. He finds out the bad. We find out the good in our music."

"It must be remembered that none of us are perfect."

SYMPHONY NOT TO BAR GERMAN MUSIC

Traveler—Aug. 27/19

Word comes from New York that Pierre Monteux, who has just returned from Paris on his way to take charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not exclude German music from the repertoire of his organization.

The decision seems to us entirely wise. Nothing but prejudice could cause a continuance of the ban on all things German that naturally was maintained during the war. Products of German factories will, perhaps, be readmitted but slowly to our markets, because the articles can in most instances be duplicated in our own workrooms or in those of some friendly nation. But with works of art, the condition is different. A painting, a piece of sculpture, or a musical composition, is the product of individual genius. It cannot be duplicated. It is created wherever the producer chances, or chooses, to do his work. The works of artists everywhere are the heritage of all mankind. Permanently to deprive ourselves of the enjoyment of whatever is best in German music, would be to spite ourselves without even the pitiful satisfaction of spiting the Germans.

To discard the contributions of German genius, merely because of a dislike for Germany, would be a good deal like the deliberate efforts of German military leaders to destroy Rheims Cathedral and other monuments of French art.

At the same time, it will be well to re-examine every specimen of German brain-work before accepting it. Much of German art and German philosophy has false ideals woven into its fabric. Now that the results of such ideals have been so graphically and so tragically exhibited in the Teuton assault upon civilization, we should be extremely vigilant against every form of German doctrine, however carefully disguised.

Symphony Hall.

SYMPHONY MEN READY FOR WORK

Will Begin Rehearsals for the Coming Season
Wednesday

NEW 'CELLO AND VIOLA LEADERS

Herald—Sept. 29/19

One of the finest collections of artists ever brought together for the Symphony Orchestra will begin rehearsals Wednesday in preparation for the opening of the season a week from Friday. The musicians have already returned to Boston from their summer homes in response to the call of Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the orchestra.

The appointment of Julius Theodorowicz, a member of the orchestra for 21 years, to the position of second concert master is the only radical change in the personnel of the body. New leaders have been chosen for the viola and 'cello sections, which have been partially reconstituted since the last appearance of the orchestra.

New Leading 'Cellist

The virtuosi, who have just arrived from France to lead these two string sections, have been well known to musical Paris for many years. Jean Bedetti, the violoncellist, took 2nd prize at the Paris Conservatory in 1902, and in 1908 played in the Colonne Orchestra under the leadership of Colonne, Plerne and Monteux. He has also given many recitals in France, Spain, Belgium,

FREDERIC DENAYER

One of the Four Best Viola Players of France

Switzerland and England. His musical career was interrupted by the war, in which he served at the front for 18 months.

Frederic Denayer, who has also been appointed to the orchestra, is considered one of the four best viola players ever produced by France. He has been active in the chief orchestras and ensembles of that country for the last 20 years, and has played in several orchestras under Monteux. He also played in the initial performance of Debussy's quartet, and played opposite Ysaye in Chausson's quartet.

There will be no Rehearsal and Concert next week

JEAN BEDETTI
Leading 'Cellist of the Orchestra

MISS RENEE LONGY

Pianist, Who Was Married to Georges Mignelle, 'Cellist of Symphony Orchestra Yesterday.

Herald Aug 6, 1919
MANY MUSICIANS ATTEND WEDDING

Miss Renee Longy Is Married to Georges Miquelle, Symphony 'Cellist

Miss Renee Longy, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Georges Longy of Hemenway street, was married yesterday at the Church of Notre Dame des Victoires, Isabella street, to Georges Miquelle, 'cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, before a notable gathering of musicians and representatives of the various musical societies of Greater Boston. The Rev. Joseph F. Sollier, pastor, celebrated a nuptial mass and also performed the ceremony.

The bride was given in marriage by her father, oboe soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Mme. Eloise Hall, former saxophone soloist with that organization, was matron of honor, and Charles M. Loeffler, violinist and composer, was best man.

Special Music Program

A special music program was played during the service by a string quartet composed of Miss Carmele Ippolite and Miss Helen Di Natale, violins; Miss Florence Colby, 'cello, and Henry Belinger, viola. The flute obligatos were played by Arthur Brooks of the Symphony Orchestra. Stuart Mason of the New England Conservatory of Music presided at the organ, assisted by Mme. Odelle Bailly, organist of the church.

Among the guests were Mrs. Richard H. Jones, president of the Chromatic Club; Miss Helen Ranney, president of the McDowell Club; Consul and Mrs. Joseph F. M. Flamand, Miss Gertrude Sands, Miss Rose A. Garrity, Miss Alice McLaughlin, members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Longy Club, members of the Professional Women's Club and pupils of the Longy school.

The bride is a talented musician, instructor in pianoforte and rhythmic at the Longy school on Hemenway street. The groom is a graduate of the Conservatoire National de Musique of Paris, where he was awarded first prize for 'cello playing in June, 1914. He served three years in the French army and came to the United States in May, 1918, with the French military band. Since that time he has been solo 'cellist in the Symphony Orchestra.

The wedding breakfast and reception were held at Copley-Plaza Hotel, after which the happy couple left for a tour of the White mountains. Mr. Miquelle and his bride will reside in Boston.

FREDERIC FRADKIN IS FATHER OF TWINS

Symphony's Solo Violinist Adds Duet
to the Aggregation

Frederic Fradkin, solo violinist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was presented with twins yesterday by Mrs. Fradkin. One was a boy, weighing six pounds, and the other a girl, weighing a pound less. Mrs. Fradkin is resting well and is rejoicing with her husband over the arrival of the twins.

Mr. Fradkin is the first American solo violinist that the Symphony Orchestra has had. He was born in New York and won his first prize at Paris. A few years ago he married Jean Tell, who was an artist in several New York plays. Mrs. Fradkin quit the stage for all time when she was married to the musician. They are making their home at 82 Fenway.

MUCK SAYS U. S. ACCORDED HIM SQUARE DEAL

By Associated Press

BERLIN, Nov. 17.—Dr. Karl Muck, formerly conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, says he was accorded "altogether worthy" treatment during his 16 months internment as an enemy alien in the United States. The noted musician has just returned to Berlin from Copenhagen where he landed several months ago after leaving the internment camp at Fort Oglethorpe, Ga.

"I was directing the Boston Symphony Orchestra when the war broke out," Dr. Muck related to a reporter of the Berlin Tageblatt. "For sometime I was unmolested, even after America entered the conflict. In March, 1918, however, I was interned, my wife remained in our house in Boston, and I was sent to the prison camp, where I was confined with 4500 other persons. The treatment and shelter were altogether worthy. The food was not to be complained of, especially as 120 people, including myself, had their own mess and their own cook. My wife was permitted to visit me once a week, and spend two hours with me, naturally talking in English and in the presence of an officer."

Dr. Muck said he had not lost many of his friends in America and that his musicians had stood by him loyally. He attributed his imprisonment to "hysteria" which, he said, was due to "British propaganda."

"No conditions were imposed on the prisoners," continued Dr. Muck, "but it was urgently suggested any who wanted to leave America and return to Germany might have their liberty. I did not want to comply with this stipulation, but my wife argued me into it and I finally agreed. And so one day I was free. My bank account and my house in Boston the American government has confiscated, and I do not know how things will come out."

Dr. Muck said he had made no plans for the future but under no circumstances would he remain in Berlin. He said it was possible he might go to Switzerland or to Gratz, Austria, where his wife's aged mother lives. On his first day in Berlin he led the rehearsal for the next Weingartner Symphony concert.

PIERRE BENJAMIN MONTEUX was born at Paris on April 4, 1875. He studied at the Conservatoire of that city, and in 1896, a pupil of Berthelier, he was awarded a first prize for violin playing. The other first prizes for violin that year were awarded to Messrs. Sechiari, Soudant, and Thibaud. He played the viola in Colonne's orchestra; he was a member of the orchestra of the Opéra-Comique, and he busied himself in chamber music. In 1893 with Miss Victoria Barrière, pianist, Miss Vormèse, and Mr. Carcanade, he founded the Société de Musique Moderne, playing the viola. Their first concert was on February 25. With Messrs. Geloso, Capet, and Schneklud he took part in the Auditions annuelles des derniers grands Quatuors de Beethoven. In 1900 with Messrs. Soudant, de Bruyre, and Destombes he played chamber music in the Matinées Artistiques Populaires. He figured prominently at concerts of the Société Nationale and the Société de Musique Française. Among the compositions heard at these various concerts for the first time—in which he participated—were Brahms's Clarinet Quintet, Stojowski's Variations, Lekeu's "Andromède," pieces by Ropartz, Quittard, Chausson ("Légende de Sainte-Cécile"), Hartog, Luzzato, Glazounoff (Élégie for viola), d'Indy (Suite dans le style ancien), L. Lacombe, Rubinstein, Jaques-Dalcroze. He also took part in concerts given by Messrs. Chevillard, Hayot, and Salmon, and in concerts of the Société des Compositeurs de Musique.

In 1911 he was engaged as conductor of the Ballet Russe, with which he made four tours throughout Europe. He conducted ballet at various theatres in Paris, and gave series of orchestral concerts in that city.

He came to the United States in 1916 as conductor of the Ballet Russe, and conducted at the Boston Opera House, November 6-11, 1916: "Les Papillons," "Spectre de la Rose," "Thamar," "Petrouchka," "Scheherazade," "Prince Igor," "Sadko," "L'Après-Midi d'un Faune," "Cléopâtre."

In 1917 he was appointed a conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House. He made his first appearance there with "Faust," November 19, 1917. He brought out Rabaud's "Marouf" (December 19), "Coq d'Or" (March 6, 1918), and Gilbert's ballet "The Dance in Place Congo."

At the Boston Opera House, coming with the Metropolitan Opera Company, he conducted "Coq d'Or" and "The Dance in Place Congo" (April 26, 1918) and "Samson et Dalila" (April 27, 1918).

He conducted these concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston in the fall of 1918: October 25—Franck, Symphony in D minor; Schumann, Overture to "Manfred"; Dukas, "The Peri" (first time here); Debussy, "Iberia"; November 1—Beethoven, Symphony No. 7; Loeffler, "La Bonne Chanson"; Franck, "The Aeolidae";

FREDERIC FRADKIN IS FATHER OF TWINS

Symphony's Solo Violinist Adds Duet
to the Aggregation

Frederic Fradkin, solo violinist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was presented with twins yesterday by Mrs. Fradkin. One was a boy, weighing six pounds, and the other a girl, weighing a pound less. Mrs. Fradkin is resting well and is rejoicing with her husband over the arrival of the twins.

Mr. Fradkin is the first American solo violinist that the Symphony Orchestra has had. He was born in New York and won his first prize at Paris. A few years ago he married Jean Tell, who was an artist in several New York plays. Mrs. Fradkin quit the stage for all time when she was married to the musician. They are making their home at 82 Fenway.

MUCK SAYS U. S. ACCORDED HIM SQUARE DEAL

By Associated Press

BERLIN, Nov. 17—Dr. Karl Muck, formerly conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, says he was accorded "altogether worthy" treatment during his 16 months internment as an enemy alien in the United States. The noted musician has just returned to Berlin from Copenhagen where he landed several months ago after leaving the internment camp at Fort Oglethorpe, Ga.

"I was directing the Boston Symphony Orchestra when the war broke out," Dr. Muck related to a reporter of the Berlin Tageblatt. "For sometime I was unmolested, even after America entered the conflict. In March, 1918, however, I was interned, my wife remained in our house in Boston, and I was sent to the prison camp, where I was confined with 4500 other persons. The treatment and shelter were altogether worthy. The food was not to be complained of, especially as 120 people, including myself, had their own mess and their own cook. My wife was permitted to visit me once a week, and spend two hours with me, naturally talking in English and in the presence of an officer."

Dr. Muck said he had not lost many of his friends in America and that his musicians had stood by him loyally. He attributed his imprisonment to "hysteria" which, he said, was due to "British propaganda."

"No conditions were imposed on the prisoners," continued Dr. Muck, "but it was urgently suggested any who wanted to leave America and return to Germany might have their liberty. I did not want to comply with this stipulation, but my wife argued me into it and I finally agreed. And so one day I was free. My bank account and my house in Boston the American government has confiscated, and I do not know how things will come out."

Dr. Muck said he had made no plans for the future but under no circumstances would he remain in Berlin. He said it was possible he might go to Switzerland or to Gratz, Austria, where his wife's aged mother lives. On his first day in Berlin he led the rehearsal for the next Weingartner Symphony concert.

PIERRE BENJAMIN MONTEUX was born at Paris on April 4, 1875. He studied at the Conservatoire of that city, and in 1896, a pupil of Berthelier, he was awarded a first prize for violin playing. The other first prizes for violin that year were awarded to Messrs. Sechiari, Soudant, and Thibaud. He played the viola in Colonne's orchestra; he was a member of the orchestra of the Opéra-Comique, and he busied himself in chamber music. In 1893 with Miss Victoria Barrière, pianist, Miss Vormèse, and Mr. Carcanade, he founded the Société de Musique Moderne, playing the viola. Their first concert was on February 25. With Messrs. Geloso, Capet, and Schneklud he took part in the Auditions annuelles des derniers grands Quatuors de Beethoven. In 1900 with Messrs. Soudant, de Bruyre, and Destombes he played chamber music in the Matinées Artistiques Populaires. He figured prominently at concerts of the Société Nationale and the Société de Musique Française. Among the compositions heard at these various concerts for the first time—in which he participated—were Brahms's Clarinet Quintet, Stojowski's Variations, Lekeu's "Andromède," pieces by Ropartz, Quittard, Chausson ("Légende de Sainte-Cécile"), Hartog, Luzzato, Glazounoff (Élégie for viola), d'Indy (Suite dans le style ancien), L. Lacombe, Rubinstein, Jaques-Dalcroze. He also took part in concerts given by Messrs. Chevillard, Hayot, and Salmon, and in concerts of the Société des Compositeurs de Musique.

In 1911 he was engaged as conductor of the Ballet Russe, with which he made four tours throughout Europe. He conducted ballet at various theatres in Paris, and gave series of orchestral concerts in that city.

He came to the United States in 1916 as conductor of the Ballet Russe, and conducted at the Boston Opera House, November 6-11, 1916: "Les Papillons," "Spectre de la Rose," "Thamar," "Petrouchka," "Scheherazade," "Prince Igor," "Sadko," "L'Après-Midi d'un Faune," "Cléopâtre."

In 1917 he was appointed a conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House. He made his first appearance there with "Faust," November 19, 1917. He brought out Rabaud's "Marouf" (December 19), "Coq d'Or" (March 6, 1918), and Gilbert's ballet "The Dance in Place Congo."

At the Boston Opera House, coming with the Metropolitan Opera Company, he conducted "Coq d'Or" and "The Dance in Place Congo" (April 26, 1918) and "Samson et Dalila" (April 27, 1918).

He conducted these concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston in the fall of 1918: October 25—Franck, Symphony in D minor; Schumann, Overture to "Manfred"; Dukas, "The Peri" (first time here); Debussy, "Iberia"; November 1—Beethoven, Symphony No. 7; Loeffler, "La Bonne Chanson"; Franck, "The Aeolidae";

Ravel, First Suite from "Daphnis and Chl  " with chorus (first time here). Mme. Florence Easton sang Mozart's "Dove sono" and Lia's aria from Debussy's "Prodigal Son." Mr. Monteux also conducted the concerts of the first trip.

Returning to New York as a conductor of the Metropolitan Opera House, he opened the season with "Samson and Delilah," November 11. Later he conducted "Tha  s," "Carmen," "Marouf," "Faust," "Le Coq d'Or," "la Reine Fiammette" (first time), "Petrouchka," "Mireille," etc.

M. MONTEUX RETURNS

By contrast to the grievous uncertainties which hung about Symphony Hall one year ago at this time, it is a situation far more harmonious and assured which M. Pierre Monteux will find there tomorrow upon his return to Boston to take up his duties as leader. Gratefulness may well be felt for this, and it may be felt without any forgetting that the very nature and number of the perplexities confronting the Symphony Orchestra one year ago were the measure of the credit due to M. Rabaud for his mastery of them and to the new board of trustees for making this mastery possible. The foundations of reconstruction laid last year, when many a mainstay of the orchestra seemed to be slipping, would not have been good foundations at all had they not endured. It is their presence today, as a basis ready to the hand of M. Monteux for his fresh building, which testifies to the soundness of last year's achievement.

Contrary reports notwithstanding, the personnel established for the orchestra before the close of the season of 1918 remains without substantial change. The rumors of defections to Detroit and Philadelphia have been grossly exaggerated, probably for reasons best known to the musicians union which helped engineer them. A few men go, but their number scarcely exceeds the percentage of change which has been found normal from season to season. This small group aside, there have been also some little shiftings among the strings. These are not of consequence, certainly not as against the many string-players who, with the excellent Franklin still concert-master, all remain at their accustomed desks. In the brass choir the same first quartette of horns stands intact. M. Monteux, it has been truly announced, is bringing with him a new first cellist and a new first viola—the sole changes among section-leaders. Here is only a further contribution—both of these players are French—to the homogeneity and essential union gained for the orchestra last year despite the croaking of many ravens.

Given his material, there need be no questioning the result which the artistry and the musicianly craftsmanship of M. Monteux will work out of it. Boston has had one experience of him, be it remembered, and critics here know him for the extraordinarily competent leader of rehearsals, drillmaster at once of infinite exactitudes and of infinite subtleties, which he then proved himself. They know the vigor and warmth and the novel interest of the finished product as he brought it to the opening concert of the season of 1918 after weeks of such painstaking preparation as he delights in. With this memory happy in retrospection, and with taste keen for the store of good things in prospect, Boston welcomes M. Monteux at the moment of his return and says sincerely "Thank you for coming."

NEW LIGHTS AND OLD

Trans. — Aug. 31, 1919
THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS IN FALL

FORECAST

Bright Prospects for the Impending Season—A Continuing Orchestra, an Expectant and Eager Public, "Assisting Artists" Well Arrayed, and Generally Favoring Circumstance—Above All, the Promise of Mr. Monteux as Conductor

FOR at least two seasons, the prospects of the Symphony Concerts have not been so auspicious as they are at the beginning of this autumn of 1919. Neither trustees nor faithful and familiar public, neither conductor nor managers are occupied, in this thirtieth year of the orchestra, with a reorganization of the musicians in its ranks. That necessary task, as conditions went twelve and fifteen months ago, was then accomplished at no small pains on the part of all concerned, in outcome that almost immediately spoke for itself and with ample promise for the future. With scarcely a material change in personnel, the Symphony Orchestra of the season of 1919-1920 will be the Symphony Orchestra that the frequenters of the concerts knew and applauded at the end of the season of 1918-1919. It will be indeed the better, since in the work of another year it is sure to become both more homogeneous and more plastic; an instrument, so to say, more sensitive to itself and to the conductor playing upon it; a body in which individual abilities will shine the more brightly for the richness of the general setting. By common consent the reorganized orchestra does not lack such abilities; by the testimony of the common ear, it was fast renewing last spring the qualities by which of old it had run the gamut of tonal eloquence. In the new season it has only to go forward and in promising circumstance.

A year ago there was no conductor, established or temporary, for the Symphony Concerts. Not until November, indeed, came a diligent and conscientious locum tenens, doing the best he might at a post the exactions of which he little foresaw and before a public that he little understood—a conductor better versed in the ways of orchestral concerts in Paris than in the standards of the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in its own city and in the cities that it regularly visits. Fortunately in a season he passed; and now at the beginning of a new year, a leader succeeds him, who was designated last spring, who has prepared himself accordingly, whose hand the orchestra already knows, whose abilities the audiences of Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings have already applauded—a conductor to whom his American public is not new and strange—a cosmopolitan conductor of the great world of music rather than of one and another corner of it in Paris.

To put by the two or three men of genius in the art of conducting, to regret in passing one and another exceptional talent that was not available, the trustees of the orchestra could hardly have made a more promising choice than Mr. Monteux. When, last autumn, on leave from the Metropolitan Opera House, he led the reorganized orchestra in a few concerts at the beginning of the season, band and audience discovered his pains as a drill-master, his abilities as an interpreter, his sensibility to the distinctions of orchestral playing, his keen intelligence and his warm sympathy with whatever music he had in hand. Last autumn Mr. Monteux's first pair of concerts in Boston was notable; while his second was full to the brim of interesting pieces. At that time he carried the concerts through the first weeks of a beset season and returned to his post as an operatic conductor. Now for a full year, the orchestra will be his to develop, to sensitize, to polish according to the scope of his abilities, his ambition and the response of a warmly interested and keenly anticipatory public. Through twenty-four concerts he can devise and diversify his programmes, free at last from the salutary or the superfluous inhibitions of war-time.

Mr. Monteux is as open-minded as he is widely read in symphonic music; in the days of the concerts in Paris that bore his name, he strove manfully against the routine that takes the regular and the easiest way. Not for nothing did he go up and down Europe as the chief conductor of Mr. Diaghilev's Russian Ballet; not for nothing has he been conductor of French operas for two seasons at the eclectic Metropolitan. In all its years, the Symphony Orchestra has hardly had a conductor with so cosmopolitan a background. As fortunately, he knows and appreciates the standards and the traditions of the Symphony Concerts and the expectations—the habit even—of the public frequenting them in Boston and New York. In his programmes they did fair to regain their familiar catholicity, their familiar diversity of interest; as of old, composers will

38
Ravel, First Suite from "Daphnis and Chloé" with chorus (first time here). Mme. Florence Easton sang Mozart's "Dove sono" and Lia's aria from Debussy's "Prodigal Son." Mr. Monteux also conducted the concerts of the first trip.

Returning to New York as a conductor of the Metropolitan Opera House, he opened the season with "Samson and Delilah," November 11. Later he conducted "Thaïs," "Carmen," "Marouf," "Faust," "Le Coq d'Or," "la Reine Fiammette" (first time), "Petrouchka," "Mireille," etc.

M. MONTEUX RETURNS

39
By contrast to the grievous uncertainties which hung about Symphony Hall one year ago at this time, it is a situation far more harmonious and assured which M. Pierre Monteux will find there tomorrow upon his return to Boston to take up his duties as leader. Gratefulness may well be felt for this, and it may be felt without any forgetting that the very nature and number of the perplexities confronting the Symphony Orchestra one year ago were the measure of the credit due to M. Rabaud for his mastery of them and to the new board of trustees for making this mastery possible. The foundations of reconstruction laid last year, when many a mainstay of the orchestra seemed to be slipping, would not have been good foundations at all had they not endured. It is their presence today, as a basis ready to the hand of M. Monteux for his fresh building, which testifies to the soundness of last year's achievement.

Contrary reports notwithstanding, the personnel established for the orchestra before the close of the season of 1918 remains without substantial change. The rumors of defections to Detroit and Philadelphia have been grossly exaggerated, probably for reasons best known to the musicians union which helped engineer them. A few men go, but their number scarcely exceeds the percentage of change which has been found normal from season to season. This small group aside, there have been also some little shiftings among the strings. These are not of consequence, certainly not as against the many string-players who, with the excellent Fradkin still concert-master, all remain at their accustomed desks. In the brass choir the same first quartette of horns stands intact. M. Monteux, it has been truly announced, is bringing with him a new first cellist and a new first viola—the sole changes among section-leaders. Here is only a further contribution—both of these players are French—to the homogeneity and essential unison gained for the orchestra last year despite the croaking of many ravens.

Given his material, there need be no questioning the result which the artistry and the musicianly craftsmanship of M. Monteux will work out of it. Boston has had one experience of him, be it remembered, and critics here know him for the extraordinarily competent leader of rehearsals, drill-master at once of infinite exactitudes and of infinite subtleties, which he then proved himself. They know the vigor and warmth and the novel interest of the finished product as he brought it to the opening concert of the season of 1918 after weeks of such painstaking preparation as he delights in. With this memory happy in retrospection, and with taste keen for the store of good things in prospect, Boston welcomes M. Monteux at the moment of his return and says sincerely "Thank you for coming."

NEW LIGHTS AND OLD Trans. — Aug. 31, 1919 THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS IN FALL FORECAST

Bright Prospects for the Impending Season—A Continuing Orchestra, an Expectant and Eager Public, "Assisting Artists" Well Arrayed, and Generally Favoring Circumstance—Above All, the Promise of Mr. Monteux as Conductor

FOR at least two seasons, the prospects of the Symphony Concerts have not been so auspicious as they are at the beginning of this autumn of 1919. Neither trustees nor faithful and familiar public, neither conductor nor managers are occupied, in this thirty-ninth year of the orchestra, with a reorganization of the musicians in its ranks. That necessary task, as conditions went twelve and fifteen months ago, was then accomplished at no small pains on the part of all concerned, in outcome that almost immediately spoke for itself and with ample promise for the future. With scarcely a material change in personnel, the Symphony Orchestra of the season of 1919-1920 will be the Symphony Orchestra that the frequenters of the concerts knew and applauded at the end of the season of 1918-1919. It will be indeed the better, since in the work of another year it is sure to become both more homogeneous and more plastic; an instrument, so to say, more sensitive to itself and to the conductor playing upon it; a body in which individual abilities will shine the more brightly for the richness of the general setting. By common consent the reorganized orchestra does not lack such abilities; by the testimony of the common ear, it was fast renewing last spring the qualities by which of old it had run the gamut of tonal eloquence. In the new season it has only to go forward and in promising circumstance.

A year ago there was no conductor, established or temporary, for the Symphony Concerts. Not until November, indeed, came a diligent and conscientious locum tenens, doing the best he might at a post the exactions of which he little foresaw and before a public that he little understood—a conductor better versed in the ways of orchestral concerts in Paris than in the standards of the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in its own city and in the cities that it regularly visits. Fortunately in a season he passed; and now at the beginning of a new year, a leader succeeds him, who was designated last spring, who has prepared himself accordingly, whose hand the orchestra already knows, whose abilities the audiences of Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings have already applauded—a conductor to whom his American public is not new and strange—a cosmopolitan conductor of the great world of music rather than of one and another corner of it in Paris.

To put by the two or three men of genius in the art of conducting, to regret in passing one and another exceptional talent that was not available, the trustees of the orchestra could hardly have made a more promising choice than Mr. Monteux. When, last autumn, on leave from the Metropolitan Opera House, he led the reorganized orchestra in a few concerts at the beginning of the season, band and audience discovered his pains as a drill-master, his abilities as an interpreter, his sensibility to the distinctions of orchestral playing, his keen intelligence and his warm sympathy with whatever music he had in hand. Last autumn Mr. Monteux's first pair of concerts in Boston was notable; while his second was full to the brim of interesting pieces. At that time he carried the concerts through the first weeks of a beset season and returned to his post as an operative conductor. Now for a full year, the orchestra will be his to develop, to sensitize, to polish according to the scope of his abilities, his ambition and the response of a warmly interested and keenly anticipatory public. Through twenty-four concerts he can devise and diversify his programmes, free at last from the salutary or the superfluous inhibitions of war-time.

Mr. Monteux is as open-minded as he is widely read in symphonic music; in the days of the concerts in Paris that bore his name, he strove manfully against the routine that takes the regular and the easiest way. Not for nothing did he go up and down Europe as the chief conductor of Mr. Diaghilev's Russian Ballet; not for nothing has he been conductor of French operas for two seasons at the eclectic Metropolitan. In all its years, the Symphony Orchestra has hardly had a conductor with so cosmopolitan a background. As fortunately, he knows and appreciates the standards and the traditions of the Symphony Concerts and the expectations—the habit even—of the public frequenting them in Boston and New York. In his programmes they did fair to regain their familiar catholicity, their familiar diversity of interest; as of old, composers will hand to the conductor of the Boston Orchestra important new pieces; so far as in him lies the quality of performance. The Monteux who bids fair to stir his hearers with the sensuous beauty of Stravinsky's ballets knows also the austerities of d'Indy. The Monteux who searched out last summer in Paris the few posthumous pieces of Debussy is mindful also of the over-neglected Mendelssohn of a vanished day.

As with the orchestra and the conductor, so with the audiences that from the middle of October to the beginning of May will weekly sit before them. These listeners also will be free from the pains and penalties of war-time. No longer need anyone put by the Symphony Concert lest money so spent should be diverted from war-chests or pleasure so taken distract from austerer obligations. No longer need resentful ears turn away from the music of Wagner (which from the beginning Mr. Monteux intends to place plentifully in his programmes) nor hear with inner qualms the music even of Brahms. The acrimonies over Dr. Muck in his final days and over the subsequent reorganization of the orchestra are lessening, as sooner rather than later they were sure to do. Even the confirmed doubters have waited and seen how interesting the "new" Symphony Orchestra can be, how stimulating a new line of conductors may prove. After two years of more or less divided continuance, the Symphony Orchestra can return to its sufficient task of playing music for the sake of music and performance; while audiences may equally hear both for the satisfaction that they yield in themselves and not for the random sympathies they happen to evoke. Artistry and pleasure are again the word at the Symphony Concerts, alike on the stage and, by clear token, in the auditorium. For already, through nearly every city through which the orchestra ranges, and especially in its "home-town," the eagerness of the public, old and new, stands clear. Unless many a sign fails, there will be "atmosphere" again in Symphony Hall on the twenty-four Fridays and the like-numbered Saturdays.

In such auspicious circumstances, the Symphony Concerts of 1919-1920 will run a familiar course. From the middle of October to the beginning of May stretch the twenty-four pairs of concerts, broken by the usual intervals when the orchestra makes its monthly journeys southward or departs for a week—this season in December—into the Middle States. As of old, it will be heard regularly in two or three cities of New England and occasionally in many more; while in Boston on a Sunday afternoon, one at least of the annual concerts for the increase of its Pension Fund will be restored. Thus, a hundred concerts and a few more will make the work of the orchestra for the year—as much as it can do well, yet not too much to keep it in established place in all the region that it annually pleases. As in recent years, it will, likewise, command at need the services of Mr. Townsend's Symphony Chorus. For Mr. Monteux is ambitious of occasional performances of music in which orchestra and chorus join voices. He is taking thought of Beethoven's Choral Symphony, heard only twice in Boston since Mr. Fiedler's time. He is as eager to end the season, next May, with a performance of Franck's oratorio of "The Beatitudes." Indeed, as some predict, then and there Mr. McCormack, the tenor, will be heard in a choral concert for the first time hereabouts—or anywhere else—in years. Of such, after all superfluous gainsaying, remains the prestige of the Symphony Concerts.

Worthy of that prestige and not too many nor too few are the "assisting artists" announced for the new season; while as last year, the management in the choice of them has avoided the rut into which it is easy to fall. Outside Mr. Fradkin and Mr. Noack who, rising from their places in the orchestra, are to play the violin concertos which are the reward of the "first desk," the "soloists" number twelve. Mr. McCormack aside, the singers are four women: Miss Destinn or Miss Destinnova, as she now elects to call herself in the Czech tongue, released from war-time durance in Bohemia and reported from London as renewing her fine powers; Mme. Matzenauer in the flower of large-voiced song at the Metropolitan Opera House; Mme. Homer, likewise in the full graces of vocal and interpretive maturity; and last, for signal newcomer, Mme. Frijs, riper of voice than in an earlier day, rich in the virtues of musical insight and dramatizing imagination, and, as always, vivid personality.

The pianist of large, deep and grave maturity, the august presence among the virtuosi now traversing American concert-halls, is Mr. Rakhmaninov, the inevitable; the pianist whose fineness and brightness of touch and tone stirred the ear last year "at these concerts," whose intelligence and imagination were not less luminous, returns in Mr. Cortot; the approved abilities of Mr. Ganz as virtuoso and musician give him just place in the Symphony Concerts; while youth, and richly deserving youth, has its opportunity in the first coming to them of Mr. Ornstein, not as debatable composer but as undebatable pianist of no small or untried powers. Again, too, returns the one organist who, in this day, has established himself in the symphony concerts of the United States, the applauded and antipated Bonnet. The younger generation has righteous place again with Mr. Spalding as one of the two violinists, outside the orchestra, to grace the concerts—and grace plus gravity are the words for this his early prime. The other assisting violinist need hardly be named, since, for the impending season, every orchestra covets him and a manifold public everywhere awaits him. The inhibitions of the war-years are ended; Mr. Kreisler is restored to concert-hall. With him as with many another circumstance and condition for the new year, old times have come again at the Symphony Concerts.

MONTEUX AND MUSIC

Trans. — Apr. 28, 1919

SUNDRY OPINIONS FROM THE NEW CONDUCTOR

The Range of His Experiences — Catholicity and Wagner — Symphonic Versus Operatic Pieces—A Word About French, and Also About American, Composers—Orchestra and Leader.

NO two people could be imagined more different in type than Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Henri Rabaud, the retiring conductor. Except for the Gallic courtesy that distinguishes them both, they seem at opposite poles. Rabaud is tall, slender, grizzled; Monteux is short, dark, plump. Monteux is vivacious to the sparkling point; Rabaud, reserved to the utmost. The one suggests the scholar by his stoop, his preoccupied gravity, the care with which he brings out his few words. The other is the man of affairs crossed with the musician; the man of family, the man who knows and loves his fellows; the man of enthusiasms that are yet balanced by good sense and that become especially attractive under a winning manner. One could not imagine Mr. Rabaud as making enemies; one could fancy Mr. Monteux as making only friends. The warmth and grace of the south of France, to which Mr. Monteux traces his descent (his parents are Marseillaise) inform his redy smiling speech with a spontaneity all their own.

Yet Mr. Monteux is ill described if you think him one without strong views, one who veers to the wind of others' opinions. Ask him what he thinks of "Pagliacci" or of the operas of Puccini and see the devotee's indignation in his musician's eye. But if you expect any chauvinistic prejudices to narrow his kindly and broad view of life and of art, again you will be mistaken. Ask him what he thinks of Wagner's music and see what this man, French to the tips of his artists' fingers, has to say on that subject. Two impressions remain strongly after a talk with Mr. Monteux—one of his charm and kindness of manner; the other of the catholicity of his musical outlook. Outside of reasons of personality, this catholicity obviously springs from the range of his artistic experience.

"I suppose I have conducted every kind of music there is to conduct," Mr. Monteux began. As conductor of the Colonne Concerts and of his own concerts in the Casino at Paris, he directed the performance of symphonic and oratorio music; in the same capacity at the Paris Opéra, the Théâtre des Champs-Élysées, Covent Garden, Berlin, Vienna and Budapest, he gained operatic experience, to which he added at the Metropolitan Opera House, where he has conducted French operas since 1917. As conductor of the Russian Ballet on four tours he has specialized in ballet music with notable success.

"Of all music I prefer the symphonic form, in that it is purest," Mr. Monteux said. "In opera, you have what you call the accessories. But the symphony is music and only music. No, I cannot say to you whose music I prefer. Bach, Mozart, Saint-Saëns, Beethoven I have played, and I love all their symphonies. I like all the good music. That is why I care less for opera; because so much operatic music caters to the popular taste, for example, like 'Pagliacci.' A-ah!" (He shuddered dramatically; then laughed at himself.) "Puccini? Mals oui; second rate, also. Facile; you know what I mean? Easy to play; easy to listen to; easy to win applause with. It is music for the public; as for me I like music for the musicians." "And shall you hold to that idea in your programmes?"

"But I have not yet planned; so many things have to be considered. Only one thing is sure; the public is not the same for concerts as one has for operas, and the Boston public is well used to the best. So I shall hope to give them of the very best, of all countries."

"Wagner, for instance? You like his music?"

"But yes!" His face glowed. "Yes, immensely I like his music. I have often given it. Perhaps for a while yet, if the feeling of the public is against it for other reasons, it may not be best to do so; that is all to be ascertained. But it is great music; it will always be great music and as such it will one day again take its place."

"You gave concerts in Paris exclusively of modern music at one time, did you not?"

42

—Yes, and I am very fond of it in some forms; but there the conditions were different. There were five orchestras in Paris at the time, all drawing full houses. On Sunday afternoons, figure to yourself, five orchestras played in different halls at exactly the same hour. So, one of them, you see, just had to make its programme of the modern only. Now, with the Boston orchestra it is different. It has what you call monopoly; so its programmes must be broad; they must not only be of modern, but of classic pieces; not of French music alone, nor of Italian, nor of Russian, nor of American. There must be some of all."

An excellent signed photograph of Saint-Saëns, on the piano that takes up one side of the conductor's study, attracted the interviewer's eye, and we spoke of the aged composer's attainments and personality. It appeared that Mr. Monteux and Saint-Saëns are intimate friends, as well as associates in work and the younger man greatly admires the older. "I conducted his last concert in Paris, just before the war," Mr. Monteux continued. "We gave his 'Lyre and the Harp' and Saint-Saëns was his own organist. He was not at all satisfied with the organist chosen and he said, 'I will play the organ myself—but who shall conduct?' It was at rehearsal, and a friend of mine said, 'Monteux is in the audience.' At once Saint-Saëns demands that I come to the stand—that I conduct. Voilà! I have conducted much of Saint-Saëns—'La Princesse Jaune,' 'Phryne,' 'Henri VIII.' But of all his operas I like 'Samson and Delilah.' It is to me his greatest work, almost pure melody."

"There has been no great music growing out of the war, in France at least," Mr. Monteux said regretfully in answer to a question. "Nor will there be for some time, I believe. Men's minds have been on other things. One writes you know to an occasion and one cannot be equal to the occasion as it has been in France these four years."

"Have you ever composed, Mr. Monteux?" He leaned forward confidentially, finger up. "Yes, indeed. I have composed many things. And do you know where they are, those compositions? In a big box, tied up tight with a string. And they will never see the sun, I promise you. I play too much music to write any more of my own. Not since fifteen years ago, when I composed for the last time, have I written anything. For I believe that a man can only have one career, and that mine is to conduct. I shall always be a conductor."

"You find the personal equation a strong factor in conducting, do you not, Mr. Monteux? What is an orchestra, a democracy or an autocracy?"

"Both," the conductor answered. "It must seem a democracy but really be an autocracy. You must be altogether en rapport with your men, but they must really look to you absolutely. Only to draw out their best from them, you understand. One does not love to give orders for the orders' sake, but only to get results." Mr. Monteux seemed as he spoke an epitome of that remarkable nation whose foremost quality has long been the ability to influence others, while always respecting the individual's liberty. One could not imagine this smiling, vivacious little man ever becoming autocratic; but one could readily perceive how his personality might arouse in others enthusiasm for that music which so evidently rules his life.

Presently we spoke of Russian composers and Mr. Monteux expressed his admiration for the works of Rimsky-Korsakov, of Borodin and of Stravinsky. "So many material difficulties have interfered with representing Russian operas," he said regretfully. "People wonder why more are not performed; but you see it needs more than the composer and the librettist; more even than the artists. Not so with the giving of their orchestral music. I look forward to that. It will be my hope to include all kinds of good music, even American," he added with a laugh. "France ought to hear some of your composers, by the way; you have several that should be known in Europe. Loeffler, Carpenter, four or five others are well worthy to be heard; some have been. Then I shall seek out and bring over some good concert music from Italy. That is a side of Italian musical development that has been too much ignored, for the operatic pieces always receive the emphasis. There are a number of young Italian composers of whom I hear good things said, as well as the older ones whose music I hope to bring forward."

"Is there anything you would especially like to say for publication, Mr. Monteux?"

"Yes," he said, unexpectedly and earnestly. "This: In playing French music I shall not make French propaganda. You understand; Rabaud, Messager and I, we have been brought up in France; it is our country; we naturally love and we play the music of our country. But not to make propaganda for it; that would be stupid. French music is great enough not to need any; and you Americans know and love French music already. I shall not play French music because it is French music, you understand, although I love it. But I shall play the best music of every nation."

[Clare Peeler in Musical America.]

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1919-20

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

FIRST PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 10, AT 2.30 P.M.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 11, AT 8 P.M.

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY in D major, No. 2. op. 36.

- I. Adagio molto; Allegro con brio
- II. Larghetto
- III. Scherzo; Allegro;
- IV. Allegro molto

FRANCK,

SYMPHONIC POEM, "Le Chasseur Maudit," ("The Wild Hunter")

DEBUSSY.

PRELUDE to "L'Après-midi d'un Faune," ("The Afternoon of a Faun")—Eclogue by S. Mallarmé

ALBENIZ,

FOLK SUITE for Orchestra, "Catalonia"

42

"Yes, and I am very fond of it in some forms; but there the conditions were different. There were five orchestras in Paris at the time, all drawing full houses. On Sunday afternoons, figure to yourself, five orchestras played in different halls at exactly the same hour. So, one of them, you see, just had to make its programme of the modern only. Now, with the Boston orchestra it is different. It has what you call monopoly; so its programmes must be broad; they must not only be of modern, but of classic pieces; not of French music alone, nor of Italian, nor of Russian, nor of American. There must be some of all."

An excellent signed photograph of Saint-Saëns, on the piano that takes up one side of the conductor's study, attracted the interviewer's eye, and we spoke of the aged composer's attainments and personality. It appeared that Mr. Monteux and Saint-Saëns are intimate friends, as well as associates in work and the younger man greatly admires the older. "I conducted his last concert in Paris, just before the war," Mr. Monteux continued. "We gave his 'Lyre and the Harp' and Saint-Saëns was his own organist. He was not at all satisfied with the organist chosen and he said, 'I will play the organ myself—but who shall conduct?' It was at rehearsal, and a friend of mine said, 'Monteux is in the audience.' At once Saint-Saëns demands that I come to the stand—that I conduct. Voilà! I have conducted much of Saint-Saëns—'La Princesse Jaune,' 'Phryne,' 'Henri VIII.' But of all his operas I like 'Samson and Delilah.' It is to me his greatest work, almost pure melody."

"There has been no great music growing out of the war, in France at least," Mr. Monteux said regretfully in answer to a question. "Nor will there be for some time, I believe. Men's minds have been on other things. One writes you know to an occasion and one cannot be equal to the occasion as it has been in France these four years."

"Have you ever composed, Mr. Monteux?" He leaned forward confidentially, finger up. "Yes, indeed. I have composed many things. And do you know where they are, those compositions? In a big box, tied up tight with a string. And they will never see the sun, I promise you. I play too much music of our country. But not to make other people's music to write any more of propaganda for it; that would be stupid. my own. Not since fifteen years ago, when I composed for the last time, have I written anything. For I believe that a man can French music already. I shall not play only have one career, and that mine is to French music because it is French music, conduct. I shall always be a conductor," you understand, although I love it. But I

"You find the personal equation a strong factor in conducting, do you not, Mr. Monteux?" (Clare Peeler in Musical America.)

teux? What is an orchestra, a democracy or an autocracy?"

"Both," the conductor answered. "It must seem a democracy but really be an autocracy. You must be altogether en rapport with your men, but they must really look to you absolutely. Only to draw out their best from them, you understand. One does not love to give orders for the orders' sake, but only to get results." Mr. Monteux seemed as he spoke an epitome of that remarkable nation whose foremost quality has long been the ability to influence others, while always respecting the individual's liberty. One could not imagine this smiling, vivacious little man ever becoming autocratic; but one could readily perceive how his personality might arouse in others enthusiasm for that music which so evidently rules his life.

Presently we spoke of Russian composers and Mr. Monteux expressed his admiration for the works of Rimsky-Korsakov, of Borodin and of Stravinsky. "So many material difficulties have interfered with presenting Russian operas," he said regretfully. "People wonder why more are not performed; but you see it needs more than the composer and the librettist; more even than the artists. Not so with the giving of their orchestral music. I look forward to that. It will be my hope to include all kinds of good music, even American," he added with a laugh. "France ought to hear some of your composers, by the way; you have several that should be known in Europe. Loeffler, Carpenter, four or five others are well worthy to be heard; some have been. Then I shall seek out and bring over some good concert music from Italy. That is a side of Italian musical development that has been too much ignored, for the operatic pieces always receive the emphasis. There are a number of young Italian composers of whom I hear good things said, as well as the older ones whose music I hope to bring forward."

"Is there anything you would especially like to say for publication, Mr. Monteux?"

"Yes," he said, unexpectedly and earnestly. "This: In playing French music I shall not make French propaganda. You understand; Rabaud, Messager and I, we have been brought up in France; it is our country; we naturally love and we play the music of our country. But not to make propaganda for it; that would be stupid. French music is great enough not to need anything. and you Americans know and love French music already. I shall not play only have one career, and that mine is to French music because it is French music, conduct. I shall always be a conductor," you understand, although I love it. But I

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1919-20

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

FIRST PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 10, AT 2.30 P.M.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 11, AT 8 P.M.

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY in D major, No. 2, op. 36,
I. Adagio molto; Allegro con brio
II. Larghetto
III. Scherzo; Allegro;
IV. Allegro molto

FRANCK,

SYMPHONIC POEM, "Le Chasseur Maudit,"
("The Wild Hunter")

DEBUSSY,

PRELUDE to "L'Après-midi d'un Faune," ("The Afternoon of a Faun")—Eclogue by S. Mallarmé

ALBENIZ,

FOLK SUITE for Orchestra, "Catalonia"

Pierre Monteux, Conductor

(Photograph by Gare)

The New Leader of the Symphony Orchestra in Action

SYMPHONY OPENS NEW MUSIC YEAR

Concert Under Monteux Gives Big Promise

BY OLIN DOWNES

First concert of the 1919-20 season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Pierre Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The audience was a big one, and it was a pleasure to see Mr. Monteux and his men. They finished Beethoven's Symphony until the orchestra rose to acknowledge the conductor. There is every reason to believe from subscriptions and attendance at the opening concert of the season that a good many subscribers have returned to town, that the Boston Symphony Orchestra faces one of the most successful seasons in its history.

ALBENIZ'S PIECE

Monteux's programme was very interesting; the Beethoven Symphony; Franck's symphonic poem, "The Hunter"; Debussy's "L'Après-midi d'un Faune," and a novelty, a suite of a suite, Catalonia, by Albeniz.

For the first time Albeniz has appeared on a Boston Symphony programme. Piano pieces by him have been played by George Copeland and others. Many will be displeased by the fact that they have not heard yesterday. They will say that it is noisy, vulgar, with instrumentation that is not merely brilliant, but gaudy. We confess to great pleasure in the virile commonness of the dance themes used, with other material, in a way which suggests some popular festival or fair. There is ribald laughter, toss-pot gayety, to the crackling of trumpets and the miauwing of 'celli. A muleteer makes love with a leer to the tavern wench. Costumes which mingle the most audacious and vulgar colors catch the rays of the blazing sun. Jests which are neither polite nor refined are exchanged. Dancers are heavy-footed. The crowd is odorous, but immensely alive. The world roars with laughter.

Lively and Vigorous

Mr. Monteux did not make the mistake of varnishing this music or give it a distinction it did not possess. His lively and vigorous performance was in the right vein. In some one of Thomas Hardy's novels a peasant brings in a sandwich which has fallen in the dirt? and as some one begins to eat this sandwich some one else says that honest dirt never hurt a stomach, or words to that effect. Our stomach is not hurt by this music; we find it honest dirt.

Qualities of clearness, simplicity and a musician's understanding of the classic form showed in Mr. Monteux's reading of the Beethoven familiar symphony—a performance which was, however, rather heavy and thick in tonal quality.

Debussy Exquisitely Played

Franck's "Wild Huntsman" is a virtuosic study for a conductor, rather than one of the composer's best and most characteristic works. But Debussy of "L'Après-midi d'un Faune"—what a miraculous master he is! How is it that one recognizes in a phrase of a flute, composed of notes which have been used countless of numbers of times with only slight variations of succession, pitch, etc., by a million composers—how is it that in the hands of a certain one of these composers the notes give us visions of antique art, of forests that never grew, and between their trees fleeting glimpses of the beings whose non-existence caused Keats such poignant and irreparable regret—how is all this? It is the miracle of genius, and that is as much as anyone will ever know of the matter.

Mr. Monteux did not make the mistake which many a distinguished conductor has made of taking too slowly the tempo of this exquisite music, the performance of which was warmly applauded.

Pierre

The New Leader

SYMPHONY OPENS NEW MUSIC YEAR

First Concert Under Mr. Monteux Gives Big Promise

BY OLIN DOWNES

The first concert of the 1919-20 season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The audience was a big one, and it applauded Mr. Monteux and his men when they finished Beethoven's Second Symphony until the orchestra rose and bowed its acknowledgements with the conductor. There is every indication from subscriptions and attendance at the opening concert of the year, when a good many subscribers have not returned to town, that the Symphony Orchestra faces one of the most successful seasons in its history.

ALBENIZ'S PIECE

Mr. Monteux's programme was very interesting; the Beethoven Symphony; Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "The Accursed Hunter"; Debussy's "L'Après-midi d'un Faune," and a novelty, a movement of a suite, Catalonia, by Isaac Albeniz.

This is the first time Albeniz has appeared on a Boston Symphony programme. Piano pieces by him have been played by George Copeland and others in Boston. Many will be displeased by the music heard yesterday. They will say that it is noisy, vulgar, with instrumentation that is not merely brilliant, but gaudy. We confess to great pleasure in the virile commonness of the dance themes used, with other material, in a way which suggests some popular festival or fair. There is ribald laughter, loss-pot gayety, to the crackling of trumpets and the mlauiwing of 'celli. A muleteer, makes love with a leer to the tavern wench. Costumes which mingle the most audacious and vulgar colors catch the rays of the blazing sun. Jests which are neither polite nor refined are exchanged. Dancers are heavy-footed. The crowd is odorous, but immensely alive. The world roars with laughter.

Lively and Vigorous

Mr. Monteux did not make the mistake of varnishing this music or give it a distinction it did not possess. His lively and vigorous performance was in the right vein. In some one of Thomas Hardy's novels a peasant brings in a sandwich which has fallen in the dirt? and as some one begins to eat this sandwich some one else says that honest dirt never hurt a stomach, or words to that effect. Our stomach is not hurt by this music; we find it honest dirt.

Qualities of clearness, simplicity and a musician's understanding of the classic form showed in Mr. Monteux's reading of the Beethoven familiar symphony—a performance which was, however, rather heavy and thick in tonal quality.

Debussy Exquisitely Played

Franck's "Wild Huntsman" is a virtuoso study for a conductor, rather than one of the composer's best and most characteristic works. But Debussy of "L'Après-midi d'un Faune"—what a miraculous master he is! How is it that one recognizes in a phrase of a flute, composed of notes which have been used countless of numbers of times with only slight variations of succession, pitch, etc., by a million composers—how is it that in the hands of a certain one of these composers the notes give us visions of antique art, of forests that never grew, and between their trees fleeting glimpses of the beings whose non-existence caused Keats such poignant and irreparable regret—how is all this? It is the miracle of genius, and that is as much as anyone will ever know of the matter.

Mr. Monteux did not make the mistake which many a distinguished conductor has made of taking too slowly the tempo of this exquisite music, the performance of which was warmly applauded.

SYMPHONY GIVES FIRST CONCERT

Season Opens with Brilliant Performance and Large Audience

MR. MONTEUX GETS GREAT OVATION

By Philip Hale

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, gave the first concert of its 39th season yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, a season that promises to be musically brilliant and pecuniarily successful. The hall was completely filled with an audience that was enthusiastic throughout the concert from the moment it welcomed heartily the conductor. Nor was the unusually hearty applause merely by way of compliment: it was spontaneous, a willing tribute to the indisputable talent of the leader and to the equally indisputable proficiency of the superb, unrivalled orchestra.

The program was as follows: Beethoven, symphony No. 2; Franck, symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman"; Debussy, prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun"; Albeniz, "Catalonia" (first time in Boston.)

It was evident at once that the orchestra, which contains some new players—among them Mr. Bedetti, the first violoncello, and Mr. Denayer, the first viola—had been thoroughly rehearsed; was already a plastic, elastic, responsive body of artists, to use that sadly abused word. As far as precision and other matters of technic were concerned the concert might have been the 24th, not the first.

Of all of Beethoven's symphonies, the second is the least interesting, the least characteristic, in 1919. The first pleases by its simplicity, by its relationship with the symphonies of Haydn and Mozart that preceded it. There are moments in the second that are unmistakably in the incomparable manner of the great Beethoven, but on the whole the pleasure of yesterday afternoon was in the reading, the performance, rather than in the music itself. Mr. Monteux's interpretation was romantically classical, not so mistakenly reverential that it became jejune and tedious; on the other hand, it was not forced, not unduly dramatic; there was no attempt to be sensational, with the air of "Now I'll show you how Beethoven's music should be performed." The interpretation was vital, vivid, musically beautiful. Especially worthy of praise was the treatment of the Introduction, the Scherzo and the Finale. In the Larghetto there might have been more sustained passages of truly piano effect.

Franck's symphonic poem was really heard here for the first time, although it had been played thrice at these concerts before yesterday. On previous occasions the expression of the supernatural seemed tame, almost timid. There was little suggestion of horror, terror, the demoniacal. One thought that good "Pere" Franck here, as in "The Beatitudes," was unable to express the satanic; that Weber's few measures accompanying the ride through the air of the Demon Hunter and his train in "Der Freischuetz" were far more imaginative than the many measures of Franck. Yet this demoniacal quality is in Franck's symphonic poem. It needed an imaginative, dramatic conductor to bring it out. As the music was played yesterday, the effect was well-nigh overwhelming.

Debussy's exquisite Prelude has been a stumbling block to many conductors. Ever Mr. Weingartner chose so sluggish a pace that the music was lifeless. Even Dr. Muck, singularly fortunate as a rule in his choice of tempi, erred in the same direction. The Prelude was never so beautiful as it was yesterday, not even when Mr. Monteux conducted the performance of the ballet with Nijinsky as the Faun at the Boston Opera House. Yesterday the tonal coloring, the balance of timbres, the prevailing poetic feeling, the solo work of Messrs. Laurent, Longy and Fradkin, made the performance memorable.

"Catalonia" was heard here for the first time. The stirring reading did not conceal the inherent poverty of the musical thought and rhetoric. To put it bluntly, this music seemed common.

The piano pieces "Iberia" reveal a finer side of Albeniz's nature. Hearing "Catalonia," one is more and more convinced that the best Spanish music has been written by Frenchmen—Chabrier, Ravel, Debussy, even Bizet, although Spaniards do not accept "Carmen." We have heard records of songs sung by gypsies in Spain that have more "local color"—to use a vague phrase condemned by some, as Johannes Weber, who argued at length that there is no such thing—than is to be found in this rhapsody of Isaac Albeniz.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Schumann's symphony in B flat major, No. 1; Dvorak's violin concerto (Albert Spalding, violinist); Enesco's Suite op. 9.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

AUSPICIOUS BEGINNING OF THE NEW SEASON

The Usual Audience Seemingly Well Pleased—The Orchestra Little Changed and for the Better — An Interesting Conductor on His Mettle with an Interesting Programme — Franck's "Wild Huntsman" and Albeniz's "Catalonia" for Unfamiliar Pieces

THE war has ended at the Symphony Concerts. As though, indeed, it had never disturbed them, they began anew yesterday afternoon, for a thirty-ninth year. As of old, every seat in Symphony Hall had been taken by subscription; while few were the chairs left temporarily vacant. Much the same also, to the casual eye, was the audience of October in 1919 and the audience of October in 1916—a middle-aged company, that is to say, in which the women appreciably outnumbered the men, among which youth was pleasantly sprinkled, and in which social prestige, social routine and liking for symphonic music were agreeably blended. Again, as of old, this audience could applaud warmly, as it did when Mr. Monteux came to his place as conductor and when he and the orchestra had made their way through Beethoven's second symphony. It was as well pleased with the obvious tonal melodrama of Franck's symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman." Justifiably it did not linger long to cap Albeniz's suite "Catalonia," of a folk-nature, as the stately programme-book put it, and played for the first time in Boston. Strange, however, was its reserve over Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," since by this time the beauty of the music in voice and imagery, is acknowledged the world over while the performance yielded it richly. By these signs, the programme was one that might have stood at any Symphony Concert of recent years, so long as there was a well-read and catholic-minded conductor to choose it. For last token of the end of the war at Symphony Hall, "The Star-Spangled Banner" did not preface these pieces. Presumably audience, conductor and management are now agreed that the concern of the Symphony Concerts is the cosmopolitan making of music for its own sake.

True, there were perceptible changes in the personnel of the orchestra and Mr. Monteux now lead it for the first time as continuing conductor. Yet he might have come to his place from his two pairs of concerts last autumn; while the new comers do not alter—or alter for the better—the quality of the band. Mr. Theodorowicz, for example, was good to hear in the chair of the second concert-master, since by personal quality and long experience, he is both steadying and stimulating to his fellow-strings. As admirable, so far as the evidence of a single concert goes, was Mr. Bedetti, the new first violoncellist, clearly a sensitive musician, alert to rounded phrase and supple inflection commanding, besides, a warm, flowing tone. Other incidental changes, like the return of Mr. de Mailly to the flutes, the shifting of Mr. Mager to the trumpets and a few new hands among the violins, maintain the standard of the several choirs; while, as last winter, Mr. Laurent at the first flute and Mr. Speyer at the English horn shine among the wood-winds. On the other hand, the double basses lack, for the time, the usual numbers and there have been comings and goings among the horn-players. What advantage they will bring remains to be heard; but with an exception or two, the horns hardly match at present the rest of the wind-choir.

Throughout the concert, the orchestra acquitted itself well, subjected now to more insistent rehearsal and exacting discipline than it experienced under the departed Rabaud. Through Beethoven's flowing symphony, its tone was bright and plastic; it kept to Mr. Monteux's quick pace and animating rhythms; songful measures regained not a little of the mellowness of the past; details stood clear for the moment, then fell as elastically into place in the progress of the music. In Franck's symphonic poem, the band missed none of the tonal and pictorial energy that—and not much else—the music seems to exact. It was as fortunate with the rhythmical verve—and again not much else—that is the virtue of Albeniz's piece. Most of all, however, the quality of the orchestra, under Mr. Monteux's hand and ear and in individual prowess, shone out of Debussy's prelude. Strings and wood-winds caught the manifold iridescence, the incessant sensuous tremor, the exquisite suppleness and euphony of their measures. Seldom has the music sounded so luminous, so jewelled. As seldom has it seemed so lightly, surely and continuously woven; or the pure song—for it is no less—of recurring periods so melted upon the ear. With it Mr. Monteux and the orchestra both foreshadowed a time in which there will be less speaking and writing of the

418
Boston Orchestra "before the war" or in like reservation.

As for Mr. Monteux, he may be a conductor of this, that or the other rank in our American liking for degrees, but unmistakably he is interesting. His modesty, his subordination of himself to the task in hand, stand clear. As at the end of the symphony yesterday, it is the orchestra equally with the conductor that he would have the audience applaud. At his work, he is agreeable to the eye without superfluous vehemence or rigid insistence; while the players seem readily and responsively to understand him. A finely sensitive ear, hand and imagination surely ordered the performance of Debussy's prelude, discerning and maintaining the delicate formal outline, missing no play of tonal tint and half-tint, summoning and sustaining the sensuous impulse, the vaporous atmosphere, the half-sportive, half-melancholy fancy of the music—and all this loveliness in flowing fusion.

If it was difficult to share what may be Mr. Monteux's admiration for Albeniz's piece, it was easy to appreciate the rhythmic vigor that he brought to a repetitious music, the frank fashion in which he kept to its homely note, the zeal with which he caught each scrap of the Spaniard's meagre instrumental color. So too, with Franck's symphonic poem, characteristic of the composer when he would be boldly and baldly delineative. It is heavy-handed music, though Franck did write it and Mr. Monteux laid on and spared not. He missed neither the spectral voice of the horns nor the still more spectral voice of the tuba. He kept "The Wild Huntsman's" chase, whether for blasphemous pleasure or under ceaseless curse, in becoming sound and fury. The tonal panorama passed; it had been pictorial, theatric—and the piece is not one whit more. Clearly the new conductor differentiates well, seeks and imparts the characteristic voice of the music in hand. For this Monteux of "Catalonia" and "The Wild Huntsman" was also the Monteux of Debussy's faun in the manner aforesaid and of Beethoven's youthful symphony in D major, "read" limpidly, animatedly, faithfully, ingratiatingly.

The conductor's pace was brisk as Beethoven plainly prescribes; while his hand was light and pliant as the composer no less clearly indicates. The lively motion in which the conductor kept the first movement blurred not a detail. He paced and phrased the slow movement with a suavity and a felicity that renewed its grace and charm. Capriciously, not rigidly, went the playful contrasts of the scherzo; while in the finale, elasticity of rhythm and phrase, light and unobtruded suspensions, a shading here, a shading there of pace or accent, heightened the smiling gayety of the whole. The performance was mirror-like of Beethoven's music in spirit and in truth; the sternest purist could not reproach it; yet at many a turn it was touched by Mr. Monteux's own taste, skill and fancy. It was Beethoven Viennese, even Parisian, but Beethoven never literal, rigid, pedantic, or at the other extreme, over-emphasized, forced, mannered.

In fact conductor and orchestra fared better through the afternoon than did two of the assembled composers. It is possible that Bostonian ears have been over-filled of late with the music of Franck; it is certain that they have had quite enough of, say, the "Symphonic Piece" from "The Redemption" and "The Wild Huntsman" of yesterday. That German nobleman, as he usually appears in the legend, hunted blasphemously, vaingloriously, on what Anglo-Saxon statutes call "the Lord's Day." Therefore was he cursed to endless and fruitless hunting. (The wonder is that the Sabbatarian societies have never seized upon him as a horrible example, nay warning). Accordingly Franck's tonal tale is of kin with the passages in "The Beatitudes" that depict the wicked and their works and many degrees removed from the wholly Franckian "Psyche," for example, or the semi-Franckian "Daughters of Aeolus." Music of evil is not altogether Franck's trade and writing it, he was prone to take refuge in the ways of Meyerbeer and occasionally of Berlioz, hardly his blood-brethren in imagination or procedure. From Berlioz he might catch romantic intensities of vision and expression; from Meyerbeer he could borrow only calculating tonal melodrama. Of that melodrama from the Sabbath-hymn of the peasants to the chase natural and supernatural, "The Wild Huntsman" is all compact. The composer of the incantation in "Robert the Devil" might even have envied Franck that curse out of the tuba. But a Franck outdoing Meyerbeer at his own game is not exactly the Franck whom the twentieth century hears most gladly.

In no better case was the Albeniz of "Catalonia." One and another of his piano-pieces heard hereabouts have praised him—for fire of rhythm, glow of color, ardor of picture, progress, emotion. Might not his orchestral music sound as well? Eager propaganda in recent years has implied that it would, even fostered the notion that he was an overlooked genius—neglected voice of a passionate and pungent music of Spain. Upon Mr. Monteux's programme goes Albeniz's "Catalonia." The music does seize vivid folk-tune, does quicken it with no little rhythmic verve and occasional flare of fancy. Over and over, however, it repeats motif and rhythms and scanty is the harmonic and instrumental color that dresses and redresses them. Chabrier, Debussy, Laparra, Ravel, have written far more graphic and characteristic music of Spain and with folk-tune and folk-dance no less to prompt them. Possibly Spanish music, like many another objet d'art, is best made in Paris.

1-7

H. T. PARKER

Boston Season Begun

Specialty for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts — It is the prerogative always of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to give official sanction to the opening in Boston of another musical season. True, there may first be a scattering concert or two, as has been the case this year, but nobody considers the season really begun until the first of the series of 24 symphony concerts has been given.

The Boston season is now officially open. Pierre Monteux, cordially but decorously applauded as he came on to the stage, has led his men through a program comprising Beethoven's second symphony, César Franck's "Le Chasseur Maudit" ("The Wild Huntsman"), Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and Albeniz's "Catalonia" suite; has made his impression, favorable and otherwise, on the Friday afternoon audience, and has been duly compared with predecessors.

In some respects Mr. Monteux' task in presenting the first concert this year was not so great as it was last year, when the orchestra was more or less disorganized. A greater proportion of the old players is here now than then. Then, too, these men have had the benefit of a season's work with Mr. Rabaud, who, it may be presumed, was an exponent of the style of conducting and program making which Mr. Monteux will follow. However, last year it was a temporary position; now it is for a year. And to a certain extent, whether it is wise or fair or just, or not, the audience cannot help making a little forecast of the 23 concerts to come from the one it heard on Friday.

The Beethoven symphony received a perfunctory reading. The conductor added nothing of his own, being seemingly more occupied with holding his men to the tempo he chose than with letting his fancy run in the scherzo or the slow movement. His best work of the afternoon was in the Debussy number, for here he realized the poetry of the score. The César Franck piece, example of a day of music writing that is gone, seems an unworthy representative of the great French master because it lacks the spontaneity and authority of other works of this pioneer of modernism. It is not a very alarming moment that his portrayal of fear brings forth. Listening to the Albeniz suite was no difficult task, being filled rather with the pleasurable excitement of wondering what sort of an odd sound would next emanate from the orchestra.

419

First Symphony Rehearsal

Prominent people who attended the first Symphony rehearsal of the present season on Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall included Mrs. William P. Fay, Mrs. Wirt Dexter, Mrs. Benjamin F. Pitman, Mrs. William Lindsey, Mrs. John C. Phillips, Mrs. Roger Wolcott, Mrs. Eben D. Jordan, Mrs. Edith M. Binney, Mrs. George S. Mumford, Mrs. Charles Morris, Mrs. Herbert E. Fernald, Mrs. B. Nason Hamlin, Mrs. S. V. R. Crosby, Mr. and Mrs. Warren B. P. Weeks, Miss Mary Barnard, Mrs. James D. Barney, Mrs. Eugene N. Foss and her daughter-in-law, Mrs. B. S. Foss, Mrs. Edward Reynolds, Mrs. Albert R. Whittier, Mrs. William W. Vaughan, Mrs. Frederick S. Mead, Miss Abby and Miss Belle Hunt, Mrs. Henry P. Quincy, Mrs. Edward J. Holmes, Mrs. David K. Horton, Mrs. Richard D. Sears and her daughter, Miss Miriam Sears, Mrs. Harold J. Coolidge, Mrs. J. Lewis Bremer, Mrs. Richard S. Russell, Mrs. Murray A. Potter, Mrs. John C. Inches, Judge Frederick P. Cabot, Mrs. Hugh Bancroft, Mrs. Charles C. Wheelwright, Mrs. Clement S. Houghton, Mrs. Franklin W. Hobbs and her daughter, Miss Rebekah Hobbs, Mrs. William York Peters, Mrs. Arthur W. Blake and her daughter, Mrs. F. L. W. Richardson, Miss Eleanor and Miss Katharine Abbott, Mrs. Ellerton P. Whitney, Mrs. F. W. Thayer, Mrs. Robert Saltonstall, Mrs. Robert H. Stevenson, Jr., Mrs. Boylston A. Beal, Mr. Henry L. Higginson.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1919--20

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SECOND PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 17, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 18, AT 8 P. M.

SCHUMANN,

SYMPHONY in B flat major, No. 1, op. 36

I. Andante un poco maestoso; Allegro molto vivace

II. Larghetto

III. Scherzo, Molto vivace; Trio I.: Molto piu vivace; Trio II

IV. Allegro animato e grazioso

DVOŘÁK.

CONCERTO for Violin and Orchestra in A minor,
op. 53

I. Allegro ma non troppo

II. Adagio ma non troppo

III. Finale: Allegro giocoso, ma non troppo

ENESCO,

SUITE for Orchestra, op. 0

I. Prélude à l'unisson

II. Menuet lent

III. Intermède

IV. Final

Soloist:

ALBERT SPALDING

In Full Tide of Music and Mood

Albert Spalding

As He Comes Back From the Wars to the Concert-Halls

PHONY GIVES OND CONCERT

Oct. 18, 1919
Enthusiastic Audience, Fill-Hall, Enjoys Schumann's Spring Symphony

DING HEARD IN VORAK CONCERTO

By PHILIP HALE

Second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as

Schumann, Symphony in B major, No. 1; Dvorak, Concerto for violin and orchestra; Enesco, Suite for violin and orchestra, op. 9.

Schumann's symphony, popularly known as the "Spring" symphony, has been played as a rule at these concerts all or a winter month. It has shared the fate of overtures entitled "Spring." Thus may music cheer the force of contrast.

the spring comes slowly up this
It does not in Schumann's sym-

It comes impetuously, with a rush, with the sound of waters resounding and exulting. Schumann's Spring is a romantic one, known chiefly by its melody and musicians. Mr. Monteux played an appropriately romantic interpretation. Seldom, if ever, have we heard so engrossing a performance, one that from the beginning to the end was lyrically dramatic. While various episodes were adroitly introduced and dismissed, there was no halt in the flow of the musical thought. It is an old story that while Schumann's interpretation is generally maladroit, his at re-orchestration have failed.
Schumann's lovely ideas must wear out. Yesterday this dress did not seem so drab, so rudely cut. The musical it for once caused the orchestral to be forgotten.

pages of Dvorak's concerto that please the most are those in which the composer remembers the folk songs and dances of his Bohemia. The finale is the movement in which we recognize the true Dvorak. When he would be scholastic, when he would appear to be writing with one eye on a college of learned professors, he is labored and dull, as in the first movement of this concerto. He then seems to lose even his birthright of rhythm and color.

Dvorak the naive peasant, richly endowed by nature is nearer and dearer to us than the Dvorak that was forced to be serious and profound. By what is he known today? By "From the New World" Symphony, a few songs, and transcription for violin of a Humoresque. Yet there are early orchestral works by Dvorak that might give pleasure and stir the blood if they were revived.

Mr. Albert Spalding, the solo violinist of yesterday, first thought of playing Bruch's "Scottish Fantasia," but many are not yet ready to listen patiently to the music of a man who signed the outrageous manifesto of the "Intellectuals" early in the war; who in the course of the war wrote violently and indecently against the Allies, especially against England, the country that for some years fed him and enlarged his fame. Mr. Spalding wisely decided not to play this Fantasia. It is said that he finds Dvorak's Concerto good. There are concertos that appeal to a violinist, when they are caviare to the general. The quotation will serve, although we by no means would put Dvorak's Concerto on a level with caviare, for it is for the most part futile music. No doubt Mr. Spalding is interested in technical problems contained in it; it surely does not make demands upon his emotional nature. He played the music skilfully and modestly and was loudly applauded for his pains.

The first movement of Enesco's Suite displayed the noble sonority and the beautiful quality of the strings, as Schumann's symphony showed the marked improvement in the section of the second violins. The minuet is curiously invented, with its suggestions of archaic form and color, while the Intermezzo charms by reason of its hypno-tizing drone and its memories of oriental arabesques.

The hall was completely filled with an enthusiastic audience. The season has, indeed, opened brilliantly.

The concert will be repeated tonight.
The program of the concert next week is as follows: D'Indy's new symphony
No. 3 ("De Bello Gallico"), which will be performed for the first time in America; Beethoven overture and Ballet No. 5 from "The Creatures of Prometheus"; Wagner, Siegfried Idyll;
Liszt, "The Preludes."

In Full Tide

As He Comes Back

SYMPHONY GIVES SECOND CONCERT

Herald — Oct. 18, 1919

Enthusiastic Audience, Filling Hall, Enjoys Schumann's Spring Symphony

SPALDING HEARD IN DVORAK CONCERTO

By PHILIP HALE

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Schumann, Symphony in B flat major, No. 1; Dvorak, Concerto for violin and orchestra; Enesco, Suite for orchestra, op. 9.

Schumann's symphony, popularly known as the "Spring" symphony, has been played as a rule at these concerts in a fall or a winter month. It has thus shared the fate of overtures entitled "Spring." Thus may music cheer one by the force of contrast.

"And the spring comes slowly up this way." It does not in Schumann's symphony. It comes impetuously, with a mad rush, with the sound of waters released and exulting. Schumann's Spring is a romantic one, known chiefly by poets and musicians. Mr. Monteux gave an appropriately romantic interpretation. Seldom, if ever, have we heard so engrossing a performance, one that was from the beginning to the end so lyrically dramatic. While various episodes were adroitly introduced and dismissed, there was no halt in the continuity of the musical thought. It is an old story that while Schumann's instrumentation is generally maladroit, attempts at re-orchestration have failed. Schumann's lovely ideas must wear his dress. Yesterday this dress did not seem so drab, so rudely cut. The musical thought for once caused the orchestral clothing to be forgotten.

The pages of Dvorak's concerto that please the most are those in which the composer remembers the folk songs and dances of his Bohemia. The finale is the movement in which we recognize the true Dvorak. When he would be scholastic, when he would appear to be writing with one eye on a college of learned professors, he is labored and dull, as in the first movement of this concerto. He then seems to lose even his birthright of rhythm and color. Dvorak the naive peasant, richly endowed by nature is nearer and dearer to us than the Dvorak that was forced to be serious and profound. By what is he known today? By "From the New World" Symphony, a few songs, and transcription for violin of a Humoresque. Yet there are early orchestral works by Dvorak that might give pleasure and stir the blood if they were revived.

Mr. Albert Spalding, the solo violinist of yesterday, first thought of playing Bruch's "Scottish Fantasia," but many are not yet ready to listen patiently to the music of a man who signed the outrageous manifesto of the "Intellectuals" early in the war; who in the course of the war wrote violently and indecently against the Allies, especially against England, the country that for some years fed him and enlarged his fame. Mr. Spalding wisely decided not to play this Fantasia. It is said that he finds Dvorak's Concerto good. There are concertos that appeal to a violinist, when they are caviare to the general. The quotation will serve, although we by no means would put Dvorak's Concerto on a level with caviare, for it is for the most part futile music. No doubt Mr. Spalding is interested in technical problems contained in it: it surely does not make demands upon his emotional nature. He played the music skillfully and modestly and was loudly applauded for his pains.

The first movement of Enesco's Suite displayed the noble sonority and the beautiful quality of the strings, as Schumann's symphony showed the marked improvement in the section of the second violins. The minuet is curiously invented, with its suggestions of archaic form and color, while the intermezzo charms by reason of its hypnotizing drone and its memories of oriental arabesques.

The hall was completely filled with an enthusiastic audience. The season has, indeed, opened brilliantly.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concert next week is as follows: D'Indy's new symphony No. 3 ("De Bello Gallico"), which will be performed for the first time in America; Beethoven overture and Ballet No. 5 from "The Creatures of Prometheus"; Wagner, Siegfried Idyll; Liszt, "The Preludes."

Music in Boston Oct. 18 '19

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts — It is pleasant to note the cordiality of the welcome given to Albert Spalding when he appears as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This young American, who has sacrificed much in the way of material well-being for the sake of becoming a violinist, will some day be regarded as a pioneer, for he devoted himself to art when friends and family expected, nay, almost insisted, that he hew out a commercial career. And not only did he undergo a long and hard apprenticeship, but he did it at a time when the American musician had little to hope for from a public which could see slight value in anything that did not come from Europe, and preferably from Germany. He was not taken seriously, but that did not bother him, outwardly, at least. He kept on, and now he has reached the point where, in a generation of violinists, he may rightfully occupy a prominent rank. So his welcome at the Friday afternoon concert of the Boston orchestra was pleasant to see, and even more pleasant was the warm recognition of his good work in the Dvořák concerto in A minor, Op. 53. No violinist could well help getting a beautiful tone out of the instrument which Mr. Spalding plays, but this player has reached the point where he is concerned with his tone chiefly for the use he can put it to in conveying the musical ideas of the composer as he feels them. So he was able to set forth the joy and contemplative beauty of the Dvořák concerto with conviction both to himself and his audience.

The symphony was the B flat, No. 1, Op. 38 of Schumann, a thing of joy and satisfying in its harmonies because of the genius of Schumann for orchestration. If Mr. Monteux is given to repetitions, it would be interesting to hear this later in the season, when the players have settled down a little more into the unity and precision that is still somewhat lacking.

Enesco's suite for orchestra Op. 9 was the concluding number of the program, and was found mildly interesting by the audience.

YOUTHFUL MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Schumann's "Spring" Given—Spalding
as Soloist

Post

Oct. 18 '19

BY OLIN DOWNES

Albert Spalding, the young American violinist, who recently returned to this country after service as an aviator and as a musician in the war, was soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

The orchestral compositions were the poetic "Spring" symphony of Schumann, and the Suite, op. 9, of Enesco—a singular and fascinating piece of music.

SCHUMANN'S SYMPHONY

The performance of Schumann's Symphony was, on the whole, the finest the writer has heard. To many a celebrated conductor this music is a stumbling block. It is too simple for a leader who relies on striking effects to pull him through. It is too sincere, too youthful, too poetic for one without youth and poetry in him to hope to interpret. Then there is the question of orchestral effect. Schumann, who wrote this symphony with spring and love in his heart, knew what orchestral effects he wanted, but did not always know how to secure them in a practical way. This is acknowledged. Unfortunately, there are many conductors who are content to excuse a dull performance on these grounds.

The conductor cannot so easily relinquish his own responsibility when he interprets this lovely work. He must get the full value of every note in the score, make every detail susceptible of color tell, develop the hints of what the composer wants into concrete effects, meet the creator of the music half way and assist him to deliver his message.

Glowing With Color

Mr. Monteux did all this. He is not a man to take another man's word for what is or is not in a score. He reads the score for himself, hence generally knows what is in it. How many admirable things he did which commonly escape notice! How one tone of a horn or a flute told in the color scheme.

The orchestra glowed with color, a kind of color particularly characteristic of Schumann, native to him, inimitable by anyone else. Nor was the symphony a succession of more or less disconnected episodes, as it so often sounds. The thought was continuous, the spirit romantic. The rustles and stirrings of spring agitated the instruments. Now the music was full of a vague and beautiful melancholy, like the earth when it is burdened with the prescience of an eternity of deaths and resurrections to come, and again there was the impetuous surge of youthful emotion, warmth, love.

Simply and Eloquently Rendered

Never was the dreamy song of the violins in the second part so simply and eloquently rendered. Seldom has there been such vigor, such healthy folk-spirit, so much humor and fancy in the scherzo. The choice of tempi was singularly happy. In certain places, as in the allegro of the first movement, as in one of the strains of the scherzo, it was a trifle slower, a trifle more sturdy, than with other conductors, and to the writer this conception was ideal.

To do all this, with a simple and well-known work, is a very great thing. One must have for the time the heart of a child, with the skill and the expert knowledge of orchestral instruments, which Mr. Monteux possesses in an unusual degree.

Mr. Spaulding's Playing

It was a brilliant concert of familiar compositions. Mr. Spaulding, who long since showed himself a serious artist of marked talent, displayed on this occasion more authority and individuality in his performance than ever before. The Dvořák concerto, which has many beautiful ideas in it, is diffuse and overlengthy, but it was vitalized and each episode given meaning and significance by the player.

It is a pleasure to add that Mr. Spaulding has never lost the straightforwardness and sincerity which distinguished his playing from the beginning. And he no longer performs like a gifted, earnest, well-trained youth. He has a man's conviction and purpose in his task. He was warmly applauded at the end of the concerto.

There will be no Rehearsal and Concert next week

Enesco's Suite

A foil to the frank lyricism of Schumann and Dvořák was the strange, haunted, twilight music of Enesco. He is a peculiar individuality, a musician who engrosses some and repels others. This music has a strangely personal melancholy faithfully reflected in the composition and very difficult to define at all in words. A twilight zone of the composer's consciousness seems to be revealed. Here in Enesco, a Rumanian, a lover of the music of Brahms and Wagner, the Germans, and grown up as a composer in modern France. Is this suite Slavic? It seems to be so in the last movement, which is very fantastical. One does not know where the other movements come from. They come from Enesco. They are suggestive of the style of music of a day long past, but in spite of the suggestion of music in the old style this composition is ultra-modern in spirit. A modern man peers back through vistas of ages which have seen so many men hope and struggle and die. Music has its message for every hearer. To many Enesco's music will be music, made of notes, well made, and yesterday very well performed under Mr. Monteux, especially as regards the playing of the strings in the open unison movement.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Trans. — Oct. 20 '19
ENESCO, SCHUMANN, MONTEUX,
SPALDING

A Perversely Interesting Suite That Dressed Ancient Forms in Modern Vesture—Music of the Spring Glorified by a Conductor Able to Set It on the Stage of the Imagination — A Dull Concerto Animated by a Violinist Without Other Choice

NOT the least happy incident of the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening was the absence of French music from the programme. It is quite as possible to be over-fed with French music as it is with German or Russian, or, as befell the other day no farther away than Worcester, with American. Too much of the ancients, like too much of the ultra-moderns, may easily cloy the ear. Overfed with the music of Paris many a frequenter of the Symphony Concerts was last season, because a passing conductor was not widely read in other musics and because he seemed fondly to believe that a mediocre piece was somehow less mediocre, if Paris had given it birth. Mr. Monteux, cultivated and cosmopolitan musician, harbors no such illusion. As he said aptly in an interview early in the autumn, French music of high desert needs no propaganda. It speaks for itself the world around and—he might have added—gloriously. As for mediocre or cut-moded music, which has been and is still written in Paris, exactly as in Berlin, Vienna, Moscow, Rome or even Boston, there is no good reason why it should be played anywhere, least of all in the abundance in which it fell upon many an ear last winter. The more, then, the reason to applaud a programme that began with the singing Schumann of the "Spring" symphony, proceeded with the serviceable Dvorak of the concerto for violin, and ended with the highly individual Enesco of the orchestral suite with a prelude for strings in unison. True, Enesco dwells and works in Paris, but he is Roumanian by blood, while Vienna first trained him. Much more significantly, in youth and in maturity he has worked to his own ends in his own way.

56

So it was, perhaps, that to practised and therefore the more curious ears, his music was the most interesting of the evening. Added to the repertory of the orchestra eight years ago and then played twice within as many months, it has been subsequently repeated only once, so that recollection could do hardly more than whet anticipation. Fulfillment came quickly with the large sweep, the incisive voices, the diversified progress of the prelude for the stripped and unified strings—a naked music, if the hearer chooses, but heated by fire of invention and spurred by imaginative energy, of an Enesco who in his own way will follow a way of the ancients. Surely of the day and year in which the suite was written, say at the beginning of the twentieth century, is the succeeding minuet—again an ancient form, but again also, a modern an individual handling. Not only is the harmonic and the instrumental coloring Enesco's own and of Enesco's time, but as much of both is the fancy it releases. To more than one ear, this minuet is a dance of phantoms, of ghosts recalled to life and pleasure in a chateau tumbling to ruin, snatching their hasty, dusty hour. The ensuing interlude, yet again, seeks an archaic austerity of form, progress, phrase, yet speaks with the richer, diversifying voice of our own day in music-making. With a lively finale in dance-rhythm ended many an ancient suite. Enesco chooses to end his with what seems a Roumanian folk-tune, rhythmical, repeated, variegated, interrupted in ready and spirited modern fashion.

A perverse music—again if the hearer chooses—in the clothing of forms of the eighteenth century with the tonal vestiture of the early twentieth, but so much the more individual of imagination and accomplishment and with many a stimulating tang for the ear that would escape the endless bore of the regular thing in the regular way. Fortunate, wise, happy Enesco to possess and cherish a native wildness.

Our fathers fancied that Dvorak possessed this native wildness. Possibly he did, possibly it survives still in some of his music, like the Hussite overture and this or that chamber-piece. Their sons, however, are incredulous as our sons may be when—and if—they read praises of it in Enesco. Certainly to old and to young, hardly any sort of native wildness touches the concerto that Mr. Spalding was compelled to play. Compelled, indeed, is written advisedly. His original choice, it seems, was Bruch's "Scottish Fantasia," a much more animated, artful and amusing music. Now Bruch in these days is a doddering old man, dragging out life in a suburb of Berlin. During the war, it appears, he blasphemed the English in senile furies. Other old men nearer Boston still resent these follies. There were alarms and excursions even as there were last spring when Miss Braslau would sing certain music of Bruch. The "Scottish Fantasia" was "banned" and Mr. Spalding took shelter in Dvorak's dull concerto. Evidently there are "high quarters" in Symphony Hall, as in the Senate of the United States, in which the war has not yet ended. Not wisely, indeed, might sundry senators present themselves at the Symphony Concerts, even the father of one of the trustees of the orchestra itself. He has passed middle age; by report of recent debates in Washington, he has been known to speak despitefully of the English.

To the saving Dvorak, Mr. Spalding returned much. Through the "thoughtful," the painstaking music-making of the first movement, through the smooth and long-drawn song of the second, through the warmer motifs and the livelier progress of the finale he made his way as though the whole piece were enkindling the play of his finest powers. He melted technical exaction into flowing and decorative detail. He clothed dull and repetitious measures with the rich body, the warm glow, the flowing progress of his tone. He touched off prosaic figures with a gentle flourish. Where the music gave off neither light nor heat, it received the radiance of his tone, his ardor for the violin—and even for this concerto of Dvorak. From him and from Mr. Monteux, in deft and sympathetic accompaniment came the moments of tranquil, simple, songful beauty in the slow division and from both, with a little more aid and comfort from the composer, the moments of rhythmic life in the finale. The music might easily have led Mr. Spalding into a dry, a super-refined tone. As it was, the very shortcomings of the concerto seemed to warm and deepen his voice. Like the ancient masters of the violin, he touched—and glorified.

37

Mr. Monteux and the orchestra did like service to Schumann's symphony of the return of spring; but therein was music to put them to their mettle. It were a late day to rehearse anew the songful rapture of the beginning, the songful ecstasy of the succeeding movement, the songful brightness of the scherzo, the songful gayety of the finale. If ever there was instrumental song, from first measure to last, it is this symphony in B-flat major, No. 1, Op. 38, as paltry prose labels it. Twenty times conductors and orchestras have sung it more or less rapturously into Bostonian ears. It were as late a day to traverse anew the details of the music in which Schumann's hand, less graced than his imagination, has dulled or nearly stifled his voice. As many times conductors and orchestras have more or less aptly or energetically made him articulate. Mr. Monteux lagged no whit behind his predecessors in songful eloquence, in illuminating stroke of pace or accent. For himself, his orchestra, his audience, he did more. Before them he unrolled the music as though it were glowing pageant of the coming of spring and of the poetized emotions that advent is presumed to send beating high. His pace and progress through the symphony set the first movement, as it were, in flood upon the countryside. The poet, in the second, saw, dreamed and flowed with tender fancies. Through the third skipped the playful folk. In the fourth the whole awakening world was merry, antic. Mr. Monteux visualized the music, set the stage of imagination with it. Symphonic music gains when a conductor of parts and spirit has served also in the opera house.

H. T. PARKER

MR. MONTEUX NEWLY TESTED
Jan. 17, 1919
 Conductor and Orchestra in the Unsparring Acoustics of Sanders Theatre at Cambridge—A Concerto for Another Side of His Abilities—A Feat for the Strings in Enesco's Music

FOR many a year the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge, under the auspices of the university, have usually been a repetition of pieces recently played in Boston. Last evening, when a new series began in Sanders Theatre, Mr. Monteux, who has the courage of his own ways, reversed precedent and proposed to his hearers the programme of the concerts today and tomorrow in Symphony Hall, with the "assisting artist"—Mr. Spalding, the violinist—summoned to them. Those hearers filled every place in the concert-room, as they did not always do last winter under the dispensation of Ra-baud. Many were the "officers of instruction and government"; not too few were the instructed, governed and, this time, pleased students. For both, following Mr. Higginson's precept and practice, the cost of the concerts is kept low—lower probably, than for any series of similar quality and prestige the country over. Therefore, do the miscellaneous folk of Cambridge flock to them and occasional outlanders from Boston over the Charles. As one of the university dowagers affirmed last evening in a carrying, even a circum-ambient, voice, "There were many persons in the house whom she had never seen in her life!" In spite of that predicament, they were none the less good to see. The wider, the more various the public of the Symphony Concerts in either Boston or Cambridge, the firmer is the present and the future. On both sides of the Charles, one and another who would enjoy them stays away in mistaken notion that they are for the elect only. They are not—in spite even of marvelling and distressed dowagers.

With courtesy, interest, good will, this company applauded Mr. Monteux when he came to his place: then warmed to him, as he well deserved, through the course of the concert—best of rewards for a conductor newly come to a practised audience. Being also an audience in Cambridge, it recalled Mr. Spalding twice and thrice, again according to his deserts; while at the end of Schumann's "Spring" symphony, it clapped heartily the standing orchestra. For it, in some respects, the wooden walls and the consequent resonance of Sanders Theatre were a severer test than Symphony Hall had been a week ago. Across the Charles, every detail of music and performance stands as clear as conductor and orchestra may make it. There also the listener hears quality of tone unclouded, undiminished. Moreover, one of the pieces upon the programme happened to be Enesco's suite. The first division falls to the string-choir only, plus a kettle-drum toward the end and throughout in unison. Enesco has written it in bold and incisive phrases, in sharp contrasts, vivid transitions, mounting periods.

The writers of music in the eighteenth century loved this propulsive force, this penetrating power of striding strings singing in a single voice. Enesco, instructed musician, has assimilated their proud affection, but he is also musician with an individual ardor, a barbaric tang of his own.

So does the first division of his suite cut the air with these united strings and cleaving it, strike fire. As the choir of the orchestra played it, as Mr. Monteux lead it, the music rang upon the ear, strode across the imagination. Up and down the choir, power, pliancy, precision, were at one. The conductor perceived the breadth of Enesco's pattern, caught the intensity with which the composer weaves it. The audience knew the sweep, even the splendor, of this naked music.

In the relative routine of the rest of the chosen music, the strings equally pleased the ear—in euphony with Mr. Spalding's violin or in bright background for it through Dvorak's concerto; in the warmly phrased instrumental song of Schumann's symphony; in the reiterated and heightened emphases and ascents of Enesco's sharp-set finale. The wood-winds were as fortunate in the unpairing acoustics of Sanders Theatre, especially when some single voice among them isolated a few measures of the songful Schumann or threaded about the main stem of the music one or another of his fanciful ornaments. Full-throated and rich-voiced were the horns also with his song; while they, the trumpets and Mr. Monteux as well, warmed to that exuberant phrase in which he proclaims the coming of the spring. If the Symphony Orchestra is still to be accounted a "new" Symphony Orchestra, seldom has it better proved individual and collective quality than it did last evening. Add to the music then played Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" of last week at Symphony Hall; recall the performance—and not an essential and scarcely a distinction of orchestral playing seems now lacking to it.

The conductor bore as well the sharp tests of Sanders Theatre and the new test of a concerto in which the orchestra partners a solo instrument. Mr. Monteux has gathered long experience with dancers, mimes and singers in opera houses. Therefore he accompanies well in the glorified sense in which the word designates the orchestral part of a concerto. He was considerate, sympathetic, stimulating with Mr. Spalding; he had a keen ear for the "solo violin" in relation to the other instrumental voices; yet he was mindful of the progress, the unity of the concerto as a whole. As operatic conductor, also, Mr. Monteux knows and cherishes the large, keen, direct impression upon his hearers. So he swept through Enesco's "prelude in unison" and his glinting, snapping finale; and so he caught the exuberance of Schumann's symphony of the spring. He made the music "sound," even when the composer's clumsiness or artlessness of hand momentarily dulls it—"sound" with the sheer eagerness of outpoured song at the beginning, with the sheer happy fancy of the scherzo of the talk at play; with the gentler song that suffuses the slow division, with the gayer song of the finale. Whatever French conductors do or fail to do with German romantic music, they have ears for it as instrumental song. In Mr. Monteux there are also the perception and the skill that can exercise fine as well as large means to this end. He can use the adroit hand; he has the sensitive ear. Now and again only does he yield to the temptation to set his orchestra in too firm, too square-cut masses of tone.

H. T. PARKER

SANDERS THEATRE . . CAMBRIDGE

OPENING CONCERT

Thursday Evening, October 16

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SOLOIST

ALBERT SPALDING

VIOLIN

Tickets at Kent's University Bookstore, Harvard Square, Cambridge

Mr. ALBERT SPALDING, born at Chicago, August 15, 1888, when he was seven years old began the study of the violin with Chiti in Florence, Italy, and when he was living in New York, with Juan Buitrago. When Mr. Spalding was fourteen he passed with high honors the examination for a "professorship" at the Bologna Conservatory. In Paris he studied for two years with Lefort. His first appearance in public as a professional violinist was at the Nouveau Théâtre, Paris, June 6, 1905.

His first recital in Boston was on January 4, 1909. On December 12, 1911, as soloist with the Theodore Thomas Orchestra of Chicago (now the Chicago Symphony Orchestra), he played Elgar's violin concerto, then heard for the first time in Boston. He has given recitals here on November 12, 1914; April 29, November 3, 1915; January 28, November 4, December 17, 1916; and on April 4, 1916, he took part with Messrs. Carlo Buonamici and Felix Fox, pianists, and the Flonzaley Quartet in a concert in aid of widows of Italian reservists.

He also played at an entertainment given by the Friars of New York on June 7, 1916.

He played in Boston at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, January 12, 1917 (Beethoven's concerto). He served in the war as an aviator in Italy and played for the benefit of soldiers.

So does the first division of his suite cut the air with these united strings and cleaving it, strike fire. As the choirs of the orchestra played it, as Mr. Monteux lead it, the music rang upon the ear, strode across the imagination. Up and down the choir, power, pliancy, precision, were at one. The conductor perceived the breadth of Enesco's pattern, caught the intensity with which the composer weaves it. The audience knew the sweep, even the splendor, of this naked music.

In the relative routine of the rest of the chosen music, the strings equally pleased the ear—in euphony with Mr. Spalding's violin or in bright background for it through Dvorák's concerto; in the warmly phrased instrumental song of Schumann's symphony; in the reiterated and heightened emphases and ascents of Enesco's sharp-set finale. The wood-winds were as fortunate in the unsparring acoustics of Sanders Theatre, especially when some single voice among them isolated a few measures of the songful Schumann or threaded about the main stem of the music one or another of his fanciful ornaments. Full-throated and rich-voiced were the horns also with his song; while they, the trumpets and Mr. Monteux as well, warmed to that exuberant phrase in which he proclaims the coming of the spring. If the Symphony Orchestra is still to be accounted a "new" Symphony Orchestra, seldom has it better proved individual and collective quality than it did last evening. Add to the music then played Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" of last week at Symphony Hall; recall the performance—and not an essential and scarcely a distinction of orchestral playing seems now lacking to it.

The conductor bore as well the sharp tests of Sanders Theatre and the new test of a concerto in which the orchestra partners a solo instrument. Mr. Monteux has gathered long experience with dancers, mimes and singers in opera houses. Therefore he accompanies well in the glorified sense in which the word designates the orchestral part of a concerto. He was considerate, sympathetic, stimulating with Mr. Spalding; he had a keen ear for the "solo violin" in relation to the other instrumental voices; yet he was mindful of the progress, the unity of the concerto as a whole. As operative conductor, also, Mr. Monteux knows and cherishes the large, keen, direct impression upon his hearers. So he swept through Enesco's "prelude in unison" and his glinting, snapping finale; and so he caught the exuberance of Schumann's symphony of the spring. He made the music "sound," even when the composer's clumsiness or artlessness of hand momentarily dulls it—"sound" with the sheer eagerness of outpoured song at the beginning, with the sheer happy fancy of the scherzo of the folk at play; with the gentler song that suffuses the slow division, with the gayer song of the finale. Whatever French conductors do or fail to do with German romantic music, they have ears for it as instrumental song. In Mr. Monteux there are also the perception and the skill that can exercise fine as well as large means to this end. He can use the adroit hand; he has the sensitive ear. Now and again only does he yield to the temptation to set his orchestra in too firm, too square-cut masses of tone.

H. T. PARKER

SANDERS THEATRE . . CAMBRIDGE OPENING CONCERT

Thursday Evening, October 16

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SOLOIST

ALBERT SPALDING

VIOLIN

Tickets at Kent's University Bookstore, Harvard Square, Cambridge

Mr. ALBERT SPALDING, born at Chicago, August 15, 1888, when he was seven years old began the study of the violin with Chiti in Florence, Italy, and when he was living in New York, with Juan Buitrago. When Mr. Spalding was fourteen he passed with high honors the examination for a "professorship" at the Bologna Conservatory. In Paris he studied for two years with Lefort. His first appearance in public as a professional violinist was at the Nouveau Théâtre, Paris, June 6, 1905.

His first recital in Boston was on January 4, 1909. On December 12, 1911, as soloist with the Theodore Thomas Orchestra of Chicago (now the Chicago Symphony Orchestra), he played Elgar's violin concerto, then heard for the first time in Boston. He has given recitals here on November 12, 1914; April 29, November 3, 1915; January 28, November 4, December 17, 1916; and on April 4, 1916, he took part with Messrs. Carlo Buonamici and Felix Fox, pianists, and the Flonzaley Quartet in a concert in aid of widows of Italian reservists.

He also played at an entertainment given by the Friars of New York on June 7, 1916.

He played in Boston at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, January 12, 1917 (Beethoven's concerto). He served in the war as an aviator in Italy and played for the benefit of soldiers.

60

3-1

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1919--20

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

THIRD PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 24, AT 2.30 P.M.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 25, AT 8 P.M.

D'INDY,

SHORT SYMPHONY, (based on the War in France 1916-1918,) No. 3, op. 70. "Sinfonia Brevis de Bello Gallico"

- I. Lent et calme; Lent et anxieux
- II. Assez vite
- III. Lent
- IV. Tres animé; Lent: Majestueux
(First performance in America)

BEETHOVEN,

BALLET, op. 43, "The Creatures of Prometheus" Overture
Ballet No. 5: Adagio
Violoncello Solo, J. BEDETTI; Flute, G. LAURENT; Clarinet, A. SAND; Bassoon, A. LAUS; Harp, A. HOLY

WAGNER,

"A SIEGFRIED IDYLL"

LISZT,

SYMPHONIC POEM, No. 3, "Les Préludes," (after Lamartine)

Some Principals Among the Symphony Players. From Left to Right: Jean Bedetti and Frederic Denayer, Newly Come from France, Bearing a Very Considerable Reputation with Them, to Head the Cello and Viola Sections; Gustav Heim, Albert Sand and George Wendler, the Trumpet, Clarinet and French Horn Respectively, Upon Whose Matchless Musicianship the Superfine Performance of the Great Orchestra Largely Depends.

SYMPHONY'S THIRD CONCERT

D'Indy's Work on French
War Given First Time—
Brilliant Performance

OLD BALLET MUSIC OF BEETHOVEN ENJOYED

Harvard Oct. 25, 1919
By PHILIP HALE

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: D'Indy, Short Symphony Concerning the Gallic War (first time in America); Beethoven, Overture and Ballet No. 5, "The Creatures of Prometheus"; Wagner, "A Siegfried" Idyl; Liszt, Symphonic Poem, "The Preludes."

The title of D'Indy's symphony is in Latin. Did he consciously or unconsciously borrow "De Bello Gallico" from Julius Caesar? It matters not; the symphony, composed in 1916-18 and first performed in Paris last May, was inspired by the war; the two chief themes of the first movement are intended to typify the French and the Huns; there is the attempt to portray in music the suspense, the anguish, the heroism of the French; and at last there is the triumphal march, the apotheosis of victory, with the fanfares and the salvos of tumultuous rejoicing. In other words, this symphony is a "piece d'occasion."

The fate of these pieces has usually been unfortunate, like that of many "prize compositions." A new work from Vincent d'Indy is awaited with more than ordinary expectation. The composer of the Symphony on a Mountain Air, of the noble Symphony in B Flat, of the gorgeous "Istar" variations—not to mention other works orchestral of another nature—is never hurried, restless; an experimenter in the pursuit of his art. Yet there are emotions so deep, so mastering, that they are not to be fully expressed even in music, which has been said to be the language of the inexpressible. It would seem that in this symphony flaming patriotism has consumed purely musical thought; that the Frenchman dominates the artist. Perhaps d'Indy and his fellow-countrymen would have it so. The symphony is therefore interesting as a vivid outpouring of patriotism; as purely a work of art it cannot be ranked with the works above named.

It is hardly necessary to say that the Symphony is technically engrossing, for d'Indy is an acknowledged master. There are pages that are fully worthy of the musician that wrote the Symphony in B flat and "Istar." The introduction portraying the peace and calm of France before the ruthless invasion of Belgium is singularly beautiful. There are brilliant measures in the Scherzo. The first section of the slow movement is profoundly emotional, but what is the significance of the abrupt, perplexing, disconcerting change in mood? We say "significance," for although the score has no printed argument, there surely was a "program" in the composer's mind. The Finale, inspiring chiefly by reason of its dynamic force, is rather commonplace with the possible exception of the pages in which, according to a Parisian critic, the theme of St. Michael is proclaimed victoriously by the little trumpet in D while massive chords punctuate after an old fashion long approved by d'Indy's predecessors.

Beethoven's little ballet overture had not been heard at a symphony concert for 10 years. The Adagio was a favorite piece in the years of Theodore Thomas's and the Harvard Musical Association's concerts, from 1869 till 1882. It is graceful, pretty music, which served yesterday to display the talent and taste of Messrs. Bedetti, Holy, Laurent, Laus and Sand in solo measures.

Mr. Monteux gave a dramatic reading of Liszt's familiar "Preludes," and saved it for the most part from the charge of sentimentalism and the reproach of bombast.

The great audience was most appreciative, distributing applause with impartial hands. The new symphony and Beethoven's music were especially well received.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Haydn's Symphony "The Queen of France" (first time at these concerts); Rachmaninoff, Piano Concerto in D minor No. 3 (first time in Boston); Stravinsky, Suite from "The Fire-Bird" (first time at these concerts). Mr. Rachmaninoff will be the pianist.

Some Principals Among the Symphony Players. From Left to Right: Jean Bedetti and Frederic Denayer, Newly Come from France, Bearing a Very Considerable Reputation with Them, to Head the 'Cello and Viola Sections; Gustav Heim, Albert Sand and George Wendler, the Trumpet, Clarinet and French Horn Respectively, Upon Whose Matchless Musicianship the Superfine Performance of the Great Orchestra Largely Depends

SYMPHONY'S THIRD CONCERT

D'Indy's Work on French
War Given First Time—
Brilliant Performance

OLD BALLET MUSIC OF BEETHOVEN ENJOYED

Harald Oct. 25, 1919
By PHILIP HALE

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Montoux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: D'Indy, Short Symphony Concerning the Gallic War (first time in America); Beethoven, Overture and Ballet No. 5, "The Creatures of Prometheus"; Wagner, "A Siegfried" Idyl; Liszt, Symphonic Poem, "The Preludes." The title of D'Indy's symphony is in Latin. Did he consciously or unconsciously borrow "De Bello Gallico" from Julius Caesar? It matters not; the symphony, composed in 1916-18 and first performed in Paris last May, was inspired by the war; the two chief themes of the first movement are intended to typify the French and the Hun; there is the attempt to portray in music the suspense, the anguish, the heroism of the French; and at last there is the triumphal march, the apotheosis of victory, with the fanfares and the salvos of tumultuous rejoicing. In other words, this symphony is a "piece d'occasion."

The fate of these pieces has usually been unfortunate, like that of many "prize compositions." A new work from Vincent d'Indy is awaited with more than ordinary expectation. The composer of the Symphony on a Mountain Air, of the noble Symphony in B Flat, of the gorgeous "Istar" variations—not to mention other works orchestral of another nature—is never hurried, restless; an experimenter in the pursuit of his art. Yet there are emotions so deep, so mastering, that they are not to be fully expressed even in music, which has been said to be the language of the inexpressible. It would seem that in this symphony flaming patriotism has consumed purely musical thought; that the Frenchman dominates the artist. Perhaps d'Indy and his fellow-countrymen would have it so. The symphony is therefore interesting as a vivid outpouring of patriotism; as purely a work of art it cannot be ranked with the works above named.

It is hardly necessary to say that the Symphony is technically engrossing, for d'Indy is an acknowledged master. There are pages that are fully worthy of the musician that wrote the Symphony in B flat and "Istar." The introduction portraying the peace and calm of France before the ruthless invasion of Belgium is singularly beautiful. There are brilliant measures in the Scherzo. The first section of the slow movement is profoundly emotional, but what is the significance of the abrupt, perplexing, disconcerting change in mood? We say "significance," for although the score has no printed argument, there surely was a "program" in the composer's mind. The finale, inspiring chiefly by reason of its dynamic force, is rather commonplace with the possible exception of the pages in which, according to a Parisian critic, the theme of St. Michael is proclaimed victoriously by the little trumpet in D while massive chords punctuate after an old fashion long approved by d'Indy's predecessors.

Beethoven's little ballet overture had not been heard at a symphony concert for 19 years. The Adagio was a favorite piece in the years of Theodore Thomas's and the Harvard Musical Association's concerts, from 1863 till 1882. It is graceful, pretty music, which served yesterday to display the talent and taste of Messrs. Bedetti, Holy, Laurent, Leus and Sand in solo measures.

Mr. Montoux gave a dramatic reading of Liszt's familiar "Preludes," and saved it for the most part from the charge of sentimentalism and the reproach of bombast.

The great audience was most appreciative, distributing applause with impartial hands. The new symphony and Beethoven's music were especially well received.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Haydn's Symphony "The Queen of France" (first time at these concerts); Rachmaninoff, Piano Concerto in D minor No. 3 (first time in Boston); Stravinsky, Suite from "The Fire-Bird" (first time at these concerts). Mr. Rachmaninoff will be the pianist.

SYMPHONY GIVES IDEAL PROGRAM

Adm. — Oct. 20/19
Monteux Proves That He is Growing Fast in Conductorship

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

Program.
D'Indy. Sinfonia Brevis, de Bello Gallico.
Beethoven. Prometheus Ballet Overture and Adagio.
Wagner. Siegfried Idyll.
Liszt. Les Preludes.

Such a program is the reviewer's ideal. Entirely orchestral, with an important novelty and a good contrast of different schools. The absence of a soloist only gave prominence to the symphonic character of the occasion.

How much greater is the inspiration of such a work as D'Indy's than Strauss' self-laudatory "Heldenleben." Without giving a series of war-pictures this new work portrays struggle, anxiety, sorrow and final triumph. It is shapely, too, and does not altogether depart greatly from the symphonic form of Beethoven, although the first movement has a rather free return of themes at its end, the Scherzo (which in this case is earnest) comes second instead of third, and there is some of the asceticism of D'Indy in the beginning of the finale.

WORK IS GENUINE.

But the work is genuine and sincere throughout, and it has sufficient of development to win the suffrages of the musician without repelling the laity. As is usual in modern works, the introduction furnishes some important matter for the first movement. There is some excellent horn work in the trio of the second movement, a noble climax in the slow movement, and the apotheosis of triumph in the finale, although this comes only after struggle and dissonance.

The work is an idealization of military band effects, of fife and drum, (the piccolo replacing the fife) and of stirring march rhythms. It is this, rather than a direct picture of battle,

Like the Heroic Symphony it is subjective rather than objective. Even the xylophone is made an important tone-color in its score.

The Scherzo is in 5-4 rhythm, much of the time, and here and there are defiant fanfares of trumpets. It would not be D'Indy if there were not contrapuntal skill displayed somewhere, and there are some touches of canon—and some of cannon as well.

STRANGE DIALOGUE.

The finale has some remarkable touches of very high and difficult trumpet playing in an antiphonal effect against chords of the full orchestra. There is also another strange dialogue between bass drum and xylophone. All these touches were finely brought out.

The work had its finest performance in America on this occasion, and was received with well-deserved enthusiasm, Mr. Monteux being twice recalled and the orchestra obliged to rise.

Perhaps it was unfair to Beethoven's weakest overture, to the only ballet that he ever wrote, to place it after such a strong modern work as the War Symphony. It is certainly the easiest and simplest of the overtures of the great master, as befits ballet-music. It is dance-like, too, and forms a sharp contrast to such overtures as "Coriolanus" or "Egmont."

The Adagio which followed, No. 5 in the ballet, is chiefly remarkable for its use of the harp. Mr. Holy had no very thankful task here, for the composer wins no especial effect from his employment of the instrument. We must bear in mind, however, that in 1801 the concert harp (double-action pedal) had not been invented, and Beethoven's instrument was much more diatonic than ours of the present. He had never used the harp before, and he never used it again. When, in 1810, Erard brought forth the modern harp, Beethoven was too deaf to experiment with new instruments. Flute, clarinette, bassoon and violoncello also gave solo work in this rather watery number, which, because of their excellent playing aroused much applause.

EFFECTIVE READING.

Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll," written as a Christmas and birthday present for his wife, is naturally not among his ambitious or heavily-scored works. But it presents graphic-leading motives from his trilogy and develops them as only Wagner can. And it was good to hear some of his work in the symphony programs again, although we could have wished one of his broader compositions for the "renewal." But Monteux read the number with sympathetic elasticity and the sweetness of the bird motives, the nobility of "Siegfried, Rock of the World," and the intertwining of the two figures was effective enough.

And then the concert ended with Liszt, Liszt whom we have not had upon the program for 10, these many months, and the very broadest and noblest of all his symphonic poems. It begins with a figure which Franck uses in his D-minor symphony, and which Beethoven used in one of his sonatas, but which belongs to Wagner because he so gloriously employed it as the "Fate-Figure" in the Trilogy.

PROGRAM EXCELLENT.

But how grandly the themes follow after this! The theme of man in his strength, the love theme, the storm and stress figures buffeting the three-noted figure (C, B, E.) above mentioned, the pastoral effects gradually merging into the call to battle, the finale with man revealed in power and majesty, all these made the last number the chief number of the whole concert, even dwarfing D'Indy's excellent symphony.

If Beethoven and Wagner were represented by comparatively weak works, Liszt was present with the strongest of all his compositions, for we rank this as no evenly great than his "Faust Symphony."

M. Monteux certainly never had a better opportunity to show the stuff that is in him in such a program as this and he made full use of his opportunities. One might have demanded a little more of majesty in certain parts of "Les Preludes" and less of emphasized contrast, but he proved that he is growing fast in conductorship; his programs are excellent and his readings of high merit.

D'INDY'S NEW SYMPHONY

MUSIC OF HIS REACTIONS TO THE WAR

First Performance in America at the Symphony Concerts Tomorrow — The Course and the Quality of the Piece—Origins and Outcome—The Composer in Familiar and Unfamiliar Aspect

Trans. — Oct. 23, 1919.

SINCE d'Indy's third symphony, bearing the significant sub-title "Sinfonia brevis, de bello gallico," is to be played at the Symphony Concerts of this week for the first times in America, and not improbably for the only performances so far out of Paris, some hints of its method, style and contents may not inappropriately be given herewith.

The student of Vincent d'Indy's music is by this time aware that it presents an unusual and yet logical fusion of classic style and obvious modernity of expression. The plain chant of the Roman church, the essence of sixteenth century counterpoint, the fugue, canon and passacaglia of the eighteenth century, dramatic procedure from Monteverde to Wagner, the variation of Bach, Beethoven and César Franck, the salient features of sonata treatment from Beethoven to Franck, have each and all contributed distinctive elements to a style at once individual and original. This process of assimilation meets the inevitable test in that it has progressed far beyond mere imitation to genuine re-creation; not an echo, but a basis for new thought as well as advance in style. In d'Indy's case the influences of classicism has not been to restrict but to enlarge avenues of individual utterance by virtue of its intellectual breadth.

The study of d'Indy's third symphony reveals at once that it does not depart from the unalterable conviction of the composer's artistic maturity. It manifests the usual tokens of classicism, not the versatile and makeshift neo-classicism of Saint-Saëns, but that of a living and inevitable need, in which a symphony is still a normal and grateful medium for musical thought. It calls for the accepted instrumental forces of the modern symphonic orchestra with the exception of a high clarinet, a high trumpet (especially beloved of d'Indy and employed in many of his later works) and the specific requirement of a French military drum in addition to the usual snare drum. Its plan is that of the customary four movements, in which the substitute for a scherzo comes second and the slow movement third. Moreover, it contains no striking departure from the conventional structure of symphonic movements, yet within these limits the music is of a vital order of expression such as no living composer save d'Indy could have written.

As is frequently the case the first movement begins with an introduction, slow in tempo and tranquil in mood. After four measures of preluding strings a theme is heard in flutes and clarinets against a figure in the violoncellos. It passes to another key and instrumental combination, returns to its original tonality soon leading to the main body of the movement with a vigorous theme derived from the introductory phrase. Soon the normal "transition" appears, not derived from the first theme but in slower tempo and of a radically different character. To this succeeds in a "regular" key a noble and uplifting second theme sung first by the horns, and continued by the strings. Horn phrases and reminiscences of the "transitional" theme bring the "exposition" section of the movement to an end. The "development" is made up of transformations of the first theme, the transitional motive, and a new and expressive episode "Lent et Anxieux" indicative of conflict and strain. The "recapitulation" portion of the movement is unusual in that the development leads to the "restatement" of the "second theme" first in B major and then in the "home key" D major, followed by the phrases which closed the exposition. Then the first theme returns, and there is a short but brilliant peroration.

The second movement, of the slow scherzo type, opens with a playful theme in the strings, developed with inconspicuous yet palpably scholarly resources of canonic style, but spontaneous withal. At intervals a heavy rhythmical phrase interrupts the normal germination of the theme with evident descriptive intent. The trio contains a buoyant theme for horn, not unrelated in character to the reiterated melody for horns in the second movement of "A Summer Day in the Mountain." It is taken up by various instrumental combinations. Dissonant trumpet calls of warning bring back the first section, but the repetition is varied in many ways, especially by new canonic devices.

After a few introductory measures by wind instruments, the slow movement begins with a profoundly expressive and reflective theme in the strings, recalling the mood of "Evening" in "A Summer Day in the Mountain." A sharply rhythmical episode in the wood winds interrupts, but the earlier theme persists, accompanied by figures derived from the episode. After a varied development it returns in the divided strings against a waving arpeggio accompaniment, reaching an eloquent climax. There is a quiet and emotional close.

The finale opens with dissonant calls in horns and trumpets passing to the woodwind. The main theme appears in the full orchestra, showing some affinity with the theme of the slow movement. Much is made of a brilliant and majestic ascending figure in the strings, which after some development combined with phrases from the introduction leads directly to the second theme. A somewhat stormy development, involving both themes and figures from the introduction brings a "restatement" of the earlier section but with changes of tonality. An episode recalls the theme and mood of the slow movement. Then the second theme returns in victorious apotheosis given to trumpets and flutes accompanied by full orchestra leading to a triumphant close.

As a whole, the symphony while treated with a ripe scholarship totally free from pedantry, is less complex than the second symphony in B flat, first heard here under Mr. Gerlicke and later under the composer's baton. A comparison between the new work and its predecessor is perhaps inevitable. But such a summing-up is hardly possible, since the two works differ markedly in expressive purpose. D'Indy, a man of deep sentiment and a patriot before being an artist, a veteran of the Franco-Prussian war, was stirred in common with the rest of the civilized world by the barbarities of the recent war. This symphony, composed from 1916 to 1918, could not attain the detachment and the preoccupation with the problems of "absolute music" which characterized the second symphony finished fifteen years before. D'Indy must perforce be affected by the supreme trials and the heroic struggles of his country during its composition. While no "programme" is indicated, this symphony is obviously a record of strife, privations and ultimate triumph. It needs no written basis, no ticketing of episodes, or dramatic interpretation of themes or figures employed. D'Indy wrote from a full heart, and the form which best suited his need of utterance was the classic symphony. If in some respects a different D'Indy is mirrored therein, the symphony as a whole, and more particularly the slow movement, is a vital presentation of the reaction of the external world in music of commanding force and beauty. This work presents D'Indy from a new angle; one in which he can no longer be termed ascetic or cerebral, as some of his detractors have affirmed at times. It is rather a token of his keen moral and spiritual participation in the fortunes of his country.

EDWARD BURLINGAME HILL

D'Indy's New Symphony in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—Vincent d'Indy's third symphony, op. 70, bearing the legend "Sinfonia Brevis de Bello Gallico," which had its first hearing in America at the Friday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on October 24, is written from the heart of the man, nobly conceived and nobly expressed. Whether it follows modern French idiom, as we have come loosely to use the designation, whether it is classical or romantic, whether it follows the traditional symphonic form—these are questions of minor importance. The one transcendent consideration is whether or not this is an honest and convincing record of emotions aroused by the war tragedy. Has the writer succeeded in making his audience feel the things he felt, see the things he saw? And unquestionably he has—for those with imagination to feel and to see.

Imagination is required to grasp this music, for here is no boom! boom! of big guns, no tramp! tramp! of marching legions. There is no scene of actual combat; here is the record of a stay-at-home, but one who suffers no less keenly because he is not in the trenches.

It must be classified as program music, though the program be not the record of a clash of arms. Rather in this wise is its story told: An idealized France, tranquilly pursuing her daily round, startled by the German invasion, derisively regarding the goose-stepping army advancing, roused to the enthusiasm of mobilization. All this in the first movement, Lent et calme; Animé. An awakened France, stirred with joy and then foreboding, crushing down her fears, but bustling with ceaseless activity. This is the second movement, Assez vite. A subdued and suffering France, soberly resigned to the work in hand, but never fearing, and, though saddened, strong in courage. This is the third movement, Lent. Then comes the outburst for the victory, grand and heroic pæans, a France rejoicing with Gargantuan joy. This is the last movement, Très animé; Majestroux.

Thus is the story told by the observer, always in regular form, with no transgressing of the laws of harmony. The melodies are never pretty, there is no attempt to make them ingratiating, but they have a pungency that satisfyingly expresses their intent. As a summing up of France at war this symphony will live, a notable document.

The overture and ballet No. 5 from Beethoven's "Creatures of Prometheus" allowed incidental solo work by the new first cellist, Mr. Bedetti, the flutist, Mr. Laurent, the clarinetist, Mr. Sand, and the bassoonist, Mr. Laus. Mr. Bedetti made a marked impression because of his large but pleasing tone and his perfect intonation. "A Siegfried Idyll" brought back the name Wagner to the program for the first time since the war. The music was noticeably appreciated and warmly applauded. Liszt's "Les Préludes" completed the program.

WAR PIECE PLAYED BY SYMPHONY

D'Indy's Work Given For First Time in America

Post — Oct. 25/19
BY OLIN DOWNES

Vincent d'Indy's "short symphony concerning the Gallic war" ("Sinfonia brevis de bello Gallico") was played for the first time in America at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony.

19
Hall. The other compositions were the overture and the fifth number from Beethoven's ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus"; Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

SECOND MOVEMENT GOOD

D'Indy's symphony, composed in 1916-18 and performed for the first time at a concert of the Societe Nationale, Paris, in May, 1919, is in memory of the German invasion of France and the final triumph of the allied arms. The composer suggests first, in a very beautiful way, the calm of the French country-side. The Hunnish forces are then caricatured. There are martial themes for the French. There are four movements. The last is theatrical and triumphal in character. The third movement, the slow movement, of a lofty nature, leads d'Indy inevitably to thoughts of his master, Franck.

For us the second movement is the most interesting and sustained in its excellence, musically speaking, of the four. Much of the rest is piece-meal, full of transparent devices for effect, overworked sequences, tricks of instrumentation—a d'Indy, in short, miles below the d'Indy of the second symphony and the "Istar" variations, which are among the wonders of the modern musical art. Music for patriotic celebration is seldom valuable as music. There was warm applause, however, for this symphony.

Five Solo Parts

The overture appears to be the best part of the Prometheus music. The slow movement gave opportunity for instrumentalists of the orchestra, playing solo parts, to show their art. At the close of the serene and melodious piece Messrs. Laurent, flute; Sand, clarinet; Laus, bassoon; Holy, harp, and Bedetti, the admirable new 'cellist, bowed in response to applause.

The "Siegfried Idyl" is a little overlong, a little discursive. But it is exquisite poetry, and notwithstanding its undue length, music written with a master hand. It excites wonder every time it is heard. The interweaving of endless melody, the manner in which each musical idea puts forth fresh branches and tendrils and leaves, as it were, of its own is something found only in the scores of the supreme masters. The harmony is so fresh and beautiful; and different voices, meeting and crossing, form harmonies of which the spell is ever potent. Mr. Monteux made the most of this work of genius. He is the conductor, too, for such an extravagant and brilliant piece as the Liszt symphonic poem which brought the concert to a close.

D'INDY'S SYMPHONY WELL RENDERED

Beethoven's Music Gives Soloists a Chance

Liszt's Preludes Welcomed at the Orchestral Concert

Globe — Oct. 25/19

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the third concert of the season yesterday afternoon to an unusually interested and applauding audience. There was no outside soloist, but the fifth of the ballet numbers from Beethoven's "The Creatures of Prometheus" provided a chance for several members of the orchestra named on the program to display their skill and taste in solos.

The feature of the program which aroused most anticipation was O'Indy's new symphony, inspired by the war. Yesterday's performance was the first in America, and probably the first outside of Paris. Mr. Monteux and the orchestra got all there is to be gotten out of the music, yet the applause at the end was polite, rather than enthusiastic.

D'Indy has one fatal defect which outweighs his many virtues as a composer; he cannot write either a good melody or a motive which lends itself spontaneously to development.

The slow movement of this symphony with a different harmonization would be insufferably cheap. The development of the first movement is labored. The mood of Nov 11, 1918, is better expressed in the closing section of Liszt's "Preludes," also on this program, than by D'Indy's finale, which is "martial and animated" because he wanted it so, not because he couldn't help yelling and throwing up his hat.

Beethoven's "Prometheus" music is taken from an early and not very successful work. It shows flashes, but only flashes of the Beethoven of the "Coriolanus" overture. Nevertheless, Mr. Monteux is to be thanked for letting us hear the lesser as well as the greater Beethoven at the Symphony, where hearers sometimes tire of masterpieces by too frequent repetitions.

Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" was played with the delicacy and restraint the music demands, but too often fails to receive from conductors who interpret it as though Wagner were always "dramatic." This music was last played here by the Symphony at a concert before the war. Vigorous and prolonged applause which Mr. Monteux was obviously happy to have to acknowledge three times before proceeding with the rest of the program, greeted it yesterday. Liszt's "Les Preludes," the final number, is one of the best liked pieces in the repertory of the orchestra.

This program will be repeated tonight at 8. At the next concerts, Rachmaninoff will play his third concerto, and the orchestra will give an unfamiliar symphony by Haydn, called "The Queen of France," and Stravinsky's suite from the music "The Firebird."

SYMPHONY CONCERT

NEW SPIRIT BRINGS BACK OLD QUALITY

Mr. Monteux Restoring Interest, Standards, Prestige—His Abilities as Programme-Maker—A Happy Revival from Beethoven—Wagner Returns, and Liszt Profits Not by His Company—D'Indy's Music of the War Falls Far Below Expectation

THE range and the method of Mr. Monteux's programmes are restoring the standards and renewing the pleasures of the Symphony Concerts. He follows no formulas like the dear departed Rabaud with his German symphony as preface to a French or a Franco-Russian miscellany. He falls into no haphazard choices no convenient repetition of "stock-pieces," as Dr. Muck tended to do in his final years in Boston. If Mr. Monteux will include a piece by Beethoven in his miscellaneous numbers, he does not repeat the overture to "Egmont" or the overture, "Coriolanus," for the twentieth or the thirtieth time, but Prometheus as he did yesterday, or resurveys, as he soon will do, the overture to "King Stephen." Thereby he freshens his programme and freshens, no less, the interest of his hearers in Beethoven. Similarly, to Mr. Monteux Enesco does not imply repetition after repetition of a "Roumanian Rhapsody" or Haydn the semi-ready and too-familiar symphony that happens to lie at the top of the pile in the orchestra's library. A week ago the conductor restored Enesco's suite to the active repertory, a week hence he will return to a symphony by Haydn hitherto overlooked at the Symphony Concerts. No easy-going man, comfortable in routine is the new conductor.

At Mr. Monteux's will novel pieces are regaining old place upon the programmes. In the first pair of concerts he included Albeniz's fragment, "Catalonia." Yesterday, day, d'Indy's "Short Symphony About the War of the French" was heard for the first time in America. The concerts of next Friday and Saturday will bring a new concerto for piano by Rakhmaninov and the suite drawn from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fire-Bird," music of sensuous beauty and pictorial imagery. To cite these items is to indicate the range of the new conductor's reading, interest, knowledge, to suggest his catholicity of mind and taste. In particular these qualities and inclinations stood clear when side by side on the programme of Friday afternoon, he set the new symphony by d'Indy and Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," the first music of the German composer to be heard at the Symphony Concerts in two seasons. On many an occasion in recent years d'Indy has been more virulent than just in his opinion of German music. Wagner in his day spoke and printed much folly about the French. Both Wagner and d'Indy, however, have written music deserving recurring place in the Symphony Concerts. Back accordingly they both come—and ironically in one and the same programme—after more or less superfluous "banning," and to the obvious pleasure of the listening and applauding audience. Now to do these things as Mr. Monteux is doing them, is not only to prove the mettle of the new conductor but to restore the quality and the prestige of the concerts themselves.

69

Similarly with Mr. Monteux's work upon and with the orchestra. He has not yet made it the sensitive and plastic instrument at every turn with any and all music that it should ideally be, that in its best years of a recent past it has actually been. Of course Mr. Monteux is ambitious of such perfection, but as obviously he has not yet had the time in which to achieve it. In a month of rehearsals and concert the conductor has inclined over much to large, square-cut, firmly moving body of vision of Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," a fortnight ago and of Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," there is no doubting his mind and his ear for pliancy of pattern and tone, for apt transitions and adroit euphonies, for artful and imaginative shadings of progress and color. A little lighter hand, a little more plasticity with Wagner's endlessly blossoming music and the playing of the "Siegfried Idyl" yesterday would have been as finely touched as that of Debussy's prelude. In Enesco's suite, in Albeniz's music, in Beethoven's overture to "Prometheus," in d'Indy's symphony, Mr. Monteux has abundantly proved his lively ear and quick hand for rhythm. Out of many another piece stands his regard for the largely moulded phrase. He is dramatizing conductor, as in Franck's tone-poem of "The Wild Huntsman"; he is conductor who feels and releases the romantic rhetoric of music, as yesterday in Liszt's symphonic poem, "Preludes"; he is conductor, as in Schumann's symphony of the spring, who deepens the beauty and swells the ardors of instrumental song. Not yet has he missed the intrinsic quality of any piece upon his programmes or failed to find the revealing and the characterizing pace.

Sollicitous over his music, Mr. Monteux is not less solicitous over the voices of the orchestra. He is at endless pains with them until they give him back the quality of tone, the animating accent that he asks. Individually not a few of those voices are the best that the orchestra has known in recent years. In the slow movement from "Prometheus," yesterday, Mr. Bedetti at the violoncello, Mr. Laurent at the flute, Mr. Sand at the clarinet, Mr. Laus at the bassoon, Mr. Holy at the harp, so disclosed new virtue or affirmed old, with Mr. Wendler, wherever he might, in company with them at the first horn. The wood-wind choir of the orchestra is a little company of masters. The string choir advances in brightness, richness, plasticity of tone. Sundry changes have bettered the brass. The orchestra is again an instrument to stir a conductor's ambition, an audience's pride. And the outcome? The Symphony Concerts, after a year of partial eclipse, are bright again with interest and pleasure for audiences. With return to old standards comes back old prestige.

The "standard repertory," as it now is, provided two of the pieces upon the programme of yesterday—Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and Liszt's tone-poem, "Preludes"; while the "standard repertory," as it used to be, afforded the overture to Beethoven's ballet, "The Brood of Prometheus" and a slow movement from the succeeding dances. It was a happy notion of Mr. Monteux to restore to the concerts this music of Beethoven, light-minded, light-handed, fanciful, graceful. The snapping chords, the running figures, the playful turns, the flowing animation of the overture sound as fresh today in a hall in Boston as they did in a theatre of Vienna a hundred odd years ago and are now, probably, far more brightly played. As programmes usually run, this Beethoven of dexterity and charm we of 1919 may know only from the concerto for violin. Here in these fragments of "Prometheus" is music of equal delight to the sensuous and the fanciful ear. The overture is winged with light and fertile ardor; the slow movement spins itself from solo instrument to solo instrument in long unfolding line, inviting the grace of pose, the instant languor of motion that, presumably, the dancers brought to it. Musical and pictorial imagination now through it and for once Beethoven stays within the prescribed, the accepted frame.

A well-tempered audience, as Bach labelled his clavichord, happily took the "Siegfried Idyl" as a matter of course. If any were displeased at the return of Wagner to "these concerts," they politely hid their chagrins. If any were overjoyed, they did not swell the applause for music and performance beyond desert, even if the upper balcony renewed it when it was about to subside. Wagner, like any other eminent composer of symphonic music has just place in the repertory of the Symphony Orchestra. Wagner's music to many ears yields large and keen pleasure. The war was the war and the necessary or assumed inhibitions are past. The pleasures of the present, new or renewed, beckon. And the Wagner of this "Siegfried Idyl" is almost as strange to the concert-hall as the Beethoven of "Prometheus"—a Wagner of musing mood, gentle impulse, intimate affection, finding voice in the speech and the imagery of tones. Not a little of his music is a lush garden; as much of it may be likened to a vast and sombre forest. Here in the "Siegfried Idyl" is his bed of little flowers of tonal fancy, blossoming in fresh measure upon fresh measure in quickening warmth of invention and ingenuity. Or to shift the figure, elsewhere Wagner wrote his epics and legends. Here is his lyric verse. Once more, the range, the readiness of the man. The Liszt of "Preludes" fares none too well in such company. He is manifestly "addressing" his audience and rhetorical is his tonal speech. His romantic moods of "love in enchanted daybreak," or "on nature's bosom," or "mid the trumpets loud clangor" are so obviously "effective" in the contrasting progress of the music from naked simplicities to furbelowed pomps. Yet to this day, the "effects" stir the average hearer and Liszt lasts.

Doubtless many an instructed hearer expected too much of d'Indy's symphony of the war, since memory summoned the composer's "Istar," his "Summer Day in the Mountain," his two earlier symphonies—a signal and enduring music in kind and quality—to what anticipation of great things. When the piece was done, doubtless as many hearers sought to find excuse for their disappointment. D'Indy is in the sixty-eight year of a life in which he has spared neither mind nor body nor spirit. Perhaps, at last, sterility and routine, the unconscious acceptance of the easiest way, are creeping into his music. Quite as probably, the images, the emotions that the war stirred in him, as he reacted to it, as he watched the reactions of his countrymen, evaded, balked him when he would transmute them into tones.

Many measures designed to be eloquent, born of deep mood and memory, come to little once they are set upon music-paper and heard from the orchestra. The martial tumult of the end of the first movement sounds theatrical to a fault; the listener hears and sees, not the French armies departing to battle, but the military bustle of the stage. Hostile and cynical reviewers in Paris have consigned the final apotheosis, when Victory—in a high trumpet—flies over the surging troops of France, to some spectacle of the screen. The glow of harmonic and instrumental music upon the third movement glimmers music that intrinsically falls short of the implied mood of lofty devotion, faith, resolution: while a singular intermezzo in another vein bafflingly interrupts it. ~~And~~ again in the progress of the symphony, the invention and the imagination of a dandy as technician, rather than musician or emotional vitality, sustain the interest of the hearer. Page after page, zealously as Mr. Monteux and the orchestra plied their pains, suggests music missing its goal, a design fallen far short of accomplishment, a symphony manqué—and the usual recourse to routine and artifice. To more than one ear, only out of the beginning—picturing the calm and peace of France when war breaks upon it—speaks the expected d'Indy of exalted imagination and utterance; while once and again in the scherzo returns the d'Indy of fine ardors. Far too much of the rest is relative silence. But these are the impressions of a single hearing. A second may correct or dispel.

H. T. PARKER

BOSTON ORCHESTRA'S TRIP

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make the first trip of the season during the week of November 2, giving its regular concerts in Philadelphia, November 3; in Washington, November 4; in Baltimore, November 5; in New York, November 6; in Brooklyn, November 7; in New York, November 8. Mr. Rachmaninoff will appear as soloist in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn.

SYMPHONY MUSIC HARD TO RECORD

To the general musical public probably the most important improvement of recent times has been the reproduction of the music of an entire modern symphony orchestra. This has been a matter of great difficulty, and the first records of the kind—those of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—were not issued until many special difficulties had been overcome. The great difficulty in recording orchestral music has been in getting a proper balance between the different instruments and the different groups of instruments. There are many records of symphonic music to be had, but those of the Boston Symphony Orchestra appear to have been the first in which an entire modern orchestra of approximately a hundred men is employed.

Those who know and love the symphony orchestra, and have studied its development from the days when Mozart wrote the G minor Symphony with a beggarly array of woodwind and brass, will not be surprised to learn of the difficulty of securing an adequate balance between woodwind, brass, strings and percussion in reproducing orchestral music; and this difficulty was greatly augmented by the characteristics peculiar to sound reproduction. Short, rapid vibrations awaken a more intense response in the diaphragm than long, slow ones. Hence instruments playing the higher notes of their register record with more ease than low-pitched sounds. Thus the bass instruments of the orchestra recorded with less volume than the higher-pitched ones. But this difficulty was gradually overcome in the Victor laboratory.

Frank

Again the Frenchman's War-Time Symphony in Renewed Impression of Failure

ONLY in the disclosing and the clarifying of details in workmanship did a second hearing, on Saturday evening, of Mr. d'Indy's war-time symphony better the impression of the first. Among certain musicians hereabouts there is almost a d'Indy cult, yet even his most loyal devotees, disappointed as they admit themselves to be in the quality of the piece, do not reproach the performance. Few have perused the score; only in Paris and at a single concert, has the symphony previously been played; comparisons are obviously impossible, but to practised and exacting hearers Mr. Monteux and his orchestra seemed nowhere to cloud the music. Rather, they illuminated and enforced it. To their intelligence and pains, the listening ear and mind owed the discovery of many a detail of modulation, transition, inflection, timbres and harmony in which Mr. d'Indy is hardly less imaginative and expert than in his prime of "A Summer Day in the Mountain" and the second symphony. As soon as the score, for orchestra or for piano, is generally accessible, students of composition will con this "Sinfonia Brevis de Bello Gallico" with recurring interest and profit; while, so far as craftsmanship went, the connoisseur of contemporary symphonic music was rewarded hardly less often as he listened on Friday and Saturday. Scarcely a composer of our time possesses Mr. d'Indy's readiness and resource with the formal structure of a symphony, sustaining it from first measure to last yet bending and binding it to whatever emotion, pictorial suggestion or illusion he would compass. Not many more enjoy his range of invention and imagination in significant and individual harmonic and instrumental color. True, it has narrowed in this war-time symphony—or the composer has of purpose restrained it—but enough remains, as a youthful neighbor said, to "intrigue" the ear.

These, however, are the curiosities and the pleasures of the sophisticated with Mr. d'Indy's newest music. The audiences sitting before it on Friday and Saturday in Symphony Hall, tried it rather by the instant satisfactions that it yielded, the emotion it evoked, the illusions it worked. In these respects the war-time symphony fell far short both of kindled expectation and measured achievement. Where was the d'Indy who these many years has hated the commonplace with a righteous hatred, when in the finale he sets his brass choir scaling tonal heavens while the rest of the petitiously in massed Hebrew manuscript, the orchestra of Noah's approach to land, but the audience applauded. The musical sound is the shrieking trumpets, the elation rings not and heart of many was the d'Indy's foe to mediocrity set to music-paper the martial tumults, nt? The disillusioned of France "pricking supers" of an opera their job. Mr. d'Indy ed the march, "Sam- to be heard without soldiery move to it. hind. Or, perchance, some wan and wintry called French troops. s to the faint, distant of "Madelon." True mon, even a vulgar ment and habit Mr. visionary. Yet, for homely touch reflects sound, spirit of the the commonplaces of beginning and end across the operation of France to their warms into emotion: conductor the glory the introduction pic-day was their play- rance before the warm, "Preludes." Not cherzo with note of nteux been conduc- ayety, as in the ex- when he sets to this and entreating hearts showy and "effec- interest and spirit t, there are reiterated measures of scholar- an. The preluding space, Brahms-like, as Liszt would have s imagination shall lianate, opertice, al- sed as though by a hough Pavlova were d'Indyan beauty of ice upon a time she The scherzo, inter- ensuous richness of uch music qua music, le ardors of warlike pastoral tune etched w movement holds for he finale fled clan- dy nobler voice and ustibly. The hack- Then comes the baff- together fantastic, as its imagery and elo- and second hearing. ion heard, felt, be- ood; and last a clear nantic torrent, the tier exaltation into an sztian day and tem- ment more to be ex- s away. Rarely did or American pen. No heatre; yet of the ould inform the sym- s symphonic music, mental and spiritual "Dante," "Faust" gress of the war; but amed it tone-poem. seems infuse into it For many a year s, as he shared them. Monteux can play Now, the individual- a and audience both y d'Indy is not fortu- ch has played him. s than one—with the late of Boston, in said

a certain instrumen will and testament presented to said Co

same should not be s is hereby directed to publishing this citat three successive wee Transcript, a newspa
the last publication to said Court, and by m ing a copy of this ci interested in the esta
fore said Court. W
Esquire, Judge of sai of October in the year and nineteen.

ARTHUR

COMMONWEALTH SUFFOLK, SS.

persons interested in of FLORENCE A. S in said county, decea has been presented
L. HART, of Winc
Middlesex, and HAR line, in the County of or some other suita trustees under the w has been proven are hereby cited to a to be held at Boston, I on the thirtieth day
ten o'clock in the fo
any you have, why granted. And said serve this citation by in each week, for thr
Boston Evening Tran lished in said Boston,
one day at least befor
ing, postpaid, a cop interested in said tr
before said Court. W Esquire, Judge of s day of October, in th hundred and nineteen.

ARTHUR

COMMONWEALTH SUFFOLK, SS.

devisees, legatees, an ested in the estate of late of Boston, in said
Whereas, a petition h
Court to grant a lett
the will annexed, on t not already admin WEILER, of Brooklin folk, or some other hereby cited to appea be held at Boston, in the thirtieth day of ten o'clock in the fo
any you have, why granted. And said pe to give public notice citation once in each weeks, in the Boston newspaper published publication to be one Court, and by mailin
a copy of this citation tees named in said wi
fore said Court. W
Esquire, Judge of said of October, in the yea
dred and nineteen.

ARTHUR

COMMONWEALTH MIDDLESEX, SS.

the heirs-at-law, next orchestra moves repetitiously in massed chords? In an obscure Hebrew manuscript, it is recorded that the orchestra of Noah's ark so celebrated the approach to land, but that only Japhet in the audience applauded. Pompous and ponderous musical sound is this background to the shrieking trumpets, but the note of victorious elation rings not out of it into the mind and heart of many a hearer. Where again was the d'Indy who has been invincible foe to mediocrity and routine when he set to music-paper the military march, the martial tumults, of the first movement? The disillusioned eye saw not the armies of France "pricking to the field," but the "supers" of an opera house vigorously on their job. Mr. d'Indy might have remembered the march, "Sambre et Meuse," not to be heard without emotion when French soldiery move to it. His own sags far behind. Or, perchance, his ear, awakened in some wan and wintry dawn, might have recalled French troops, padding along asphalt to the faint, distant semi-glorified hum of "Madelon." True "Madelon" was a common, even a vulgar song, and by temperament and habit Mr. d'Indy is intellectual, visionary. Yet, for some ears, such an homely touch reflects more of the right sound, spirit of the "Gallic War" than the commonplaces of military music at both beginning and end of the symphony. Not across the operatic stage went the soldiers of France to their fighting.

Where the music warms into emotion conductor the glory and illusion, as in the introduction picture-day was their play-turing the peace of France before the warm, "Preludes." Not bursts, as in the scherzo with note of Montoux been conducted when he sets to this altation of devoted and entreating hearts showy and "effective interest and spirit in the third movement, there are reiterated sequences, calculated measures of scholarship, filling time and space, Brahms-like, until the composer's imagination shall spark again. Even so, the beginning yields a grave and d'Indyan beauty of mood, picture, voice. The scherzo, interesting, artful as so much music qua music, sounds with the fine ardors of warlike France; while the slow movement holds for a while to Mr. d'Indy nobler voice and austerer handiwork. Then comes the baffling intermezzo, altogether fantastic, as its imagery and eloquence heard, felt, beset at both first and second hearing, in rhythm, color, mood; and last a clear, mantic torrent, the decline from the earlier exaltation into an easier level of sentiment more to be expected from German or American pen. No doubt Mr. d'Indy would inform the symphony with his own mental and spiritual reactions to the progress of the war; but he would also as it seems infuse into it the common emotions, as he shared them of his countrymen. Now, the individualistic, the semi-solitary d'Indy is not fortunate—in more senses than one—with the multitude.

sibly, the "Sinfonia" is the failure in and Saturday. It enture to be. True, his seventeenth year, in the music of themselves than of an alien task. The characteristic and cert-hall or theatre in the Mountain," any, of the opera, retrospective, lofty, er there was music f-absorbed, even a d and heart, it is prime. Mr d'Indy in the war kindled devotion, every beat high, beat his war-time self a symphony, he orthilly, even if he est heights. He is e introduction, the of the slow move-asic. It is when he the multitudinous id common vision, last divisions, that nalities of military is." The common lon and speech are

For many a year, Montoux can play a and audience both ach has played him.

late of Boston
a certain will and presented the same should is hereby publishing three successive Transcript, E.

the last published said Court, he ing a copy interested in fore said
Esquire, Judge
of October
and nineteen

COMMONWEALTH OF SUFFOLK persons interested of FLORENCE in said Court has been
L. HART, of Middlesex, line, in the or some of trustees under has been are hereby to be held on the thirty ten o'clock
any you have granted. As serve this in each week
Boston Evening
lished in said one day at ing, postpaid
interested in before said
Esquire, Judge day of October hundred and

COMMONWEALTH OF SUFFOLK
devises, legat
ested in the late of Boston
Whereas, a Court to grant the will annexed not already WEILER, of folk, or some hereby cited be held at the thirtieth
ten o'clock
any you have granted. And to give public citation once weeks, in the newspaper publication in Court, and a copy of the tees named fore said
Esquire, Judge
of October,
dred and nine

COMMONWEALTH OF MIDDLESEX
the heirs-at-l

sons interested in the estate CREHORE late of Newton ceased: Whereas, certain to be the last will and test of said deceased have been Court for Probate, by F.
CREHORE, who prays that may be issued to her, named, without giving a bond: You are hereby cited Court, to be held at County of Middlesex, on the ber, A. D. 1919, at nine o'clock to show cause, if any you should not be granted.
hereby directed to give public publishing this citation on three successive weeks, in Transcript, a newspaper
last publication to be one said Court, and by mailing ing a copy of this citation interested in the estate, said fore said Court. Witness, TIRE, Esquire, First Judge twenty-fifth day of October and nine hundred and nine F. o 25, 27, 1919

COMMONWEALTH OF SUFFOLK, SS. PROB.
PALMIRA F. M. STAGNA County, has presented to praying that her name may PALMIRA F. M. DE AME therein set forth: All persons appear at a Probate Court in said County of Suffolk, October, A. D. 1919, at ten noon, to show cause, if any same should not be granted is hereby directed to give public publishing this citation on
three successive weeks, in Transcript, a newspaper
last publication to be one day Court. Witness, ROBERT Judge of said Court, this day in the year one thousand nineteen. ARTHUR W. o 18, 20, 1919

NOTICE IS HEREBY
scribe has been duly
the will of GEORGE M. E.
land, in the State of Ohio, has taken upon herself that as the law directs. All persons upon the estate of said deceased exhibit the same, and all persons estate are called upon to make MABEL E. c/o FRIEDMAN
30 State
Boston, Oct. 23, 1919.

Legal Notice

TO THE HONORABLE THE PROBATE COURT OF THE COUNTY OF NORFOLK:
Respectfully represents V. A. of Dedham, in said County O'LEARY, his wife, that of twenty-one years or upwards of adopting JOSEPH A. GRIFFIN in the County of Suffolk, GRIFFIN ANDERSON of Boston, in the
and MARGARET ANDERSON said child was born in the seventh day of August, A. D. parents have suffered said child as a pauper by the City of Boston for more than two years date of this petition, namely, on on which said date said child the care and custody of the Children of the City of Boston; and are of sufficient ability to and furnish him with suitable education: Wherefore they pray

For that reason, possibly, the "Sinfonia Brevis de Bello Gallico" is the failure in kind that on Friday and Saturday, it seemed beyond peradventure to be. True, Mr. d'Indy is nearing his seventieth year, but there is less hint in the music of powers waning in themselves than of powers reluctant to an alien task. The d'Indy of his most characteristic and significant music in concert-hall or theatre—of "A Summer Day in the Mountain," of the second symphony, of the opera, "The Stranger"—is introspective, lofty, remote, austere. If ever there was music of an individual, a self-absorbed, even a too self-conscious mind and heart, it is these pieces of his prime. Mr d'Indy was of those in whom the war kindled exaltation. Resolution, devotion, every emotion and sensation beat high, beat often nobly. Expressing his war-time self—and nothing else—in a symphony, he might have written worthily, even if he did not gain his farthest heights. He is well upon them in the introduction, the scherzo, the beginning of the slow movement of the present music. It is when he forsakes himself for the multitudinous mood, the general and common vision, as in the first and the last divisions, that he succumbs to the banalities of military march and "apotheosis." The common lot and temper, sensation and speech are not for him.

For orchestra and conductor the glory of the concert on Saturday was their playing of Liszt's tone-poem, "Preludes." Not for nothing has Mr. Monteux been conductor of the opera house when he sets to this romantic, rhetorical, showy and "effective" music; while his interest and spirit fired his forces to a man. The preluding sounded as portentous as Liszt would have it. The slow song, Italianate, opertice, almost erotic, was phrased as though by a single voice, moved as though Pavlova were posturing to it—and once upon a time she did; was drenched in sensuous richness of color. The succeeding pastoral tune etched itself upon the ear. The finale fled clangor upon clangor in exhaustibly. The hackneyed music renewed its imagery and eloquence. Ear and emotion heard, felt, believed again. The romantic torrent, the rhetorical flood of the Lisztian day and temperament drowned cross away. Rarely did Liszt write for the theatre; yet of the theatre is nearly all his symphonic music, whether he labelled it "Dante," "Faust" or "Saint Elizabeth," named it tone-poem, oratorio or even mass. For many a year man of theatre also, Mr. Monteux can play this Liszt, with orchestra and audience both stirred—even after a Much has played him.

—

74

4 - 1

75

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1919--20

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

FOURTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 31, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 1, AT 8 P. M.

HAYDN,

SYMPHONY in B flat major, "La Reine de France"
(B. and H. No. 85)

- I. Adagio; Vivace
- II. Romanze: Allegretto
- III. Menuetto; Allegretto
- IV. Finale: Presto

(First time at these Concerts.)

RACHMANINOFF.

CONCERTO for Pianoforte with Orchestra in D minor. No. 3, op. 30

- I. Allegro ma non tanto
- II. Intermezzo: Adagio
- III. Finale

(First time in Boston)

STRAVINSKY

SUITE from "L'Oiseau de Feu." (The Bird of Fire)
A Danced Legend

- I. Introduction: Jardin enchanté de Kastcheï et danse de l'oiseau de feu, (Kastcheï's Enchanted Garden & Dance of the Bird of Fire)
- II. Supplications de l'oiseau de feu
- III. Jeu des princesses avec les pommes d'or, (The Princesses play with Golden Apples)
- IIIa. Berceuse, (Lullaby)
- IV. Ronde des Princesses, (The Princesses dance in a circle)
- V. Danse infernale de tous les sujets de Kastcheï. (Diabolical Dance by all the Subjects of Kastcheï)

[First time at these Concerts]

Soloist:

RACHMANINOFF

Steinway Pianoforte used

Drawn for The Christian Science Monitor from photograph by Eide

Sergei Rachmaninoff

RACHMANINOFF WILDLY CHEERED

Herald—Nov. 1, 1919

Pianist in Impressive Performance at Fourth Symphony Concert

"QUEEN OF FRANCE" BY HAYDN SCORES

By PHILIP HALE

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Haydn, Symphony, "The Queen of France" (first time at these concerts); Rachmaninoff, Concerto No. 3 for piano and orchestra (first time in Boston); Stravinski, Suite from the ballet "The Fire-Bird" (first time at these concerts). Mr. Rachmaninoff was the pianist.

It is a surprising fact that this orchestra played Haydn's Symphony for the first time; nor have we been able to find the record of performance by any orchestra in Boston at a public concert. Haydn's Symphonies were heard here often in the last years of the 18th century, and it is more than probable that "The Queen of France" was one of them; but there is no means of identifying any one of these Symphonies, for they were entered on the program as "Grand Symphony," "Overture" or "Full Piece."

Buelow once spoke of "The Queen of France" as "a miniature symphony to be performed in a miniature room by a miniature orchestra," and he referred sarcastically to a performance of it by "60 fiddlers and six tooters." Now Haydn wrote "The Queen of France" for Paris, a city that was accustomed to large orchestras. He wrote it for the "Concert de la Logé Olympique," a society that replaced the "Concert des Amateurs," and this orchestra numbered 40 fiddles, 12 violoncellos, eight double-basses, and the usual number of wind instruments. It is not likely that "The Queen of France" was first performed by a little orchestra.

Yesterday the string section was somewhat reduced and the wood-wind was doubled. Would the symphony seem fresher, more sparkling, if it were performed in a little hall by small orchestra? We doubt it. As it was played yesterday the first movement and the trio of the Minuet gave special pleasure. The variations on the pretty French song of old time do no stray so far from the theme itself as to relieve the movement from the reproach of monotony.

Mr. Rachmaninoff played his third concerto 10 years ago in New York. The performance was the first one. The prevailing mood of the music is one of sadness, a melancholy now subdued, now defiant; hardly relieved until the final outburst of hope, joy, what-you-will, by capricious episodes, as if one forced oneself to take a more sanguine view of life and then sank back, resigned to fate, or rebellious. The first movement is the most imaginative, the most impressive. We know of few first movements, if any, in the repertoire that equal it. The attention of the hearer is at once riveted; the mood is at once established. Low mutterings as of "the complaining millions of men" under a leaden sky; the sadness of it; the thought of a brooding, sinister Fate, not quite ready to deal the final blow—thus this music may be characterized without extravagance, without any laborious attempt at fine writing. The intermezzo, while it is interesting, often poetic, falls below this Allegro. Nor is the Finale, in spite of the exciting moments, the contrasting episodes and the thrilling apotheosis, equal in musical and psychological importance or in technical construction to this constantly sustained, firmly knit, inevitable first movement. Yet the two last movements in another concerto would make their irresistible way. It would be a pleasure to speak at length of the workmanship displayed, of the character of the melodic and harmonic schemes, of the skilful orchestration. The performance by the pianist was a remarkable one, remarkable even for Mr. Rachmaninoff. The pianist and the composer were one and the same being. Thoughtful, imaginative, brilliant as this performance was, the virtuoso did not allow one to forget the music or regard it as merely an opportunity for the display of the pianist. The orchestra played as if inspired, with even more than its customary elasticity, tonal strength and beauty in solo passages and in ensemble. The great audience recalled Mr. Rachmaninoff again and again. Seldom has a pianist received so flattering a tribute in Symphony Hall.

There will be no Rehearsal and Concert next week

Information in the program book about first performances of Stravinski's works was gained from contemporary French and English journals, and from supposedly authoritative annals. Yet, in some instances, this information is inaccurate. Thus there was a performance of "The Fire-Bird" in London, led by Mr. Monteux, before Rhene-Baton conducted it. Mr. Monteux also conducted the first performance of "Petrouchka" in Paris, and the first performance of the opera "Le Rossignol" at the Paris Opera. How the contemporary journals could be so mistaken is not easily comprehended.

The performance of the suite from "The Fire-Bird" brought pleasant recollections of the ballet. To anyone that has seen this ballet, the music in concert form, however detachable it is, is less significant. On the other hand, seeing a ballet, one necessarily too often disregards the music. In this Suite the sport, the fascinating dance of the Princesses, and the charming Lullaby—which, by the way, Mr. Monteux interpolated—are the most effective as concert music. The "Danse Infernale," away from the stage, suffers the most severely of all the movements. The performance of the Suite was exceedingly brilliant.

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concerts next week. The program of Nov. 7, 8 is as follows: Berlioz, Symphony "Harold in Italy" (Mr. Denayer, solo viola); Chadwick, "The Angel of Death," Symphonic poem (first time here); Chabrier-Mottl, Bourree Fantasque. Mme. Povla Friish will sing an air from Franck's "Redemption" and these songs with orchestra: Duparc, Invitation au Voyage; Moussorgsky, Hopak; Bloch, Psalms 127 and 114.

WARM GREETING TO RACHMANINOFF

4th — Nov. 1, 1919
Composer Assists in Own
Work at the Symphony

Stravinsky's "Fire Bird" Suite Given Admirable Interpretation

Rachmaninoff deserved the almost unprecedented applause which greeted his playing of his own Third Concerto at yesterday's Symphony concert. He not merely surmounted with ease the immense technical difficulties of the music. He proved once more that he is both a great composer and a great pianist.

This concerto is as a whole the finest work of his yet played in Boston. The first movement, especially, has all the brooding intensity which makes the opening section of his "Isle of the Dead" among the most powerful of modern compositions.

It is restrained throughout, with none of the Tschalkowsky-like outbursts of bombast which mar the latter half of that tone poem, and with no lapses into sentimentality. The whole concerto, though the later movements are not on as consistently high a level as the first, is certainly among the best ever written. It should be oftener heard, though there are few living pianists who could play it and not one who could equal the composer's own performance.

Stravinsky's Suite from "The Fire-Bird," the other significant novelty on yesterday's program, sounded pale and tame after the magnificent concerto. It suffers somewhat in the concert hall from the absence of the Russian Ballet, for which the music was originally written. Stravinsky manipulates his orchestra deftly and adroitly to secure the effects he desires.

His music has a firm texture, with no ragged spots where his skill forsakes him. It is often bizarre and freakish, but never more so than the danced legend for which it is composed demands.

No wonder that younger composers nowadays are dazzled by his work as they were fascinated not long since by Debussy's. But he is only a clever and whimsical miniaturist compared with the Rachmaninoff of the Allegro ma non tanto of the Third Concerto.

Stravinsky, or at least the earlier Stravinsky of "The Fire-Bird," no longer sounds ultra modern to ears attuned to the later work of Ravel and Scriabin. Mr. Monteux, who has conducted performances of this music with the Ballet Russe in both London and Paris, gives an altogether admirable interpretation of it.

It is certainly surprising that Haydn's Symphony in B flat major, called "The Queen of France," should have been performed yesterday for the first time in Boston as far as available records show. One wonders how many more equally delightful works by that indefatigable symphonist lie buried in the complete editions.

The slow movement with a beautiful theme taken from an old French Romance and the spirited and playful finale have a delicacy and grace which one commonly associates with Mozart rather than with Haydn.

The performance was mellifluous rather than finely shaded. It was never dull or lifeless, but it missed some of the finer nuances of the music. Haydn in this symphony has turned courtier, but Mr. Monteux sometimes let him remain a peasant. Rabaud's virtues would have suited this music, as those of Monteux suit Rachmaninoff's and Stravinsky's.

There are no concerts next week. The program for Nov. 14 and 15 includes Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" symphony, songs for Mme. Friish and unfamiliar numbers by Chadwick and Chabrier. This week's program will be repeated tonight.

MASTER OF PIANO WITH SYMPHONY

Post — Nov. 1, 1919
Rachmaninoff Plays
Own 3d Concerto
First Time Here

BY OLIN DOWNES

From the standpoint of the great majority, the dominating feature of the Boston Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon was the performance by the great Russian composer and virtuoso, Sergei Rachmaninoff, of his own concerto for piano and orchestra in D minor. This is the third of Mr. Rachmaninoff's piano concertos. It has been recently revised by him. His performance was a tremendous triumph. Seldom, at concerts where the audiences are normally very enthusiastic and appreciative to the point of being uncritical, has a virtuoso been given a warmer reception.

SPLENDID PIANO PART

After saying these things it may easily appear crabbed or arrogant of a reviewer to state that in his opinion the music itself is very poor stuff. But that is the case. To the best of the writer's knowledge and conviction this is the poorest of the three concertos which Mr. Rachmaninoff has written for the piano. The reason it seems to him poor is that in the first place it is very long and diffuse. Secondly, most of the ideas seem to lack strong individuality. Thirdly the form is so extended that at a first hearing anyway the music drops apart in places. Idea No. 1 does not develop and lead to Idea No. 2, and so on to the end. There is much repetition, but by no means a great deal of real growth of musical thoughts and real putting together of a strong musical structure.

Of course there is a splendidly written piano part, provided you are a pianist with the strength, technic and musical authority of Mr. Rachmaninoff, and this piano part was superbly played by the composer. And there are certain effects as characteristic of certain aspects of Mr. Rachmaninoff's music as certain melodies are characteristic of Puccini. They always bring their result—frantic applause. These effects are, for example, low, dark, rich harmonies in the strings, with a solo horn sounding through; or brilliant, sweeping climaxes when the orchestra suddenly blazes out in tonal splendor; strong, persistent march rhythms, melodies of a melting, Slavic, melancholy cast; episodes for brass and wood wind, rather reminding of Tschalkowsky.

Now these things sound splendidly, and if you have not heard them before they make a great impression. But in this concerto, at least, these effects are neither new nor exceptionally inspired, and those familiar with even a few of Mr. Rachmaninoff's finest compositions can hardly by any stretch of the imagination rank this third concerto, heard for the first time at the Boston Symphony concerts, with the wonderful tone-poem, "The Isle of the Dead," or a lesser work, the second symphony, or even the second piano concerto, which, on the whole, appears to be a better knit and more concise work.

Mr. Rachmaninoff seems to us in his compositions to err, as a rule, on the side of over-length. This is not because he is pretentious, but because he is sincere. He has such sincerity, such conviction and absorption in what he is doing that he is probably incapable of a completely objective criticism of his own work. His shortcomings, as we believe them to be, are always those of a deeply earnest and talented man. In addition to this, he is a very commanding figure on the stage—tremendously tall, quiet in manner but powerful in aspect, with a head and a body which suggest at once prehistoric force and frame and modern intellectuality. He has personality and magnetism to a very exceptional degree, and a very different order of magnetism than that of the half-feminized, long-haired type of artist.

Triumph of Personality

It is a credit to the public of today that so simple, sincere and genuinely distinctive an individuality as Mr. Rachmaninoff should impress us all so much. He is a great musician, and if his intimates did not bear witness to it one would know him to be a great man. But sometimes a man is great in himself, and sometimes he is great in his music. Sometimes, but not always, both go together. This concerto begins very well indeed with the announcement by the piano of a theme in the nature of Russian folk-song. It ends, after a finale interminably long and full of repetitions, with a very exciting and effective crescendo. The triumph of yesterday afternoon, coldly analyzed, was not the triumph of a great piece of music. It was the triumph of a great musical personality.

The other music on the programme was a symphony by Franz Joseph Haydn, nicknamed "La Reine de France" from the unsubstantiated supposition that this symphony was a favorite of Queen Marie Antoinette. This symphony does not appear to have been played before at these concerts. It is perfectly charming; just as formal as most of Haydn's symphonies, with a fine vigorous allegro, a slow movement, not too slow, with a happy little theme; a minuet with humor and gusto in it, and a rapid, gossipy finale. It was played in the most admirable manner, with the most exemplary spirit and enphony, from the Danced Story, "The Fire-Bird" ("Oiseau de Feu").

Brilliant Theatre Music

The ballet which employs this music has been repeatedly performed in Boston by the Ballet Russe. The music is a marvel of orchestral coloring and workmanship. Today, the clever use of an orchestra is commonplace. By the side of the most noted masterpieces of orchestration this music is amazing. It has, besides the atmosphere of a fairy tale, the tale of enchanted princesses in the power of the Magician Katschei, saved by the brave prince, who is given the most beautiful of the princesses for his bride.

But the music without the spectacle is difficult and in many cases disappointing. It is inextricably interwoven with color and movement on the stage. Away from the stage, one hears interesting but unintelligible episodes which would say little or nothing, if one did not know the story, and had not the spectacle in his mind while listening. Also, this music hints very strongly indeed at modern Paris, and at one particular Parisian namely, the composer, Maurice Ravel. For the writer, the finest movements, musically speaking, are the third movement, in the nature of a scherzo, called "The Princesses Playing with the Golden Apples," the "Berceuse," and the Dance of the Princesses, in which there is poetic employment of what is probably a Russian folk theme. There is grotesquerie and imagination in the "Infernal Dance of Katschei's Subjects"; there is the element of the rich and the strange in "The Entreaties of the Fire-Bird," but this is music essentially for the theatre, which falls far short of its complete effect in the concert room.

SYMPHONY IMPRESSES CRITIC ELSON

Adv. — Nov. 2, 1919.

Chief Triumph of Concert,
New Piano Concerto by Rachmaninoff

RIVALS PADEREWSKI
IN HIS PERFORMANCE

M. Monteux Commended for Beginning Programs on Time

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

Program.

Haydn, Symphony in B-flat.
(First time at these concerts.)
Rachmaninoff, Piano Concerto No. 3, D minor.
Soloist, Serge Rachmaninoff.
Stravinsky, Suite from "The Firebird."

A decidedly interesting program, and one which was quite intelligible in spite of the eccentricities of Stravinsky. Much as we admire Mr. Rabaud we must state that M. Monteux's programs are made with more tact.

Fancy a symphony by Haydn given for the first time! This new composer seems to have the gift of tune, which is quite out of fashion. He has also brevity, which is unheard of in this century. He has also a clear style of scoring, which even American composers spurn nowadays. Yet with all these handicaps the new work was attractive and won much applause. Seriously, we often find more real enjoyment in a Haydn symphony than in Mozart's attempts at more dramatic effects (always excepting the G-minor and the Jupiter symphonies) in which field he becomes tame compared with modern effects. Haydn's Minuet movements however, fade out a little, and his slow movements are not exactly thrilling.

M. Monteux gave the first movement with a masculine heartiness that was inspiring. The Minuet was also read with commendable spirit, and the wood-wind (minus the clarinet, which Haydn almost never used) was charmingly prominent in the Trio of this. The whole work was very concise and won immediate favor, great applause following its conclusion and the orchestra being forced to rise to acknowledge it. But the chief triumph of the concert was the new piano concerto by Rachmaninoff.

RIVALS PADEREWSKI.

Serge Rachmaninoff is becoming one of the most important musical figures of the present. He rivals Paderewski in his piano performance and he excels him as a composer, although not, perhaps, in his concertos. His third concerto, which he played, was heard for the first time in Boston. It is an impressive and powerful work, its finale being its most ambitious and striking movement.

It does not strive for the massive scoring which many composers affect at present, although trombones, tuba, bass drum, military drum and cymbals are added to the classical forces. It has the characteristic, often found in works of composers who are pianists, of making the solo instrument more prominent than the orchestra most of the time, the defect of Liszt's concertos. It was too often a brilliant piano solo, while a true concerto should be chiefly orchestral.

But the composer shows self-restraint in the two cadenzas of the work (in first movement and finale) which are short although brilliant and impressive. The composer makes full use of his wide stretch and massive power in chord passages by introducing these effects very prominently, especially in the finale.

The slow movement is an Adagio Intermezzo which exhibits all of Rachmaninoff's poetic power. He gives true sentiment without becoming at all sentimental. There are fine arpeggio effects of the piano, in the finale, which contrast well with the heavy chord work, and the climaxes are worked up here in a very exciting manner to the very end. The composer does not take refuge in jangle-ries of rhythms, as the moderns too often do, but every point is straight, clear and intelligible.

ONE CLIMAX AFTER ANOTHER.

There was Russian melancholy in the first part, which was at times rather too pensive for a true first movement, and it ended pianissimo. The finale was thoroughly Muscovite, with one climax after another and many extensions by deceptive cadences. There were idealized march rhythms which led to triumph as if Kolchak were capturing Petrograd, and it was performed with an abandon that swept everything before it, so that the artist won a great triumph both as composer and pianist.

That musical "infant terrible," Stravinsky, has poured the whole pepper-pot into the finale of Fokine's "Firebird" by way of spice, but when one has the music in connection with the ballet action it is more effective than his detractors are willing to admit. He may be a musical anarchist, but he is one with some touches of genius. Naturally, however, he is at his best in depicting the ugly parts of the plot; in the tender or yearning passages we would prefer a Tchaikowsky or a Delibes. Here is a brief sketch of the story:

Prince Ivan captures the fire-bird, and, moved by pity, sets her at liberty, whereupon the fairy presents him with a feather, which acts splendidly as a duster in brushing away difficulties or troubles. The prince falls in love with a lady in a castle, who is held by Katschei, a disagreeable party who turns people into stone by merely looking at them. He has the original "stony stare" that novelists speak about. His legions surround Prince Ivan to some very descriptive music (Stravinsky at his best), but the feather duster does its work well and brushes them away.

PRAISE FOR MONTEUX.

Katschei has one constitutional trouble, his soul is not in his body but in an egg, quite apart from him. The fairy shows the Prince this egg, and he at once applies the French proverb, "On ne peut pas faire des omelettes sans casser des oeufs," and, in spite of the very high price of poultry-fruit at present, boldly breaks the egg, whereupon the party with the troublesome glance crumbles up, the statues come to life, and the lovers are united.

As already intimated, we find the portrayal of Kastchei and his legions the most graphic part of the work, and the suite ends with these in a highly infernal manner. The other movements had more of finesse and delicacy, and the Ronde des Princesses had a degree of beauty that would have been enhanced if the action could have gone with it. As we remember the ballet, the music is very closely wedded to even every gesture of the pantomime.

M. Monteux, we believe, conducted the premiere of this ballet, and he was eminently fitted to give all its delicate and subtle touches. He also deserves credit for beginning his concerts on time and never making his programs too long.

MUSIC

Mr. Rachmaninoff in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, Massachusetts—Truly a stimulating and a novel program that Mr. Monteux set before his Friday afternoon audience at the fourth concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Stimulating in that new musical ideas were set forth, and novel in that all three numbers were heard for the first time at these concerts. Haydn's symphony in B flat (B. and H. No. 85), bearing the title "The Queen of France" has somehow escaped performance through the 38 years of the orchestra, and the audiences have been the loser. There are touches in this, now of brilliancy and now of delicacy, that other and more familiar Haydn symphonies lack. The brilliancy Mr. Monteux accomplished, but the delicacy at times eluded him, as in the romance, the second movement.

The interest of the audience was plainly for Mr. Rachmaninoff, who played with the orchestra his third piano concerto in D minor, Op. 30. Here is a difficult piece of music, hard for the audience to grasp, hard for the pianist, and hard for the conductor and the orchestra. Merely to say that it repays the surmounting of all the various difficulties does scant justice to it, for it is a big work, bigly conceived, and the effort required to compass it is broadening to both players and listeners. With another artist playing it the piano would most likely be one of the instruments of the orchestra, for the part is not at all designed to display technique. With the composer playing, the concerto assumes more the character of a duet, with the piano not at all subordinated, nor yet unduly exalted. Its climaxes are noble and stirring, well built up but never too long delayed nor too long drawn out. A wealth of musical ideas floods through its pages, most of them tinged a little with sadness, many of them peculiarly Slavic. As in the case of his second concerto, played last year under Mr. Rabaud, this abounds in puzzling changes of tempo, but unlike the performance last season the changes were not so neatly managed.

Stravinsky's suite "The Fire-Bird" closed the program, flooding Symphony Hall with gorgeous sound, freely giving out music of sheer beauty, unhampered by constricting forms and laws. To Mr. Monteux it was familiar work conducting this, but he must have felt, as did many of the hearers, the absence of the dancers. In music of this sort Mr. Monteux thus far has appeared to the best advantage.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Trans. — Nov. 1, 1919
AN AFTERNOON OF CONTRASTING RUSSIANS

Stravinsky's Suite from the Ballet of "The Fire-Bird" and Rachmaninov's Third Piano Concerto for the First Times—Indifference to the One and Zest for the Other or, Rather, for the Composer as Pianist and Personality—The Appeal of Power Versus the Appeal of Magic CONDUCTORS propose; but, in measure, audiences dispose. Mr. Monteux obviously designed the suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fire-Bird" as the outstanding piece at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon. Beyond peradventure it is music glowing with intrinsic beauty or vivid with delineative suggestion. As plainly it is music written with rare individuality of means, method, imagination. It is a renowned music withal that has gone up and down the theatres of Europe and America, that has exercised no small influence upon the younger generation of composers the world over. Finally,

It is music that warms Mr. Monteux's full-lip into the revised concerto as it came yesterday into new being, that no novel music and no artist in many a year of the Concerts have been applauded. Rachmaninov and this conductor. At a few plausible impressions his first hearing. The concerto, for example, in measures of art-ful euphony between the other instruments or choirs of the orchestra—passages in which the end and the expressive means are fully and feelingly blended that the ear with sensuous delight. Rachmaninov his darkling gleaming horn, his murmured the heart of many a hearer. Again, the concerto does measures of swirling power, as for example, toward the end of the piano seems to martial the orchestra before it and with mighty Tchaikovsky-wise, drive it forward into as mighty and sonorous measures. In are the starker measures. In the first movement, in which the piano seems to etch the pattern of the ear incisively, indelibly. Most needless to say does Mr. Monteux use the piano merely as dissonant. Yet, scarcely a composer has searched out its more thoroughly, employed it imaginatively, more variously, and in degree as imaginative, more so with harmonic and in color, especially when he may play piano and orchestra at will. Rachmaninov sometimes repeats himself, processes, they lack neither illusion. As signally, he plays piano concertos—the second, the first, no less than this third concerto—power that bears the stamp of the composer's course. They are the task to Mr. Rachmaninov; the upswelling act of creation. Ninety-nine out of a hundred with a reciprocal warmth. The other hand—to set down further and less confidently—this conductor is an excessively moody, variable, at moments even a music. Russian composer still, his residence at Dresden and reference to German models, Rachmaninov cannot forego many a rough his finale. True, they are gorgeous, occasionally intensifying, but they do delay and the composer obviously purposed of masterful sound. Slav irrepressible temperament, Mr. Monteux cannot forbear the play through the music of many a litful and, to the cooler Anglo-Saxon mind and heart, visit to the United States. It is hard, again, after a single hearing, to penetrate to the cooler Anglo-Saxon mind and heart, statues are uni-

As a portray the mos and the highly moveme delicacy had a d have be could ha member closely of the p
M. Mo
the pren was emi delicate deserves certs on program

Mr. I
Specially fo
BOSTON
stimulatin
Mr. Mont afternoon concerts Orchestra. musical i novel in t heard for certs. Ha
(B. and E
"The Que escaped p years of t ences hav touches in now of de familiar E brilliancy but the d as in the ment.

The int plainly fo played wi ano conce
is a diffic audience t and hard orchestra.
pays the s ous diffic

it, for it is a big work, bigly conceived, of Europe and America, that has exercised and the effort required to compass it no small influence upon the younger generis broadening to both players and lis- ation of composers the world over. Finally,

Visioning Stravinsky's Music

The Fire-Bird

From Bakst's Fantastic Costume Sketch

It is music that warms Mr. Monteux's fullest and finest powers. In his days with the Russian Ballet he led often in it; for its own sake he justly cherishes it; never before has he been able to play it upon so accept and responsive an instrument as the present Symphony Orchestra; with reason he sought and gained a performance pulsing with rhythmic life, graphic with harmonic and instrumental color; full-voiced of sustained song, missing not a measure of pictorial or poetizing suggestion. Such a music so played was intended to be, and deserved to be, the conductor's crown to his first group of Symphony Concerts.

"Dis aliter visum." The gods otherwise decreed—but less the gods than the goddesses who fill so large a part of the parquet on Friday afternoons at Symphony Hall.
younger divinities, they "passed up" Stravinsky and "The Fire-Bird," departed in noisy file while Mr. Monteux and the orchestra were sounding the first measures of more than one movement; returned to both at the end the faintest and hastiest crackle of applause. Unless precedent fails, the audiences of Saturday evening, musically more curious, more receptive and better informed, will use Stravinsky and "The Fire-Bird"—to say nothing of conductor and band—in larger accord with their deserts. Possibly for the first time anywhere —one more unique distinction for this town
—music by S. ravinsky (his earlier experiments aside) has been coldly, almost deliberately, slighted. Elsewhere, whether the audience resented or approved, and usually it has done both simultaneously, opinion and feeling have run warm and high.

Perhaps, however, the audience was in no mood for further new sensations after it had heard Mr. Rakhmaninov play his concerto for piano in D minor, the second number of the afternoon. With the pianist-composer, it could drink its fill of puissant and illuding personality. The most mistrustful hearer could not doubt the mastery of every technical means, the range of manifold and expressive eloquence with which he, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra gave the music voice. So heard, the response of the audience was quick and deep, warm and unanimous.
How the concerto would sound from less revealing mind and commanding hand than the composer's is hard to say. It is ten years since Mr. Rakhmaninov published the piece and inscribed it to Josef Hofmann. Yet in that decade, if report runs accurately, the pianist has not elected—or,
as some cynically say, dared—to hazard it.
Indeed, according to more of this prattle of the lobbies, it had been played only once before—in the autumn of 1909 at one of Mr. Damrosch's concerts in New York in the course of Mr. Rakhmaninov's first visit to the United States. It is hard, again, after a single hearing, to penetrate far into the revised concerto as it came in measure yesterday into new being.

Suffice it that no novel music and no
"assisting artist" in many a year of the Symphony Concerts have been applauded as were Mr. Rakhmaninov and this concerto in D minor.

At the least a few plausible impressions abide from this first hearing. The concerto abounds, for example, in measures of artful and moving euphony between the piano and other instruments or choirs of the orchestra—passages in which the imaginative end and the expressive means are so expertly and feelingly blended that they stir the ear with sensuous delight.
Give Mr. Rakhmaninov his darkling strings, his gleaming horn, his murmuring piano and the heart of many a hearer turns to water. Again, the concerto does not lack measures of swirling power, as when, for example, toward the end of the finale, the piano seems to martial the who's orchestra before it and with mighty cords, Chalkovsky-wise, drive it forward and upward into as mighty and sonorous climax. Akin are the starker measures, as in the first movement, in which the piano seems to etch the pattern of the music upon the ear incisively, indelibly.
Nowhere, almost needless to say does Mr.
Rakhmaninov use the piano merely as dis-playful instrument. Yet, scarcely a composer of our time has searched out its possibilities more thoroughly, employed them more imaginatively, more variously.
As learned, and in degree as imaginative, is the composer with harmonic and instrumental color, especially when he may part or fuse piano and orchestra at will.
If Mr. Rakhmaninov sometimes repeats himself in these processes, they lack neither subtlety nor illusion. As signally, he writes these piano concertos—the second, heard last January, no less than this third —with a propulsive power that bears the hearer along the composer's course. They are not a willed task to Mr. Rakhmaninov;
they are an upswelling act of creation.
No wonder, ninety-nine out of a hundred ears answer with a reciprocal warmth.

On the other hand—to set down further impressions and less confidently—this concerto in D-minor is an excessively moody, a highly variable, at moments even a repetitious music. Russian composer still, in spite of long residence at Dresden and occasional deference to German models, Mr. Rakhmaninov cannot forego many a repetition through his finale. True, they are vivid, vigorous, occasionally intensified repetitions, but they do delay and diffuse what the composer obviously pur-posed as a flood of masterful sound. Slav likewise by irresistible temperament, Mr.

Rakhmaninov cannot forbear the play through the music of many a fitful and,
to the cooler Anglo-Saxon mind and heart,

84

bewildering mood. They seem to confuse the brief slow movement—intermezzo the composer labels it—to make it restless brooding rather than deeply flowing instrumental song. In clearer and sharper illusion they make the finale hectic, though they leave it somewhat disjointed. They do the music most service when from first measure to last they characterize the long first movement yet keep place in ordered and mounting progress. Through this Allegro, Mr. Rakhmaninov's controlling mind enkindled imagination and ready technical resource go hand in hand. The music, lowers and mutters, struggles into voice only to be subdued, brightens, quickens, is again overshadowed and stayed, sombre, sorrowful, fate-smitten—a veritable tone-poem in atmosphere and emotion out of which the piano speaks with changeful, penetrating, puissant voice. Concertos in our day have usually been made, whether piano or violin the virtuoso behind or a dutiful composer, was the occasion. Mr. Rakhmaninov imagines his even when there are discoverable blemishes and mannerisms upon them. In this first movement of the concerto of yesterday, such imagination has seldom run deeper or better sustained itself.

Yet there was not a reason why Rakhmaninov's music should have overshadowed Stravinsky's (as it surely did to most of the audience) except in the visible and audible presence of the composer as pianist. The presumption is that the composer is also audible through his own measures, even, if otherwise, he be no more than a name above them. But what is even so celebrated a name as Stravinsky, beside Mr. Rakhmaninov's potent personality close to every anticipating hearer? There are no excuses to be made for the cool indifference to the suite from "The Fire-Bird." It could hardly be played in clearer revelation, in more pervading illusion. True, it is music of the theatre written to vivify, enhance and enrich a pictorial and fanciful action, drawn from old Russian legend, mimed and danced upon the stage. Stravinsky, however, has so chosen the music that only one of the excerpts is dimmed by transfer to the concert-hall—the final dances of the sorcerer and his train. Heard by itself, the music is fantastic, grotesque, bold and broken of rhythm, streaming with macabre color, fertile in pungent modulation, whipping the air with wild gesture and frantic posturing. Yet, for illusion needing the visible presence of bearded old Kotschei and his uncanny folk. Throughout the suite, Stravinsky of right assumes some acquaint-men assume the solemn task of upon the records of this society, going on and out of this life of it. President, Mr. J. Converse Gray. My fellow-officers feel the loss of the more keenly because he was the prime of life, physically and fitted with those qualities for which he so generously used in of this Home and of many works with which he was con-

J. P. &

the fascination of a dainty that present a custom spats fit the ankle with have a large assortment smart and serviceable riding

THE STORE WITH THE

IES, PETERS

An artist of piano

CRITICS AS PARTISANS

of Monteux and Symphony in New York

BY OLIN DOWNES

Boston Mr. Monteux
liant concerts prior
r. Rabaud, with the Orchestra. The Bos-
estra then proceed-
w York, and was the back by the
that city.

lieve at this event,
who had given con-
greatly to the satis-
which should cer-
performances from so satisfactorily in unsatisfactorily in

r things have hapof music. Anyone about the temper-
of musicians and displays there are invariably doing
the presence of the
an untoward inci-
l emotional disturan entire concert.
stonians who had
ction from the acne new conductor
ert in New York,
into account the Monteux, a musi-
perhaps did play

which confirmed
was said that on distice of Nov. 11,
date of the first
the Boston Sym-
-19, there was not
t within the Symalso much din on
that these things,
d acoustics of the ad influenced the tely in the per-

symphony—perhaps the finest—given here by any orchestra in many years. But the New York Telegram found that while Monteux and his men read this symphony "with full adherence to its unmistakable meanings, moods and never outlandish imageries" (whatever that may mean) it still felt that it was played "with a kind of 'little' cleverness and probably satisfied the musical precisionists present." The virtue of the performance of Debussy's "L'Après-midi d'un Faune" lay not, if you please, in any particular qualities of taste or imagination on the part of the conductor, but "in the extraordinary skill of the musicians in the several sections employed rather than in any exposition of imaginative reading or inspirational visions on the part of Conductor Monteux."

Perhaps the gentlemen preferred the dry and ponderous reading of this music which Dr. Muck was in the habit of giving.

But the gem of New York comment, to our mind, on the playing of the Boston Symphony, is the comment of Mr. James Hunker, "Jimmy," as he is known to his friends, who, in one article discovered that "Mr. Monteux is an accomplished routinier, better versed in ultra-modern music, Russian ballet preferred, than in the classic" and that the Schumann symphony "went rather heavily . . . a breeziness permeating the symphony that was not felt last night." Following which, in a second article, Mr. Hunker discovers that Walter Damrosch, who conducted on the same day a concert by the New York Symphony was "a veteran, though not a superfluous or lagging one" and the tone of the orchestra "a delight to the ear."

Now, we are not disposed to deny to the New York Symphony all of the fine qualities ascribed to it by Mr. Hunker, nor would we willingly comment at length on Damrosch's conducting. We once heard him conduct Beethoven's 5th symphony, and that day we listened no more. But when a reviewer so far forsakes all reasonable perspective in comparing orchestras like the New York and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and conductors like Damrosch and

OF HIS TASK.

Now, Mr. Monteux and the Boston Symphony gave a New York concert last Thursday night. They played compositions which had already been heard here, including the Schumann "Spring" symphony, which by many people in Boston who are fairminded and whose knowledge is worthy of respect, was one of the finest performances of this

84 bewildering methe brief slow composer label brooding rather mental song.

sion they make they leave it a do the music m measure to last first movement and mounting p legro, Mr. Rakh enkindled imagi resource go ha lowers and mu only to be sub is again oversha sorrowful, fate-poem in atmos which the plan penetrating, pul
our day have u piano or violin dutiful compose Rakhmaninov
there are discov nerisms upon t
ment of the co imagination has better sustained

ance, in or out of the theatre, with the fable of "The Fire-Bird." But when has a composer of these latter days been defined his "programme." For naught else, except the advertisements did "programme-books" come into being.

Ultra-modern music, if the hearer likes the phrase, "The Fire-Bird" surely is, but it runs in no baffling idiom. Rather, to any sort of practised ear in this nineteenth year of the twentieth century it runs as clear as the day in matter, manner, imagery, illusion. To the students and the connoisseurs may be left debate about Stravinsky's ways with the generating and the characterizing motives from which rise
the course and the contents of his music.
To them also may be left praise of his command of rhythms and daring with them, of his invention and resource with harmonies and timbres. The usual hearer busies himself little with these means to ends. For him the immediate sensation that the music yields him. The more, then, the wonder that so many failed to perceive yesterday the atmosphere of old legend swiftly, pervasively woven by the prelude, or the fluttering incandescence of the measures, radiant, glowing, magical, fairy-like, in which the Fire Bird herself is first revealed.

Yet there was maninov's music owed Stravinsky
most of the audi and audible pres pianist. The pri poser is also a measures, even, than a name at even so celebrat
beside Mr. Rakh
allity close to e
There are no ex
cool indifference Fire-Bird." It c clearer revelation sion. True, it is ten to vivify, en
torial and fancif
Russian legend,
the stage. Stra chosen the music cerpts is dimmed cert-hall—the final and his train. He is fantastic, grotes of rhythm, stream fertile in pungent air with wild ges
Yet, for illusion
ence of bearded canny folk. The

As wondrous in intrinsic quality and de-lineative suggestion is the music of her owed Stravinsky entreaties to the Tsarevitch, her captor. It is iridescent with her motion; yet vibrates with her petitionings. It makes her miming almost piteously visible; yet heard without thought of her, it quivers with its own melodic loveliness. There are those who wail and will not be comforted because there is no sustained melody in "ultra-modern music." Did they listen yesterday to the lullaby that soothes the sleep of the Tsarevna that is to be, to the so-called "Round" of the captive princesses? If they did, they heard music of full voiced instrumental song, glowing through transparent texture, almost as simple in impression as it is sophisticated of facture. And when, unless it be in Laparra's Basque Suite of last spring, has music so gleamed with swift, radiant, graceful, playful motion as does that in which Stravinsky's princesses toss the golden apples? In a sense, anywhere and anyhow, it matters little how this music happens to be re-Beauty, imagination, invention, individuality still speak out of it.
A unique temperament and talent, near in kind to genius made it—and feared not.

H. T. PARKER

Stravinsky of right assumes some acquaint-

85

CRITICS AS PARTISANS

of Monteux and Symphony in New York

BY OLIN DOWNES

Boston Mr. Monteux
lliant concerts prior
r. Rabaud, with the Orchestra. The Bos-
estra then proceed-
w York, and was
the back by the
that city.

lieve at this event,
who had given con-
greatly to the satis-
which should cer-
performances from
so satisfactorily in unsatisfactorily in things have hapof music. Anyone

about the temper-
of musicians and Hcaps there are invariably doing
the presence of the
an untoward inci-emotional distur-
in entire concert.
stonians who had
tion from the acie new conductor
ert in New York,
into account the Monteux, a musi-
perhaps did play

which confirmed
was said that on stice of Nov. 11,
date of the first
the Boston Sym-
19, there was not within the Symalso much din on hat these things, acoustics of the ad influenced the ely in the performance of his task.

Now, Mr. Monteux and the Boston Symphony gave a New York concert last Thursday night. They played compositions which had already been heard here, including the Schumann "Spring" symphony, which by many people in Boston who are fairminded and whose knowledge is worthy of respect, was one of the finest performances of this symphony—perhaps the finest—given here by any orchestra in many years.

But the New York Telegram found that while Monteux and his men read this symphony "with full adherence to its unmistakable meanings, moods and never outlandish imageries" (whatever that may mean) it still felt that it was played "with a kind of 'little' cleverness and probably satisfied the musical precisionists present." The virtue of the performance of Debussy's "L'Apresmidi d'un Faune" lay not, if you please, in any particular qualities of taste or imagination on the part of the conductor, but "in the extraordinary skill of the musicians in the several sections employed rather than in any exposition of imaginative reading or inspirational visions on the part of Conductor Monteux."

Perhaps the gentlemen preferred the dry and ponderous reading of this music which Dr. Muck was in the habit of giving.

But the gem of New York comment, to our mind, on the playing of the Boston Symphony, is the comment of Mr.
James Hunker, "Jimmy," as he is known to his friends, who, in one article discovered that "Mr. Monteux is an accomplished routinier, better versed in ultra-modern music, Russian ballet preferred, than in the classic" and that the Schumann symphony "went rather heavily . . . a breeziness permeating the symphony that was not felt last night." Following which, in a second article, Mr. Hunker discovers that Walter Damrosch, who conducted on the same day a concert by the New York Symphony was "a veteran, though not a superfluous or lagging one" and the tone of the orchestra "a delight to the ear."

Now, we are not disposed to deny to the New York Symphony all of the fine qualities ascribed to it by Mr. Hunker, nor would we willingly comment at length on Damrosch's conducting. We once heard him conduct Beethoven's 5th symphony, and that day we listened no more. But when a reviewer so far forsakes all reasonable perspective in comparing orchestras like the New York and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and conductors like Damrosch and Visioning Stravinsky's Music

A Princess

From a Sketch by Bakst in the Ancient Russian Manner

Beauty, imagination, invention, fertility in pungent illusion, individuality still speak out of it. A unique temperament and talent, near in kind to genius made it—and feared not. Yet, for illusion of bearded canny folk. The vinsky of right assumes some acquaint-

H. T. PARKER

CRITICS AS PARTISANS

Fortunes of Monteux and Symphony in New York

BY OLIN DOWNES

Last season in Boston Mr. Monteux gave two very brilliant concerts prior to the arrival of Mr. Rabaud, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Boston Symphony Orchestra then proceeded on tour to New York, and was promptly ripped up the back by the music reviewers of that city.

It was hard to believe at this event, that the same man who had given concerts in a manner greatly to the satisfaction of audiences which should certainly know good performances from bad, could conduct so satisfactorily in Boston and so very unsatisfactorily in New York.

Of course, stranger things have happened in the history of music. Anyone who knows anything about the temperamental difficulties of musicians and the practical handicaps there are against a performer invariably doing himself justice in the presence of the public, knows how an untoward incident, or a very small emotional disturbance, may spoil an entire concert. Therefore, when Bostonians who had derived great satisfaction from the accomplishments of the new conductor read about the concert in New York, some of them took into account the possibility that Mr. Monteux, a musician of temperament, perhaps did play poorly in New York.

There were rumors which confirmed this supposition. It was said that on the night of the armistice of Nov. 11, 1918, which was the date of the first New York concert of the Boston Symphony season of 1918-19, there was not only great excitement within the Symphony orchestra, but also much din on the streets outside, that these things, and the unaccustomed acoustics of the hall, and so-forth, had influenced the conductor unfortunately in the performance of his task.

Now, Mr. Monteux and the Boston Symphony gave a New York concert last Thursday night. They played compositions which had already been heard here, including the Schumann "Spring" symphony, which by many people in Boston who are fair-minded and whose knowledge is worthy of respect, was one of the finest performances of this symphony—perhaps the finest—given here by any orchestra in many years. But the New York Telegram found that while Monteux and his men read this symphony "with full adherence to its unmistakable meanings, moods and never outlandish imageries" (whatever that may mean) it still felt that it was played "with a kind of 'little' cleverness and probably satisfied the musical precisionists present." The virtue of the performance of Debussy's "L'Après-midi d'un Faune" lay not, if you please, in any particular qualities of taste or imagination on the part of the conductor, but "in the extraordinary skill of the musicians in the several sections employed rather than in any exposition of imaginative reading or inspirational visions on the part of Conductor Monteux."

Perhaps the gentlemen preferred the dry and ponderous reading of this music which Dr. Muck was in the habit of giving.

But the gem of New York comment, to our mind, on the playing of the Boston Symphony, is the comment of Mr. James Hunker, "Jimmy," as he is known to his friends, who, in one article discovered that "Mr. Monteux is an accomplished routinier, better versed in ultra-modern music, Russian ballet preferred, than in the classic" and that the Schumann symphony "went rather heavily . . . a breeziness permeating the symphony that was not felt last night." Following which, in a second article, Mr. Hunker discovers that Walter Damrosch, who conducted on the same day a concert by the New York Symphony was "a veteran, though not a superfluous or lagging one" and the tone of the orchestra "a delight to the ear."

Now, we are not disposed to deny to the New York Symphony all of the fine qualities ascribed to it by Mr. Hunker, nor would we willingly comment at length on Damrosch's conducting. We once heard him conduct Beethoven's 5th symphony, and that day we listened no more. But when a reviewer so far forsakes all reasonable perspective in comparing orchestras like the New York and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and conductors like Damrosch and Monteux, with an obvious leaning toward Damrosch—then it is time to throw up the hands and stop talking. You cannot argue with people who are determined in advance to see one side of a question. The puzzle of the New York fault-findings—or at least, some New York fault-findings—with Monteux is explained: provincialism and partisanship.

IN THE EAR OF NEW YORK

MR. MONTEUX AND HIS ORCHESTRA

FRESHLY JUDGED

Two Concerts Before Audiences Renewing the Numbers and the Appraise of Previous Years—The Reviewers, the New Leader and the Changed Band—Praise for the Conductor's Stravinsky — Questionings Over His Schumann.

As established conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux has led it the first times in New York and he discriminating public that its concert assemblage there has heard, likewise for the first times, the reorganized band as he is moulding it. The first of these concerts befell last Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall with Schumann's "Spring Symphony," the overture and a slow movement from Beethoven's ballet, "The Brood of Prometheus," Debussy's Prelude to Mallarmé's Eclogue, "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Enesco's Suite to fill the programme—all pieces recently heard at home. Of the occasion as a whole, Mr. Spaeth writes to The Transcript:

That New York still reserves for the Boston Symphony Orchestra the place of honor in its musical affections was sufficiently proved last Thursday evening at Carnegie Hall, when Pierre Monteux led his men through their first programme of the metropolitan season. The hall was crowded to the doors, as always on these occasions, by the true followers of orchestral music, and the welcome to Mr. Monteux and the players indicated an enthusiasm which was more than cordiality. At the close of the "Spring Symphony" of Schuman, the applause assumed proportions which demanded acknowledgment by the entire band, and throughout the evening the spirit of hearty approval was unmistakable. There was interest in the naively simple beauties of Beethoven's ballet, "The Brood of Prometheus," and Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" elicited particular appreciation of the wood-wind choir of the Bostonians, although Mr. Monteux chose to give the elusive composition a surprisingly literal interpretation. The comparatively unfamiliar Suite, Opus 9, by Georges Enesco, was a pleasing and far from indigestible dessert to a generally unpretentious and wholesome feast.

The impression left by the opening concert is that the orchestra as a whole has recovered much of the technical finish which marked its performances before the disruption of the war-period, and that Mr. Monteux, free from the embarrassment of acting merely as a stop-gap, is already beginning to impress upon the players something of his own ideas and personality. Whether these factors are to prove of permanent value is still an open question.

Various are the impressions received and recorded by the reviewers in the New York newspapers. The Tribune, for example, heard the orchestra with no small pleasure; the conductor with less satisfaction. It says:

The Boston Symphony Orchestra may change its backer, its manager and its conductor, but its New York public remains faithful. The famous orchestra (alas! we can call it Major Higginson's no longer) found Carnegie Hall filled with an audience possessed of all its old-time brilliancy, while Mr. Monteux, appearing for the first time in New York as the orchestra's regular conductor, received a greeting as he entered the conductor's stand which was more than merely polite. Before the end of the first movement of the opening Schumann symphony had been played one thing was gratefully evident—that the personnel of the orchestra had recovered from the severe "shake-up" it had received by the expulsion of its German members. It was the Boston Symphony Orchestra of old, homogeneous, resonant in tone, perfectly balanced throughout its choirs. And this fact alone speaks volumes for its conductor.

It cannot, however, be said that Mr. Monteux gave an inspired or an exciting reading of Schumann's "Spring Symphony"; indeed, it seemed at times as if the spirit of winter rather than spring were upon it. This same heaviness of hand was apparent in the overture to Beethoven's ballet, "The Brood of Prometheus," but in the adagio Mr. Monteux at last came to his own and gave to it a performance of great charm. In Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" Mr. Monteux was, however, completely successful. Rarely had this oft-played composition received a more delicate or more sympathetic reading, and conductor and musicians alike well earned the applause they received.

Writing in The Times, Mr. Aldrich, who had not officially heard the orchestra since the days of change and reorganization, is coolly judicious:

Old friends and admirers of the orchestra had no doubt prepared themselves to hear in its playing something other than they had been accustomed to, different even from what they had heard last season. Nor was this expectation disappointed. The tone of the organization is a new one—brilliant, tending toward hardness, with more heard from the side of the brasses than formerly, and that less mellow; with fluency, and, on the whole, excellent quality from the wood-winds. Something else has taken the place of the golden and transparent beauty of former days.

Now Mr. Monteux is the permanent chief, and he has had the time and opportunity to make his intentions prevail in the orchestra's performances. His beat is very positive, his modelling of the phrase crisp and in high relief. His reading of the symphony was full of nervous tension, highly strung, in sharp contrasts of dynamics, wherein sometimes tone was forced in strings and brass. Much was made of every episode; nothing was left unnoted; and in the elaboration of detail something was lost of the engaging and spontaneous flow of the music. In the song of the larghetto something was lost of its tranquil beauty, molested by unexpected violences. This "Spring Symphony" is filled with an exulting spirit, but it does not verge upon the feverish.

The music from Beethoven's ballet pleased, especially the adagio, in which there were solo passages for violoncello, flute, clarinet, bassoon, and harp well played. Debussy's exquisite prelude was delivered explicitly rather than suggestively; the shimmering, vaporous atmosphere was clarified by an area of high barometric pressure that exposed all the orchestral mechanism. It was in its way interesting and informing; but it was not a poetical exposition of Debussy's thought.

In The World, Mr. Huneker is disposed to agree with Mr. Aldrich, but en passant he cannot forbear an amusing fling at the sepulchral Rabaud from whom the orchestra and its audiences were timely and happily delivered. He writes:

Mr. Monteux is an accomplished routinier, better versed in ultra-modern music, Russian ballet preferred, than in the classics. Nevertheless, one feels sure with him, and it may be asserted without fear of denial that he has more fire in his beat than his predecessor, a gifted composer, yet always irresistibly suggesting an undertaker presiding over the obsequies of the various compositions he so mournfully conducted. But Pierre Monteux has not a light touch. He is seldom Gallic.

Schumann's first symphony, with its springlike airs and romantic rustlings, as if in some dim Old World garden, went rather heavily. Naturally the joyous last movement sounded more Schumannesque than its companions. Even if the scoring is opaque, there is a breeziness permeating the symphony that was not felt last night. Strangely enough the conductor seemed more at ease in an "overture to a heroic and allegorical ballet, 'The Brood of Prometheus,'" by, of all musicians in the world, Beethoven.

Debussy's Faun again enjoyed a rutilant afternoon—metaphysically be it understood; the dream of a dream, the reverberations of which filled the chambers of his ardent brain, a marvellous evocation of a soul-mate related in terms of musical mysticism. Unhappily it wasn't mystic, nor poetic. It sounded like the statement of a fact, not the evocation of a memory-image. But beautiful because of the sheer sensuous quality of the scoring.

In turn, Mr. Henderson of The Sun cannot forget the dear departed, remarking that Mr. Rabaud "discovered that directing concerts in this country was not what he fondly fancied it to be and sail away." Like the rest the reviewer judged the performance of Schumann's symphony somewhat heavy. "It served well," he writes, "to display the present quality of the famous orchestra, which seemed to have gained in cloudiness, and to have lost something of its old starry depths. The symphony was played somewhat crudely, somewhat rudely, but with no little of the buoyant vigor for which its score calls. . . . In Debussy's music Mr. Monteux was entirely at home. The orchestra played it very well, indeed, and it was good to hear."

For the second concert on Saturday afternoon, Mr. Monteux's programme traversed Haendel's little symphony, "The Queen of France," Beethoven's overture, "King Stephen," to be resurrected next Friday and Saturday in Boston; Franck's tone-poem, "The Wild Huntsman," and the suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fire-Bird." With the outcome the reviewers were well pleased and in The Times, Mr. Aldrich writes not only for himself, but in measure for all of them, saying:

Haydn's Symphony in D, called "The Queen of France," was agreeable and not too familiar; a hearty expression of the composer's geniality. It was heard with pleasure, in a performance full of spirit and carefully wrought shadings, with amply vigorous contrasts in dynamics, and with a quality of tone that seemed rather more ingratiating than what was heard in Schumann's symphony the other evening. The orchestra was reduced by half the number of double basses in this symphony, but no other changes were made in the direction of dimensions supposedly Haydn's.

Franck's symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman," is not Franck at his best; yet it is an ingenious and effective treatment of a theme that has appealed to many musicians; and not all have treated it so successfully, with so much atmospheric suggestion and picturesque quality, in terms so purely musical. The performance of it was admirable, full and rich in color, without excess in dynamics, without undue striving for realistic effects, and yet with the dramatic meaning the composer was seeking.

In was in the selections from Stravinsky's ballet music "The Fire-Bird" that the orchestra and Mr. Monteux achieved their greatest success. The music is exquisite in its fancifulness, boldly fantastic, capricious, ingenious, picturesque, pictorial; illustrating the changing fantasy of the ballet. Something of its fantasticality, its imaginative power, becomes meaningless when it is taken away from the fantasticality of the action. Yet the lullaby, the dance of the princesses, and, perhaps somewhat less, the scene of the playing of the princesses with the golden apples, have enough of their own to say, as music, to stand fairly well by themselves. . . . Mr. Monteux conducted the music with complete knowledge and the fullest sympathy—he was the conductor of notable performances of the ballet in Paris and London, and knows its spirit as do few. The performance was brilliant.

Mr. Rachmaninoff made his first appearance in the United States, as a pianist, when he gave a recital at Smith College, Northampton, November 4, 1909. He played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the trip that began November 8, 1909.

He has played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston:—
1909, December 17, when he played his second concerto, Op. 18, then heard in Boston for the first time, and conducted his symphonic poem "The Island of the Dead," which was also heard here for the first time.

1919, January 31: His second concerto.

His first appearance in Boston was at his recital in Symphony Hall, November 16, 1909. He also played at one of Mrs. McAllister's concerts at the Hotel Somerset, January 10, 1910.

Returning to the United States late in 1918, he gave recitals in Symphony Hall on December 15, 1918; January 10, February 22, October 26, 1919.

These compositions by him have been played at concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston:—

Symphony in E minor, No. 2: October 15, November 5, 1910; March 30, 1912; December 20, 1913; November 30, 1917.

Symphonic Poem "The Island of the Dead": December 17, 1909 (conducted by the composer); February 19, 1910; April 15, 1911; November 26, 1915; October 26, 1917.

Pianoforte Concerto No. 1: December 7, 1904 (Carlo Buonamici, pianist).

Pianoforte Concerto No. 2: December 17, 1909 (Mr. Rachmaninoff); November 17, 1916 (Mr. Gabrilowitsch); January 31, 1919 (Mr. Rachmaninoff).

SANDERS THEATRE . . CAMBRIDGE

SECOND CONCERT

Thursday Evening, November 13

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SOLOIST

VERA JANACOPULOS

SOPRANO

Tickets at Kent's University Bookstore, Harvard Square, Cambridge

vinsky's ballet music "The Fire-Bird" that the orchestra and Mr. Monteux achieved their greatest success. The music is exquisite in its fancifulness, boldly fantastic, capricious, ingenious, picturesque, pictorial; illustrating the changing fantasy of the ballet. Something of its fantasticality, its imaginative power, becomes meaningless when it is taken away from the fantasticality of the action. Yet the lullaby, the dance of the princesses, and, perhaps somewhat less, the scene of the playing of the princesses with the golden apples, have enough of their own to say, as music, to stand fairly well by themselves. . . . Mr. Monteux conducted the music with complete knowledge and the fullest sympathy—he was the conductor of notable performances of the ballet in Paris and London, and knows its spirit as do few. The performance was brilliant.

Mr. Rachmaninoff made his first appearance in the United States, as a pianist, when he gave a recital at Smith College, Northampton, November 4, 1909. He played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the trip that began November 8, 1909.

He has played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston:—

1909, December 17, when he played his second concerto, Op. 18, then heard in Boston for the first time, and conducted his symphonic poem "The Island of the Dead," which was also heard here for the first time.

1919, January 31: His second concerto.

His first appearance in Boston was at his recital in Symphony Hall, November 16, 1909. He also played at one of Mrs. McAllister's concerts at the Hotel Somerset, January 10, 1910.

Returning to the United States late in 1918, he gave recitals in Symphony Hall on December 15, 1918; January 10, February 22, October 26, 1919.

These compositions by him have been played at concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston:—

Symphony in E minor, No. 2: October 15, November 5, 1910; March 30, 1912; December 20, 1913; November 30, 1917.

Symphonic Poem "The Island of the Dead": December 17, 1909 (conducted by the composer); February 19, 1910; April 15, 1911; November 26, 1915; October 26, 1917.

Pianoforte Concerto No. 1: December 7, 1904 (Carlo Buonamici, pianist).

Pianoforte Concerto No. 2: December 17, 1909 (Mr. Rachmaninoff); November 17, 1916 (Mr. Gabilowitsch); January 31, 1919 (Mr. Rachmaninoff).

SANDERS THEATRE . . CAMBRIDGE

SECOND CONCERT

Thursday Evening, November 13

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SOLOIST

VERA JANACOPULOS

SOPRANO

Tickets at Kent's University Bookstore, Harvard Square, Cambridge

90

MAKES HER DEBUT WITH SYMPHONY

Miss Janacopulos Well Received at Concert
in Cambridge

Post Nov. 14 / 19

BY OLIN DOWNES

Miss Vera Janacopulos, soprano, made her debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, at the concert given last night in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge. She is a young woman in her early 20's, of Grecian descent, born in Brazil, educated musically in Paris, where she studied, first as a violinist under the composer, Enesco, and later as a vocalist, making here debut in the French capital in 1914.

SANG RUSSIAN SONGS

She sang four Russian songs with extraordinary authority and eloquence. Miss Janacopulos is doubly fortunate in her musical endowments, since she has a voice of the most uncommon range, freshness and capacity for dramatic expression, and has also the intelligence as a musician, which so many singers lack. She has even more intelligence than that. For there are musicians who know their business intelligently and well, as engineers, or dishwashers, or dentists know their business, without having very much imaginable or emotional sensibility.

91

But this woman, this Miss Janacopulos, is what she is evidently because of an unusually broad and well-informed mind. For one has to have a mind and use it to sing the four songs on last night's programme and do each one of them justice, when each song is entirely different in style and substance from the other.

"The Commander"

The first song was "The Commander," a surpassingly grim and dramatic song of Moussorgsky, inspired by the poem of Count Golenitcheff-Koutousoff, in which Death, at midnight, mounted on his charger, proudly surveys the ruin and the carnage of the battlefield and summons the dead to pass before him in review. It is a song which requires imagination as well as the most uncommon vocal and technical equipment. In all respects it seemed that Miss Janacopulos was equal to its demands, in the opening picture of battle, in the invocation to the night spreading its shadows over the fallen, in the apostrophe of the terrible commander—an extremely impressive performance.

Then there was the interpretation of Rimsky-Korsakoff's charming "The Rose Hath Charmed the Nightingale" and the poetic performance of Borodin's "Sleeping Princess," a performance, in contrast to "The Commander," astonishing in its atmosphere, its exquisite fineness of coloring, its intimate mood.

But perhaps the most unusual achievement of the singer was the interpretation of Moussorgsky's "Gathering Mushrooms"—mushrooms which are apt to poison the white haired husband and pave the way for the indulgence of the passion of the young bride. There was then the feeling of peasant patois, which could never be translated into English, of irony, of menace underneath the lilting, strangely rythmed, folk-like character of the music. These were songs that displayed equally the intelligence, temperament and vocal resource of the singer. Unless all signs fall there is in Miss Janacopulos a singer who will quickly take a very important position among her colleagues of the concert stage.

Other features of the concert was the appearance of Mr. Denayer, first violist of the orchestra, when he played the solo viola part with admirable finish and warmth of tone, of Berlioz' "Childe Harold" symphony, and the performance of George W. Chadwick's "The Angel of Death," which was well received.

92

5-1

93

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1919--20

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

FIFTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 14, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 15, AT 8 P. M.

BERLIOZ,

SYMPHONY in Four Movements, with Viola Solo.
op. 16. "Harold in Italy"

I. Harold in the Mountains; Scenes of Melancholy, Happiness and Joy: Adagio; Allegro

II. March of Pilgrims Singing their Evening Hymn; Allegretto.

III. Serenade of a Mountaineer of the Abruzzi to his Mistress
Allegro assai; Allegretto

IV. Orgy of Brigands; Recollections of the preceding scenes Allegro frenetico

(VIOLA SOLO by Mr. Frederic Denayer)

FRANCK,

ARIA from "The Redemption"

CHADWICK,

SYMPHONIC POEM, "The Angel of Death"
(First time in Boston)

DUPARC, MOUSSORGSKY,
BLOCH,

SONGS with Orchestra,
"Invitation au Voyage"
"Hopak" Psalms 137 and 114

BEETHOVEN,

OVERTURE to "King Stephen," op. 117

Soloist:

POVLA FRIJSH

Povla Frijs

BERLIOZ FIRST ON PROGRAM

"Harold in Italy" Played Romantically by Symphony Orchestra

DENAYER, NEW FIRST VIOLA, TAKES SOLOS

By PHILIP HALE

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Berlioz, Symphony, "Harold in Italy"; Franck, the archangel's air from "The Redemption"; Chadwick, Symphonic poem "The Angel of Death" (first time in Boston); songs with orchestra: Duparc, Invitation au voyage; Moussorgsky, Hopak; Block, Psalms 137 and 114; Beethoven, overture to "King Stephen." Mme. Povla Frijs was the singer.

The symphony of Berlioz goes back to 1834. It is not easy for us to understand those romantic years. Even pianists today, as a rule, go to the barber once a month. They no longer wear a sombrero; their cravats are not flowing, but as formal as those seen in the street car and magazine advertisements of collars encircling the necks of orthodox young men. Only a little while ago a London critic wondered at a composer for setting music to an early poem of William Morris and wondered still more at the courage of a Mr. Mullings in singing it. But romanticism, Byronic romanticism, was in the Parisian air when Berlioz wrote this symphony. "Anthony" and "The Tower of Nesle" had only recently been played. Honest citizens, as well as artists, tried to resemble Boccage, the actor; sombre, melancholy, mysterious, amorous, ferocious in passion, a man with the "air fatal." to wonder that Berlioz, wildly romantic throughout his life, was romantic in his music until he dreamed of Virgilian classicism, writing his "Trojans."

"Harold in Italy" was a remarkable work in 1834; it is remarkable in certain ways in 1919. It is true that some in London, Oxford and New York can see Berlioz only as a poorly equipped musical poseur. They say the same of Liszt; but no man was more terribly in earnest. The "March of Pilgrims" is not the only movement of this symphony that has preserved its strange and haunting beauty, with the still famous constant interruption in the rhythmic flow. The introduction is still poetic; the Serenade is still piquant. For the first time at these concerts one heard the "Orgy of Brigands" played with the fitting wildness and recklessness, and Berlioz's reference to "brazen throats belching forth blasphemies" did not seem mere hifalutin. The whole symphony, in fact, was played romantically, as Berlioz understood that word, as far as the orchestra was concerned.

Mr. Denayer, the new first viola played the solo measures in a thoroughly artistic manner. That was expected, for his reputation had preceded him. His tonal purity, his technical skill, his phrasing—all these were to be highly praised. Yet his performance could hardly be called romantic; it was rather academic. There was a lack of abandon. The player of this music should be a man, "a panache," to borrow a term from the French actor's slang.

Mr. Chadwick's symphonic poem was first played in New York at a concert in the memory of Theodore Roosevelt by the Symphony Society, led by Walter Damrosch to whom the work is dedicated. It was suggested by Mr. French's bas-relief "Death and the Sculptor." The music expresses what the musician saw and felt in the sculpture. The opening, in fiery Straussian vein reminds one of the sculptor's towering ambition. Even in the height of his power, there are orchestral hints at the staying hand of relentless death. The hand is stayed. "Cut is the branch that might have grown full straight." After the lamentation comes the apotheosis, or as Mr. Chadwick himself says: "It may be that the last part suggests eventually the artist's ascent to the Parnassus of which he dreamed. But it might also be a meorial for every artist who has given his life during the war—although not so originally intended." The work is firmly knit, soundly constructed, sonorous, and as such it was warmly received by the audience.

After Beethoven's "Prometheus" overture we have already had this season the overture to "King Stephen." Let us hope that Mr. Monteux will not think it his duty to exhume other long buried overtures of Beethoven. Mr. Gericke, by nature a kindly soul, had a fatal passion for the "Dedication of the House." This "King Stephen" over-

There will be no Rehearsal and Concert next week

Viola Frijsh

BERLIOZ FIRST ON PROGRAM

"Harold in Italy" Played
Romantically by Sym-
phony Orchestra

DENAYER, NEW FIRST VIOLA, TAKES SOLOS

By PHILIP HALE

The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Berlioz, Symphony, "Harold in Italy"; Franck, the archangel's air from "The Redemption"; Chadwick, Symphonic poem, "The Angel of Death" (first time in Boston); songs with orchestra: Duparc, Invitation au voyage, Moussorgsky, Hopak; Block, Psalms 127 and 114; Beethoven, overture to "King Stephen." Mme. Viola Frijsh was the singer.

The symphony of Berlioz goes back to 1831. It is not easy for us to understand those romantic years. Even pianists today, as a rule, go to the barber once a month. They no longer wear a sombrero; their cravats are not flowing, but as formal as those seen in the street car and magazine advertisements of collars encircling the necks of orthodox young men. Only a little while ago a London critic wondered at a composer for setting music to an early poem of William Morris and wondered still more at the courage of a Mr. Mullings in singing it. But romanticism, Byronic romanticism, was in the Parisian air when Berlioz wrote this symphony. "Anthony" and "The Tower of Nesle" had only recently been played. Honest citizens, as well as artists, tried to resemble Beethoven, the actor; sombre, melancholy, mysterious, amorous, ferocious in passion, a man with the "air fatal." to wonder that Berlioz, wildly romantic throughout his life, was romantic in his music until he dreamed of Virgilian classicism, writing his "Trojans."

"Harold in Italy" was a remarkable work in 1824; it is remarkable in certain ways in 1919. It is true that some in London, Oxford and New York can see Berlioz only as a poorly equipped musical poseur. They say the same of Liszt; but no man was more terribly in earnest. The "March of Pilgrims" is not the only movement of this symphony that has preserved its strange and haunting beauty, with the still famous constant interruption in the rhythmic flow. The introduction is still poetic; the Serenade is still piquant. For the first time at these concerts one heard the "Orgy of Brigands" played with the fitting wildness and recklessness, and Berlioz's reference to "brazen throats belching forth blasphemies" did not seem mere hifalutin. The whole symphony, in fact, was played romantically, as Berlioz understood that word, as far as the orchestra was concerned.

Mr. Denayer, the new first viola played the solo measures in a thoroughly artistic manner. That was expected, for his reputation had preceded him. His tonal purity, his technical skill, his phrasing—all these were to be highly praised. Yet his performance could hardly be called romantic; it was rather academic. There was a lack of abandon. The player of this music should be a man, "a panache," to borrow a term from the French actor's slang.

Mr. Chadwick's symphonic poem was first played in New York at a concert in the memory of Theodore Roosevelt by the Symphony Society, led by Walter Damrosch to whom the work is dedicated. It was suggested by Mr. French's bas-relief "Death and the Sculptor." The music expresses what the musician saw and felt in the sculpture. The opening, in fiery Straussian vein reminds one of the sculptor's towering ambition. Even in the height of his power, there are orchestral hints at the staying hand of relentless death. The hand is stayed. "But is the branch that might have grown full straight." After the lamentation comes the apotheosis, or as Mr. Chadwick himself says: "It may be that the last part suggests eventually the artist's ascent to the Parnassus of which he dreamed. But it might also be a meorial for every artist who has given his life during the war—although not so originally intended." The work is firmly knit, soundly constructed, sonorous, and as such it was warmly received by the audience.

After Beethoven's "Prometheus" overture we have already had this season the overture to "King Stephen." Let us hope that Mr. Monteux will not think it his duty to exhume other long buried overtures of Beethoven. Mr. Gericke, by nature a kindly soul, had a fatal passion for the "Dedication of the House." This "King Stephen" overture is frankly theatre music for an occasion. The King Stephen is not as some might think the thrifty English monarch sung by Iago, whose breeches, according to the old song, "cost him but a crown. He held them sixpence all too dear. With that he call'd the tailor, lown." No this Stephen was of Hungary, the Apostolic King, who for his pious work was canonized. The overture is part of the stage music for Kotzebue's play "Hungary's First Benefactor," produced at the opening of a new theatre at Budapest over 100 years ago. It is said that a little joyous theme in the overture is of a Hungarian gypsy nature; but this gypsy was corseted and most discreet; she never danced for the officers and wandering Englishmen.

There will be no Rehearsal and Concert next week

The exquisite art of Mme. Frijsch, who last season was Mme. Frisch, has often been applauded in this city. In a hall of reasonable size, she is a most interesting singer, by virtue of her interpretative skill. In Symphony Hall, intimacy is not easily established. We have yet to hear any music from Franck's "Redemption" that is fully worthy of that great master. Perhaps a woman with a clarion voice might make the Archangel's air impressive. One of the chief features of the concert was Mme. Frijsch's singing of Duparc's beautiful "Invitation au Voyage," music that out-views even the beauty of Baudelaire's verse. The enchanting orchestral accompaniment was heard here for the first time, according to our recollection. The delivery of "Hopak" was roguish rather than rowdy, and this song should be sung with a touch of vulgarity. The woman of the song was not conspicuous for archness or refinement. And what shall be said of the strongly individual "Psalms" of Ernest Bloch? His music is his own; there is no music like it. "By the Rivers of Babylon" is a mighty wail. "When Israel Went Out of Egypt" is changed with the spirit of fanatical exultation. Strange and overpowering music! We know of no more original composer. Mr. Bloch has been quoted as saying that, superficially, his music is not Jewish at all; yet these "Psalms" are the full expression of characteristics that have long been associated with the race that worshipped the one God in the desert and in the Temple; the warlike, fiery, persecuted, oppressed, yet hopeful, race from which sprang the poets of the Psalms and the prophecies. Only a woman imbued with the artistic spirit would have dared to sing this extraordinary music before a miscellaneous audience. She sang it as though she were the voice of the race. To hear these songs is worth a pilgrimage.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Handel, Concerto for strings, No. 5 in D major; Balakireff, "Thamar," Symphonic Poem; Dukas, overture, "Polyeucte" (first time at these concerts); Schmitt, Suite, "The Tragedy of Salome."

BRILLIANT CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Post Nov. 15, 1919
Povla Frijsch, Danish

Soprano, Appears
as Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

Povla Frijsch, the Danish soprano, was soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra given under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Frederick Denayer, first violist of the orchestra, played the solo part in the performance of Berlioz' "Childe Harold" symphony. George W. Chadwick's symphonic poem, "The Angel of Death," was played for the first time at these concerts. The programme came to an end with Beethoven's seldom played overture to "King Stephen."

BLOCH'S SETTING OF PSALMS

The most novel and seizing feature of this concert was Ernest Bloch's settings of Psalms 137 and 114 for soprano voice and orchestra. These songs were interpreted with very dramatic feeling by Mme. Frijsch. They require an uncommonly gifted interpreter. On the other hand, there is music so vital, so human in its feeling, so strong in its inspiration that it would be difficult indeed, even for incompetent artists, to kill it.

Mr. Bloch's music for the two Psalms is in this category. It is profoundly emotional. Its powerful sensuality—if such a phrase may be used in conjunction with the expression of emotional and religious feeling which is fanatical—gives it a poignancy, a force and color, hardly surpassed as regards these particular qualities by any music written today. And like most of the great music, examination or analysis of these compositions reveals their fundamental simplicity of workmanship and utterance.

Profoundly Hebraic

Very strong dissonances, the most telling effects, are the result of equally strong, simple harmonies welded together or set one against the other. The feeling of the music is profoundly Hebraic, as the composer would have it. Its orientalism is anything but the orientalism of the pseudo or decorative order. It is racial, it comes from the very well-springs of the racial consciousness of the tribes of Israel.

The orchestra coloring is gorgeous, and yet not cloying, not fussed with, or invented for the sake of coloristic effects. Instead, it appears as the one inevitable garment of the musical thought. There is also the immense rhythmic life of the music. How a few notes, a recurring rhythmic pattern, can give a hearer the impression of being in the midst of creation itself, can communicate the sensation of the vast rushing tides of life, is one of the eternal and glorious mysteries of music. That is the impression of this music, whether its mood be lofty, ecstatic, or a mood of barbaric glorification, triumph, revolt, defiance of the enemies of Israel. The music smoulders with never dying fire, or it breaks out in harsh, fanatical objurgations, or it laments with an Eastern wail, an intensity of feeling, indescribable to those incapable of spiritual sympathy with any racial spirit but their own and oblivious of such expressive power as the power of this splendid, true, sincere music of Ernest Bloch.

Mme. Frijsch's Singing

Mme. Frijsch appeared to be in excellent voice. The tone had a freshness and vibrancy to the ear which were more rather than less in evidence than on the many occasions when she has given song recitals in smaller concert halls in Boston. Why she should have chosen what is to us the stupid air from Franck's "Redemption" ("Le roi dont vous vantez la gloire") is a puzzle. (For surely it is not merely personal idiosyncrasy on the part of a reviewer which calls this music stupid and sentimental.) The later songs were those in which the singer shone at her best, such as the haunting melancholy of Duparc's exquisite "L'Invitation au voyage" in which she was inimitable, and in the taxing music of Bloch.

Among other attributes of a consummate artist, Mme. Frijsch has the feeling for breadth, for big, dramatic utterance, where this is required. At the same time, and while she gave much pleasure, she is primarily the singer for intimate gatherings and audiences of poets and musicians. In a song such as Moussorgsky's Hopak we prefer a coarser style than hers habitually is. In this song the tavern wench carouses and cajoles her old man, and from the bottom of her lusty, coarse soul snaps her fingers at fate and shouts her unconquerable joy in living.

Chadwick's Tone Poem

Mr. Chadwick's tone poem was inspired by Daniel Chester French's bas-relief, "Death and the Sculptor." "The young sculptor is represented as just raising his chisel to attack his work when the Angel of Death, a shadowy figure, puts out an arresting hand." In Mr. Chadwick's tone poem, as in Richard Strauss' "Tod und Verklärung," there is the thought of the dauntless effort toward an ideal struggle with the King of Terrors, and a triumphant apotheosis. The piece is concise, well put together, but not very original. Strauss was thoughtless in forestalling Mr. Chadwick.

Of the Berlioz symphony, to speak last of the first item of the programme, Mr. Monteux gave a very brilliant and finished performance. The effect was heightened by the warm tone and the musicianly treatment of the viola part by the newcomer to the orchestra, Mr. Denayer. At least one side of the genius of Berlioz was admirably accentuated the side of the colorist, of the musical painter of scenes of nature, of the artist who, while his turbulent genius at times made him leap clear over technical obstacles or scout them in a way as contemptuous as it was clumsy, nevertheless had at the bottom of his soul the typically French feeling for fineness, precision, clarity of thought and expression. The symphony—or three movements of the four heard by the reviewer—never sounded more beautiful and more interesting in its multiplicity of ingenious details. Whether it had enough of romantic madness, of Byronic pose and 1830 extravagance and abandon is another question on which each hearer will have his own opinion. This was but one of the interesting features of a very brilliant concert.

Symphony Tickets For Sale

I have two tickets for the rest of the series of Symphony concerts. I am leaving Boston and forced to dispose of them. The seats are together and excellently placed in the rear of the floor clear of the balcony. Twenty concerts. Price $40 for the two. D. L. MCCOY, 10 State St. (A):

FOR SALE SYMPHONY TICKET FOR SATURDAY EVENINGS

Front row, second balcony, centre; twenty concerts, $20. Apply to R. W. R., No. 905 Beacon St., Boston. SW(A) n 8

POVLA FRIJSCH IN FINE VOICE

Advs. Nov. 16/19
Denayer's Work on Viola
Also Effective at Symphony Concert

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

PROGRAM.

Berlioz, "Harold Symphony."
Franck, Aria from "The Redemption."
Soloist, Mme. Povla Frijsch.
Chadwick, "Angel of Death" (symphonic poem)
Songs with Orchestra.
Chabrier, Bourree Fantasque.

There were practically two soloists, for the viola part in the Berlioz "Harold Symphony" is more than an obligato. It was first composed as the solo part of a viola concerto for Paganini.

It was a great pleasure to hear Frederick Denayer in this effective work. The viola is the very Cinderella of the orchestra, with the violin and the violoncello as its proud sisters, and there is a very scant repertoire of really great music for this instrument. Yet it is the very embodiment of brooding sorrow, of pensive melancholy, and it pictures Byron's hero as no other instrument could do.

BELL EFFECTS EXCELLENT.

From its first entrance, supported by the harp, until its gasping, dying phrases, in the final orgie, it dominated the work, portraying sadness amid the charm of the mountains, against the serenity of religion, and even in the merry-making of the innocent rustics.

M. Denayer was naturally much applauded at the end. He played most artistically and with great expression. A word of praise may be given to the bell effects of harp and horn of the second movement, and the orgie of the brigands was read by M. Monteux with just the wild fury that Berlioz desired.

What sensational finales this composer has made! The introduction of a touch of the litany of the monks, in this carousal shows the master of contrasts. The first movement was taken with more spirit and vigor than we have ever heard given to it, a masterly reading, but we could have enjoyed a little more abandon in the third movement. The symphony was, however, one of M. Monteux's marked successes.

Of Mme. Frijsch's solos we found Bloch's setting of two psalms, the most effective. This composer is doing for Jewish music what Chopin did for Polish and Liszt for Hungarian. He manages to give the earnest spirit of his (original) Hebraic themes with an Old Testament loftiness which no other composer has attained. He does not try to build on Jewish tunes, which are of doubtful antiquity.

Mme. Frijsch was broad-toned and dramatic, and this found its best expression in the Bloch and the Musorgsky numbers. The Hopak was given with proper vigor, and the Bloch numbers, which were really orchestral tone poems with voice, were given great dramatic intensity.

Against this earnestness and in contrast with Childe Harold's sadness came the finale of the concert with Beethoven's King Stephen Overture, not one of the master's greatest, but so seldom heard that it was fitting to lift it from obsolescence.

"ANGEL OF DEATH."

It remains only to speak of Mr. Chadwick's new work, "The Angel of Death." He has taken an exalted and transcendental subject for this tone poem. Death has arrested the work of the artist, but transfiguration follows death as in Richard Strauss' greatest work, the glory of his achievements lives on beyond his own mortal career.

The topic was suggested by a bas-relief by Daniel Chester French, entitled "Death and the Sculptor." As Mr. Chadwick's beautiful "Aphrodite" was also inspired by a statue, we can see in such works the correlation of the arts.

The tone poem is dramatic and is written for a large, modern orchestra, which the composer handles with his accustomed skill. There is a bold and fiery beginning, but there are premonitions of doom even in the early measures. These lead to some effective contrasts and climaxes. It is easy to recognize the advent of Death and the heart-throbs dying away on kettledrum. The threnody of lamentation which follows is strikingly earnest.

But death has not ended all; the work of the artist lives, and the music tells a story that the bas-relief could not complete; there is a glorious crescendo leading on to final triumph. The apotheosis of the motive on the brasses at the end is a noble climax. The use of the trombones and tuba is brief, but remarkably telling, and the motto at the end of the work might well be: "Oh, Death, where is thy sting? Where, grave, thy victory?"

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Trans. — Nov. 15, 1919
SONGS AND A SINGER EXCEL ALL THE REST

Mme. Frijsch for the First Time with the Orchestra—Two Psalms in Music Like the Speech of Hebrew Prophets — The Subtle Beauties of Duparc—Franck and Musorgsky Besides — Beethoven Trifles and Berlioz Fades

WITH one exception the songs of the singer were the most interesting items in the Symphony Concert of yesterday—more interesting than the singer herself. Though she was Mme. Frijsch, far more interesting than the three purely orchestral numbers. The exception was her first piece, the air of the archangel from Franck's hybrid symphony inbred upon oratorio, "The Redemption." Whether the air is more commonplace and tedious than the "symphonic piece" drawn from the same source and played to surfeit in Boston last season is for casuists in dulness to decide. At the beginning, when the archangel proclaims the descent of Jesus to earth, stand two or three score measures bright with Franckian luminosity; in the progress of the music are occasional periods of Franckian spiritual ecstasy. The rest is inarticulate rapture or rapture articulate in the precious operatic manner of Meyerbeer and Halévy. Ah ces messieurs! whom Franck, curiously purblind on some sides, "venerated" when he set to oratorio. Moreover, is it not possible that the frequenters of the Symphony Concerts have heard quite enough for a while of the music of Franck, exalted, characteristic or merely routine? Early report affirmed a salutary resolution of Mr. Monteux to banish the Rabaudian excess of Franck and Saint-Saëns from his programmes. May he hold firmly to it.

One more of Mme. Frijsch's numbers might also pass in the routine of the day—Rimsky-Korsakov's orchestral version of Musorgsky's "Hopak," thrice and four times familiar "with piano" in the concerts of "favorite" singers. Even Mme. Gluck there essays it, makes it "captivating." To captivate, however, was probably the least of the composer's purposes when the verse stirred him, when he set music above it. Once more he would characterize and in the rhythmic beat of Russian folk-tune—characterize a blowsy, full-fed wench, lusty for liquor, a rude dance and two-fisted companions, screaming out her scorn and jollities. Musorgsky whips her through a becomingly larruping music and is appropriately accented. She is too hackneyed for the Symphony Concerts. Better leave her, prettyfied, for an uneasy seat in Mme. Gluck's parlor. Moreover, Mme. Frijsch is not altogether the singer. In spite of her many distinctions, for either Franck's air or Musorgsky's song. Rather, because of those very distinctions she falls short of both. Her voice is not large, her vocal method and manner are not sweeping; least of all is she declamatory; whereas Franck's music, if it is to come to life at all, seeks amplitude, even bombast. Mme. Frijsch is a singer of fine sensibilities, of adroit refinements. Musorgsky's woman is loud-mouthed and leering; his music characterizes her.

Two more of Mme. Frijsch's pieces, and the more novel among them, suffered likewise from the limitations of her song—Mr. Bloch's settings of the Psalm of David in which captive Israel laments in bitterness "by the waters of Babylon" and of the other Psalm in which Israel released goes "out of Egypt," elate upon an earth starting its joy. In both the singer altogether comprehended the substance and the symbols, the imagery and the passion of text and music. At every turn she enriched both with the keen, fine play of her penetrating mind and assimilating spirit. Yet Mr. Bloch exacts a vocal power, an unabating eloquence of transmission that Mme. Frijsch's tones may hardly compass and by no means maintain. He has written the orchestral parts accordingly. In sum, he is as one who would mould direct, yet hardly unsophisticated, musical means to barbaric force of utterance. Mme. Frijsch apprehends and plies the means, seeks the force, but by inexorable limitations of tone may not sweep into it. She sings the Psalms as a single penetrating voice in the multitude of wailing or rejoicing Israel. Though Mr. Bloch chose to write for one such voice, yet did he hear the host.

A truly remarkable, a highly individual, a piercing yet tumultuous music are these settings. Israel wails in what at first perception seem monotonous rhythms, but they beat, beat, beat the listening imagination into responsive emotion. Israel wails in stark reiterated phrases—until in all the world there is no solace for it except proud passion for its own Jerusalem and as proud hate for Babylon, captor—and doomed. Bitter and wild and fierce is this lamenting; acrid, savage through the tones stalk pride and hate. These are the elemental passions for which Mr. Bloch, whether his means be simple or intricate, finds as elemental utterance. No wonder placid suburbia, perhaps recalling Mr. Rabaud's easy entertainments for the elderly, wondered what this fuss was all about, recoiled, resented it.

For background rose Mr. Bloch's orchestral voices, plangent, pulsant, penetrating, like to the bare, bold imagery of the Hebrew prophets. Now and then they set sharp edge upon the singer's phrases; once and again out of them flashed the swarthy faces, the gleaming eyes of the lamenting or the rejoicing tribe; always they were the work of a composer in whom an individual technique, darting through many a detail, is the servant of as individual and dauntless imagination. As Jeremiah lamented, so laments Mr. Bloch for captive Jewry; as Isaiah flamed in imagery, so he lays fire to harmonies and timbres.

In tones of like power for the new passion, as savage and acrid of voice, out of kindred barbaric background, in similar boldness of musical image and starkness of musical progress, Israel exults, vaunts its God of Jacob, domineers over an earth possessed, as it fondly believes, of its joy. A tilde mouths defiant through the proud might that bids the earth, the mountains upon it, the waters within it, do the Jewish will. Had the major prophets of Israel written music, they might have held Mr. Bloch's pen. Individual beyond most composers of our time, he can yet set tribes into music—a whole race even, in its fierce barbaric day.

Franck trite and theatrical, Musorgsky a-slumming, Bloch tribal and tumultuous, plangent and piercing—Mme. Frijsh ranged widely when she added to them the Duparc and Baudelaire of "L' Invitation au Voyage." The verse swims in sensuous haze, conjures misty image of scent, color, light, trappings, vistas; pulses with wistful languors, faintly tingles with amorous excitements. Akin is the jewelled music, whether the singing voice bears it, whether the orchestral voices melt together within it—music of murmurous flow and soft lustre, of the sights and sounds of dream, of the subtleties of erotic sensation. Bloch's acridly sensual song bites and cries aloud; Duparc's supersensuous song quivers, gleams, pales and is still. Here at last was music for Mme. Frijsh's present voice and familiar imagination, for the new brightness and suavity of her song, for the old finesse of moulded phrase and colored tone, for her sensibilities, her subtleties, her skill in veiled suggestion. With Duparc and Baudelaire, she also wrought beauty.

Big as they relatively were, the symphonic pieces of the day seemed but paltry things beside these Psalms of Bloch, this song of Duparc. True, Beethoven signed one of them, the overture, "King Stephen," and Berlioz another, the symphony, "Harold in Italy." Yet that particular Beethoven is no more than a composer faithfully fulfilling a commission to prelude a play, picking up a neat little, nice little gypsy motif, scattering a few trumpet-calls where they will do the most good, piling up the inevitable chords at the end, contriving to be both ceremonial and amusing, not so easy a task as it seems as many a maker of music, similarly charged and laboring for festal occasion, will cheerfully or reluctantly confess. Only the prigs would feed in the arts upon an everlasting diet of masterpieces; every real artist has made his trifles, his "pieces of occasion" happy and unashamed. Better decennial entertainment from "King Stephen" than annual repetition of "Leonora," "Coriolanus" and "Egmont." No conductor long overlooks those classics; Mr. Monteux was wise and pleasurable when he condescended—once with "Prometheus" and again with "King Stephen" to Beethoven off pedestal.

Moreover, the overture is still a bright music whereas Berlioz's symphony sounds as faded in general as did yesterday the particular voice of Harold in the thin light tone, the impassive progress, the colorless performance of Mr. Denayer at the first viola. Mr. Féris's peer hardly sits as yet in his place. "The March of Pilgrims Singing Their Evening Hymn" still tinkles upon the ear; pungently Italian is the mountaineer's serenade; in the finale is a deal of romantic rodomontade, in which Mr. Monteux properly laid on and spared not; out of the first movement still drips romantic fullness of mood. Little streams of music, these down a symphonic water-course long since run dry under the changing suns of new times and new fashions in the arts of expression. The museum—in the cabinet of Romanticism A. D. 1830—is the place for "Harold in Italy, Symphony in Four Movements with Viola Solo." Not often need conductors bear it hence for performance. The Berlioz of the Fantastic Symphony, of Romeo and Juliet, of the overtures, of "The Damnation of Faust" needs no successes of curiosity. . . . And also there was Mr. Chadwick's new tone-poem, "The Angel of Death." If it did not exactly provoke admiration, it did summon reflections. Let them wait, bye and large, until Monday.

H. T. PARKER

Music in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, Massachusetts — Hector

Berlioz wrote the "Harold in Italy" Symphony in 1824. Had he written it in this year of grace he would doubtless have called it a Symphonic Poem in Four Parts. It is doubtful, though, whether he would have made any other changes. The symphony is strikingly, stirringly modern, both in its freedom from convention in writing and in its coloring. Every once in a while some conductor takes this work off the shelves and plays it to the delight and interest of his audience and no matter how good a conductor he may be, the chief glory on the occasion goes to the composer. In the Friday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on November 14, Mr. Monteux gave a reading of the second and third movements that was both stimulating and satisfying. It is doubtful if any conductor could hold the interest of an audience throughout the first movement, although Mr. Monteux had done some judicious arranging and had made a few cuts in it. The last movement, "The Orgy of the Brigands," doubtless was meant by Berlioz to portray a merry, capering crowd, but the brigands of Mr. Monteux were rather tamed and subdued. Mr. Denayer, the new leader of the viola section of the orchestra, had his chance to show what he could do in this symphony and the impression he made was distinctly favorable. He too took liberties with the score and did not attempt certain difficult octaves in the third movement, but his tone was smooth and flexible and his phrasing most artistic.

Two men who are writing music at the present day were in the audience to hear their works performed, George W. Chadwick of Boston and Ernest Bloch of New York. Mr. Chadwick's symphonic poem, "The Angel of Death," and Mr. Bloch's songs, "Psalm 137" and "Psalm 114," were heard for the first time in Boston. Between the two styles of writing affected by these men lies a great gulf. Mr. Chadwick's

FREDERIC DENAYER
One of the four best viola players at Boston

model quite palpably was Strauss, with occasional side glances at Wagner. Mr. Bloch's music followed only the pattern outlined by the inner necessity from which he wrote, but its exceeding richness of color and invention betokened the genius of the writer. His songs were interpreted by Mme. Povla Frijsh, whose artistry in song cannot be questioned, but whose voice unfortunately lacked the volume necessary for this concert room.

Mr. Monteux in putting on the program Beethoven's Overture to "King Stephen" instead of one of the overtures too familiar through repetition by past conductors did his audience a service, if only to show them that Jove sometimes nods.

MME FRIJSH SINGS WITH THE SYMPHONY

Adequate Performance in an Exacting Field

Berlioz, Beethoven and Chadwick
Rendered by the Orchestra

Povla Frijs, soprano, was the soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert, the fifth of the series. She sang the aria of the archangel from Franck's "Redemption." "L'Invitation au Voyage."

Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," Symphony, with its superbly economical orchestration, its vividness that sometimes lapses into sentimentality or bombast, and its absence of cumulative effect is too familiar to require much comment. Mr. Denayer gave a good performance of the viola solo and Mr. Monteux did full justice to Berlioz in his reading.

The "King Stephen" overture of Beethoven, which is seldom played nowadays, is not a masterpiece partly because its several themes do not seem to belong together, since they neither blend well nor contrast well. Yet nothing by Beethoven can ever be without interest to listeners critically minded toward music.
His methods are more readily seen in his minor works than in his masterpieces.

Mr. Chadwick deserved the applause which compelled him to rise in his place and bow after the performance of his new Symphonic Poem inspired by Mr.
French's bas relief at Forest Hills Cemetery, "The Angel of Death." The piece is one of the best of recent American compositions. This program will be repeated tonight at 8.

FRÉDÉRIC DÉSIÉ DENAYER was born at Paris, March 9, 1878, of a French father and an English mother. As a boy he sang in Parisian churches and at the age of fourteen went to England to sing at a royal marriage. At the Paris Conservatory he studied the violin with Garcin and Marsick. In 1896 as a pupil of Laforge he took with H. L. Brun a second prize for viola playing. No first prize was awarded that year, the first year in the history of the Conservatory that there was competition for the viola prize, although prizes had been awarded for violin playing since An V. (1797). In 1897 Mr. Denayer took the first prize. The composition played in competition was Rougnon's Concerto romantique in F minor. Mr. Denayer has since been active in Parisian musical life. For twelve years he was first viola of the Opéra and of Colonne's orchestras. He has appeared as soloist at the Lamoureux concerts; he has played at the Concerts Monteux under
Mr. Monteux; he has taken part in the concerts of the Parisian Quartet, Quartet Hayot, Quartet Parent, and the Trompette.

Madam POVLA FRIJSH (FRISCH) was born at Marstal, Denmark.
She studied singing in Paris with Mme. Sarah de Lande; in the United States with Mrs. Sarah Robinson Duff. Her first public appearance of importance in Paris was in May, 1910, when Alfred Cortot accompanied her. As a young singer she had already made tours with Raoul Pugno, pianist; also Pablo Casals, violoncellist.
From 1910 to 1915 she sang frequently with Parisian orchestras, with celebrated visiting conductors, in chamber concerts, and in recitals.
She gave recitals also in London, Copenhagen, and cities of Switzerland.
Her first recital in New York was on November 10, 1915. Her first recital in Boston was on December 15, 1915. On February 17, 1916, she sang with the Cecilia Society. She gave a recital on January 6, 1917; on January 21 she took part with Miss Winifred Christie, pianist, and the Longy Club in a concert at Symphony Hall; on February 14 she sang with the Cecilia; on March 21 she sang at a concert given by Mr. Longy and Miss Longy. She gave a recital on March 6, 1919.

SYMPHONY HALL
SUNDAY AFTERNOON, NOVEMBER 16, AT 3.00

Thirty-third Concert for the Benefit of the Orchestra's

PENSION FUND

BY THE
Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

PROGRAMME

Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 6 ("Pathetic") in B minor, Op. 74
I. Adagio; Allegro non troppo.
II. Allegro con grazia.
III. Allegro molto vivace.
IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso.

Wagner Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde"

Saint-Saëns Pianoforte Concerto No. 2 in G minor
I. Andante sostenuto.
II. Allegretto scherzando.
III. Presto.

Rossini Overture to "William Tell"

SOLOIST
MAGDELEINE BRARD

STEINWAY PIANO USED

MME FRIJSH SINGS WITH THE SYMPHONY

Adequate Performance in
an Exacting Field

Berlioz, Beethoven and Chadwick
Rendered by the Orchestra

Povia Frijsh, soprano, was the soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert, the fifth of the series. She sang the aria of the archangel from Franck's "Redemption," Duparc's "L'Invitation au Voyage," Moussorgsky's "Hopak" and two psalms by Ernest Bloch. Those in the audience who had heard her in recital must have felt that she did not quite do herself justice, except in Duparc's song.

Her performance was always adequate and she proved from the opening notes of the Franck aria that her voice can fill the great hall with a clear resonant tone. Her diction and phrasing were correct and her interpretation was intelligent throughout. But there are many singers capable of giving a workmanlike performance of oratorio numbers and only two or three in this generation who can give as delicate and finished versions of lyrics like "L'Invitation au Voyage" as hers.

It is a tour de force for her to sing big, magniloquent arias. Nor is she unsurpassed as an intense and dramatic interpreter, such as her numbers from Bloch and Moussorgsky demand. The two Psalms are meant by their composer to be cries from the soul of the Jewish people. They are profoundly tragic in their eloquence and nobility, but somewhat incoherent.

Mme Frijsh can convey the impressionistic incoherence of Beaudelaire and Duparc, but she is less successful with the prophetic vagueness of the Old Testament and Bloch. The crude vigor of the Russian peasants in "Hopak" is equally beyond any cultivated, modern interpreter, whose gift is pre-eminently lyric, as hers is.

She lacks the dramatic power to recreate in her singing moods hopelessly alien to our modern civilization, as are those of Russian peasants and Jewish psalmists. By compensation she can polish and quicken those indeterminate desires most of us suffer from for the "Voyage" to a world where we may find nothing but "order, beauty, luxury, calm and delight," the world of the exquisite refrain of Duparc's song, as few singers can.

Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," Symphony, with its superbly economical orchestration, its vividness that sometimes lapses into sentimentality or bombast, and its absence of cumulative effect is too familiar to require much comment. Mr Denayer gave a good performance of the viola solo and Mr Monteux did full justice to Berlioz in his reading.

The "King Stephen" overture of Beethoven, which is seldom played nowadays, is not a masterpiece partly because its several themes do not seem to belong together, since they neither blend well nor contrast well. Yet nothing by Beethoven can ever be without interest to listeners critically minded toward music. His methods are more readily seen in his minor works than in his masterpieces.

Mr Chadwick deserved the applause which compelled him to rise in his place and bow after the performance of his new Symphonic Poem inspired by Mr French's last relief at Forest Hills Cemetery, "The Angel of Death." The piece is one of the best of recent American compositions. This program will be repeated tonight at 8.

SYMPHONY HALL
SUNDAY AFTERNOON, NOVEMBER 16, AT 3.00

Thirty-third Concert for the Benefit of the Orchestra's

PENSION FUND

BY THE
Boston Symphony Orchestra

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

PROGRAMME

Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 6 ("Pathetic") in B minor, Op. 74
I. Adagio; Allegro non troppo.
II. Allegro con grazia.
III. Allegro molto vivace.
IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso.

Wagner Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde"

Saint-Saëns Pianoforte Concerto No. 2 in G minor
I. Andante sostenuto.
II. Allegretto scherzando.
III. Presto.

Rossini Overture to "William Tell"

SOLOIST
MAGDELEINE BRARD

STEINWAY PIANO USED

No performer has ever created a more profound impression on an audience here than the little French girl who has achieved success on two continents.

CONCERT FOR PENSION FUND

Harold — Nov. 17 '19
Symphony Orchestra Gives Its 33d Performance of the Kind

GIRL PIANIST WINS GREAT TRIUMPH

At Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon the Symphony Orchestra gave its first Pension Fund concert for this season and the 33d in the whole list of them. The soloist was Magdeleine Brard, the youthful pianist from France, who has won extraordinary praise for her playing in New York and other cities, since she came to America last year.

The orchestra played Tschalkowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," and Rossini's overture to "William Tell." Miss Brard's number was Saint-Saens's G Minor Concerto No. 2.

The hall was crowded, with many standing. A subdued air of solemnity overcast the throng and the orchestra, owing to the death of Maj. Higginson. There was some speculation whether an extra number would be played as a tribute to his memory, but this was hardly necessary, for the depth of lamentation in the final movement of Tschalkowsky's symphony and much of the music in the Wagner number were as appropriate as any musical memorial of the orchestra's founder and sustainer could have been. It was as if a prophetic inspiration had guided the choice of these two numbers for yesterday's concert. It is doubtful if either work was ever played with deeper or more poignant feeling.

Miss Brard's appearance and playing proved to be a revelation. It provided astonishment, admiration and abounding pleasure. As she came on the stage spectators gasped to see a little girl with wavy, unrestrained locks, dressed in a young misses' short white frock, come forward with the unconscious grace of a well-bred child and seat herself at the piano. One was reminded of the picture of the boy Mozart discovered at midnight at his spinet.

Then she began to play and the wonder grew and kept growing as the brilliance and power and intricacy of the concerto developed. Here plainly was no slip of a girl, no infant prodigy, but a youthful artist with marvellous skill, uncommon power, commanding surety in every ripple, trill or run and seeming maturity in feeling and expression. Old hands at piano concerts began to sit up and take notice as the finish, the lightness and firmness and tenderness of touch and emotion were revealed in the opening andante movement.

Then came the allegretto and zip! the little girl's audience was transported to a fairy wood filled with dancing and whirling sprites and gnomes and butterflies and darting birds and flashing waterfalls and a shimmering mystic light "n everything like that."

And the little girl was not playing any piano, just leading the whole big throng, orchestra men and all, in an elfin whirl, drawing them along with her and the fairies by the spell of some magical music with which she filled the wood, the trees, their dancing leaves, the nodding flowers and the spray of fountains.

In the final presto movement strong winds blew away the sprites and the gossamer butterflies and tore the leaves with great gusts and the little lady's followers were tossed about by the power and splendor of her mastery of music. Here, as in the fairy dance, the girlish mistress of their spirits, compelled obedience without a show of effort. She seemed to be doing nothing at all special, just filling the air with irresistible rhythm and harmony of which she was a living part. When she ended and the spell was broken there came a tornado of applause so sweeping and continuous that it threatened to smash the stone tablets of the ancient law against "extras" at a symphony concert. But it didn't.

Steinway Pianoforte used

MISS BRARD ACCLAIMED A VIRTUOSO

Wins Signal Triumph at Pension Fund Concert

Post Nov. 17
BY OLIN DOWNES

The pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, which was packed for the occasion.

The orchestral compositions were Tschaikowsky's "Symphonie Pathétique," Wagner's prelude and love-death from "Tristan and Isolde," and Rossini's overture to "William Tell." Miss Madeleine Brard, a first prize of the Paris Conservatoire, and now in her 16th year, played the Saint-Saens G-minor piano concerto.

WINS DESERVED TRIUMPH

Of this work Miss Brard, who was wildly applauded, gave a very brilliant performance. The music had sparkle, piquancy and great rhythmic life. Miss Brard has not only the fingers, she has the temperament of the virtuoso, the ability to excite an audience by the spirit and bravura of her playing. Qualities such as these are inherent in Saint-Saens' concerto.

This concerto has other qualities, too, in the opening movement, and it would be possible to take issue with Miss Brard concerning the playing of the more lyrical motives. But this is a detail and partly a matter of taste. Miss Brard won a deserved triumph. She played with musicianship, as well as lightness, accuracy, speed. However rapid the tempo, she never lost her grip on herself. Excellent schooling rather than strong individuality is now naturally in the ascendancy, so far as her interpretation is concerned, but this schooling she has assimilated. She knows why as well what she plays. She was heard to the best advantage in the second movement, which she played with exceptional grace and esprit, and in the dashing finale, after which she was recalled five or six times.

Tschaikowsky's Master Work

It is the custom in these days for the superfine musicians to decry the Tschaikowsky of the sixth or "Pathétique" symphony. These people disdain what they feel to be the coarseness and frequent ineptitudes of Tschaikowsky in his expression of overwhelming emotion. The sixth symphony was for years the great favorite of all of Tschaikowsky's symphonic works. Then it was played too much. Then weary reviewers came to prefer either the fourth or the fifth symphonies to the sixth. It is not easy for one reviewer, anyhow, to agree with them. For him, the Symphonie Pathétique remains, in point of musical inspiration, richness of workmanship and originality and unconventionality of form, Tschaikowsky's greatest symphonic achievement. Who has produced symphonic music more profound in its feeling than the finale of lamentation? What in modern music matches in elemental power and reckless fury the march, which is as if the hordes of all Asia were causing the earth to tremble at their mighty tread?

But there are those to whom this wild, defiant music is "coarse," "unrefined," and so on. To some, art must wear not only long skirts, but kid gloves! There are criticisms easily recognized as legitimate and logical of the first two movements; but the great passages in both of these movements will stand criticism for many years before they will yield place to works of sophisticated intellectuality or hyper-refinement, to which they are at present disadvantageously compared.

Should Be Heard Oftener

The "Symphonie Pathétique" should be played not only at Pension Fund concerts, as has been the case in late seasons, but also at the subscription concerts of Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings.

At the Pension Fund concerts, the public which is too busy or too full of cares during the week to listen to symphonic music attends with profound enjoyment performances by one of the greatest orchestras of orchestral masterpieces. The poignant music of Wagner and the great overture of Rossini thrilled the audience, which applauded the orchestra as well as the soloist to the echo.

Miss Brard More Than a Prodigy, Says Elson

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

THE week began very strongly with a pension fund concert, given by our orchestra in Symphony Hall, last Sunday afternoon. As if by prescience M. Monteux had placed Tschaikowsky's symphony of struggle and death on the program, and, while the "Pathétique" was being played, every auditor dedicated it to the memory of the noble founder of the orchestra, who had just passed away. The work brought memories of Mr. Emil Paur, who used to interpret it with our orchestra in an unapproachable manner. In this performance it was not so graphic, except in the third movement, which was performed with a truly barbaric fervor which suited its fierce military vein excellently. The "Tristan and Isolde" selection was very welcome, as indicating a restoration; the king has come into his own again. The "Wm. Tell Overture" was also brilliantly interpreted.

But the most marked success of the concert was the Boston debut of Madeleine Brard, a young miss of sixteen, who is more than a prodigy, who is in some respects a finished artist. She played St. Saens' G minor piano concerto, a work which has entirely dethroned Mendelssohn's concerto in the same key. She played it not as a well-learned lesson, but as well as any artist who has given it in Boston, not excepting the composer himself.

Yet in spite of all the fire that scintillated in the finale, we found the dainty Scherzo the chief glory of her performance. Here there was crisp delicacy and a hearty abandon that was elfin in character and must have aroused the most blase auditor.

We must hear her in more varied works before we can judge of her full scope, but that here is a great artist in embryo, a second Teresa Carrena, is certain. The young artist was recalled endlessly with wild enthusiasm. What with Rosita Renard a couple of weeks ago, and this young phenomenon last Sunday, the French young ladies are certainly in the limelight, and the Paris Conservatoire, from which both graduated, is proving that it has great piano teachers.

Hail Girl of 16 as Musical Marvel

Adv. Nov. 23/19

SYMPHONY patrons gasped when a small young person advanced upon their exclusive stage. Shaking her black curls, and primly arranging her short, white skirts, she sat herself at the piano. Like the child Mozart discovered at his spinet, she fingered the keys.

Then she began to play. Magdeleine Brard, Parisian pianist, had made her Boston debut. And, as she played, the wonder grew. Like fairy wings her little fingers flitted across the keys. Famous musicians leaned forward that they might not miss a note. Critics gasped. And as Magdeleine Brard played the tension grew.

Never in the history of the Boston Symphony concerts has a performer made so profound an impression as the little French pianist. In a blaze of glory she has left us. But the memory of her recital will linger throughout the seasons of many symphonies.

Though hailed today as the greatest prodigy of the piano since the childhood days of Josef Hofmann, little Mademoiselle Brard is as charmingly unaffected as a country school girl. Her youthful freshness quite contradicts the impression one gained at Symphony.

Before sailing for New York last winter, Magdeleine played for the benefit of the Red Cross at Bordeaux. General Winfield Scott, U. S. A., who was stationed there, was so delighted with her performance that he removed one of the stars from his shoulder and pinned it on the coat of the little lady whose genius had so charmed him.

The little girl in knee-length skirts laughed delightedly at the recollection.

"Don't you just love Yankee soldiers?" she questioned naively. "I adore them."

Modestly Mademoiselle recounted the tale of her triumphs. "I was fourteen," she said, "when the Prix d'Honneur was awarded me. I'm still terribly excited about it, for it's the highest prize the Conservatoire can bestow, you know. I was twelve when the Conservatoire gave me my first prize, and thirteen when I received the Prize of Excellence. All the awards were unanimous and coveted by the greatest pianists in France. I've wondered and wondered how the judges ever selected little me."

"My government has sent me to America, you know. They call me their 'representative artist,' though I'm sure I've never earned so proud a title."

"The real reason that my friends love my music is because I love it so myself. I practice for hours and hours every single blessed day, and it's the most fun I've ever had. They tell me that some girls hate to practice, but it isn't really so, is it?"

"I think that American girls are so nice, and so pretty. Though I visited the States on tour last year, I had so little time to make friends. This year I hope that I'll meet lots and lots of people."

"Won't you tell Boston folk that I appreciate so much the wondrous ovation they gave me, and that I do hope I may play again for them soon?"

GIRL SENSATION OF PENSION CONCERT

Miss Brard, 16, Mature
and Skillful Pianist

Magdeleine Brard's performance of Saint-Saens' Pianoforte Concerto No. 2 in G minor at yesterday's pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra created a very unusual sensation. Mr. Monteux and the orchestra joined enthusiastically in the violent and prolonged applause. She was recalled no less than six times at the end. There were cries of "Bravo" from the audience and she was given a bouquet from the orchestra. No debut in recent years has scored such great and well deserved success with a Symphony concert audience. What is more significant, no soloist within recent memory has ever been so applauded by the members of the orchestra itself.

There were murmurs of surprise in the audience when she first came on the stage. She is actually 16 but looks considerably younger. The solo passage at the beginning of the first movement, however, showed at once that she was not the "infant prodigy" her childish appearance betokened, but a player of mature strength, poise and skill, fairly comparable with men like Hofmann and Rachmaninoff.

Her playing has a breadth, force and dignity very rare in the performance of feminine pianists. Her massive chords and brilliant passage work are like those of the best male performers, rather than the work of a talented girl.

If there are three or four men living who could surpass her in passages where controlled strength is required, there is no one who could improve on her performance of the "Allegretto Scherzando" of this concerto. It has been heard here many times, but no one has ever come anywhere near equalling her interpretation of it.

She has the crisp phrasing, the firm yet delicate touch and the beautiful singing tone needed for an ideal performance. Best of all she does not sentimentalize, and yet is never academic. As a pupil of Cortot and a winner of a "first prize" at the Paris Conservatory she has, of course, been admirably trained. But only phenomenal ability could make it possible for a mere child to play as she does.

She is to be ranked with the youthful Hofmann and with Heifetz as an example of a young player whose performance is never immature. Her future appearances in Boston will be eagerly awaited by everyone who was lucky enough to hear her yesterday.

The rest of the concert brought routine performances of Tschalkowsky's "Pathetic" symphony and of the prelude and "Love-Death" from Wagner's "Tristan," which is "not of an age, but for all time."

A brilliant performance of Rossini's overture to "William Tell," which wears on the whole better than most of Tschalkowsky, was the concluding number. A very large audience enjoyed the concert.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1919--20

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SIXTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 21, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 22, AT 8 P. M.

IN MEMORY OF
HENRY LEE HIGGINSON

FOUNDER AND SUSTAINER OF
THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SCHUBERT,

SYMPHONY in B minor, (Unfinished)

- I. Allegro moderato
- II. Andante con moto

BRAHMS,

CONCERTO No. 2, in B flat major, for Pianoforte and Orchestra, op. 83

- I. Allegro non troppo
- II. Allegro appassionato
- III. Andante
- IV. Allegretto grazioso

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY No. 5, in C minor, op. 67

- I. Allegro con brio
- II. Andante con moto
- III. Allegro; Trio
- IV. Allegro

Soloist:

Mr. FELIX FOX

Mason & Hamlin Pianoforte

Before sailing for New York last Winter, Magdeleine played for the benefit of the Red Cross at Bordeaux. General Winfield Scott, U. S. A., who was stationed there, was so delighted with her performance that he removed one of the stars from his shoulder and pinned it on the coat of the little lady whose genius had so charmed him.

The little girl in knee-length skirts laughed delightedly at the recollection.

"Don't you just love Yankee soldiers?" she questioned naively. "I adore them."

Modestly Mademoiselle recounted the tale of her triumphs. "I was fourteen," she said, "when the Prix d'Honneur was awarded me. I'm still terribly excited about it, for it's the highest prize the Conservatoire can bestow, you know. I was twelve when the Conservatoire gave me my first prize, and thirteen when I received the Prize of Excellence. All the awards were unanimous and coveted by the greatest pianists in France. I've wondered and wondered how the judges ever selected little me."

"My government has sent me to America, you know. They call me their 'representative artist,' though I'm sure I've never earned so proud a title."

"The real reason that my friends love my music is because I love it so myself. I practice for hours and hours every single blessed day, and it's the most fun I've ever had. They tell me that some girls hate to practice, but it isn't really so, is it?"

"I think that American girls are so nice, and so pretty. Though I visited the States on tour last year, I had so little time to make friends. This year I hope that I'll meet lots and lots of people."

"Won't you tell Boston folk that I appreciate so much the wondrous ovation they gave me, and that I do hope I may play again for them soon?"

GIRL SENSATION OF PENSION CONCERT

Miss Brard, 16, Mature
and Skillful Pianist

Magdelein Brard's performance of Saint-Saens' Pianoforte Concerto No. 2 in G minor at yesterday's pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra created a very unusual sensation. Mr. Monteux and the orchestra joined enthusiastically in the violent and prolonged applause. She was recalled no less than six times at the end. There were cries of "Bravo" from the audience and she was given a bouquet from the orchestra. No debut in recent years has scored such great and well deserved success with a Symphony concert audience. What is more significant, no soloist within recent memory has ever been so applauded by the members of the orchestra itself.

There were murmurs of surprise in the audience when she first came on the stage. She is actually 16 but looks considerably younger. The solo passage at the beginning of the first movement, however, showed at once that she was not the "infant prodigy" her childish appearance betokened, but a player of mature strength, poise and skill, fairly comparable with men like Hofmann and Rachmaninoff.

Her playing has a breadth, force and dignity very rare in the performance of feminine pianists. Her massive chords and brilliant passage work are like those of the best male performers, rather than the work of a talented girl.

If there are three or four men living who could surpass her in passages where controlled strength is required, there is no one who could improve on her performance of the "Allegretto Scherzando" of this concerto. It has been heard here many times, but no one has ever come anywhere near equalling her interpretation of it.

She has the crisp phrasing, the firm yet delicate touch and the beautiful singing tone needed for an ideal performance. Best of all she does not sentimentalize, and yet is never academic. As a pupil of Cortot and a winner of a "first prize" at the Paris Conservatory she has, of course, been admirably trained. But only phenomenal ability could make it possible for a mere child to play as she does.

She is to be ranked with the youthful Hofmann and with Heifetz as an example of a young player whose performance is never immature. Her future appearances in Boston will be eagerly awaited by everyone who was lucky enough to hear her yesterday.

The rest of the concert brought routine performances of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony and of the prelude and "Love-Death" from Wagner's "Tristan," which is "not of an age, but for all time."

A brilliant performance of Rossini's overture to "William Tell," which wears on the whole better than most of Tschaikowsky, was the concluding number. A very large audience enjoyed the concert.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1919--20

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SIXTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 21, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 22, AT 8 P. M.

IN MEMORY OF
HENRY LEE HIGGINSON

FOUNDER AND SUSTAINER OF
THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SCHUBERT,

SYMPHONY in B minor, (Unfinished)

I. Allegro moderato
II. Andante con moto

BRAHMS,

CONCERTO No. 2, in B flat major, for Pianoforte and Orchestra, op. 83

I. Allegro non troppo
II. Allegro appassionato
III. Andante
IV. Allegretto grazioso

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY No. 5, in C minor, op. 67

I. Allegro con brio
II. Andante con moto
III. Allegro; Trio
IV. Allegro

Soloist:

Mr. FELIX FOX

Mason & Hamlin Pianoforte

IN MEMORY OF
 HENRY LEE HIGGINSON
 NOVEMBER 18, 1834 — NOVEMBER 14, 1919
 FOUNDER AND SUSTAINER
 OF THE
 BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
 THE FUNERAL MARCH FROM
 BEETHOVEN'S SYMPHONY NO. 3, "EROICA"
 WILL BE PLAYED AT THIS CONCERT

6-3
 HENRY LEE HIGGINSON

(Copyright by Notman.)
 SOLDIER, BANKER, PHILANTHROPIST AND LEADING CITIZEN OF BOSTON, WHO DIED FRIDAY NIGHT

IN MEMORY OF
 HENRY LEE HIGGINSON
 NOVEMBER 18, 1834 — NOVEMBER 14, 1919
 FOUNDER AND SUSTAINER
 OF THE
 BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
 THE FUNERAL MARCH FROM
 BEETHOVEN'S SYMPHONY NO. 3, "EROICA"
 WILL BE PLAYED AT THIS CONCERT

HENRY LEE HIGGINSON

(Copyright by Notman.)
 SOLDIER, BANKER, PHILANTHROPIST AND LEADING CITIZEN OF BOSTON, WHO DIED FRIDAY NIGHT

MEMORIAL CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Post — Nov. 22/19
Higginson's Loved
Pieces Are Played
—Fox Is Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

The sixth programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was "In memory of Henry Lee Higginson (Nov. 18, 1834-Nov. 14, 1919), Founder and Sustainer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

The programme was made of compositions which Major Higginson particularly loved. This was the only ceremonial attached to what was essentially a memorial concert, and it was the only kind of ceremonial—the performance, which Major Higginson made possible, of noble music—which would be adequate to the occasion.

FELIX FOX, PIANIST

This programme consisted of Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony; Brahms' B-flat piano concerto and Beethoven's fifth symphony. Felix Fox of this city took the solo piano part of one of the most difficult of all piano concertos at very short notice, and was warmly and deservedly applauded for his accomplishment.

The symphony of Schubert was superbly interpreted by Mr. Monteux with justness of pace, dramatic accent, romantic feeling, as also in the noble serenity and melancholy of the slow movement. Mr. Monteux is gaining gradually the repute of an exceptionally sympathetic student of the classics, as well as a brilliant exponent of modern works with which his name has been particularly associated—witness his performance not only of this music, but of the orchestral part of the Brahms concerto. We have seldom heard so sympathetic and totally beautiful a performance of the Schubert symphony.

Mr. Fox's Performance

Then came the heroic music of Brahms. The B-flat piano concerto is rugged, powerful in its developments, at times harshly or thickly colored, and in every way uncompromising so far as effort to please the public is concerned. Therefore, this concerto has waited long for public recognition, which it is slowly but surely gaining. Mr. Fox by his musicianship presented the music with uncommon clearness and understanding. He had a very difficult and, in a sense, ungrateful task. The concerto, in professional parlance, is not "pianistic"—does not lend itself well to effective performance on the piano. It requires of the pianist temperament and imagination backed by extraordinary intellectual understanding, interpretative power and a very extensive technique.

Mr. Fox understood these qualities of the music and met them with resource which constantly became greater as the performance went on and he warmed to his work. Not only is the concerto heroic: it is a heroic deed for any man to essay a performance of it with three or four days for preparation. Therefore, no doubt, Mr. Fox used music. It would be a good thing if more pianists, even when they had ample time to prepare a concerto, would use their music, thus giving themselves as well as their audience greater mental security and ease during the performance. The poetic slow movement of the concerto, in particular, made a deep impression, and the finale was played with appropriate humor and exhilaration. Mr. Fox was repeatedly recalled.

Beethoven's Fifth

Mr. Monteux's performance of the fifth symphony was dramatic and passionate to a degree. There was not a dull moment in it. The famous "fermatas" of the first movement had uncommon force and grip. The feeling was contagious. The second movement seemed pleasantly shortened; the ominous scherzo, the shouts of triumph, the noble march of the last movement, made a great effect. For the writer, nevertheless, there was too precipitate a pace in the first movement and there was seldom the marvellous union of elemental power and glory and at the same time a profound underlying strength and very deep down the quality of repose—repose which, in Beethoven's stormiest moods, yet remain, as the bottomless depths of the ocean remain in repose, however terrible the tempest that tortures the surface of the deep. Nor are we among the majority who feel it reasonable and advisable to double brass and wood in this symphony. Last season, in an unforgettable performance of this work, Rabaud showed what could be done with Beethoven's orchestra as it was originally devised.

These are details concerning which musicians may differ. What was deep-felt was the inherent grandeur of the music, and the spirit of the great, simple man who, like the composer, had in his battles, triumphed and marched

HONOR FOUNDER OF SYMPHONY

Herald — Nov. 22/19
Orchestra's Sixth Concert
Is in Memory of
Maj. Higginson

PROGRAM MADE UP OF HIS FAVORITES

By PHILIP HALE

The sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Schubert, "Unfinished" Symphony; Brahms, Concerto No. 2 for Piano; Beethoven, Symphony No. 5. Felix Fox was the pianist.

This concert was in memory of Maj. Higginson, the founder and sustainer of the orchestra. The program was made up of compositions that he especially liked to hear. To discuss the nature of these compositions without regard to the performance, if any discussion were needed, would now be out of place. The symphonies have long been regarded as the full expressions of the composer's characteristics and they are familiar to all lovers of music. The concerto had been performed nearly a dozen times at these concerts. It was heard in the more recent years three times in succession: in 1916, 1917, 1918. The performances by Josephy and Adele aus der Ohe are gratefully remembered by the older concert-goers; the performances by Messrs. Bauer and Gabrilowitsch are fresh in the memory.

It is not out of place to praise the interpretation of the symphonies and the concerto by Mr. Monteux and the orchestra. Mr. Monteux had before this shown that a Frenchman can be as eloquent an interpreter of the great German masters as of the modern and ultra-modern French; but yesterday he revealed new strength and beauty in the fragment of Schubert's Symphony—fortunately for the world it is a fragment, for it is doubtful whether Schubert could have sustained his lofty flight to the end—and not within our recollection have the grandeur, the mystery, and the triumphant exaltation of the Fifth Symphony been so boldly brought before one.

Too many conductors regard only the lyrical side of Schubert's genius; they soften or ignore his dramatic intensity, forgetting that among his songs are the "Doppelgänger," "Atlas," "The Dwarf," not to mention other masterpieces of a robust and even wild imagination. M. Vincent d'Indy, a stickler for form, deplors the fact that Schubert died before he had taken lessons in counterpoint of Simon Sechter, and does not hesitate to say that Schubert's symphonic works have, for the most part, only a mediocre interest; works injured by the absolute want of order, proportion, and general harmonious arrangement. It is true that many of Schubert's compositions are diffuse; that in them he was charmingly and at last tiresomely garrulous; but this reproach cannot be urged against the first movement of the "Unfinished." Here is music that is much more than

"Notes, with many a winding bout
Of linked sweetness long drawn out."

Mr. Monteux not only felt the dramatic intensity, the passion of certain pages, but, by his art, his personal authority, and his magnetism, the audience felt with him.

In like manner the fiery, self-torturing first Allegro of Beethoven was no longer taken smugly for granted as a long esteemed composition by a justly respected musician: it was as vital and modern as if the great war had inspired a genius. (In fact, as the whole symphony was performed yesterday, it deserves the title "Eroica" more than the third, with its final variations). The transition from the Scherzo to the Finale is a test of a conductor's vision. Here again Mr. Monteux triumphed in his solving of this crux. After the double-bass figure—"the gambols of a frolicsome elephant," to quote Berlioz—come those strange, sinister measures of preparation for the superb tonal outburst. After this outburst the problem is how to maintain the spirit of exultation to the end, without drooping, without halting. Mr. Monteux clearly showed that this problem is not without a convincing, stirring solution.

114

Mr. Fox, a pianist of clear, fluent, polished technique, also an excellent musician, was called on at the eleventh hour to play the piano part of Brahms's voluminous concerto. The task for one that has long been in readiness is an arduous one. Mr. Fox acquitted himself with pleasure to the hearers and with credit to himself. A feature of the performance was the playing by Mr. Bedetti of the violoncello solo in the andante, playing that ravished the ear by tonal beauty and richness and wholly satisfied the musical understanding.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Chausson, symphony in B flat major; songs with orchestra; Beethoven, "Nature's Adoration"; Handel, "Ombra Mai Fu," from "Xerxes"; Bach, "My Heart Ever Faithful"; Griffes, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla"; Khan, symphonic poem (after the poem of Coteridge), first performance; Verdi, "O Don Fatale," from "Don Carlos"; Chabrier-Mottl, "Bourree Fantasque." Louise Homer will be the singer.

SYMPHONY MEN HONOR FOUNDER

Herald—Nov. 16 '19
Orchestra Maj. Higginson
Sustained Plays Beethoven Funeral March

ORGANIZATION DREAM OF YOUTH REALIZED

By PHILIP HALE

The Funeral March from Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony was played at the Symphony concert last night in memory of Henry Lee Higginson. Some, remembering that Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony was one of his favorite compositions, that he never wearied of it, may have wished that it might have been first on the appointed program; but Maj. Higginson was a soldier, as well as a public benefactor, the founder and the sustainer of the Boston Symphony orchestra; and the heroic yet tender Dead March of Beethoven well became the sturdy soul now mourned.

It was a fact, probably unnoticed by many, that the symphony of Berlioz that followed Beethoven's music was first performed in Paris five days after Maj. Higginson was born. This symphony lives; the founder of this orchestra will live long in the memory and in the heart of the city through the orchestral music to which he gave life; for music that is not heard in its full beauty and splendor is as if it had never left the brain and the soul of the composer.

A young man, Maj. Higginson dreamed of an orchestra that would perform the best music in the best way. At last, he realized his dream. He also dreamed of men and women of humble means hearing this orchestra. This dream came true; yet not so completely as he wished, for with the years the number that was eager to hear the best music grew larger and larger. He was not discouraged at the beginning by advance criticism, by flings and carpings. Little by little he added to the artistic strength of the organization. Having engaged a conductor he had faith in him; he did not dictate, he did not interfere. No doubt music that was not to his own conservative taste was often performed; but he made no sign of protest. He realized the fact that art is not of any one decade, not of any one century; that form and expression are constantly changing; that which is inherently beautiful will survive, although at first hearing it may have a strange sound to the ear; that which makes an immediate appeal through the familiarity of its qualities often dies with the season in which it is applauded.

The "sustainer" of the orchestra: this is not an idle word. Maj. Higginson cheerfully shouldered the pecuniary burden, which, at first discouraging to any one faint-hearted, gradually became less and less. Long ago he reaped his reward: the orchestra that was his was more than a source of local pride; its fame spread throughout the land; it crossed the Atlantic.

The founder is no more; the orchestra is still, and will be, a glory of the city. Never has it been in a finer musical condition. It remains for us who are left behind to take up the burden gladly; to do all that is within our power to make for musical righteousness; to insist upon having the best; having it, to maintain it.

115

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Trans. — Nov. 22/19
COMMEMORATION BRINGS ALSO INNOVATION

Closed Doors Upon a Symphony as Possible Precedent for the Future—Music of Schubert in a Beauty and Passion Worthy of an Unusual Occasion—Vigorously Dramatized Beethoven—The Impossible Task of an Exacting and Hastily Prepared Concerto

SCHUBERT'S Unfinished Symphony began the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon as first item in a programme designed to honor the memory of the late Mr. Higginson as founder of the orchestra in 1881, as financial sustainer of it until it was reorganized in the autumn of 1918. Between the two movements—for the first time in the longest memory at Symphony Hall—the doors were not opened for the tardy, though they received a somewhat longer grace than usual in a late beginning. Thus, only a brief pause separated the two divisions of the fragment; the music flowed, as the composer designed it, in virtually continuous stream; neither players nor hearers were disturbed by late-comers trooping down the aisles to their seats, saluting acquaintances along the way and finally "setting themselves" for the afternoon. In fact, the whole audience, timely warned of this departure from routine on an unusual occasion, was in its place before Mr. Monteux lifted his stick for the first measure. Such uninterrupted performance clearly heightened for all concerned the pleasure of the music and the performance.

According to the management, the innovation was only an incident of the day; but if it is possible for the audience to assemble promptly on one occasion, why should it not do likewise on others, and why should not that management gently, yet persistently persuade it to such courtesy? It is Mr. Monteux's custom, as it was Dr. Muck's before him, to set the symphony of the afternoon at the beginning of the concert. After the first movement the tardy are wont to provide a noisy interlude sometimes three or four minutes long; after the succeeding movements these intermezzi gradually diminish until by the end of the whole symphony the whole audience is seated. Obviously these delays and intrusions hamper the continuity and illusion of music and performance, vex the conductor intent upon his task and sensitive withal, distract and irritate not a few eager and absorbed listeners.

Now, once upon a time, it was the custom to wear hats and bonnets at the Symphony Concerts. There were rumors that the management was about to insist upon the removal of coverings for the head. "How dare it?" was the retort of many august dames and damsels. It dared quietly, politely persisted, finally prevailed. Probably like good fortune would reward it did it insist upon unopened doors through the first number upon the programme, even though it were a symphony thirty or forty minutes long. Grumbling would die away into submission; submission would fructify into habitual promptness; and no superfluous interludes would disturb the progress of symphony or suite. To write these things, moreover, is not to forget the unforeseen and unescapable delays that may befall any of us, however foresighted and well-intentioned, on our way to Symphony Hall on a Friday or a Saturday. They, however, like most incidents of living, are the luck of the day, to be taken casually, amusedly.

Another departure from routine begun yesterday, likewise abates a long-standing and increasing irritation about which the management has recently received much complaint. It has been the custom of the tardy to beguile their waiting with lively, high-pitched, amusingly intimate conversation and seemingly to place themselves for that diversion as near as possible to the closed doors. In a single afternoon those sitting near them within the hall have readily learned that John's "flier" in the stock market was not too lucrative and that Jane's conduct toward eligible suitors leaves something to be desired. Moreover, when Josepha confides these mischances to Antoinette, "you dear old thing," her tones are often shrill and by no means keyed to the symphony by Schumann or d'Indy in progress on the other side of none too thick doors. So much has this annoyance increased of late on the fringes of the auditorium, so resentful has been complaint about it, that over every entrance now stands a sign: "Silence Requested." These signs are there to stay. For within the velvet glove of the management of the Symphony Concerts is the firm hand that seeks the ways of perfection. And little things do count in weekly pleasure to the audience, in weekly zest in conductor and orchestra.

Designed as has been said to honor the memory of Mr. Higginson, the concert of yesterday in itself was rather a rite of mourning and remembrance than a public performance of symphonic music in the usual sense of the words, in the ordinary course of the season. At the request of his family and his intimates the programme traversed two pieces which, as many frequenters of Symphony Hall knew, he heard with endless pleasure before he forsook the concerts—Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. Between them stood a third music to which, it seems, he listened almost as gladly—Brahms's concerto in B-flat for piano and orchestra. These numbers, of course, displaced the programme which Mr. Monteux had proposed and partially prepared for the week, compelled him to revise materially the lists of pieces arranged for the twelve concerts the orchestra is about to undertake in other cities, and exacted strenuous rehearsal of the concerto and the two symphonies from conductor and players. Since the concert was a ceremony of mourning and since it was made ready under difficult circumstance, it were unbecoming to record and test it in the usual terms and processes of reviewing.

116

Yet it would be as unbecoming to leave unnoted the renewed, the enhancing beauty with which conductor and orchestra clothed Schubert's fragments. For the time they regained the golden tone, sensitive and supple, rich, euphonious and translucent, which of old was a chief glory of the band; while Mr. Monteux himself plied upon the music the divination which is the conductor's crown—enkindling force upon his men, transporting illusion upon his audience. At his hands, the music spoke with manifold and exalted voice—in serene and songful flow, in shadowed melancholy, in impatient and passionate intensity, in the warm glow, the penetrating strangeness of romantic vision. Nowhere has Schubert written more moody a music, nowhere a symphonic music of such sustained yet diverse emotion. From it springs the beauty of instrumental song that was the fountain of his youth. From it also rises the power and passion that, had death relented, might have poured through his maturity. In this music, which Mr. Higginson cherished above all other, in a performance worthy of the zenith of the orchestra, sounded his true funeral rite in the concert hall.

Again it were duty to orchestra, to conductor, to hearers and to that fetish which is called "the record" to note the vigor of progress, the incisiveness of rhythm and accent, the largeness of phrase, the high pitch of tonal emotion, the sustained dramatizing energy with which Mr. Monteux projected Beethoven's symphony upon his hearers. There have been performances in easy memory which achieved a deeper beauty, which more abounded in imaginative stroke and shading, which sought and maintained a loftier voice. These distinctions lie well within Mr. Monteux's abilities, as he had proved, half an hour before, upon Schubert's music. For Beethoven's he preferred another way—a way that cost the transition into the finale not a little of its throbbing mystery, that made the slow movement seem short-breathed and a little impatient, but a way also that wrought the first movement into a tumult of passionate outcry and bore the finale to surging climax. Beethoven of the theatre, if the hearer chose, but Beethoven also dramatizing and dramatized in tones.

Between the symphonies, Brahms's concerto—a wholly unreasonable, an almost impossible task for conductor, orchestra and pianist in two or three days of preparation—came lengthily and went dryly in as lucid and painstaking performance as such circumstance permitted. When pianist after pianist had declined the solo part or foregone it because of other engagements, Mr. Félix Fox undertook it. His willingness as well as his accomplishment praise him. Equally diligent but equally hard-pressed was Mr. Monteux. And in this baffling music "the readiness" is by no means "all." The munificence, the sense of obligation, the just ambition of Mr. Higginson indeed founded the orchestra and for thirty-odd years sustained it. Through all those years, his devotion to the highest standards of repertory and performance never flagged. When he laid down the orchestra it was at the zenith of a deserved and unsurpassed fame. For once a founder and sustainer, a succession of conductors, an orchestra variously renewed had held fast to a single ideal and in its sign conquered. To ask of leader, band and pianist the impossible feat of Brahms's concerto made ready in two or three rehearsals was neither to honor Mr. Higginson's memory nor to maintain his standards. The maintenance of these ideals in even artistic course best commemorates, best perpetuates him.

H. T. PARKER

MUSIC A TRIBUTE TO HIGGINSON

Adv. Nov. 23 '19
Symphony Program Made Up of Favorite Numbers of the Founder

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

Program.
Schubert, Unfinished Symphony.
Brahms, Second Piano Concerto.
Soloist, Mr. Felix Fox.
Beethoven, Fifth Symphony.

The program of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening was changed into a tribute to the memory of Major Higginson, for it was made up of three works which were his especial favorites. These works are not new to Boston and certainly require no analysis. It was a feast of classical music of the purest type.

The unfinished symphony was read with more of shading and finesse than romance. It probably contains the best melodies that were ever put into this form, for Schubert's symphonies were really songs in disguise and were never very powerful on the development side, although the andante contains some of the best figure treatment that Schubert ever achieved. Still, the melodies are the chief charm of both movements and the work can bear some degree of sentiment.

Beethoven's fifth symphony is also clear sailing, both for conductor and audience, and made up in its development what the Schubert work lacked.

MEASURING THE STANDARD.

The surprisingly effective performance of M. Rabaud with this orchestra was, however, not rivalled. Not that there are faults to find. M. Monteux is probably blameless in the matter. But there was a time when our orchestra was far ahead of every other organization of its kind, while now it is but one of a half a dozen good American orchestras. In such works as these two one can make comparisons with ease and surety, and measured by such a yard-stick, the superiority of our band is not as clearly evident as it used to be.

117

The chief figure of the first movement was sometimes ragged and the work was often boisterous. Even the strings did not shine in the andante, where there used to be a most perfect ensemble. It is possible that the sudden change of program caused a lack of rehearsals and that the men had not become used to the difference of reading from the former performances.

The Brahms concerto was far more complex than the symphonies before and after it. Yet the present writer recalls a remark of the late Professor Carl Baermann about this concerto: "When I first took it up I studied its difficult passages as a duty. But afterwards I began to see that each of these had a definite artistic purpose that could not have been expressed differently."

Mr. Felix Fox, our estimable resident pianist, was the soloist, and he conquered the difficulties which beset the thorny path with considerable success. It is a work which may have appealed to Major Higginson, who was a trained musician, but it certainly can never be an appeal to the general public; it was too abstruse for that.

FOX WAS THE FEATURE.

The pianist, too, can never shine here as in a Liszt or a Rachmaninoff concerto, for the soloist must frequently abnegate his prominence and must sink into the ensemble, as if he were but a single tone-color in a symphony. This Mr. Fox bravely did, and he deserves credit for his careful attention to the ensemble effects. He never attempted to make a solo out of this eminently orchestral work.

And the orchestra and M. Monteux seconded him well, so that, for the musician, this became the chief number of the concert. It was the most ambitious work that this pianist has ever done before a Boston public and we are glad to pronounce it successful.

The pianist did not play the work from memory, but had the music before him. This is unusual, but it is sensible, for it is certainly better that the music, rather than the performer, should be upon the rack. Mr. Fox was recalled with much enthusiasm at the completion of his task.

CONCERT IN MEMORY OF MAJ HIGGINSON

Globe Nov. 22/19
Symphony's Tribute to
Founder of Orchestra

The program of this week's Symphony concerts is in memory of Maj Higginson, founder and sustainer of the orchestra, who died on Nov 14. It is made up of pieces which were his especial favorites, none of them funeral in character.

To both orchestra and audience the concert yesterday afternoon was one without parallel, which will be long remembered. Never again in Symphony Hall will there be occasion for an equally solemn and beautiful tribute, since no one else can ever do for the Symphony Orchestra anything comparable to what its founder did.

The first of the chosen numbers was Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony. The performance given yesterday called to mind the perfect playing by the Flonzaley Quartet of the Adagio from Beethoven's Quartet, op. 127, under similar circumstances, at a concert in memory of their founder and sustainer, Mr De Coppet, several years ago.

The familiar music sounded as it never has before. Words are inadequate to describe its beauty. One wondered whether it could have been better played in heaven. It never has been in this world. The orchestra has sometimes seemed to surpass itself on other occasions, but it is doubtful whether its founder ever heard it play anything as well as it played this symphony yesterday.

Moments of escape from human limitations are rare, and the "clouds of glory" had faded before Brahms' Second Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, the next number on the program, was begun.

Mr Felix Fox, called on at very short notice to take the piano part, gave a surprisingly good performance of the exceptionally difficult music. Except that he had the score before him there was nothing which showed that he had not been preparing for months to play it, instead of for only three days.

Many far more noted virtuosi have given less admirable performances of this concerto at Symphony concerts here. He made the piano what Brahms meant it to be, a part of the orchestra, not a solo instrument with orchestral accompaniment. Mr Monteux and the orchestra did their part equally well, but the total result was only the usual admirable performance heard with satisfaction, not a thing apart from routine.

Mr. Felix Fox,

The concluding number was, like Schubert's "Unfinished," among the best-loved of symphonies for many others besides Maj Higginson. It was Beethoven's Fifth, in C minor, which the orchestra has played oftener than any other symphony, always to eager audiences.

All the tragedy, irony and beauty of life fill this music. It reaches at times, as in the last few pages of the scherzo, heights unattained by other masters.

The performance yesterday, however, fell short of perfection. The first movement was taken at too rapid a pace, which made it seem a petulant, rather than a tragic outburst. The andante, too, lacked the underlying massive solidity given by gradually mounting and broadening phrases. Only the finale was played with the requisite restrained eloquence and intimation of inexhaustible reserves of strength. But the time for rehearsals had been unduly short.

Louise Homer will be the soloist next week, and the symphony is to be Chausson's, in B-flat major. The memorial program will be given again to-night at 8.

HENRY LEE HIGGINSON.

The following announcement was made in the newspapers of Boston, in April, 1881:—

"IN THE INTEREST OF GOOD MUSIC.

"Notwithstanding the development of musical taste in Boston, we have never yet possessed a full and permanent orchestra, offering the best music at low prices, such as may be found in all the large European cities, or even in the smaller musical centres of Germany. The essential condition of such orchestras is their stability, whereas ours are necessarily shifting and uncertain, because we are dependent upon musicians whose work and time are largely pledged elsewhere.

"To obviate this difficulty, the following plan is offered. It is an effort made simply in the interest of good music, and, though individual inasmuch as it is independent of societies or clubs, it is in no way antagonistic to any previously existing musical organization. Indeed, the first step as well as the natural impulse in announcing a new musical project is to thank those who have brought us where we now stand. Whatever may be done in the future, to the Handel and Haydn Society and to the Harvard Musical Association we all owe the greater part of our home education in music of a high character. Can we forget either how admirably their work has been supplemented by the taste and critical judgment of Mr. John S. Dwight and by the artists who have identified themselves with the same cause in Boston? These have been our teachers. We build on foundations they have laid. Such details of this scheme as concerns the public are stated below.

"The orchestra is to number sixty selected musicians; their time, so far as required for careful training and for a given number of concerts, to be engaged in advance.

"Mr. Georg Henschel will be the conductor for the coming season.

"The concerts will be twenty in number, given in Music Hall on Saturday evenings from the middle of October to the middle of March.

"The price of season tickets with reserved seats for the whole series of evening concerts will be either $10 or $5 according to position.

"Single tickets, with reserved seats, will be seventy-five cents or twenty-five cents, according to position.

"Besides the concerts there will be a public rehearsal on one afternoon of every week, with single tickets at twenty-five cents, and no reserved seats.

"The intention is that this orchestra shall be made permanent here, and shall be called "The Boston Symphony Orchestra."

"Both as to the condition and result of success the sympathy of the public is asked.

"H. L. HIGGINSON."

CONCERT IN MEMORY OF MAJ HIGGINSON

Globe — Nov. 22/19
Symphony's Tribute to
Founder of Orchestra

The program of this week's Symphony concerts is in memory of Maj Higginson, founder and sustainer of the orchestra, who died on Nov 14. It is made up of pieces which were his especial favorites, none of them funeral in character.

To both orchestra and audience the concert yesterday afternoon was one without parallel, which will be long remembered. Never again in Symphony Hall will there be occasion for an equally solemn and beautiful tribute, since no one else can ever do for the Symphony Orchestra anything comparable to what its founder did.

The first of the chosen numbers was Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony. The performance given yesterday called to mind the perfect playing by the Flonzaley Quartet of the Adagio from Beethoven's Quartet, op. 127, under similar circumstances, at a concert in memory of their founder and sustainer, Mr De Coppet, several years ago.

The familiar music sounded as it never has before. Words are inadequate to describe its beauty. One wondered whether it could have been better played in heaven. It never has been in this world. The orchestra has sometimes seemed to surpass itself on other occasions, but it is doubtful whether its founder ever heard it play anything as well as it played this symphony yesterday.

Moments of escape from human limitations are rare, and the "clouds of glory" had faded before Brahms' Second Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, the next number on the program, was begun.

Mr Felix Fox, called on at very short notice to take the piano part, gave a surprisingly good performance of the exceptionally difficult music. Except that he had the score before him there was nothing which showed that he had not been preparing for months to play it, instead of for only three days.

Many far more noted virtuosi have given less admirable performances of this concerto at Symphony concerts here. He made the piano what Brahms meant it to be, a part of the orchestra, not a solo instrument with orchestral accompaniment. Mr Monteux and the orchestra did their part equally well, but the total result was only the usual admirable performance heard with satisfaction, not a thing apart from routine.

Mr. Felix Fox.

The concluding number was, like Schubert's "Unfinished," among the best-loved of symphonies for many others besides Maj Higginson. It was Beethoven's Fifth, in C minor, which the orchestra has played oftener than any other symphony, always to eager audiences.

All the tragedy, irony and beauty of life fill this music. It reaches at times, as in the last few pages of the scherzo, heights unattained by other masters.

The performance yesterday, however, fell short of perfection. The first movement was taken at too rapid a pace, which made it seem a petulant, rather than a tragic outburst. The andante, too, lacked the underlying massive solidity given by gradually mounting and broadening phrases. Only the finale was played with the requisite restrained eloquence and intimation of inexhaustible reserves of strength. But the time for rehearsals had been unduly short.

Louise Homer will be the soloist next week, and the symphony is to be Chaussou's, in B-flat major. The memorial program will be given again tonight at 8.

HENRY LEE HIGGINSON.

The following announcement was made in the newspapers of Boston, in April, 1881:—

"IN THE INTEREST OF GOOD MUSIC.

"Notwithstanding the development of musical taste in Boston, we have never yet possessed a full and permanent orchestra, offering the best music at low prices, such as may be found in all the large European cities, or even in the smaller musical centres of Germany. The essential condition of such orchestras is their stability, whereas ours are necessarily shifting and uncertain, because we are dependent upon musicians whose work and time are largely pledged elsewhere.

"To obviate this difficulty, the following plan is offered. It is an effort made simply in the interest of good music, and, though individual inasmuch as it is independent of societies or clubs, it is in no way antagonistic to any previously existing musical organization. Indeed, the first step as well as the natural impulse in announcing a new musical project is to thank those who have brought us where we now stand. Whatever may be done in the future, to the Handel and Haydn Society and to the Harvard Musical Association we all owe the greater part of our home education in music of a high character. Can we forget either how admirably their work has been supplemented by the taste and critical judgment of Mr. John S. Dwight and by the artists who have identified themselves with the same cause in Boston? These have been our teachers. We build on foundations they have laid. Such details of this scheme as concerns the public are stated below.

"The orchestra is to number sixty selected musicians; their time, so far as required for careful training and for a given number of concerts, to be engaged in advance.

"Mr. Georg Henschel will be the conductor for the coming season.

"The concerts will be twenty in number, given in Music Hall on Saturday evenings from the middle of October to the middle of March.

"The price of season tickets with reserved seats for the whole series of evening concerts will be either $10 or $5 according to position.

"Single tickets, with reserved seats, will be seventy-five cents or twenty-five cents, according to position.

"Besides the concerts there will be a public rehearsal on one afternoon of every week, with single tickets at twenty-five cents, and no reserved seats.

"The intention is that this orchestra shall be made permanent here, and shall be called "The Boston Symphony Orchestra."

"Both as to the condition and result of success the sympathy of the public is asked.

"H. L. HIGGINSON."

120

Benefactor of His Fellow Men.

By Governor Calvin Coolidge

THE death of Major Henry L. Higginson has removed a man who has been for years a commanding figure. In public service and private philanthropy a benefactor of his fellow men; in character an example to be followed with reverence, in attainments pre-eminent among associates of commanding importance. An uncompromising patriot, the advocate of every good cause, a man whose work, whose memory, whose principles will endure.

WRITES EULOGY OF HIGGINSON

President Lowell Sends Tribute to College Paper

Post

Nov. 7/19

In contrast to the custom of Harvard University presidents, A. Lawrence Lowell issued the following eulogy on Major Higginson to the Harvard Crimson, the student official daily, last night:

"In Major Henry L. Higginson the university lost a councillor and benefactor; the students, a friend. Ever mindful of their welfare he gave them the Union and Soldiers Field. Outside the university he created, and for years at his own expense maintained, the Symphony Orchestra. Without holding public office he was always quick to serve the public and unsparing in his denunciation of public wrong. Many will feel that a friend has gone from us for he was much loved because he loved much."

Higginson Will Leave No Endowment Fund to Symphony Orchestra

Library, Musical Scores and Instruments Only
Bequests—Widow Receives Practically
Entire Estate

7-1

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1919--20

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SEVENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 28, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 29, AT 8 P. M.

CHAUSSON,

SYMPHONY in B flat major, op. 20

I. Lent; Allegro vivo

II. Très lent

III. Animé

BEETHOVEN,

HANDEL,

BACH,

SONGS with Orchestra,

"Nature's Adoration," op. 48, No. 4

AIR; "Ombra mai fù," from the Opera "Xerxes,"
Act I, Scene I.

AIR, "My Heart Ever Faithful," from the Cantata
"For God so Loved the World"

GRIFFES,

The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan, (after the Poem
of S. T. Coleridge)

(Pianoforte obbligato, Alfred De Voto)

First performance

VERDI,

ARIA, "O Don Fatale," from the Opera "Don Carlos" Act IV. Scene 6

CHABRIER,

PIECE for PIANOFORTE, Bourrée Fantasque
Orchestrated by Felix Mottl

Soloist:

LOUISE HOMER

Mason & Hamlin Pianoforte

120

Benefactor of His Fellow Men

By Governor Calvin Coolidge

THE death of Major Henry L. Higginson has removed a man who has been for years a commanding figure. In public service and private philanthropy a benefactor of his fellow men; in character an example to be followed with reverence, in attainments pre-eminent among associates of commanding importance. An uncompromising patriot, the advocate of every good cause, a man whose work, whose memory, whose principles will endure.

WRITES EULOGY OF HIGGINSON

President Lowell Sends Tribute to College Paper Post Nov. 17/19

In contrast to the custom of Harvard University presidents, A. Lawrence Lowell issued the following eulogy on Major Higginson to the Harvard Crimson, the student official daily, last night:

"In Major Henry L. Higginson the university lost a councillor and benefactor; the students, a friend. Ever mindful of their welfare he gave them the Union and Soldiers Field. Outside the university he created, and for years at his own expense maintained, the Symphony Orchestra. Without holding public office he was always quick to serve the public and unsparing in his denunciation of public wrong. Many will feel that a friend has gone from us for he was much loved because he loved much."

Higginson Will Leave No Endowment Fund to Symphony Orchestra

Library, Musical Scores and Instruments Only
Bequests—Widow Receives Practically
Entire Estate

7

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1919--20

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SEVENTH PROGRAMME

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 28, AT 2.30 P. M.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 29, AT 8 P. M.

CHAUSSON,

SYMPHONY in B flat major, op. 20

I. Lent; Allegro vivo
II. Très lent
III. Animé

BEETHOVEN,
HANDEL,

SONGS with Orchestra,

"Nature's Adoration," op. 48, No. 4

AIR; "Ombra mai fù," from the Opera "Xerxes," Act I, Scene I.

BACH,

AIR, "My Heart Ever Faithful," from the Cantata
"For God so Loved the World"

GRIFFES,

The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan, (after the Poem
of S. T. Coleridge)

(Pianoforte obbligato, Alfred De Voto)

First performance

VERDI,

ARIA, "O Don Fatale," from the Opera "Don Carlos" Act IV. Scene 6

CHABRIER,

PIECE for PIANOFORTE, Bourrée Fantasque
Orchestrated by Felix Mottl

Soloist:

LOUISE HOMER

Mason & Hamlin Pianoforte

Louise Homer, contralto.

HOMER PLEASES IN FOUR SONGS

"O Don Fatale" in Symphony Program Finds
Her in Best Voice

Adv. Nov. 30, 1919

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

Program.
Chausson. Symphony in B flat.
Beethoven. Handel and Bach. Three songs.
Soloist, Mme. Louise Homer.
Griffes. "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan." Tone poem.
Mme. Louise Homer.
Chabrier. Bourree Fantasque.

It is not so long since we had a performance of the Chausson Symphony, but we much preferred the reading of this concert, even if the execution or it was better in 1916. M. Monteux brought out the strong contents and the varied emotions of the work in excellent style. It is a rather sombre work for a Frenchman, even the Scherzo being absent from its short three-movement form. Its brevity is a merit, for the composer stops when he has delivered his message, which very few moderns do, and in spite of its predominance of gloom, Chausson, by fine working-up of climaxes, manages to avoid any trace of monotony.

Thus, in the second movement, which is pre-eminently sombre, there are moments of ineffable tenderness against the bitter lamentation which afford contrast enough. The finale, however, is full of triumph. The trumpets blazed forth finely in this movement, and the lofty chorale gave great dignity to the climax. There was plenty of figure treatment in this part of the work, especially of a short motive of three notes—D, b-flat, A, descending, which is ingeniously treated.

AN APPRECIATIVE AUDIENCE.

The work is earnest and honest, it is as sincere as the works of Chausson's teacher, Cesar Franck, and it is one of the best of the modern French symphonies. But its counterpoint and its figure development can scarcely appeal strongly to the general public. Yet it was heartily applauded.

The English horn did some excellent work in the melancholy second movement, and the trumpets of the finale were inspiring. The conductor was recalled at the end of the work, and his poetic reading deserved this tribute.

Mme. Louise Homer is one of the most welcome of artists at these concerts. Her broad alto voice, her artistic intelligence, and her emotional power combine to make her work effective. She evidently chose her numbers with a view to reconciling the dignity of the concerts with popular effect. But, let us whisper it cautiously, Beethoven is not a great song-writer, and his vocal solos (even the vaunted "Adelaide") fade somewhat when heard beside more singable writers. Thus, his "Nature's Adoration" had a much nobler idea than Handel's "Ombra Mai Fu" (the celebrated Largo), but was not nearly so singable. Mme. Homer gave it with great majesty, however.

The words of the Handelian number are absurdly simple. "Never was shade of a dear and lovable plant more suave"—only that and nothing more. But the melody is singability itself. And Bach's "My Heart Ever Faithful," which followed, is a most spontaneous outpouring of jubilation, quaintly ended with a downward skip of a seventh (against conventional rules) at the words, "Mein Jesus ist da."

All this Mme. Homer did well, but she was in her best element in the later number, the famous "O Don Fatale," one of the earliest arias of Verdi's third period, and in the smooth, broad legato vein of "Ombra mai fu," which we have never heard better sung. Mme. Homer is in her best voice at present, and it was no wonder that she aroused great enthusiasm.

Charles Tomlinson Griffes is a teacher in New York, but has also taught in Berlin and studied there with Humperdinck, whose genial vein he has in some degree imbibed. His name is not even given in most of the biographical dictionaries. His "Kubla Khan," founded on Coleridge's poem, the recollections of a dream, pictures well

There will be no Rehearsal and Concert next week.

"The shadow of the dome of pleasure,
Floated midway on the waves,
Where was heard the mingled measure Of the fountain and the caves."

and the caves of ice, the Abyssinian maid with her dulcimer, singing of Mount Abora, and also the warning of the end of the opium dream.

In picturing the maid aforesaid and the glitter of the caves of ice, a piano part is interwoven through the score. It is something more than a tone-color, it becomes an important obbligato. This part was finely played by Alfred de Voto, who blended with the ensemble perfectly. The tinkling celesta was also prominently present.

The score is a heavy one, and Mr. Griffes handles his large forces well. The work is, of course, rather rhapsodical in character and Kubla's dome glitters even more than the gilded one on our State House. There are strong dynamic contrasts, but, at a single hearing, we could not clearly follow the working out of themes and figures. The composer was called twice to the platform to bow his acknowledgments of public applause.

A JOVIAL ENDING.

If the concert began with sombre tints, it ended with joviality, for Mottl's instrumentation of Chabrier's piano "Bourree Fantastique" is as brilliant as the modern orchestra will allow, and it allows almost everything. But to get the full idea of this robust dance one must hear it in Auvergne, with twenty pair of wooden sabots knocking out the rhythm on a barn floor. It is not so rapid as the jig, but it is fully as bolsterous and hearty. It made a vigorous and healthy end to a concert that had much more variety than usual.

But we could find the spirit of the wild dance only in the beginning and end. The soft central episode affords good contrast, but we doubt if any Auvergerat could puzzle out its meaning, while the evil tones of the muted horns suggest that there was some trouble in the dance hall.

'KUBLA KHAN' AT SYMPHONY

Herald — Nov. 29/19
Orchestra Gives First Performance of Griffes's Fantastic Work

AUDIENCE TWICE RECALLS COMPOSER

By PHILIP HALE

The seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Chausson, Symphony in B flat major; songs with orchestra: Beethoven, Nature's Adoration; Handel, air from "Serse"; Bach, My Heart Ever Faithful; Griffes, Symphonic Poem, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan" (first performance); Verdi, O Don Fatale, from "Don Carlos"; Chabrier-Mottl, Bourree-Fantastique.

Any composer girding up his loins to turn Coleridge's "Kubla Khan" into a vocal work, cantata or what not, would start on a perilous adventure, for, to quote Swinburne, this poem is "the supreme model of music in our language." "In reading it," said the master of rhythm and verbal euphony, "we seem rapt into that paradise revealed to Swedenborg, where music and color and perfume were one, where you could hear the hues and see the harmonies of heaven." Any composer mediating a symphonic poem fully "illustrative" of "Kubla Khan," a tonal, interlinear translation, would undertake a fool's task.

Mr. Griffes, born in New York state 35 years ago, wisely chose extracts from the poem, lines describing the stately pleasure-dome, "the sunny pleasure dome with caves of ice," "the miracle of rare device," the gardens and the "sunny spots of greenery." By a legitimate stretch of the imagination he hears and reproduces the sounds of revelry that might well take place in this strange palace, mentioned first by travellers, whose description led Coleridge, dreaming, to write the fragment that is enough to make his name illustrious.

Instrumental music may add wings to even a romantically poetic flight. No one hearing this music of Mr. Griffes will feel that the poem itself has been belittled; that its splendor has been tarnished; for this composer is blessed with what is rare with American musicians, imagination. His gift of expression is pronounced. He might have been extravagant; his music might have been merely bizarre. In either case he would have incurred the reproach of affectation. He has succeeded in being musically, esthetically successfully unusual. He studied composition in Berlin; but there are no Germanisms, either orthodox or heterodox, in his style. Nor does it seem that he has worshipped too devoutly in any one of the modern Parisian chapels. If he has been influenced at all, the influence is that of Rimsky-Korsakoff, Borodin, and the barbaric gorgeousness of the Russian ballet; but Mr. Griffes has decided and refreshing individuality; he has found an Oriental expression that is his own, as he has found new harmonic and orchestral colors. His "Alph, the sacred river" is not the Terek of Balakireff's "Thamar"; his measures of wild revelry are not those that Rimsky-Korsakoff heard in Sinbad's palace. The music, from the strange, unearthly opening, which at once arrests the attention, to the exquisitely fanciful ending, is fascinating throughout.

Mr. Monteux, who had taken great pains in the preparation of this remarkable composition, led a brilliant performance. Mr. Griffes was twice called upon the stage by the audience.

Would Chausson, if he had lived, have wholly escaped the influence of Wagner and Cesar Franck? The symphony is a serious work, one to be respected, with an impressive ending. The mood of the three movements is sombre without sufficient contrast. There is prevailing shade; there is little sunlight. It was a pleasure to hear after many years Mottl's skilful orchestration of Chabrier's jovial Bourree. Mottl, who admired the Frenchman and knew him well, orchestrated this Bourree in Chabrier's manner.

Mme. Homer was more fortunate in her interpretation of Verdi's aria than in her delivery of the air from Handel's "Serse" and Bach's repeated assertion that his heart was ever faithful. In Verdi's air she was appropriately dramatic with effective dynamic contrasts. The air of Handel and Bach's tune were sung merely "ore rotundo." While she was delivering the address of Xerxes to his beloved plane tree as if the monarch had been thundering a command at his huge army, or storming at Mount Athos, we wondered where the story about this affection was first told. We read in one of Dr. Donne's Elegies:

Xerxes' strange Lydian love, the platane tree,
Was loved for age, none being so large as she;

but Pliny, noting the affection entertained by Dionysius, the Sicilian King, by Licinius Mutianus, thrice consul, and by the Emperor Caligula, for the plane tree, says nothing about the passion of Xerxes. Was Herodotus the first? He tells about Xerxes passing by the Lydian city of Caillatebus. On the way, the King "met with a plane tree, which on account of its beauty, he presented with golden ornaments."

The audience, liking Mme. Homer's robust singing of the Handelian air—Caffarelli, the first to sing it, was praised for his "majestic style," but majestic and robust are not synonymous terms—and also recognizing the familiar "Largo," applauded the singer vigorously.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will leave tomorrow for a trip of two weeks. The program for Dec. 19, 20 is as follows: Balakireff, "Thamar"; MacDowell, Piano Concerto No. 2; Schmitt, "The Tragedy of Salome." Leo Ornstein will be the pianist.

AMERICAN MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Post — Nov. 29/19
Griffes' Work Pleases

Audience—Miss
Homer, Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

An American composer, Charles Tomlinson Griffes, made his first appearance on a Boston Symphony programme at the concert which Mr. Monteux conducted yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, a programme which will be repeated tonight. Mr. Griffes was not the first American to appear on these programmes. Nor will be the last. Nor will he be the greatest. But it is an important fact to note that this man, aged 35, has really produced a remarkably interesting score.

IMAGINATION LEFT FREE

